To Librarians and others connected with Colleges, Schools, &c., who may not have access to a reliable guide in forming a Library, or replenishing an old one, it is believed this Catalogue will prove especially valuable as a manual of reference.

To prevent disappointment, it is required that, whenever books can not be obtained through any bookseller or local agent, applications for remittance should be addressed direct to the Publishers, which will be promptly attended to.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, New York.

CATARRH!

I am fully aware, that credulity has been taxed to its utmost, and public confidence nearly annihilated, by impositions and fraudulent pretensions in the "Catarrh Cure" and specifics for every malady. As a physician of many years practice, I have witnessed with abhorrence and disgust such nauseous frauds. But I claim exemption from the charge of such duplicity from the fact—long time established—that my discovery of the nature, origin, and character, or, in other words, my pathology of Catarrh is true, and, that my treatment proves a positive and radical cure.

Applicants by letter must faithfully describe their symptoms.

Office, No. 3 Bond Street, N. Y., and Marlboro Hotel, Boston. R. GOODALE, M.D.

GARNKIRK and American CHIMNEY TOPS, Glazed Stoneware, Drain-Pipes, English Fire and Bath Tiles, Garden Vases, &c.

LONG ISLAND POTTERY, Depot No. 82 Nassau Street, New York.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

MR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL, "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous Illustrations by the Author, was commenced in the DECEMBER Number of Harper's Magazine. It is printed from early sheets received from the Author in advance of publication in England—for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

Five Cents a Number: $2 50 a Year.

BULWER'S BRILLIANT ROMANCE, entitled "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?" pronounced to be the strongest work the Author has written, and largest novelist, by special arrangement with the Author, appears in HARPER'S WEEKLY simultaneously with its publication in England.

TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for One Year $1 00
One Copy for One Year 2 50
One Copy for Two Years 4 00
Five Copies for One Year 9 00
Ten Copies for One Year 17 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed to every Club of Twenty-five Subscribers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and WEEKLY," handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $2 00, is now ready.

Subscribers can have their Volumes bound by sending their Numbers bound, at Fifty Cents each. Twenty-five Cents must be remitted with each Volume to be bound. Postage Paid.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" will be furnished to clubs at the following rates:

Numbers from the commencement of both the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY will be supplied. Back Numbers to complete sets furnished gratuitously. Clergymen and Teachers supplied at half price.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" must be paid at the Office where they are received. When prepaid quarterly in advance, the Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year on the MAGAZINE and Twenty-six Cents a year on the WEEKLY.

Postage upon HARPER'S WEEKLY to Canada will remit, in addition to their Subscription, Thirty-six Cents a year, if the Postage is prepaid quarterly at the Office where the WEEKLY is received.

 Persons living in the City of New York wishing to have HARPER'S MAGAZINE and WEEKLY served to their houses and residences, with the subscription money, to the Publishers, can be supplied.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,

Franklin Square, New York.

E. WALKER & SONS, 114 FULTON STREET, BOOKBINDERS.

All work executed with promptness, and in as good style, and at as low prices, as any other establishment. Special attention given to the binding of HARPER'S MAGAZINE and WEEKLY.

New Patterns ready for Spencer's U. States, 2 vols.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. II.—No. 76.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 12, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

CONTENTS.

I. A VISIT TO THE SCHOONER "MOBILE," WITH TWO ILLUSTRATIONS.
II. EDITORIALS.
III. THE LOUNGER.
IV. LITERATURE: COLONEL CROCK, OR THE SECOND DRAGOONS, WITH A FINE FOOTRAT.
V. LOWLAND LIGHT.
VI. FUNERAL HONORS PAID AT CINCINNATI TO THE LATE GENERAL THEODORE F. SKETA, WITH TWO ILLUSTRATIONS.
VII. LITERARY.
VIII. DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.
IX. FOREIGN NEWS.
X. BILLY BOWLEGS AT NEW ORLEANS, WITH FIVE BEAUTIFUL ILLUSTRATIONS.
XI. THE DEVIL'S MARK.
XII. MY WESTERN LAND SPECULATION.
XIII. BEWSHER'S "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?" Continued.
XIV. THE REGATTA OF THE NEW YORK YACHT CLUB, WITH THREE EXQUISITE ILLUSTRATIONS!
XV. MISCELLANY.
XVI. THINGS HERE AND OTHERWISE.
XVII. MARKET AND FINANCIAL REPORTS.
XVIII. COMICALITIES.

A VISIT TO CAPTAIN HOWES, OF THE SCHOONER "MOBILE."

For the purpose of gaining full particulars of the outrage committed upon the American schooner Mobile, by the British war-ship Styx, we visited the Mobile while in New York harbor, and were fortunate in finding Captain Howes and his family on board. From him we learned the following facts: The schooner Mobile, of four hundred tons burden, was built at Saybrook, on the Connecticut River, is owned by Terry & Dillstore, merchants of New York city, and has been, with few exceptions, always employed in the coasting trade. Captain Allen Howes, her Commander, is a fine specimen of the American sailor, of unimpeachable character, and wherever he is known is regarded as a plain, straightforward, truth-telling man. He was born in one of Neptune's most favorite cradles, Cape Cod, in the locality known as the thriving town of Dennis, and is now thirty-eight years old; for twenty-two years he has lived, when on shore, at Barnstable, Massachusetts. When quite a lad he instinctively "took to the water," and having served his apprenticeship in "the East India trade," at the age of eighteen was a mate on board of one of our "coasters," and has remained in them ever since, excepting when making an occasional voyage to Europe.

Captain Howes left Mobile with his vessel deeply loaded with cotton, which was piled on her decks two tier high, and consequently perfectly visible by every passing ship. Her appearance in every respect was as unlike a slaver as possible, as she was low in the water, was evidently carrying a bulky cargo, and at the time she was overhauled was running away from Cuba and the slave mart, on her way to New York. About noon of the 20th of April Captain Howes was on deck and saw what afterward proved to be the war-steamer, then a mere speck on the horizon; his own vessel at the time was running into shore. An hour afterward Captain Howes made out the stranger to be bark-rigged, and as she ran across the bows of the Mobile took her to be a New York packet bound for Key West. The Captain then left the deck and went into his cabin, and lay down to take his usual nap, preparatory for the night-watch demanded by the difficult navigation of the Gulf. For the entire understanding of the reader, it is well to know that the cabin is built on the deck of the Mobile, and the entrance to it is from the stern, the door being directly opposite where the man stands at the wheel.

When Captain Howes retired to his state-room, he left on deck not only the crew, but his eldest daughter, an interesting girl of fourteen, and also Mr. Amisa F. Thomas, of Newark, New Jersey, a passenger from Mobile. In the cabin was Mrs. Howes, a very intelligent lady, and her youngest child Edith, some six or seven years of age, the Captain generally taking his family with him on his voyages to the South. Captain Howes had hardly composed himself for sleep before his daughter, much excited, came from the deck into the cabin and said: "Father, what is the vessel doing?" alluding to the steamship. Captain Howes looked out of the window of his state-room and saw the vessel within some two miles off, running square across his bows. Supposing that the vessel wished to speak to him, he came on deck to answer the hail, when the mate met him and said: "That is an English war-steamer." Captain Howes then ordered his ensign (the stars and stripes) to be set in the rigging so as to be most plainly seen. The steamer kept on until within hailing distance, and then rounded to on the Mobile's weather-quarter; the English flag was now, for the first time, noticed flying at the mizen-peak. On the wheel-house of the steamer, perfectly visible to every one on the SIDE OF THE "MOBILE," SHOWING THE MARK OF THE RIFLE-BALL.

THE BRITISH OFFICER BOARDING THE "MOBILE."

Mobile, were two men wearing linen jackets, one holding a spy-glass, which he occasionally used, and the other armed with a musket. Presently Captain Howes heard twice in succession what appeared to be the report of a rifle, but he could not realize or believe that the Englishman would fire into his vessel and endanger the lives under his charge when lying within hail. The mate now came up to Captain Howes and said, "They are firing at us, and with ball too." Captain Howes then ordered his vessel to be hove to, the same as if he were to receive a pilot. After this there were two shots fired, one ball going over the heads of the men working amidships and striking the water to the leeward, the other hitting the side of the vessel about eight feet abaft the forechannels (where the mark can now be seen). This third shot alarmed Mr. Thomas, the passenger; and Captain Howes, perceiving that his men were in danger, ordered the jibs to be hauled down, thinking that that might stop the firing. This wanton attack greatly incensed Captain Howes, whose first impulse was to disregard the steamer and proceed on his voyage, to force the assailing party to a more positive display of its intentions; but the recollection that he had his family on board, and the fact that his eldest daughter in terror had fled to her state-room, and that Mrs. Howes, greatly excited, was begging her husband to come into the cabin out of danger, he concluded to quietly submit, though with difficulty, to a course of events which he could not control.

Near four o'clock a boat was lowered from the English vessel and came alongside of the Mobile. There were some six or ten men in the boat, all apparently unarmed, with the exception of the officer, who wore a heavy sword. Coming alongside the Mobile, the man in the bow caught the brace of the square-sail yard, which enabled the officer to step on the channels, and then on the deck of the Mobile. Captain Howes meantime stood aft, having no desire, as he says himself, to welcome the gentleman on board. The officer wore the naval uniform of a British lieutenant, and upon reaching the deck asked the mate where the Captain was? On being told, he walked aft, and without any ceremony sat down on the tiller and took out of a black satchel he carried in his hand a book, which he put on the rudder head—Captain Howes the mean while standing, and up to the moment apparently unrecognized by the officer. The mate and Mr. Thomas also came aft, and heard the conversation which ensued.

The Englishman, having thus disposed of himself, and being the only gentleman seated, commenced his inquisition, as Captain Howes observes, "more searchingly than he ever witnessed in a revenue or quarantine officer." His first inquiry was,

"Where is this vessel from?"

"Mobile."

"Where bound?"

"New York."

"How many men do you carry?"

"Ten, all told."

"Number of passengers?"

"Five persons, including one gentleman and my family."

"What are you loaded with?"

"Cotton."

Captain Howes now concluded he would ask a few questions himself, and said, "What did you mean by firing into my vessel and frightening my wife and children?"

To which the Englishman replied, "Why did you not heave to when you saw a man-of-war to the windward with her ensign flying? You might have known that those on board wished to communicate with you."

Captain Howes, very much annoyed, replied, "Why the —— did you not run down on my stern and communicate, and do this without firing bullets into me?" and continued, stating "that it was quite common to see American and Spanish men-of-war in the Gulf with their colors flying, and that they had never stopped or interfered with him, and that it would not do for him to heave to and wait the motions of every man-of-war he saw with colors flying; and, besides, a pennant was not a necessary evidence of a man-of-war, for he" (Captain Howes) "had a long one on board which he often set."

To which the officer rejoined, with considerable asperity, "If I saw you with one set I would come on board your ship and have it down."

To which Captain Howes responded, "I'll be —— if you would."

The officer, now much irritated, got up from his seat and demanded to see the ship's papers, which Captain Howes started for the cabin to get, when the Englishman although he knew Captain Howes's family was in the cabin, pushed on, and, uninvited, entered. Mr. Thomas followed, and the mate remained at the door. Captain Howes then displayed his enrollment and license. The officer, after looking at them suspiciously for a moment, said, "You should have a register."

Captain Howes replied, that "vessels engaged in his trade did not have registers, but sailed under a license, and, if he was not satisfied, he could look at his clearance from Mobile, which was in regular form."

The Englishman seemed, or affected to be, satisfied, and laid the papers upon the table, when Captain Howes asked, "Did you take me for a slaver?"

"No!" distinctly and emphatically responded the officer, which denial was heard and noticed by Mr. Thomas and the mate.

"Then," continued Captain Howes, "why did you fire into my vessel after it was hove to?"

This act the Englishman promptly denied, when Mr. Thomas and the mate said, "You did fire into the vessel after it was hove to."

Captain Howes, in spite of himself, now unable to entirely repress the indignation he felt, said, "Knowing that my ship was not a slaver, it is very strange that you should want to board my vessel and insult my flag;" and added, "you had no right to do it."

The Englishman replied, "That he had orders to board every vessel going up and down the Gulf, and that it was very lucky for him" (Captain Howes) "that he hove to." This remark Mr. Thomas and the mate heard. The Englishman then went on to say that there was a treaty which gave him the right. This Captain Howes denied, when the Englishman, in a sarcastic way, remarked, "Well, likely you know better than I do!"

The Englishman, having apparently ended his search, Captain Howes suggested that if such was the case he would like to proceed on his voyage. The officer on this hint gathered up his book and put it in the satchel and left the cabin. When on deck, he turned to Captain Howes and said,

"This will not be the last of this!"

"I don't mean it shall be," retorted Captain Howes. The Englishman then, as if recollecting something, said that he wished very much to write in his log, for if Howes was going to make a statement he wished to make one too. Captain Howes denied him this privilege, and then left him, ordering the sailors to "draw away the fore-stay sail-sheet and hoist the jibs," taking no further notice of the Englishman, who went forward and got into his gig as best he could.

The man-of-war by this time was on the Mobile's lee-quarter, about two hundred yards distant, with the main top-sail to the mast, and when last seen by Captain Howes was still in this trim, as if the very sails and rigging were suffering for being engaged in such a dirty, cowardly business.

The English officer was about forty years of age, and, besides the usual blue coat, wore his epaulets. His manner was supercilious in the last degree, and he strode the deck of the American ship as if he were its master, and gave orders to see the papers and asked all his questions in an insulting tone. Illustrative of this manner, when Captain Howes remonstratingly said,

"I have been running in the Gulf twenty years, and was never before boarded or troubled in any way;" the officer replied, with a great deal of sarcasm in his manner, "That is no reason you should not be overhauled now."

In conclusion, it may be well to notice that the papers sympathizing with the enemy, and in their haste to give "aid and comfort," deny that any shots were ever fired in these recent outrages on the American flag. In reply to this, it is only necessary to observe that the crew of the Mobile. the Captain, Mr. Thomas, the passenger, all testify to the whistling of the balls, and the mark of one is still on the side of the ship. It is notorious that Captain Howes's eldest daughter was very seriously alarmed, and that Mrs. Howes conceived her husband's life in danger while on the deck of his own ship. Edith, the youngest girl, who was in the cabin, and too innocent to comprehend the danger, but witnessing the alarm, suggested that "her father should get Mr. Hawkins's (the mate's) awful gun, and shoot the men who were trying to kill her father."

Captain Howes gave us the above statement, which we transferred to paper as related from his own lips. Although naturally a rather silent and taciturn man, he can not refer to the scenes enacted on his vessel without feeling the uprising of intense indignation. At the time the Englishman came up with the Mobile the vessel was where a slaver was never seen, as they would have no reason for visiting the vicinity. She was fifty-four miles from the nearest point of Cuba, sixty miles from the Bay of Matanzas, and nearly seventy from Havana.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Saturday, June 12, 1858.

COST OF A WAR WITH ENGLAND.

NOW that the United States Senate and the press have decided that we are going to war with England, we may as well look the prospect in the face, and count the cost. If our ruling authorities are to be believed, war may burst upon us any day. That valuable newspaper, the Washington Union—which is compiled, written, and sustained exclusively by the intimate friends of the Administration—sounds an ominous war-whoop. Let us make haste, ere it be too late, to figure up the probable profit and loss of the enterprise in which we are about to embark.

And we may as well at once dismiss from consideration all old estimates. War, in the age of Achilles and Cæsar, cost nothing beyond a beggarly stipend and a beggarly commissariat for troops. Even in the time of Wellington and Napoleon the cost was comparatively moderate; the pay of the men employed was the leading, and almost the only important item. England incurred a debt of four thousand millions of dollars for the pay, feed, and transportation of the raw material of war, rank and file. In the day in which we live all this is altered. War costs at least four times as much as it did in the days of Napoleon, and fifty times as much as it did in the days of Cæsar. The pay of soldiers has doubled within the past twenty-five years; the United States could not hope to obtain available recruits at less wages than farmers and manufacturers are in the habit of paying for unskilled labor. Provisions have quintupled in value within the past century. Time was when twopence a day supported a soldier. A quarter of a dollar will not now place him in a condition to fight effectively. And transportation is far higher than it ever was. We read of times when £300 (say $1500) was a fair remuneration to a ship for an eight months' voyage from England to South America and back. Our vessels would think themselves very unfortunate if they obtained only ten times as much.

But science has revolutionized war, like every thing else; and now the cost of labor, commissariat, and transportation would be only a small part of the expense of a war. Improved shells, Congreve rockets, Minié rifles, Lancaster and Dahlgreen guns, telegraphs, electric wires, and the thousand-and-one scientific methods of destroying life comprehensively, each and all cost enormous sums of money. War, like other enterprises, has received a vast development of late years; we fight on a grander scale than our ancestors. The mere cost of the cannon-balls fired at Sebastopol exceeded the total expense of the whole Peninsular campaigns and our Revolutionary war. A single regiment armed with the Minié rifle costs more than a brigade used to do. A modern division—with cavalry, artillery, and infantry—is more expensive than a great army was in olden time. It must always be remembered that the progress which science has made renders military methods more effective, but not more economical.

Let us take the Crimean war as a test. It has been calculated that, independently of the pecuniary value of the quarter of a million of adult males who perished in that conflict, from first to last, the actual cost of the war was, in round numbers, two thousand millions of dollars, divided between Russia, England, France, Sardinia, and Turkey. This was a war of less than two years, fought at a single point. Each side enjoyed peculiar advantages. Each was enabled to communicate with its home reservoir without molestation. The Russians sent troops into Sebastopol, the Allies sent troops into Balaclava and Chersonese without opposition. Both belligerents thus saved the cost of contests by the way. All parties engaged had large standing armies, and were not compelled to make any considerable sacrifices for recruits.

Now, if—as the Senate and the press say—we are going to fight with Great Britain, the war could hardly last less than two years. It would, therefore, cost us at least a thousand millions, judging from the estimate of the Russian war. But it would cost more; for none of the nations engaged in the Russian war paid a quarter what we should be compelled to pay for troops. Russia, France, Sardinia, and Turkey obtain men by conscription—in various forms—and pay them a nominal hire. We should be compelled to pay full wages. At first volunteers might offer their services at low rates; but the experience of the Mexican war proves that if we wanted reliable troops we should have to pay them as good wages as they could obtain in a pacific calling. Labor, as a general rule, is worth in the United States at least twice as much as it is in Europe; we may therefore say that, so far as this item is concerned, our expenses would be double those of the nations engaged in the Russian war.

This, however, would be but a small part of the expense of a war. Judging from the latest commerce and navigation reports, we shall be within the mark if we say that we have 3,000,000 tons of shipping afloat, representing a capital of at least $165,000,000, which ought to yield an annual revenue of at least $22,000,000 a year. This would necessarily be totally lost in the event of a war with Great Britain. As was shown during the last war, the captures on the one side would balance those on the other; and as our trade would necessarily be destroyed, the revenue now derived from the carrying business would disappear.

Then we have $1,200,000,000 invested in railways. These roads derive their income from the carriage of immigrants and goods from the sea-board to the vacant lands of the interior, and again from the transportation of grain and other produce from the interior to the sea-board. To earn the ordinary interest these roads must do a business of $84,000,000 a year. This would, of course, cease when immigrants and merchandise ceased to arrive, and produce and grain ceased to be forwarded to the sea-board.

Again. We sent abroad, last year, over $360,000,000 worth of produce, chiefly cotton, breadstuffs, and specie. It is doubtful, considering the preponderating naval force of Great Britain, whether we should receive any specie to export. At any rate, we should not have any foreign market for surplus breadstuffs and cotton. And while our wealthy classes would be deprived by the war of their silks, laces, watches, jewelry, wines, and other luxuries, the rank and file of the nation would suffer from the absence of a demand for our great staples. Cotton would sell at three or four cents a pound; wheat at twenty-five cents a bushel; flour at two to three dollars a barrel. Instead of producing five hundred millions' worth of cotton, corn, and other produce per annum, we should not produce over a hundred and fifty millions' worth.

There has been some talk of the enhanced rate of interest which the war would cause. No doubt a war would enhance the rate of interest. Every body who wanted to borrow would pay more for money than he would have to do in time of peace. A farmer who needed a loan of $5000 would have to grant a mortgage for $6000 or $7000 instead of $5000, as he can do at present. And it is very doubtful whether Government securities would be salable at all. United States bonds could hardly be sold at any price during the two wars which we have had; it is brave to suppose that they would be more negotiable in the event of a new war. They sell high now, because we have Europe as a customer; if we were shut out from the European market they would not find purchasers very easily.

In a word, a war with England would cost us, in actual outlay, over a thousand millions a year, which there is no reason to believe we could borrow at less than the ruinous rates current during the late two wars. We shall be within safe limits if we assume that the thousand millions would cost us $1,250,000,000. We should, moreover, lose annually at least half a million in loss of interest on ships, steamers, and railways, and loss of trade to commercial houses and the enterprises which depend on them. Independently, therefore, of any loss to be caused by the bombardment of our sea-port towns, or by the landing of negro regiments in the South, charged with the duty of exciting servile insurrections, a war with Great Britain would cost us at least $1,750,000,000 per annum—in other words, $70 per annum for each white person, man, woman, and child. Assuming that each family consists of four persons—a low estimate for this country—the war would cost every adult male $280 a year as long as it lasted. How this could be borne every citizen can judge.

The writer enjoys the acquaintance of a Liverpool merchant whose experience illustrates the immense advantage of foreign wars. In conversation a few months since, the Liverpool gentleman observed that the taxes which he paid to Government for the liquidation of the interest on the war debt amounted to just as much as all the rest of his expenses. His expenditure was divided into two equal parts—one for the Government to pay the cost of England's foreign wars, the other to support himself. Every citizen of the United States can thus realize the effect of a foreign war.

Now let us see how soon we can go to war with Great Britain.

THE RIOTS AT NEW ORLEANS.

From the meagre and obviously partial accounts which we have received by telegraph from New Orleans, it is not easy to form a reliable judgment on the transactions which occurred in that city on Wednesday and Thursday of last week. We are told that "the murders and acts of violence" which have disgraced the city of late years required an abnormal remedy, and that, in presence of an imbecile and corrupt magistracy and police, nothing was left for the people but to take the law into their own hands. Acting on this principle, a number of persons seem to have assembled together, seized a quantity of arms, erected barricades, set the laws and magistrates at defiance, and raised the flag of insurrection; and, after a few hours' debate, the Mayor is said to have compromised the matter, by relinquishing to the insurgents all police authority within the city.

If all this be so, we can only say that New Orleans must be a curious place, and the people and magistrates equally droll fellows. It has usually been considered that Democracy and universal suffrage rendered the people of every constituency responsible for their government and laws, as they had the power to change them at will. No man is well founded in complaining of a grievance which it rests with him to cure; and the idea that in a Democratic community, where the power of the people is unfettered, any amount of disorder can justify a rebellion against the lawful decisions of the majority is preposterous.

Violence, disorder, and crime are common in many American cities. That they might be more vigorously repressed than they are by the city magistracies is quite true; but the fact that they are not does not justify people in rebelling against the officers of their own creation. The remedy lies elsewhere—at the ballot-box, on election-day. It is the business of the people to elect men who will repress disorder; if they do not, they must take the consequences.

We hear much, not only at New Orleans, but elsewhere as well, of the defeat of the system of universal suffrage by violence at the polls. The Mayor of New Orleans is said to have been elected, with the aid of violence, by a minority of the electors. This may be so, but whose fault is it? If the majority lets itself be thrashed by the minority, with what grace can it complain afterward, and resort, in its turn, to lawless violence? The theory of Anglo-Saxon representative institutions presumes that every individual has manhood enough to defend and assert his rights. There are turbulent and riotous individuals in every community; but can it be seriously pretended that the true mode of dealing with them is to let them have their own way on election-day, and then afterward to rise in rebellion against the constituted authorities, and set up barricades?

There are several places in the United States where people seem ignorant of the most essential political duties. If it were universally understood that the suffrage involves a duty as well as confers a privilege, and that the man who allows himself by violence or threats to be driven from the ballot-box is a coward unworthy of citizenship, there would be less misgovernment and less talk about Vigilance Committees.

These latter phenomena, it is to be feared, are generally the work either of infringing and disappointed demagogues, who hope, by the exercise of lawless violence, to obtain what they could never get by fair means, or of faint-hearted religious who, in a moment of passionate impulse, seek to repair the consequences of a long career of fatal inhumanity. Another case are they entitled to the least sympathy.

A LITERARY FRAUD.

A POSTMASTER in Alabama sends us the circular of a Philadelphia publishing house, which is now purporting to contain an account of "Dr. Livingstone's Seventeen Years' Explorations and Adventures in the Wilds of Africa." Among other things, the book is said to narrate how "Dr. Livingstone was imprisoned three years in a subterranean cave 300 miles long," in which he "discovers diamonds and gold of immense value," escaping from which "he commences his journey of 3000 miles through a country full of wild beasts, where he is attacked by four lions—two are killed, and on the spot, and the Doctor is crippled for life," etc., etc. Ten thousand agents are wanted to circulate the work, almost any of whom, the circular says, "can make ten dollars a day."

This circular appears to have been largely distributed throughout the South and West, and our friend writes to inquire if the book which it describes is a genuine edition. We reply, that it is a gross forgery and imposition. It does not contain a single line written or furnished by Dr. Livingstone, and the incidents described do not bear the slightest resemblance to those narrated in the genuine work. The book is, and is intended to be, a fraud and an imposition upon the public, why it is not safe to be on their guard against this as well as several other spurious or mutilated books bearing the same general title.

THE LOUNGER.

A LETTER FROM MRS. DORLEY.

"MR. LOUNGER,—I wish to call your attention to a very serious matter; serious, I mean, to ladies who must go shopping, and who, we may trust not —or would not, even if she could not? Mrs. Hunt Mr. Stewart is about enlarging his vast store, establishment, or shop, and I was told as I went through you to ask him, why he will not employ women in some of the departments. I do not think to be unreasonable. I am perfectly willing that the young ladies should still have the satisfaction of being served by gallant young gentlemen in the rooms where they now are—nor am I so heartless (or pos sible) so far as to wish to deprive the handsome gentlemen of the sweet society of shoppers. (You may put the sweet where you choose.) Certainly not. But as I am a married lady myself (not old, you know, but still not elderly), I feel that it is sometimes very awkward to obtain such attendance as I wish. Some of the young gentlemen, in truth, are not so very deferential. Some of them are very pronounced in their ellans, and unsatisfactory. I say some of them, and I offer here compliments of the season, memory. Perhaps we who are not so very young are a little more exacting; but I do not like to be treated as if I were having a favor conferred upon me by a young man in a shop when he shows me goods.

"And there is one other thing. When my daughter Henrietta Helen is a little older, I don't want her to buy certain articles of feminine attire of young men. I forbear to mention them. Sir, if you are a married man (or if only hope for your own happiness you are), you will readily understand that there may be several things for which women can more agreeably negotiate with women. I am told that in Paris it is altogether the custom for women to tend the shop. My cousin Pimpernel tells me that in that city he and his friends only have his gloves tried on and his cravats tied and fitted about his neck by women, among women, and in fact, which reason to see desirable. I should, recommend judicious elderly ladies for that business. Cousin Pimpernel says it is sometimes very difficult as it for a man to be fitted with a cravat to his mind, in Paris. It used to take him half an hour or more to find one to suit him, in Paris. Helen wants to know how it would do for the young gentlemen at Stewart's to go on the cellar and eaps of the young ladies who go there. She says she thinks it might present the air of such things. But she is a giddy girl—only fifteen! so I am very well excuse her.

"Don't you think that Mr. Stewart might think seriously of this proposition? He may leave every thing just as it is, or present, only to employ women in the new rooms. Please suggest it to him. Perhaps he does not read your paper. But could you not send him a copy? I suppose you publish it for the sake of having it read.

"Respectfully yours,

"MRS. NANCY J. DORLEY."

—The Lounger knows Mrs. Dobley's confidence that Mr. Stewart will seriously consider and favorably a proposition. It would be a great satisfaction to many ladies if they could be sent to female clerks upon by women; and long experience has proved their capability of even rivaling some men in shopkeeping.

THE STEAMERS.

ON Monday June came out in full force. On Tuesday she sulked and reported a little. On Wednesday the most summer air, with a spice of the East. But on Thursday dawned a perfect day, calm and warm, breathing softly from the south. It breathed too softly—for what are yachts in a calm? It breathed up the bay, too, when yachts wanted to go down. But man is master of the south wind, and at the appointed hour the starting signal-gun pealed along the water, and the regatta of '58 commenced.

The finest harbor and bay in the world were flecked with white sails. Steering and drifting and idly floating, the great craft and the little craft stood off and on, while shoals of steamers swarming with eager people darted among them, raced down the Narrows, turned and returned with streaming flags and ringing bells and bottles of music here and there. The tufted shores of Staten Island and Hudson Island were alive, upon convenient points, with gay throngs. Pleasure-parties, vehicles, carriages and horses—shawls spread upon the grass and chairs set in the grass. The day itself was a festival. The distances muffled in tender haze, and all the Loungers upon the yachts or upon the shore,

"Like things of the season gay, like the bountiful season bland,
When the sap is up in the trees and the sun is in love with the land,"

Half lost in the liquid azure bloom of a creature of spring,
The silent sapphire-spangled marriage-ring of the land."

Seen from below, the haze hanging across the river suddenly blossomed with the white wings of the Squadron, which slowly opened into the full spectacle of the race. The low yacht, all wet with painted canvas, and after long silent delays, the saucy little sailer Gitana, and the long-lined Wind—logua to slip lithely through the rippling water, and slowly, slowly coming far across, with every dazzling inch spread, the Sylvie Nokomis—a cause straining on and passed below the spectators upon Staten Island. But all had passed the stake-boat, the Josephine steamer, with the judges on board, moved slowly down to meet the fleet toward the lower stake in the Southwest Spit. Meanwhile, gaping pageant passed, and the wide solitary lower bay was as lively as a fashionable street in a fair. Steamboats of all sizes, pilot-boats, sloops, schooners, brigs, and barks, and ships, standing in under full sail, or following tow-lines more artificially in the scene. A huge barge, crowded with spectators and drawn by a mere tadpole of a steamer, moved gravely along, giving its passengers ample opportunity of studying the scene—of seeing, were they so inclined; and on one active steamer, where people were packed with people like honey-pots with flies, the unforgiving activity of the fussy little steamboat, the walking-beam of the engine and so rose and fell with every motion of the waves, ingeniously combining the excitement of a rocking-horse with the exhilaration of a regatta in a calm.

But the calm was unsatisfactory, and with pulsing airs the light yachts slid the sea. Far away they were scarcely more than specks, almost, in "the liquid azure bloom." Once more gleaming sails met it, and so before the flowering gale flying homeward in the afternoon, with every possible variety of wrath—what miscalculation and chagrin—what unforgiving indignation—what fierce determination to discover under those snowy canopies upon that shining surface! To-day was the magician, and the puppets danced nimbly to his music. To-day was beauty upon the bay, like heavy-dew upon leaves, like the bloom upon the cheek of youthful maidens. And though the Yacht Club should last a thousand years, even in each of the thousand summers spread all its canvas to the sun, and all its flags to the sun shine, nor greener leaves glisten, nor sweeter flowers bloom, than those which adorned the regatta of fifty-eight.

RICHARD'S HIMSELF AGAIN!

AND who is not glad of it? Who is not pleased to see that the manager who brought us Jenny Lind proposes to do something else than fill his pockets? How he has labored for that end! Have we not all cursed him? Have we not been disgusted two shillings—the nurse of Washington—offered impudently, in a somewhat India-rubber condition? (Why does not Barnum immediately purchase of Thackeray's "Virginians" suggest, with an effective humor, that "the Washington" shall introduce Jose Herb into his story?) Have we not all grated in wonder upon the woolly horse, and upon that rare and extraordinary animal, the lion head that was where his tail ought to be? The mermaid, the bearded lady, the glass-eyed woman, and the fish? Are we to forget these things? It may be true that "the one person in ten knows what an aquaria is" not at all unlikely; nevertheless, after that—let us say two in eleven—ought to know what a good manager is.

Now heroes of various kinds, enculcate old wisdom, and point a moral to their tales, ought to be regarded as the fresh of genius—as the fruit of a shrewd, good-humored director—whereby money was easily extracted. Such is the principle of bringing the greatest singer since Malibran to the United States.

Mr. Barnum did that, and it was well done. There was never such a remarkable and deserved success; and it was owing to nothing else but the success always is, to sagacious management. The public was not deceived, and therefore it was not right at a talent for puffing.

And it was a good thing to bring over Jenny Lind, advertise wherever it could be advertised, and sell. Of course he could. Why, then, did not "any body" do it? Why did not he make three hundred dollars? It was a happy hit, at least, and the managers of the other experiments of Mr. Barnum, of course he made his fortune. Mr. Crystal Palaces—alas the day! Then he had to go instead of his clocks. But no man is always successful, and Mr. Barnum has done enough to show that he has the talent of success.

The new Opera enterprise is certainly promising. He proposes to bring over the entire company of the Opera Comique, Paris, under the direction of Mr. Monager Lumley, who will come to superview the performances. The troupe includes Piccolomini, Tiriens, Ortolani, and Ginglini the tenor. Among the dancers is Rosati. Before concluding the arrangement Mr. Barnum wishes to make sure of getting for a fortnight a theatre of eight hundred persons at five dollars a night for twenty nights.

The difficulty is the price. If the eight hundred who first come forward are to pay five dollars a night, for twenty nights; the rest of the public must pay the same; and it is simply impossible to succeed at that rate. Even a slight reduction will not help it. We have had for several months a better Opera than the average European visits, and we have not paid more than a dollar and a half. The reason is plain. It is because the singers, the singers, the only one known here at all is Steffanone, Mr. Gretalon's reputation, although she sang last season in London, has not yet reached us; and Tiriens is entirely new—for, doubtless, but unknown here. Now we cannot go with a premium. Colonial, too, is not a sure success. She is charming in small parts, as we gather from those who have heard her; and her London success was due partly upon the romance of her career, is not quite permanent. Ortolani is known to them who are familiar with the Opera world, but she is not a great favorite as Maria hair; and as is a fair question whether Piccolomini might not suit us more.

We say these things in the kindest spirit. The enterprise is so serious that it should be well considered. It would be a grave misfortune for Mr. Barnum to fail in his first fresh step. We wish him the best luck. But the undertaking is so well as any man that we are not to be put off with rumors of what singers "are to be" engaged, and offers. It did with Patti—it did with Frezzolini—it did with Piccolomini's pitch! with Grisi. But with Jenny Lind, with Ristori, with Rachel, with splendid voices in their prime—how great and deserved the success!

So may it be with "Her Majesty's" in Irving Place!

THE TIMES.

IN LOUNGER, with the best possible intentions of laziness, can hardly escape some kind of interest in the public questions of the moment. The British question—the Utah question—the Kansas question—the American question—and the question of Vigilance Committees, are on the side of the table lands.

Perhaps the most startling form of the democratic inquiry is that of the Vigilance Committee. It is a practical confession that the ordinary forms have failed, and that it is necessary to rub out and begin again. In San Francisco the experiment was tried, not without success; and, as we write, it is being tried in New York.

It is always hard to decide when the revolutionary point has been reached; and that may be a cruel task which will be a crime to the conscience. The end of government is the protection of individual liberty. That is the eloquent free development of individual life. When the machinery to protect, a revolution is initiated, which will, consciously or blindly, destroy it—generally blindly, perhaps violently. In New York there was a very general conviction that the machinery of the government, and it was not aside. It was a change which, in other countries, could have been effected only at the cannon's mouth.

In this country a Vigilance Committee ought never to be necessary. If good men, wise men, and educated men, did their duty at the polls, it would be useless. But if the intelligence and moral power abdicate for government, ignorance and violence will certainly usurp it.

The Times is the ablest London paper with a thousand texts that preach themselves.

A LOVE-SONG.

THE rippling melody of pathos in George Darley's love-song belongs to the early, varied, luscious lyrical poetry of England. How charming to you choose to give its melancholy strain:

"Sweet be her green dell the flower of beauty slow lies,
Lulled by the faint breezes sighing through ivy and roses.
Sleeps she, and hears not the melancholy numbers
That her true love's harp lute shall be ready to?

"Down from the high chills the rivulet is tossing,
To wind round the willow banks that love him from above.
Oh, that is tears, from my rocky prison streaming,
Which could gild to be bower of my love!

"Ah! where the woodbines, with sleepy arm, kissed
Open she her eyelids at the dream of my lay,
Saluting, like the dove, while the fountains color
To her flit maiden eat in the forest far away.

"Come, Night, and lay me for the poem thou ever bearest,
Still Heaven's messenger of peace, and Love's friend!
Come—but bring not with thee any faithless, my fairest,
Birds with its death-wounded deeper yet in their wing."

THE DERBY DAY.

LORD DERBY is having his day. Not only as Prime Minister of England did he conquer in the recent debates upon the India instructions, but as an English gentleman he has come very near to victory at Epsom races, making the day literally his own. Lord Derby Troublefield was not unlucky. His colt Lord Derby Babylon came out last. The question forces itself, whether the gentleman and lord who owns horses are to continue to enter the reputation of his country in the successive races, and to continue to be defeated? He ought to consider that as a private gentleman he only loses his money, but as an American he loses a certain kind of prestige to his country.

It is an interesting fact to our non-racing readers, that the owner of the successful horse at the "Derby" this year won two hundred thousand dollars by the success. Mr. Merry, the owner of the horse that came in second, had the same day to procure for the rest of his life to that triumphant stranger! What a goddess it has probably secured to the lucky owner!

POOR RICHARD.

A LATE letter from Paris mentions a portrait of Benjamin Franklin now for sale there. It was painted by Duplessis in 1779, and belongs to a gentleman, who, greatly reverencing Poor Richard, and now growing very old, wishes it should come into the possession of some American institution. We wish that all our venerable friends of the New York Historical Society turn their attention to the matter. An original, authentic portrait of him who stole the fire and the sceptre, and if tradition be true—the lightning rod—of the Father of Electricity, who would be a century old had they lived—does not hang upon every wall. Benign old man! How like in temperament to the late great French philosopher, Mr. Lincoln seems in Franklin was song in Krueger. There is a portrait of each of them, sensible, clear, and reading, and it is pleasant to notice the resemblance of mind in the expression they produce. Franklin was typical of the whole of the old characteristic of the Yankee, but he had a profound liking for France, and France had a profound liking for American letters.

Why will not the Historical Society, the Historical Society, secure the portrait?

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

A READER writes:

"DEAR LOUNGER—What has Mr. Lewis Cass, Jun., been doing at Rome? He is reported to have resigned because, in consequence of the Mortara affair, he could not support Antonelli. How delicious! Do tell us what it can be! Were it not for the Mortara affair, Mr. Cass would—Stuck. Oh my! if he knew we had written you this note. Now Mr. Cass, Jun., tell us what."

—Little dears,—in the city of Rome lives the Pope. Mr. Lewis Cass, Jun., is from the United States Minister at the Papal Court; and the diplomatic duties consist in introducing the American nobility and gentry to the Pope's toe. Now, as the Pope is a pneumatist, it is improper to turn your back upon his Holiness in retiring. You must, in fact, back out of his presence. Now, probably, after having introduced Mr. Smith to the Father of the Faithful, our Minister retires backwardly upon the gouty feet of some cardinal, who, to repress the impulse to kick, prefers to stir up the fires of the Inquisition, and so Rome forgives the hot for the retiring Mr. Cass, Jun. The moral is—when you are introduced to the Pope, be like Mr. Cass, Jun., whoever in any to at the time, not to tread upon any body's toes—that is to say, when he walks backward to look out for the cardinals.

—Mr. JOHN BEE replies, in a mild and persuasive strain, to some strictures of the Lounger upon the Church of Popish Corruptions in the Gulf, in which allusion was made to the pecuniary habit of Mr. Bull by himself and his cousin Jonathan. Mr. Bull remarks that he is not the subject of the correspondent, that the Lounger is "an ungrateful fellow," and that he is very much afraid he has misstated the scope of these opinions; and he begs to assure that he has justly prognosticated the issue of the present debate. Mr. Bull in England will declare that she did not mean war. The case is clear that he has misunderstood. Mr. Bull "only little officers" must be rebuked. Mr. Bull in England will declare that he did not intend to offend Jonathan, was not altogether lovely, and that the Crimea is not a very glorious page of English history!

—The remarks, friend Lounger, made in regard to the mechanical tendency of academies, and, indeed, of every part of the well exemplified in various productions which we receive from time to time, where intelligent, that this gentleman is not a man who has not also had an even sufficient attention to the subject of art to be able to distinguish between a piece of mechanism and a real work "art that can awaken soft kind of sentiment, some tenderness, some feeling, some regret, some hope," even though it should be turned out by the thousand from the mint of Parisian art. That is how received this impression to a great extent by even the best of the French schools. The appearance of pictures of this character which are being continually sent over to this country from the French artists of the true merit and the discouragement of rising art. We have, however, every confidence that the public will soon become sufficiently educated to appreciate at their true value the productions of the French academies, and thereby encourage the production of a higher class of art. We shall look eagerly for the report of the Academy exhibition.

—T. S. M. writes from St. John's, New Brunswick:

"Cause this letter being sealed with shoemakers' wax, I take the liberty of writing to you, and should you want to know what I am doing here, I will tell you I am the unworthy editor of a weekly paper, and having the manner of going more substantially to work. They laugh at us here, and say time and we shall see."

MR. T. S. M. was pained by the absence of poetry in a certain number of the Weekly, and, anxious to keep the fire burning upon the altar, begs he invokes the aid of the Lounger to fashion his offering. He sends it to the vast material, with perfect good manners, concludes:

"I do now faithfully yours remain
And hope to receive a sweet apple
Such a horned fearful name
Among Christian men."

PHILIP ST. GEORGE COOKE, LIEUT.-COLONEL SECOND DRAGOONS.

Lieutenant-Colonel Philip St. George Cooke, of whom we present an accurate likeness, is among the officers commanding in the expedition to Utah. He is one of the most meritorious soldiers in the United States army, and his perils and sufferings lately, on the stormy route to Salt Lake City, have excited widely-extended interest and attention.

He was born in Berkeley County, Virginia, in 1809—the youngest of many brothers who have been eminent in the South and West. Among these we may mention John R. Cooke, a gentleman of much distinction at the Virginia bar; and Dr. John Esten Cooke, formerly President of Transylvania University. Colonel Cooke from early boyhood longed to lead the life of a soldier, but was opposed by his parents. At fourteen, attempting to fight a duel with one of his companions, his parents yielded to his proclivities, and he soon entered West Point. He graduated in 1827, at the age of eighteen, and entered the army with the rank of third or fourth lieutenant. Soon afterward, as lieutenant of infantry—though scarcely more than a boy—he conducted, under circumstances of extraordinary hardship and trial, a body of two hundred men some six hundred miles up the Missouri; and also took part in an expedition to Santa Fé, meeting and overcoming a band of hostile Indians. He was afterward engaged in the "Black Hawk War," and was at the battle of Broad Axe.

As Major of Second Dragoons he served in California and in the Mexican War, and conducted the "Mormon Brigade" across the continent to San Francisco. His reports of the route which he followed in these marches were published by the War Department, and will be found full of interest. Many persons believe that the only practicable line for the Pacific railroad is that laid down on the maps as "Colonel Cooke's route." In 1854 he was commandant of one of the great departments of New Mexico. At this time he fought the battle of Cineguilas, defeating the Camanches and other savages with considerable bloodshed. From this distant post he soon afterward passed to Kansas, which was then convulsed. He was deputed to carry into effect the orders of Government; and this critical task was fulfilled with great prudence, firmness, and discretion. His coolness and decision upon this trying occasion undoubtedly prevented the occurrence of terrible scenes, and both parties fully recognized the propriety of his course.

When the Utah expedition was determined upon, Colonel Cooke was at once fixed upon to lead a portion of the troops. To his detachment was intrusted the safe-conduct of Governor Cumming and other civil dignitaries. Of the wild and strange incidents of the march of the army to Utah we need not speak. The journals of the day have chronicled the details, and they have been universally read. We doubt if the country at large, however, has realized, in any adequate degree, the perils and hardships of the onward advance of our brave troops, through blinding snow-storms, over the bleak and bare wastes of the great plains. Colonel Cooke's horses and mules perished by the hundred for want of fodder; the stores for the men were necessarily abandoned; still, in spite of every thing, they pushed on, and overcame all the terrors of the storm and the desert.

We have but little to add in relation to Colonel Cooke. His fortune has been to take part in few of those decisive encounters upon a conspicuous theatre of action which alone attract strongly the public attention. He has borne the "heat of the day," instead of catching by chance those "bright rewards" which ever and anon fall to the lot of holiday soldiers. For thirty years he has been in harness, guarding the frontier against a wily and untiring foe; and as he has performed faithfully his duty, he has not missed his reward. He is at this moment one of the best known and most popular officers in the army throughout all the great Western tier of States. The citizens of these States are fully aware of his services, and justly hold him in high favor and esteem. He has won this honorable distinction by never nodding at his post, but watching with sleepless vigilance over the regions he has been posted to defend. Colonel Cooke is a thoroughly-trained soldier—a man to be relied on; that is the origin of his popularity and distinction.

PHILIP ST. GEORGE COOKE, LIEUTENANT-COLONEL SECOND DRAGOONS, SERVING WITH THE ARMY IN UTAH.

LUNCAN'S LIGHT.

I was born in a small frame-house situated upon a gray sandy ridge, on what is called the "Highlands" of Cape Cod, in the good old State of Massachusetts. My grandfather had a family of fourteen children—eleven sons and three daughters—all of whom lived to become fathers and mothers excepting one son, who was cut off in the vigor of manhood in the following manner: My grandfather was about the first individual in New England who attempted the hazardous business of pursuing the humpback and other species of the whale tribe, which, in the days of our colonial history, were often seen by fishermen, showing their black sides in the turbulent waters about George's or other shoals near the island of Nantucket. My grandfather owned a small schooner called the Harmony, and, with five or more of his sons, was in the habit of cruising for whale in the summer months, and in the winter would occasionally take an adventurous trip to the nearest West India Islands with fish to be exchanged for sugar, molasses, and coffee. On one of his summer voyages he fell in with a whale of large size, and preparations were immediately made for its capture. The second son, a man of extraordinary strength and quickness of action, was usually selected by his father for harpoon-man, whose office was, as it is now, to stand at the bow of the boat ready to cast the iron into the body of the monster as he rose to the surface for air. The whale rose, indeed, but with fatal force, and, with its mouth open, struck the bow of the boat, and my uncle, standing erect with his harpoon poised, pitched into the ponderous jaws of the monster, and one piercing shriek was all that was ever heard of the beloved and brave man. My grandmother, the same evening, while standing at her window, and a flash of lightning came illuminating the room, saw distinctly the image of her son standing at a short distance from the house, and she immediately passed out, and called many times, at the top of her voice, "Tully! Tully!"—the name of her son—in agonizing tones, but which were never to reach the beloved one's ear. I did not myself see this, but I believe it as religiously as if I had, as it is well authenticated by all the family then at home that my grandmother then predicted the death of her son. I account for it by supposing that great anxiety for the return of the precious crew operated upon her imagination, rather than, as was at that time believed, that the spirit had assumed its former shape, "to walk the earth for a time."

Around the weather-beaten and sandy shores of Cape Cod, now inhabited by an intelligent and wealthy population, there are but one or two good harbors: sand-reefs and bars, in most places, extend far off into the sea, making it a dangerous place in heavy storms.

Near one of these dangerous points, and from time immemorial, there has been seen, or said to have been seen, even down to the present day, during every night in the month of September, a round and brilliant ball of light, which is called "Luncan's Light;" and when it has sometimes approached near to the shore, boats have endeavored to get outside of it, but never succeeded. "Like a guilty thing," it eluded all attempts to get near to offer it speech.

The ancient legend respecting the cause of the appearance of this mysterious and much-dreaded light is embodied in the following narrative, which, I doubt not, has been in substance related to many persons now alive, descendants of the ancient inhabitants of this renowned and stormy cape.

At the far-back date when buccaneers were allowed, almost with impunity, to sweep the seas and scour the coasts for plunder, a renowned freebooter, commanding a famous piratical craft called the Scourge, was driven by stress of weather near the reefs in front of where my father's house afterward stood; but the weather having become moderate, most of the crew were sent aloft to attend to necessary jobs to the rigging and sails. A quarrel ensued, when one of the men killed another by driving a sail-needle into his brain, and stowed the body in a sail in the top. Night coming on, and the man being missed, he was supposed to have accidentally fallen overboard, the sailors all denying any knowledge of what had become of the missing man. In the middle-watch, when every noise was hushed on board, and in a dead calm, there came from aloft a voice, loud and sepulchral, reaching every ear on board, saying "Let go! let go! let go!" and down came heavily upon the deck the corpse of a man, with a sail-needle sticking in the head. All hands were immediately called, and the captain held a formal examination of each one on board, and they all at once denied all knowledge of the occurrence. After every inducement was tendered and every threat exhausted in order to elicit the truth, without success, the captain finally resorted to the following method to unravel the difficulty. He ordered the body to be placed in the centre of the deck, and each sailor to pass in a circle around it, and touch the needle, saying that the guilty man's touch would cause the blood to flow from the wound. The last man approached, with whitened lips and faltering steps, and, lo! the blood rushed from the wound, and the murderer stood convicted.

From that time "Luncan's Light" has, in each night during the stormy month of September, cast its dread rays over the shoals of Cape Cod.

FUNERAL HONORS PAID TO GEN. PERSIFER F. SMITH AT CINCINNATI.

We alluded, a few days since, to the death of the veteran soldier, General Persifer F. Smith, who had just been placed in command of the Utah army. We are now enabled to engrave two of the scenes which marked the transmission of his remains through Cincinnati, on their way to their final resting-place at Philadelphia.

The demonstration was characteristic of the public spirit that has always animated the citizens of the Great West's "Queen City."

As soon as an intimation had been received that the remains would pass through the city, Colonel Buchanan, of the United States Newport barracks, located on the Ohio River, directly opposite Cincinnati, consulted with the military gentlemen of the city, and intrusted to them the general arrangements for the reception and escort. The remains arrived on Wednesday (26th), at about three o'clock P.M., in charge of Adams & Co.'s Express, and accompanied by Lieutenants Wheaton and Drum, of General Smith's staff. They were immediately taken in charge by detachments of the United States troops commanded by Lieutenant Whistler, and the Cincinnati Rover Guards, under Lieutenant H. G. Kennett, and escorted to the Melodeon Hall upon a field-piece, which had been arranged as a funeral-car, appropriately draped in mourning for that purpose.

In the Hall an officers' marquee had been pitched in military style, the American flag flying in front at half-mast, the roof of the tent covered with the stars and stripes, and the poles, curtains, and walls festooned with black cloth. Beneath the canopy was erected a temporary mausoleum, to receive the corpse; and the entire surroundings were deeply solemn, significant, and appropriate. Here the remains of the gallant chief, who had so often periled his life for his country's honor, were laid in state, covered by the flag he had for many years so bravely defended. They remained here in charge of the "Rovers" as a guard of honor during the remainder of the day and night, and until five o'clock on Thursday morning. During the entire time sentinels paced around the couch of death in solemn silence, only interrupted by an occasional low but sharp "qui vive," or by the necessary guard mounting at regular intervals.

Several thousand citizens, ladies and gentlemen, visited the scene up to a late hour, but a profound stillness prevailed, and the impressiveness of the occasion suffered no rude disturbance. Besides the guards, a staff of officers kept quiet vigil within the marquee.

At daybreak the low roll of the muffled drum summoned the troops to "fall in," and the remains were conveyed to the Little Miami dépôt, escorted by the Rover Guards and a delegation of officers, including Generals W. H. Lytle and staff, and C. H. Sargent and staff. In the original programme it had been arranged that the entire third brigade (General Sargent's) should form the departing escort. The troops were under arms several hours on Wednesday afternoon; but the uncertainty of the time and mode of departure, until a late hour in the day, compelled the abandonment of this design.

In our first engraving the artist has depicted the approach of the escort to the Melodeon, the column extending from the corner of Fourth and Walnut streets eastward on Fourth. St. Paul's Episcopal Church is brought into the view on the right. The company in front are the United States troops from Newport barracks; that in the rear the Rover Guards, in their magnificent uniform of scarlet, blue, and buff, and bear-skin hats. This company had sixty men on duty for twenty-four hours.

The second picture represents the interior of the hall and the marquee beneath which the remains reposed, with the sentinels and officers on duty. These views were photographed by Faris, of Cincinnati.

FUNERAL HONORS TO GENERAL SMITH AT CINCINNATI.—THE APPROACH OF THE ESCORT TO THE MELODEON.

The particulars of General Smith's life are already well known to our readers through the newspapers. We will only state here that he was born in Philadelphia, in November, 1798; his father, Jonathan Smith, was cashier first of the Bank of Pennsylvania, then of the United States Bank. His maternal grandfather, Persifer Frazer, was a Lieutenant-Colonel in the Revolutionary army. The future General graduated at Princeton, studied law in Philadelphia, and practiced in New Orleans, where he resided for many years of his life, and filled various civil and judicial offices. He had always a passion for arms; but his first service was in the Seminole war, to the scene of which he repaired at the head of a regiment of volunteers. His services there gained him the respect and attention of his chiefs, Generals Scott, Gaines, and Taylor.

On the conclusion of this service he returned to his judicial duties in New Orleans, where he remained until 1846, when General Taylor needing reinforcements on the Rio Grande, Smith in six weeks raised, equipped, and organized five regiments of volunteers, and at once marched to Taylor's assistance. For his services at Monterey he was brevetted Brigadier-General; distinguished himself further at Contreras, Churubusco, Chapultepec, before the city of Mexico, and was one of the officers who negotiated the armistice. For his services at Contreras he was brevetted Major-General.

Since the conclusion of the war he has held command successively in California, Texas, the Department of the West, and, finally, on the 15th of April last, he received command of the troops in the Department of Utah. He had suffered for some time from chronic diarrhœa, to which disease he finally succumbed. The prominent features of the deceased General character were great tact, excellent judgment, the most agreeable and ingressive manners, and an intense military enthusiasm. He was in every sense fitted for military command, and is a brilliant instance of the natural American talent for warlike operations, by which, in times of need, our country has often obtained her best servants from the ranks of her citizen soldiery. In private life he was a most genial and estimable man.

THE MARQUEE.

LITERARY.

Books of travel continue to increase. We have none to speak highly of. A gentleman who has traveled and written a book, publishes it under the curious title of The Para Papers on France, Egypt, and Ethiopia, and in the curious style in which they get up books in Paris. The book is printed and bound in France, with the name of Mason Brothers, New York, publishers, on the title-page, under the name of the French publisher; and the volume is, therefore, almost as far-fetched as its title, which travelers in the East will recognize as an equivalent to The Farthing Papers, or a little less: for a para is about the fifth part of an American cent. The author does not under-estimate the value of his papers. Such books are poor substitutes for the guide-books out of which they are made up, and as assistants to those who stay at home they are not as interesting as old Murrays.

In this volume we have the account of the author's observations in Paris, his travels to Egypt, and the Nile voyage. The book is a somewhat odd mixture, as the countries described would indicate. His impressions of the French and France are very commonplace. It would be impossible to write as many pages on Paris and say as little that is new.

The result of his studies in Egypt is illustrated by this very remarkable exclamation:

"How glaring have become here the misconceptions of man! How fallacious his attempts to consecrate to Divinity the meagre works of his own feeble hands! Did the God of Egypt require the temple of Karnak? Did the God of Israel require the temple of Solomon? If so, would he have allowed a Mohammedan mosque to rise over the ruins of the one, and the bat alone to abide in the other?"

The logic of the argument is not quite intelligible. Mr. Ditson has published heretofore a volume on Circassia, which we have not seen. The poor paper and miserable typography which characterize this book should warn him against placing an English book in the hands of French publishers.

We have received a very excellent little book from England, which teaches How to work the Microscope, in a course of lectures on the manipulation of the instrument, by Mr. Beale, who rejoices in a series of honorary titles which fill three lines of fine print on the title-page of his book, but of whom it was never our fortune before to hear.

The use of the microscope is becoming one of the common sources of amusement and instruction for ladies and gentlemen who have some leisure-time for such disposal. Within the past few years a great change has taken place in this respect in America. Private investigations in science are now quite common. Astronomical, chemical, and general philosophical instruments are found in libraries and private laboratories throughout the country. One can hardly pass Pike's elegant store on Broadway and contrast it with the little shop in which that name became famous in former years, without wondering at the elegance of the instruments which fill his cases, and wondering as well who can be the purchasers of such wares. But a visit to almost any well-furnished library in the city reveals the answer to such a query, and the observatories of the Rutherfords and Van Arsdales show the extent to which American gentlemen are carrying their love of scientific investigation.

The microscope is an instrument which may be managed with ease by quite young children of either sex, and many parents have found that by directing the minds of their children to the infinite amusement and instruction to be derived from its use, they have diverted their minds from the temptations which surround them in city life, and have established in them an inquiring and investigating spirit which will result in a most excellent influence on their characters. If any parent has a boy whose mind is active, and who seeks constantly some new source of pleasure, let him apply to Mr. Pike for a microscope, which will cost from twenty to fifty dollars, and give the boy one drop of stagnant water in which to find strange things. Then furnish him with such a book as Gosse's "Life in its lower forms" (published by Carter & Brothers), or Lippincott's edition of "Carpenter on the Microscope," and we answer for it the boy will stay at home in the evenings, and the only trouble thereafter will be to keep him from destroying his eyes.

Carter & Brothers publish a remarkable book, which is The Autobiography of Mrs. Harriet B. Cooke. This lady is well known in private circles as a teacher whose success has been great, and whose personal worth has given her a very high social position. Her life has not been one of adventure, nor of startling incident. But it has been one whose effects will be felt hereafter, and the rolls of eternity will doubtless show it to have been not without its importance in this world.

We call the book remarkable, because it is of a new class. It consists chiefly of sketches of personal intercourse with her fellow men and women—people whose lives were unknown, but whose religious affections and emotions she became acquainted with and describes. The conversion of many of her friends and pupils and their religious history forms the basis of many chapters. Any one who will imagine what have been the chief events in the life of a lady who has devoted herself to the education of the young, whose Christian feelings are very strong and form the governing principle of her life and action, can judge what this book is. The lady's style is excellent. She writes boldly, freely, and well. She quotes aptly, and her book is, therefore, one of decided literary merit. These first sentences are characteristic of the whole book: "I never was a child. Trained by an ambitious father and an industrious and intellectual mother, my earliest recollections find me at the age of four seated in my little chair beside my mother, learning 'to make papa's shirts,' and committing to memory from her lips passages from Thomson's 'Seasons' and other favorite authors."

Dr. Duff's letters from Calcutta have been among the most valuable accounts of the war in India. He has been on the ground, has written in his fearless way, has condemned the Government and exposed the iniquities of past misrule in India, and his articles have made a sensation in England which few have equaled, none, not even Mr. Russell's, have surpassed. These letters are now collected in a small volume and published by Carter & Brothers. The collection forms a succinct and excellent history of the rebellion, with abundance of anecdote and personal incident. Dr. Duff is well known in America, and no indorsement is needed of his high character for veracity as well as good judgment. We apprehend that no man can read these letters and not be satisfied that the rebellion was brought on by gross wrong and oppression—that the course of Government has been to degrade Christianity in the eyes of the Hindoos—and that the future must be very different from the past if England would retain her possessions or restore their quiet.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, 31st May, in the Senate, the question of the British aggressions was taken up, and speeches thereon made by Senators Toombs, Hammond, Crittenden, Wilson, and Mallory. The Miscellaneous Appropriation Bill was also discussed, but no vote was taken.——In the House, on motion of Mr. Marshall, the artists' memorial for the establishment of an art commission, was referred to a committee. The Paraguay Senate resolution was taken up, and, after speeches by Messrs. Ritchie, Letcher, Crawford, and Davis, passed by 115 to 79. The supplemental Indian Appropriation Bill was taken up, and laid aside to be reported, as also was the Volunteer Appropriation Bill, speeches being made meantime on the Kansas question, and on various incidental topics, by Messrs. Smith of Virginia, Marshall, Morris, Jones, Shaw, Stephens, Andrews, Hatch, and Goodwin.

On Tuesday, 1st June, in the Senate, Senator Mason introduced a bill empowering the President to issue letters of special reprisal against citizens of any Central or South American Government, in the cases specified in the bill, and regulating the manner in which such reprisals shall be had. The first section of the bill (which alone apparently is not restricted in its application) reads as follows:

"A Bill to Restrain and Redress Outrages upon the Flag and Citizen of the United States.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in cases of flagrant violation of the laws of nations, by outrage upon the flag, soil, or citizens of the United States, or upon their property, under circumstances requiring prompt redress, and when, in the opinion of the President, delay would be incompatible with the honor and dignity of the republic, the President is hereby authorized to employ such force as he may deem necessary to prevent the perpetration of such outrages, and to obtain just redress and satisfaction for the same when perpetrated; and it shall be his duty to lay the facts of each case, together with the reasons of his action in the premises, before Congress, at the earliest practicable moment, for such further action thereon as Congress may direct."

Senators Mason, Gwin, and Houston spoke in favor and Senator Seward against the bill. An attempt to make it the special order for Wednesday was voted down by 27 majority. Senator Seward moved an amendment to the Miscellaneous Appropriation Bill, that the public lands in Kansas shall not be offered for sale till 1st November, 1859; lost, by 17 to 33. Senator Seward also moved an amendment providing $54,000 for the improvement of the St. Clair Flats; lost, by 20 to 20. Senator Pugh moved an amendment granting $450,000 for the improvement of various Western harbors and rivers; lost, by 23 to 26. Senator Pugh then moved to strike out appropriations for life-boats and life-saving stations on the Atlantic coast; lost, by 17 to 31. Senator Pugh moved to reduce the appropriation for the Coast Survey from $250,000 to $150,000; lost, by 11 to 34. A few other amendments were likewise lost, and the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the Speaker announced as the Art Committee Messrs. Marshall, Keitt, Taylor, Morris, and Pendleton. The Indian, Deficiency, and Volunteer Appropriation Bills were passed. The Fort Snelling Report was then taken up, and speeches were made by Messrs. Morrill, Faulkner, Morris, Florence, Dawes, Bishop, Grow, Phelps, Cavanaugh, Stanton, Burnett, Bingham, Letcher, Marshall, and Hughes.

On Wednesday, June 2, in the Senate, Senator Houston's Protectorate of Mexico was taken up, and his resolutions negatived by 30 to 16. The Miscellaneous Appropriation Bill was then taken up, and several amendments proposed and lost.——In the House, the Fort Snelling Report was again under consideration, and elicited speeches from Messrs. Clark, of New York, Smith, of Illinois, Barksdale, Pettit, and Russell. Resolutions offered by Mr. Clark, of New York, were proposed to be substituted for those of the Committee, but were rejected by 88 to 108. The Committee resolutions were then tabled by 83 to 76. Some further discussion took place with regard to the right of Mr. Fuller, of Dacotah, and Mr. Kingsbury, of Minnesota, to occupy a seat in the House. No vote was taken.

On Thursday, 3d, in the Senate, it was resolved, on motion of Senator Hamlin, to adjourn on 14th inst. Senator Douglas introduced a bill to revive and put in force the act of March 3, 1839, in relation to the north-eastern boundary, with such modifications as will make it applicable to the present controversy in regard to the right of search and visitation. The bill thus revived puts at the disposal of the President, to be used when necessary to resist the claims of Great Britain, the naval and military forces and the militia of the United States, and authorizes him to call into service fifty thousand volunteers; also puts at his disposal ten millions of dollars, with the right to borrow the same; also, if he deems necessary, to send a special embassador to Great Britain. The act is to continue in force for sixty days after the next meeting of Congress. The bill confers these powers in the precise language of the act of 1839, except that it strikes out the word "boundary" and inserts "visitation and right of search," with a few other verbal alterations—conferring, in fact, the same power on Mr. Buchanan as was conferred on Mr. Van Buren. The Miscellaneous Appropriation Bill was passed by 35 to 13.——In the House, it was decided that the admission of Minnesota as a State dissolved her Territorial organization, and that no Territorial delegate could occupy a seat in the House. A resolution of Mr. Davis calling on the President to capture the British cruisers in the Gulf of Mexico was, after some debate, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The House adopted the Senate resolution for extending the session, but substituted Thursday next as the day for adjournment.

On Friday, 4th, in the Senate, Senator Douglas reported against the Territorial organization of Dacotah. On motion of Senator Seward, the House amendment to the Senate resolution regarding adjournment was adopted. Several private bills were then passed.——In the House, several private bills were discussed. Mr. Bocock introduced a bill for the construction of ten war steamships. Mr. John Cochrane gave notice of an amendment providing for twenty instead of ten. Objected to.

On Saturday, 5th, in the Senate, Senator Houston announced the death of his colleague, Senator Henderson. Eulogies were pronounced by Senators Davis, Crittenden, Reid, Hayne, and Seward.——In the House, the decease was announced, and the customary eulogies pronounced by Messrs. Bryan and Quitman.

THE BRITISH OUTRAGES IN CONGRESS.

Senator Douglas's bill, which is nearly a fac-simile of that passed in 1839, he says is a peace measure. It is evidently designed to place the responsibility of preserving the national honor on the President, and forcing him to redeem his pledges.

Lord Napier has desired his dispatches to Admiral Stewart, sent from Washington last week, to be forwarded from Halifax by special steamer to Bermuda. It is understood that he has advised the Admiral to order a discontinuance of the visitation of American vessels pending the instructions of her Majesty's government. The dispatches have left Halifax.

The report of a British vessel having fired into an American vessel off Pensacola and killed a man, created a profound sensation here, and has been the subject of strong and excited remark in the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. The report lacks confirmation and is generally disbelieved.

THE CASE OF THE "ADRIATIC."

Mr. Burlingame's report, unanimously concurred in by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, is accompanied by a resolution requesting the President to obtain redress on account of the conduct of the French Government relative to the American bark Adriatic. The report also recommends a revision of the laws in reference to collisions at sea, and an arrangement by which the damages may be determined in such cases.

THE COLLINS STEAMERS.

The Senate Committee on Finance have resolved to change the terminus of the Collins line of steamers from Liverpool to Southampton, agreeably to the application of Mr. Collins. The prospect is, then, that this line will commence its transatlantic service again immediately.

THE "PEOPLE'S PARTY."

Some of the papers have announced the formation of a new political party called the People's Party. A well-informed Washington correspondent says: "The professed programme of the 'People's Party' of the Union, sent from here, was concocted by a few irresponsible individuals, having no authority to use any of the names which have been published in connection with the movement. The whole affair is disclaimed by men such as Messrs. Crittenden, Bell, Marshall, and the like, whose influence has been impertinently assumed to prop up the scheme.

GOVERNOR CUMMING EXPELLED FROM SALT LAKE CITY.

A dispatch from Leavenworth, the 1st, says that intelligence from Camp Scott to the 6th of May had been received at the Fort. On that day two Mormons came into the Camp from Salt Lake City, having dispatches from Governor Cumming for Secretary Cass. The troops were expected to move toward the Valley by the end of May. Nothing was known at the camp, at the date mentioned, of any proceedings within the city. The foregoing came by mail to the fort. The expressman who brought it supplies the following additional particulars.

He left Fort Laramie on the 18th of May. At Fort Kearney, the commanding officer directed him to inform Colonel Monroe that he had information that Governor Cumming had been expelled from Salt Lake City, and that the Mormons were in arms, determined to resist the army to the last, and requesting Colonel Monroe to push on as speedily as possible. This communication, it is understood, was received at Fort Kearney through the mail brought by this messenger, to whom it was committed probably for lack of time. Colonel Hoffman's command was met seventy-five miles beyond Fort Laramie. They had encountered snow two or three feet deep and had lost many animals. All the streams were very high. The Peace Commissioners had passed Fort Laramie; they were obliged to swim the Platte at that post. It is reported that the troops at Camp Scott were living on mule meat. No official information had been received at the Fort, but the authority furnishing this intelligence is regarded as unquestionable.

The last news is to the effect that the rumored expulsion of Governor Cumming from Salt Lake is unfounded, but that Captain Marcy's troop has been intercepted by the Mormons. All these stories must be received with great caution.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

We have more news of outrages and murders in Kansas, committed by the political ruffians. Montgomery, who seems to have been the leader on one side, has been ordered to disband his men and surrender his commission in the Territorial militia. Governor Denver has sent to the scene of the disturbances for information, and promises to take effectual measures to put a stop to them.

The instructions of General Cass to the Governor, in regard to the election, are published. The Commissioners have fixed upon the 2d of August as the day of election. This is the day of the state election in Missouri, and its selection will tend to prevent the introduction of voters from that State.

SUCCESSFUL EMEUTE AT NEW ORLEANS.

On the night of 2d inst. an emeute broke out at New Orleans. A body calling itself the Vigilance Committee, in large numbers, took possession of the Arsenal, Jackson Square, and the armories. On the morning of 3d, the Executive Committee called for all law and order people to join them, and announced a determination to carry their measures out. Cannon were posted about the Arsenal, and about two hundred armed men were on guard. In the course of the day the Vigilance Committee rallied a large force of men, and tore up the streets and erected barricades with cotton-bales. The Mayor seems to have done nothing. On 4th, he resigned the police authority into the hands of the Vigilance Committee, who appointed a police of 1000 men. The Vigilance party were commanded by Major Duncan, late of United States Army. At latest accounts, however, a collision was still apprehended between the Vigilance Committee and the people. One man had already been shot.

PROCLAMATION OF THE VIGILANCE COMMITTEE.

The following was the proclamation of the Vigilance Committee:

"Citizens of New Orleans!—After years of disorder, outrage, and unchecked assassination, the people, unable and unwilling either to bow down in unresisting submission to a set of ruffians, or to abandon the city in which their business, their social sympathies, and their affections cluster, have at length risen in their might, have quietly taken possession of the arsenal and the buildings in Jackson Square, and have established there the head-quarters of a Vigilance Committee, pledging each to the other to maintain the rights inviolable of every peaceful and law-abiding citizen; restore public order, abate crime, and expel or punish, as they may determine, such notorious robbers and assassins as the arm of the law, either from the infidelity of its public servants or the inefficiency of the laws themselves, has left unwhipped of justice.

"In the present the ordinary machinery of police justice is superseded—the Mayor and the Recorders, as we understand, yielding up the power which they confess their inability to exercise for the preservation of the public peace and the security of property; and the Vigilance Committee will, therefore, provisionally act in their stead, administering to each and every malefactor the punishment due to his crimes, without heat, prejudice, or political bias.

"All citizens who have sympathies with this movement, and who think the time has come when New Orleans shall be governed like all other well-ordered and civilized communities, will report themselves, without delay, at the principal office, where the character of this movement will be explained and the determination of the people more fully made known.

"All has been done noiselessly thus far. All will continue noiselessly, dispassionately, and justly. But the ruffians who have dyed our streets with the gore of unoffending citizens, and spread terror among the peaceable, orderly, and well disposed, must leave or perish.

"So the people have determined. Vox populi, vox Dei."

THE LATEST BRITISH OUTRAGE.—CASE OF THE "MIRIANUS."

Captain Parkes of the Mirianus reports the following British outrage: We sailed from Black River Harbor, Kingston, Jamaica, with a cargo of logwood for New York. On the 20th of May last, at four o'clock in the afternoon, in longitude 83 degrees 10 minutes, and latitude 24 degrees 19 minutes, we discovered a steamer on the lee bow of the brig, at the distance of seven or eight miles from where we were. We kept on the way we were sailing, and so did the steamer and the other vessels for about half an hour. The steamer was then within the distance of about 300 or 400 yards of the brig. When thus far from us she steered up across our bow and hoisted the English ensign. We sailed on, not taking much notice of this, imagining the ship to be a merchant, or perhaps a mail steamer. She then backed her sails, lay before us and fired a gun. I now thought that it was a vessel wanting to send a letter to some port to which we might be bound, but not caring to lose time in bringing the vessel to when we had such a favorable wind, I still kept on my course. The steamer was now within about 200 yards of us, and she fired a revolver or rifle-shot. I now ordered the vessel to be hove to, in the mean time a boat was lowered from the quarter of the steamer into the water. The American flag was now flying from the peak of the brig, and she was lying to, waiting for the arrival of the boat which it was evident was coming alongside. On the boat coming close I saw that there were eight men in her, and one officer, who was in uniform. On drawing the boat alongside our vessel the officer jumped on board the brig and walked aft to where I was, without ceremony.

THE ORDERS TO BRITISH GUN-BOATS.

The following conversation then took place near the cabin of my vessel, and it was commenced by the officer addressing me thus:

Officer. Are you the captain of this vessel?
Captain Parkes. Yes, I am the captain.
Officer. What are you loaded with on this voyage?
Captain. I have a cargo of logwood, from Jamaica.
Officer. What port are you from?
Captain. Kingston, Jamaica.
Officer. Where are you bound?
Captain. To New York.
Officer. Who is the owner of your vessel, and where does he live?
Captain. R. Lane, of New York, is the owner of the vessel.

After this he did not ask any more questions; but I resumed the conversation by asking the officer where he was from. He answered; "We have been out from England about four months."

Then, said I to him, "What are you doing out here?"

"I am cruising on the coast of Florida, looking out for slavers," he replied. I then remarked, in an inquiring way, "You would not certainly take my vessel for a slaver?" And he said, "No; but my orders are to board every one of you." I then thought of the circumstance of his passing the vessels that were ahead of us, and steering on for our vessel; so I observed, "You did not stop those vessels ahead of us as you did this one?" and he remarked, "No, we did not, for those are British vessels." I did not say any more on that subject, but concluded that vessels showing British colors are allowed to pass by British men-of-war, when those that display the American flag are unnecessarily detained.

THE STYX AT KEY WEST.

A letter from Key West says: "The British steamer Styx, Commander Vesey, has been in port since the 22d, recruiting, overhauling boilers, repairing the ship, watering, etc. Captain Vesey denies the statement of Captain Howes, of the schooner Mobile. He says he fired into her because she refused to hoist her colors. Captain Vesey has acted under instructions. He says he is commander of all the British vessels in the Gulf, is responsible for the acts of the commanders of the gun-boats Buzzard, Jasper, and others. The Styx has sailed."

PERSONAL.

The correspondent of the Times gives the following account of the ball at the British Embassy on the Queen's birthday: "Apart from the war-cloud, the entertainment was a brilliant one. Lord Napier opened the first dance with Miss Lane, and had General Robles, with Mrs. Senator Douglas as a vis-à-vis. All the Corps Diplomatique, the officers of the army, the navy, and the marine corps appeared in full uniform. Vice-President Breckinridge and Mr. Speaker Orr each headed a large delegation of the bodies over which they preside, and the Departments were well represented. Prominent among the ladies were Mesdames Crittenden, Jeff Davis, Montgomery, Blair, Appleton, Ledyard, Craig and Clayton, with Mademoiselles Cass, Saunders, King, and others. Arabella regretted the absence of Madame de Stoeckl, who has been quite indisposed of late, and was told that M. Van Limburg, Minister-Resident of the Netherlands, intends to follow a good example, and wed an American wife.

That same evening there was another wedding at the "West end," at the corner of I and Twentieth streets, the residence of the Hon. Robert J. Walker. Miss Mary Walker was married (by the Rev. Dr. Pyne) to Adrian Deshone, Esq., a brother of Mrs. Senator Slidell, and although there was no great display, there was a most select and distinguished company. Arabella went into raptures over a set of pearls which were prominent among the bridal presents, and all agreed that the lovely and accomplished Miss Saunders, who was the first bridesmaid, never appeared to greater advantage. The happy pair receive their friends to-day, and many who have not shaken hands since the Lecompton question was started, will, doubtless, cordially join in pledging the bride.

The trial of General Walker for violation of the neutrality laws concluded in a disagreement by the jury, ten of that body being for acquittal, and two for conviction. Judge Campbell's charge was extremely partial and stringent. A new trial was urged immediately by Walker. The District Attorney entered a nolle prosequi.

F. N. W. Burton, Secretary of State of Tennessee, in consequence of being charged with having defrauded the State of a large amount of money, has resigned his office.

John P. Stockton, of New Jersey, has been appointed Minister to Switzerland. Joseph R. Chandler, of Pennsylvania, will probably go to Rome. J. P. O'Sullivan, of California, has been appointed Consul at Singapore, and J. N. Heine, of Georgia, Consul to Turks Island,

The applicants for the mission to Paraguay are already very numerous. The names of Mr. Fitzpatrick, of Florida, Mr. Harris, late of the Union, Mr. Cheson, and General Burgess, of Rhode Island, are strongly pressed.

Ex-President Van Buren has arrived at the New York Hotel from Kinderhook, on a visit to the city for a few days. Mr. Van Buren looks remarkably well, and is in the enjoyment of most excellent health for a man over threescore-and-ten years.

Since the Senate have evening sessions, Vice-President Breckinridge has ordered the private drinking-room of the Senate to be closed.

The Hon. S. A. Eliot, Rev. Dr. Bellows, of New York, Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, of Massachusetts, and Professor Felton, are named as candidates for the Presidency of Harvard College, shortly to be vacated by Rev. Dr. Walker.

The Judiciary Committee on Judge Watrous's case, after a most searching, expensive, and prolonged investigation, are equally divided as to their report.

Commodore Thomas Ap Catesby Jones, of the United States Navy, died last week at his residence in Georgetown, District of Columbia. Commodore Jones was of Welsh descent. He was a native of Virginia, and was born in the year 1789. He entered the navy as a midshipman in the year 1805, and received his commission as a captain in 1829. He was first brought prominently into public notice in the year 1814, at the time when the British naval expedition against New Orleans entered Lake Borgne. Commodore Jones, then a lieutenant, had command of a division of five gun-boats, carrying 23 guns and 183 men. The British force that he was appointed to intercept consisted of forty or fifty barges or boats built for this special duty, carrying 42 guns, and six or eight hundred men. After a gallant resistance the little American flotilla was compelled to surrender, Lieutenant Jones having been early disabled by a shot. His conduct in the affair was universally commended. That the victory was dearly bought by the British is proved by the fact that their loss, as officially reported, was 94—more than half the number of Americans engaged, and, by American witnesses of the affair, the loss is even said to have been three or four hundred.

In 1842, when he had command of the Pacific squadron, while lying at Callao, he received, unofficially, information which led him to believe that a war between the United States and Mexico was inevitable. He was also led to believe that through intrigues at Mexico a cession of Mexican territory to Great Britain was contemplated. He suddenly set sail with a squadron of four vessels, in order to forestall the supposed designs of the British Admiral. On arriving before Monterey, some circumstances confirmed his suspicions; he summoned the Governor to surrender the place, which was done, and on the 20th of October, 1842, the American flag rose over the old fort, and a proclamation was issued, explaining to the people the strange movement.

For this indiscreet but well-meant seizure of Monterey, in a time of peace, Commodore Jones was suspended from service for a time, and in 1855 was placed upon the Reserved List by the Naval Board.

A young lady in Cincinnati, Miss Fanny Hall, has received damages of $3500 against one Vandergriff, and other parties, for false imprisonment. She was confined for six months in the Lunatic Asylum, through the instrumentality of the officers of the church to which she belonged, but was proved to be sane, and was then discharged. The suit has been tried three times. The first jury gave her a verdict of $10,000. A new trial was had, and the jury failed to agree. The third time she was again successful, and this ends the case.

By a vote of the Baltimore Common Council, the remains of John M'Donogh (of contested-will fame) are to be removed from New Orleans to Baltimore. Two thousand dollars are appropriated for the purpose.

Letters from ex-President Pierce, at Madeira, announce his intention to leave for Lisbon on the 1st of June. Mrs. Pierce is still an invalid, but her health has been improved by her voyage.

The Evening Post understands that General Houston, immediately after the adjournment of Congress, contemplates an expedition into Mexico with a company of four or five thousand men, who are anxious to follow the hero of the Alamo to new conquests. Walker and Henningsen do not inspire the adventurous youth of the South with confidence, and it has been signified to General Houston that, if he would lead them, there were thousands ready to follow him to any part of Mexico. The understanding is that they are to Texasize another slice of Mexico, and bring it into the Union, and, with it, Houston into the Senate.

Mr. Everett, since November last, has delivered his Oration on Washington twenty-three times, with aggregate net receipts (for the Mount Vernon Fund) of $14,645, and has spoken on "Charity" fourteen times. The aggregate receipts from the delivery of these two orations, in six months, is stated at $27,073.

Henry W. Pratt, the Teller of the Grafton (Massachusetts) Bank, who robbed that institution of $12,000, has been sentenced by the Court at Worcester to a year and a half in the House of Correction. "In view of the fact," says the Boston Traveller, "that he attempted to fasten the crime upon an honest man—the Cashier of the Bank—by slipping a roll of the stolen bills into his pocket, we must say that he has been dealt with in a remarkably lenient manner."

The Rev. Dr. Bowman, the new Assistant-Bishop of the Episcopal diocese of Pennsylvania, is a native of that State, and fifty-eight years of age. He has been for thirty years rector of St. James's, Lancaster, Pennsylvania.

Dr. Bernard, lately acquitted of the attempt to murder the Emperor of the French, announces his intention to deliver an oration in Greenwich, England, on the "Present state of France, Politically considered."

Mr. George W. Curtis is to deliver the annual address at the Rensselaer County Fair, to be held in Troy next September.

M'Henry, alias Townsend, who had so much trouble in Canada, has taken to lecturing since his release. He visited Parliament last week, and was conspicuous.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT.

The British Ministry have not been defeated. On Friday, 21st, in the House of Commons, the vote of censure was taken up, and after numerous and repeated calls upon Mr. Cardwell by the Liberal members to withdraw his resolution, that gentleman, with the concurrence of Lords Palmerston and John Russell, and with the authority of the House generally, consented, and the resolution and amendments were finally withdrawn, thus virtually giving the Ministers a triumph.

Mr. Disraeli, in giving his consent to the withdrawal, said the resolution was avowedly brought forward as a censure upon the conduct of the Government. If he consented to its withdrawal, it must be clearly understood that he did so, not because the Government shrunk from the consequences that would follow if it were adopted. Whatever the result might be, they looked forward to it without apprehension, and even now were ready to encounter the consequences of a division. So far as the debate was concerned, he thought he might say that no Ministry on their trial could look back upon a discussion with greater satisfaction. The opposition to the motion had been maintained, not by the Administration, for they had wisely and properly withdrawn as much as possible from the debate, but by members not connected with the Government in politics, and by men inferior to none in intellectual character and authority. He consented to the withdrawal of the motion not for the sake of the Government, but for the sake of India and the best interests of the empire. In so doing he appealed to the language of all their dispatches to show that the Government had given to Lord Canning a most cordial and complete support, and he would mention that since Lord Ellenborough's dispatch had been sent out, the Government had communicated with Lord Canning, informing him that he might rely upon their continued confidence and support.—[Cheers.]

The House of Commons then adjourned to the 28th.

PROSPECT OF TROUBLE WITH NAPLES.

On Friday, the 21st, in the House of Lords, Lord Malmesbury stated he had received a reply from the Government of Naples in answer to the claim of indemnity, which he understood to be a refusal, and which he had treated as such. Within the last two hours, however, he had received a dispatch informing him that it was not a positive refusal, but simply an argumentative reply.

DEATH OF THE DUCHESS OF ORLEANS.

The Duchess of Orleans expired on 18th ult. at her residence at Richmond, to the inexpressible grief of her sons, the Count de Paris and the Duke de Chartres, and the other members of the exiled Royal family of France.

The demise of her Royal Highness is a deep affliction to the Ex-Queen Amelie, whose only consolation under the mournful circumstances is the presence of the Duke of Nemours, the Duke and Duchess of Aumale, and Prince and Princess Joinville, who, with their families, are living at Twickenham and Claremont. The lamentable event was quite unexpected. The Duchess only a fortnight since dined at the Marquis of Landsdowne's, and was apparently in excellent health and spirits.

"About half past four in the morning the Duchess expressed some surprise at seeing her physician still at her bedside, and, in reply to a question, said, 'Oh! I do not feel very ill.' He left the room to give some orders, returned in ten minutes, and found she had ceased to breathe. Life had departed without any premonitory signs."

HORRORS OF CHURCH VAULTS.

Dr. Letheby has presented a report on the state of the vaults in the city churches, in which he says:

"In the vaults of twenty-five of the city churches there are not less than 5700 dead bodies, and this number does not include the burials that have taken place under the aisles of the churches. If the same proportion holds in respect of all the city churches, there are about 16,000 corpses beneath the pews occupied by Sunday congregations. In some cases the effluvium from the vaults was most offensive; for although it is the general practice to confine the body in a lead coffin, yet the metal gives way after a longer or a shorter time, and there oozes out a dark, treacle-like liquid, which stinks abominably, and which is, I believe, a most deadly poison. I have seen this escaping from a lead coffin that had been deposited in the vault for more than a hundred years—so that there is no saying for how long a time the mischief of decay and slow corruption may be carried on. Again, the way in which the coffins are piled upon each other, leads to the crushing in of the lowermost of the series, when the wood decays, and then the putrid matter is squashed out through the fissures of the broken coffins. In many cases the vaults are entered by imperfectly-closed traps or doors from the general area of the church, and the vaults are either not ventilated at all, or they are ventilated into the public way, so that there steams out incessantly a poisonous vapor that may be the cause of much mischief."

THE TELEGRAPHIC FLEET.

The telegraphic fleet had all assembled at Plymouth, and would sail on an experimental trip in a few days. It consists of the United States frigate Niagara, and the British steamers Agamemnon, Valorous, Gorgon, and Porcupine.

THIRTY YEARS OF TRADE.

The Glasgow Daily Mail says: "Curious disclosures do take place in the Bankruptcy Court, and much light is thrown by the examinations of bankrupts on the hidden springs of commercial action. The disclosures made by Mr. James Grey, engineer and iron-founder, of this city, in his examination before the sheriff on Wednesday, the 12th instant, stand out in striking relief to the general run of insolvencies. It is simply a case of inexplicable fatuity, under which spell a man could persevere against hope in carrying on a business of which he knew nothing practically, and if possible, less commercially, for upward of thirty years, without having probably in any one transaction ever made a profit. It was nothing but loss from the commencement, and loss continued to the end. The large fortune of a confiding brother was gradually swallowed up in the loam and sand of a ruinous foundry. The handsome competency of trusting sisters was sacrificed to the criminal vanity which would bring ruin upon the nearest and dearest relations rather than confess to misfortune. Mr. Grey never speculated. His private expenses were only £150 a year; and yet, after thirty-two years' trading, he stops payment with a deficit of twenty-six thousand pounds!"

PELISSIER AND AUMALE.

The Nord publishes the following anecdote: "The salons of Paris are much occupied with an interview said to have taken place between the Duke d'Aumale and Marshal Pelissier. As so many erroneous statements have been made, I will tell you exactly what happened. Marshal Pelissier was taking a drive in Hyde Park. A carriage passed his. The Marshal was not aware who was in the carriage, but one of his aides-de-camp who was sitting in front told him it was the carriage of the Duke d'Aumale. The Marshal immediately ordered his coachman to drive alongside the carriage which had passed him. When he came up with the Duke's carriage, the Marshal rose and bowed to him. The Prince ordered his carriage to stop and returned the salute. The Marshal then addressed the Prince as follows: 'Monseigneur, I am happy to have this opportunity of presenting my respects to you and asking after your health.' 'And I,' said the Prince, 'am happy to see you and to shake hands with you.' A shaking of hands immediately followed. A few complimentary words were exchanged and the carriages separated. This is all that took place. It must be remembered that Marshal Pelissier served for some time in Algeria under the orders of the Duke d'Aumale."

The London Times adds that the "Duke d'Aumale and the Marshal met at a small dinner-party a few days afterward."

FRANCE.

AN EXTRAORDINARY DUEL.

A very shocking duel was fought, on the 14th of May, in the Bois de Vesinay, near St. Germain. M. Henri de Pène, a well-known literary man, who for some time wrote the feuilleton in the Nord of Brussels, which was signed "Nemo," and who has lately written in the Figaro under the same signature, made some playful remarks, in a recent article, about the sub-lieutenants of the army, and said, among other things, that, owing to some new orders concerning their uniform, they would no longer tear ladies' dresses with their spurs. This article gave offense in a mess-room at St. Germain, and in his weekly article of last Sunday "Nemo" observed that he had received a very coarse letter from a person who signed himself "A Sub-Lieutenant," and who talked a great deal more about fighting than a gentleman who means to fight usually does. This article produced a challenge from the sub-lieutenant. When M. de Pène and his seconds got upon the ground they found some twenty officers there, belonging to the garrison of St. Germain. The duel was fought with swords. M. de Pène wounded his antagonist in the wrist, and disabled him.

THE EDITOR ASSASSINATED.

M. de Courtiel advanced politely to M. de Pène, expressed himself gratified that he had met with a man of courage, and that he regretted the occurrence which had led to the meeting. The combatants then shook hands, and according to all the usages of society the matter should have ended, as M. de Pène had given satisfaction to the first sub-lieutenant who had challenged him for an insult to the class.

Hardly, however, had the two separated than one of M. de Courtiel's seconds, M. Hyène, sub-lieutenant in the same regiment, rushed up to M. de Pène, and addressing him rudely, said that he also required an answer to the challenge he had sent. M. de Pène replied that he had no answer to give, and that he placed himself entirely in the hands of his seconds. These declared that M. de Pène was not bound to answer a second individual on the same matter, and that they opposed themselves entirely to another duel. Even M. de Courtiel remonstrated, and declared that he could not be, in turn, second to M. Hyène, as he had just shaken hands with his late antagonist. It was, however, in vain. M. Hyène paid no attention to M. de Courtiel, who was an officer junior to himself. But it must not be thought that either of the two was in extreme youth. M. Hyène had been a sub-lieutenant since 1842, and M. de Courtiel since 1845. The plea of inexperience can hardly be urged in favor of a man who has been at least sixteen years in the service. The seconds, it appears, on both sides declared positively against a second duel, and had taken up the swords, when M. Hyène sprang on M. de Pène, and struck him in the face. M. de Pène then accepted another duel. They fought, and M. Hyène, "d'une main sûr," pierced M. de Pène through the lungs. The wounded man tottered, and, as he fell, M. Hyène delivered a second blow, which, it is said, pierced the liver.

AN APPEAL TO THE EMPEROR.

The correspondent of the Times says: "M. de Villemessant," the editor of Figaro, "who was at his country-house at Blois, gave his consent to the duel with Lieutenant Courtiel; but when he heard of the outrageous conduct of M. Courtiel's second, he immediately hurried to town, went to the Palace, and demanded an interview of the Emperor. Napoleon could not just then see M. de Villemessant, but he sent word to him by his Secretary that he must go immediately to the Minister of Justice who would take the affair in hand. M. de V. did so, and I learn that by order of the Minister of War, M. Hyène has been put under formal arrest, and an investigation has been commenced that will, no doubt, terminate in a Council of War. Lieutenants Grangier and Comminges, on hearing of the result of the double duel, wrote to the Duke de Rovigo—one of M. de Pène's seconds—to declare that they withdrew their challenges, and that they felt deep sympathy in M. de Pène's unfortunate situation. Lieutenant Courtiel, each day, sends from Amiens a telegraphic dispatch inquiring after the condition of the wounded man." The Times adds: "Whether justice will be done on the offender in this case it is impossible to say. The unhappy M. de Pène has evidently fallen a victim to that hatred and contempt of civilians, and particularly of all who represent the old political parties, which is prevalent in the French army; and it may be that the army, as the ruling power in France, is too strong to permit M. Hyène to be punished for asserting, as it thinks, the dignity of the service."

POLICE AMENITIES.

In the interior of France the police are still uneasy with respect to those fulminating shells of which the effect was so terrible on the 14th of January. They have received information relative to an Englishman who is the bearer of a certain number of these shells, and who is said to have disembarked already on the French coast. After having during some time searched in vain in the maritime towns, they thought from the description of the individual which had been sent to them that they had discovered, in the person of an Englishman who was about to embark on board a vessel at Havre, the person who had given them so much trouble; but the person in question very soon proved his innocence, and as he had the happiness (and in the circumstances it was a real piece of good fortune) not to be a Frenchman, he has not been deposited in Algeria while the authorities were inquiring into the truth or falsehood of the charges brought against him, as has been the case with many others. In fact, after a detention of a few hours he was set at liberty. At the present day a foreigner who falls into the hands of the police has a hundred times as good a chance of escaping as a Frenchman. If a foreigner is arrested he can appeal for protection to his embassador or consul, who will see that justice is done him; but the poor Frenchman having no such powerful protection is imprisoned, mis au secret, exiled, or banished, without having the power or apparently the right to defend himself, and without finding any power, even judiciary, whose protection he can invoke. In all political affairs the police pronounce their decisions finally and without appeal. They are at the same time accusers, judges, and executioners.

THE MARRIAGE LAW IN FRANCE—A CAUTION TO YOUNG WOMEN.

"Another marriage case was lately submitted to the Civil Tribunal. A young man named Ruttinger, having led a very dissipated life at Paris, was sent by his father in 1855 to Lima, in Peru, and there he fell in love with a young woman whose maiden name was Mendoza, and who was widow of General Guido, who at one time was Minister of War of Peru. He proposed marriage to her, but as he had no other position than that of assistant to his brother, a trader at Lima, she did not think fit to accept him. He, however, pressed his suit, and she married him. Her first husband's family were greatly displeased at the marriage, and stopped an allowance of 250 francs a month which they had made her. In two months Ruttinger cruelly abandoned her, though she was enceinte at the time. He told her that he was going to North America to seek his fortune, but she afterward learned that he had come to Paris, and in February, 1857, she followed him there. He went to live with her in an apartment in the Rue Coquenard, but in a week he again abandoned her, gave notice to leave the apartment, sold off the furniture, and wrote an insolent letter to the concierge of the house, directing him not to supply her with any thing, and to tell her that 'he (Ruttinger) was tired of her, and that the best thing she could do was to take a lover, if she could find one.' She fell into such distress that some charitable Peruvians here had to raise a subscription to enable her to return to her own country. Yesterday Ruttinger's father and mother applied to the Civil Tribunal to declare the marriage null and void, on the ground that they had not given their consent, and that he being only 23 years, and therefore as regards marriage a minor, such consent was, by Article 182 of the Code Napoleon, indispensably necessary; they also urged that it ought to be declared void, because it had not been published and duly registered in France. In the course of the pleadings on their behalf it was stated that the marriage had been a most deplorable one for the young man. The counsel of Madame Guido insisted that the marriage was good, inasmuch as the father and mother of the young man had known of it at the time it was accomplished, or at all events had not protested against it within a year after it came to their knowledge, as the Code Napoleon required them to do. The first of these assertions was, however, contradicted by the plaintiffs: and, as to the second, they showed that it was in October last that they had been informed of the marriage, and that in January they had commenced proceedings for having it declared null. The tribunal decided that the want of the parents' consent made the marriage void, but, considering that in contracting it Madame Guido had been ignorant of the French law, it laid down that she should enjoy the civil advantages to which it entitled her. As to the two other points raised by the parents, the tribunal said that the first one being sufficient, it was not necessary to pronounce on them."

LIFE IN PARIS.

A German gentleman was in the pit stalls of the Odeon Theatre the other night, with his son, a handsome lad of fifteen. Between the acts a sergent-de-ville bustled up to them, and in a sneering tone of voice, audible throughout the pit, said, "The Commissary of Police desires to speak to you and the lady in his private room." The gentleman astonished, and not a little indignant, rose from his seat, and, followed by his son, was ushered into the presence of the commissary. This functionary addressed him as follows: "Sir, in France a woman is not allowed to appear in public in male attire without authorization. Have you an authorization?" The answer was, "Sir, I do not know what you mean by talking of women: this is a boy." The commissary then surveyed the youth from head to foot, and observing, "Well, I see he has incipient mustaches—that is enough," allowed the parties thus strangely disturbed to depart, but he did not vouchsafe to offer a word of apology.

PARISIAN SPORTS.

The following feats are narrated by the Paris Sport: "A member of the Jockey Club a few nights ago wagered that he would walk blindfolded from the club-house, Rue de Grammont, to the Cirque de l'Imperatrice in the Champs Elysées. He accomplished the exploit without difficulty, and on arriving at the Cirque opened the door of the stable and walked in. He went along the Boulevards, the Rue Royale, the Place de la Concorde, and passed through the trees in the Champs Elysées. Another member of the club, the night after, went, for a wager, blindfolded from the club-house to the Cirque, then passed by the Exhibition Palace to the Quai, and then by the Place de la Concorde back to the Rue Royale. He appeared to have studied his route most carefully beforehand, as he counted his steps, and was able to say when he ought to pass before a lamp-post and other objects."

BIRTH EXTRAORDINARY.

A young hippopotamus has been born in the Garden of Plants at Paris. The little creature made its appearance at the top of the water of the tank occupied by its mother about six A.M., on Monday, May 10. After swimming about a while the little thing attempted to get on dry ground, but the descent from the sleeping apartment of the parent hippopotami into their bath not being sloped, it had some difficulty in raising its weight out of the water. The mother then came to the rescue, but in her endeavors to assist her little one up the step managed so to bruise and injure its tender body that it died the same evening.

A MALE ABBESS.

For the last forty years, in the quiet, old, tumble-down city of Versailles, inhabited by decayed Legitimist families, a lady, dressed in the garb of a semi-monastic style, was known to pursue the even tenor of her way, received into the local circles of aristocracy, and in receipt from a noble family of 6000 francs annuity, as ex-abbess of a suppressed monastery. At her death she turns out to be a man. The real abbess must have died in emigration, and a swindler of the rougher sex getting her papers has personated her for nearly half a century. The name of the deceased androgyne was Countess de Solege de Lange. The matter makes no noise; people only shrug up their shoulders.

A GOVERNMENT DEFEAT.

In reference to the Government defeat in the Haut Rhin, the Paris correspondent of the Times says: "The success of M. Migeon, who never dreamed that he was a man of so much importance, is felt in every official quarter as extremely vexatious and humiliating. No Paris paper has ventured to allude to it; and the Moniteur itself passes it over in complete silence. The thing is unprecedented since the establishment of the empire. I look upon this result as more serious than if the whole of the deputies elected for Paris belonged to the Mountain."

GERMANY.

GOVERNOR WRIGHT'S COLD-WATER FESTIVAL.

The correspondent of the New York Times says:

"I take pleasure in contradicting, from the word of Mr. Wright himself, the report that was put in circulation some time ago about our Minister's diplomatic dinner at Berlin. It appears that it was not true that the dinner was served with cold water only as a drink. Mr. Wright, although adhering himself to his temperance principles, respects the habits of the country and the position which he occupies, and sets wines before his guests for whoever may wish to use them. He did place corn bread on his table; but it was in order to show to M. de Humboldt, who was one of his guests, as well as the others, that when properly cooked, it was a good and proper article of diet. He had already had a discussion with M. de Humboldt on this subject, in which Mr. Wright had contended that maize was thought impossible food in Prussia simply because it had been indifferently cooked. So, to prove that this was the fact, he had prepared on this occasion six different specimens of corn bread, which he distributed over his table for the tasting of his distinguished guests; and he says that he had the pleasure of hearing them declare, M. de Humboldt with the rest, that he had gained a victory over their prejudices."

ITALY.

HOW THE SARDINIAN PRISONERS ARE TREATED AT NAPLES.

The correspondent of the Daily News writes: The intelligence from Salerno is of a most painful and revolting character, and in the interest of humanity I send it to you, even though you may consider me tedious. Since the appointment of the new keepers, not merely rigor, but even a species of ferocity, seems to have been used. I have already told you how the chief keeper inaugurated his arrival by beating six or seven prisoners in the most violent manner. They are still in hospital under the effects of the blows, and the head of one was much cut. It is impossible to mark how the Sardinian prisoners are treated, for they are in the same category with Watt and Park—nay, more, are entitled to more consideration; for whereas the British Government acknowledged the jurisdiction of this Government, the Sardinian Government has always disputed it, and yet the following facts occur. The mother of Poggi, who hitherto has had permission to see her son freely, is now limited to seeing him through a hole in the door. A brother-in-law of Danell, who, like the former, had come from Genoa to see him, can not get further than Naples. Fromento, for whom Count Gropilio and Signor Fazerotti have been laboring for three months to get him removed from prison, as he is suffering from a severe chest attack, is now spitting blood, and is in considerable danger. Nothing will melt hearts of stone. When our men were ill much was said at the last moment of "deference for British subjects," and they were sent home hastily to be cured. Sardinian subjects are in another category. Naples can treat them as she likes, because Austria supports her; but that England should abandon Sardinia in this position is a burning disgrace, and most bitterly is it resented by Italians. As regards Neopolitans, they are treated as dogs. Five of those who had received 100 stripes have not been able again to appear in court, and are still in hospital. Nimartoro, who made the protest which I sent you, is now very unwell, and, judging from his appearance, was not equal to receiving twenty blows. It will not probably lead to any change in the condition of these men to make the facts known—still there is a satisfaction in the publication of them, and perhaps in their own time they will bear fruit. A person called Esporito has confessed that he committed the murder which I reported; his motives were that the man did not belong to their cause, was put in among them, and continually made false revelations to their injury. The instrument was a wooden dagger, manufactured in prison. I am told that they rub them over with oil, burn them with a candle, and thus murder them.

MARTIAL LAW AT MODENA.

A letter from Modena describes the reign of terror existing there: At Massa Carrara, where the people are naturally violent, where the vicinity of Sardinia serves still further to inflame their passions and inspire them with a love of liberty, the Government has introduced martial law in a manner unprecedented in the annals of modern oppression. They hunt the liberals as you would foxes; soldiers and policemen enter all houses by day and night; they beat men, women, and children; they fill the prisons and kill their prisoners by starvation and blows. Tribunals and forms of procedure are done away with. A sbirro arrests you, a soldier condemns you, and an executioner kills you. Many are a prey to despair; despair counsels the use of the knife, and the legal assassin falls a prey to vendetta. Such events—and they are not rare—serve only to increase the cruelty of the Government and the ferocity of its servants; and the people take to flight, and seek and find protection on Sardinian soil. What would be our condition but for this haven of refuge? But even the fugitives are pursued by the implacable wrath of the Government; reclamations are sent from Modena to Turin, to demand their extradition. Up to the present the Sardinian Cabinet has refused compliance with these demands, on the very reasonable ground that the extradition treaties provide only for fugitives from justice, not for those who fly from the mad violence of a military police. But at present the Sardinian Government is placed in a very embarrassing position, for the majority of the fugitives have no means of subsistence.

THE NEW GOVERNOR OF MALTA.

On the 7th of May an individual in plain clothes was entering the Governor's Palace, Malta, with a lighted cigar, when he was stopped by the sentry, with an intimation that his orders were not to allow smoking. The individual referred to signified that he was the Governor, Sir John Gaspard le Marchant. This, however, had no other effect than to make the sentry more firm in the execution of his duty, and his Excellency was under the necessity of casting away his much cherished "Havana." During the day the order-board was withdrawn, and a new one issued from the Town Major's office, with the omission of the objectionable prohibition.

INDIA.

THE LATEST NEWS FROM THE SEAT OF WAR.

The news from India is interesting. Sir H. Rose's advance on Calpee has been delayed by the fear that the Kotah rebels will fall on Jhansi. Orders have been issued by General Roberts to advance to Kotah to co-operate with Sir H. Rose. This military movement is reported since the capture of Kotah. The Sikh force, under Major Evans, after an obstinate battle of some hours, inflicted a severe defeat on a large body of Bheels—sixty men and four hundred women were captured. British loss, 71 killed and wounded.

Azimghur was relieved by Sir E. Lingard on the 15th of April. The enemy retreated with regularity, but lost three guns and a great number of men. It is said the enemy will make a stand at Calpee.

DEATH OF ANOTHER HAVELOCK.

The Delhi Gazette says: "We regret much to record the death of Lieutenant C. W. Havelock, of the Ghoorka Regiment, nephew of the late Major-General Havelock. He belonged to Sir E. Lingard's column, which marched to the support of Azimghur some short time ago. It appears that on marching out of Jaunpore, a large body of rebels were on the qui vive to attack Sir Edward in the rear on his approach to Azimghur. This caused the Colonel to alter his plans, and compelled him, before proceeding further, to disperse this body, and while hunting up these fellows poor Lieutenant Havelock was shot from a hut in an obscure village. Havelock was at Goruckpore and Azimghur at the time of the mutiny of the 12th Irregulars, of which he was adjutant. Subsequently he went up as a volunteer with his uncle, and has been before Lucknow ever since. His fate is deplored by all who knew him. His remains were brought into Jaunpore and buried there."

[FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.]

BILLY BOWLEGS IN NEW ORLEANS.

NEW ORLEANS, May, 1858.

BILLY BOWLEGS, the King of the Everglades, has been with us. For a week he was our Lion-in-Chief. He has left us, and we now have leisure to think and talk of the crevasse, the British outrages, the cotton crop, filibustering, and other matters of secondary interest. When the news reached us, a fortnight ago, that Billy was actually taken, and, on the way to his new home in Arkansas, would honor our city with a brief visit, I felt that it was my duty to "take" him in another way, so that his royal features might be handed down to posterity in the pages of Harper's Weekly. I little knew the difficulty of the task I had undertaken; but having attempted it, I resolved to succeed, cost what it might.

Our admirable photographer, CLARK, placed the whole of his apparatus, together with the capital operator, CAUDEN, at my disposal for this purpose. The bottle was prepared, and the fire kindled, I set myself at work to catch my fish. In due time King Billy made his appearance. I took possession of him the moment he arrived, and never left him till I saw him on board the steamer Quapaw, en route for the Arkansas reservation. Brother never stuck to brother, creditor to debtor, limpet to rock, or office-seeker to a new President, as I did to Billy. It was a hard week's work; but perseverance conquers all things, and I send you—with my little bill annexed—the result of my efforts, in the shape of the portraits of his Majesty of the Everglades, his two brothers-in-law, his young wife, and last, but not least, his "guide, philosopher, and friend," the negro slave Ben Bruno.

BILLY BOWLEGS — his Indian name is HALPATTEN-MICCO — is a rather good-looking Indian of about fifty years. He has a fine forehead, a keen, black eye; is somewhat above the medium height, and weighs about 160 pounds. His name of "Bowlegs" is a family appellation, and does not imply any parenthetical curvature of his lower limbs. When he is sober, which, I am sorry to say, is by no means his normal state, his legs are as straight as yours or mine. He has two wives, one son, five daughters, fifty slaves, and a hundred thousand dollars in hard cash. He wears his native costume, the two medals upon his breast, of which he is not a little proud, bear the likenesses of Presidents Van Buren and Fillmore.

NO-KUSH-ADJO, his Inspector-General, and the brother of his "old wife," is as fine a young fellow as you would care to see. He wears his picturesque Indian garb with the grace of the draperY of a Greek statue, and, with his silver circlet around his head, stalked along our streets with an air that seemed to imply that he honored the pale-faces by condescending to walk through their brick-and-mortar city.

LONG JACK, Billy's Lieutenant, and the brother of his young wife, is much less prepossessing. The insinuating photograph gives a perfect representation of his figure, features, and dress, even to the night-gown of gaudy calico, in which he evidently flattered himself that he was making a decided sensation. He is a perfect representative of those lazy, lounging savages who are sometimes seen in our villages, ready to shoot at a mark for the sake of a drink.

Billy's young wife, who has no name, as far as I could learn, is a quiet, modest squaw, though her features bear a striking resemblance to those of her rakish brother, Long Jack. I was very desirous to add to my collection the portraits of Billy's "old wife" and her daughters, especially that of the eldest, the "Lady Elizabeth Bowlegs," a good-looking lass of eighteen. But they "kept themselves to themselves," and very stoutly refused to have any thing to do with me or any body else.

BEN BRUNO, the interpreter, adviser, confidant, and special favorite of King Billy, is a fine, intelligent-looking negro. Unlike his master, he shows a decided predilection for civilized life, and an early visit to a ready-made clothing establishment speedily transformed him into a very creditable imitation of a "white man's nigger." He has more brains than Billy and all his tribe, and seems almost unbounded influence over his master. The negro always are, in fact, the masters of their red sovereigns, who seem fully conscious of their own mental inferiority. If a Seminole wishes to convey a high idea of his own cunning, he will say, "Ah, you no cheat me. I got real nigger wit." The negroes were the master spirits, as well as the immediate occasion, of the Florida war. They openly refused to follow their masters if they removed to Arkansas; and it was not till they explained that the Seminoles thought of emigrating. The friendship of a man who has a hundred thousand dollars in cash, and two marriageable daughters, is worth cultivating. I would advise any one who wishes to get into the good graces of Billy Bowlegs to pay special attention to Ben Bruno.

Billy Bowlegs is a direct descendant of the founder of the Seminole nation. A little more than a century ago, a noted Creek chief, named Secoffee, broke away from his tribe, and, with many followers, settled in the central part of the peninsula of Florida. They were followed by other bands, and all received the name of Seminoles, or "Runaways." The Mickasukies, the legitimate owners of the country, at first opposed these emigrations, but they were too feeble to make any effectual resistance. In a short time all the Indians amalgamated, and joined in efforts to resist the white men—the common foe of all.

Secoffee was a bitter enemy of the Spaniards, and a firm ally of the English. When Florida was receded to the Spaniards, in 1784, he took the field against them. He died the next year, at the age of seventy, and was buried near the site of the present Fort King. When he felt that his end was near, he called his two sons, Payne and Boleggy, and exhorted them to carry out his plans. The Great Spirit, he said, had revealed to him that, if he would be happy in a future state, he must cause the death of a hundred Spaniards. Fourteen of this number were still wanting; and he adjured his son to make up the deficiency.

In 1821 Florida was ceded to the United States. Emigrants began to pour in who demanded possession of the lands. The Indians were estimated at about four thousand, men, women, and children, with eight hundred negro slaves. Their villages were scattered from St. Augustine to the Appalachicola River. They consisted of log-huts, surrounded by cleared fields. It was vain for them to urge their claim to the country. Our Government recognizes no such title in the Indians. In 1823 they were compelled to enter into a treaty making over to the whites the greater part of their lands, and restricting themselves within narrow bounds formally laid down.

BILLY BOWLEGS, CHIEF OF THE SEMINOLES.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY CLARK, OF NEW ORLEANS.]

Still the whites settlers pressed upon the Indians. A thousand protests for quarels arose. Slaves ran away and joined the Indians, who refused to surrender them. The property of the whites was plundered, reprisals were made, and a border war seemed imminent, which must involve the extermination of the Indians. In 1832 Mr. Cass, then Secretary of War, directed Colonel Gadsden to negotiate with the Florida Indians for a total relinquishment of their lands in exchange for others west of the Mississippi River. With much difficulty Mr. Gadsden succeeded in inducing some of the Seminole chiefs to sign a treaty empowering a delegation to visit the country proposed to be allotted to them, and in case they were satisfied with it, the nation should cede all their Florida lands, and remove west of the Mississippi. This was the famous "Treaty of Payne's Landing," made on the 9th of May, 1832. The delegation visited the country, made their marks to a paper expressing themselves satisfied with it, and agreed that their nation should commence their removal as soon as satisfactory arrangements could be made. In this treaty the name of Halpatten-Micco appears for the first time in history. He was then a young man, a sub-chief of the band of Arpaikie, or "Sam Jones." It is noticeable that the names of the leading Seminole chiefs, especially that of Micanopy, the reputed head of the nation, were wanting in this treaty.

The Seminoles refused to sanction this proceeding of a few of their chiefs. The delegation themselves denied their own act, and declared that they had not signed any paper which required them to relinquish their lands or remove from Florida. They were assured that they would nevertheless be forced to carry out the treaty. Micanopy, old and infirm, was little more than a tool in the hands of the bold and crafty halfbreed, Osceola, who, though not a chief himself, exerted a controlling influence. The Indians resolved to negotiate, gain time to place their wives and children in safety, secure their crops, and lay in ammunition, but in no case to leave the country. They showed themselves adepts in the arts of diplomacy, and succeeded in putting off any decided action till the spring of 1835. A council was then held, Osceola and eight others agreed to abide by the treaty, and the opening of the next year was fixed upon as the time when the removal should commence. Micanopy, Sam Jones, and three other leading chiefs, refused to agree to this. General Thompson, the Indian agent, therefore struck their names off from the roll of chiefs, declaring them to be no longer counselors of the nation.

Nothing was farther from the intention of Osceola than to fulfill his agreement to emigrate. He wished to gain time, and above all things, by a display of friendship, to procure arms, powder, and lead. Thompson refused to sell them. Osceola, for a moment forgetting himself, broke out into fierce passion. "Am I a negro," he said; "a slave? I am an Indian. The white man shall not make me black. I will make the white man red with blood, and then blacken him in the sun and rain, where the wolf shall smell his bones and the vulture live upon his flesh." He shouted the agent, defied the power of the Government, and was put into irons. A week's confinement gave him time to recollect himself. He professed penitence, and promised to comply with the treaty. All difficulties were now supposed to be ended; the opening of the year 1836 was looked upon as the time when Florida was to be freed from the Indians, and crowds of emigrants stood ready to rush in upon the vacant lands.

But as summer and autumn wore on abundant proofs appeared that the Indians had no intention of leaving. It afterward appeared that they had solemnly resolved that any one who prepared to remove should die. Charley-e-Mathla, a leading chief, had begun to dispose of his cattle. He was waylaid and shot down. In his handkerchief was a sum of money, which he had received for his cattle. Osceola would not suffer it to be touched. "It is the blood of the red men," he said, as he flung it to the wind.

Late in December the Indians were ready for action; yet so cunningly were their plans laid that no one suspected an immediate outbreak. Two companies, under Major Dade, had been dispatched from Fort Brooke to reinforce the garrison at Fort King. The Indians resolved to capture Fort King before their arrival, and then turn upon these reinforcements. Osceola had not forgotten his imprisonment by General Thompson. "He is my friend," said he, significantly; "I'll take care of him." For two days he lay, with sixty warriors, hidden among the palmettos, in full view of the fort, yet no one suspected their presence. On the afternoon of the 28th of December, General Thompson and Lieutenant Smith walked out from the fort, quietly smoking their cigars. They approached a clump of bushes, and upon Thompson fell dead, pierced with four-and-twenty bullets; Smith received thirteen. The scalps were stripped off and divided into minute pieces that each warrior might have a part. Osceola had taken vengeance for the indignity which he had suffered. Meanwhile the main body of the savages had been digging Dade, who was on his march to the fort. Twice had they postponed their attack to await the return of Osceola, who was watching for his "friend" Thompson. At last they determined to act without him. Before daybreak on the morning of the 28th, 180 warriors were posted on the road by which the troops would soon advance. Every Indian was concealed behind a tree, and nothing indicated their presence. At nine o'clock the soldiers approached; every man was suffered to pass the extremity of the ambush before the signal was given to fire. Half of the men fell at the first discharge. The soldiers, utterly surprised, fired at random, and at execution, while the Indians from their coverts picked them off man by man. Of the eight officers and one hundred and two men composing the detachment, every officer and ninety-eight men fell upon the spot; another was killed the next day. Only three, all sorely wounded, made their escape. The Indians lost only four or five.

XO-HUSH-ADJO, INSPECTOR-GENERAL.

Great rejoicings were held that night by the Indians. The scalps of the victims were suspended upon a high pole, around which the drunken savages danced until daylight. Oseola had joined his comrades, bringing the trophies of his exploit. Soogs were sung ridiculing the whites, and the Indians made themselves merry over laughable imitations of the somewhat peculiar manner and gestures of Thompson.

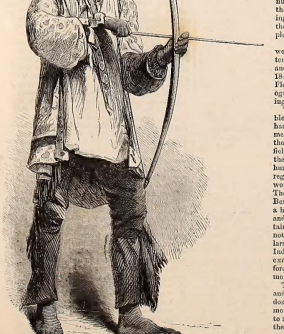
Such was the opening scene of the Florida war, which was to cost so much blood and treasure, and to task so severely the skill and energy of our ablest officers. Generals Gaines, Clinch, Scott, Call, Jesup, Macomb, Taylor, Armistead, and Worth, were successively placed in command. For a time it seemed as though a few hundred savages would successfully defy the whole power of the United States. The Indians, indeed, soon found that in open fight they were wholly unable to cope with the whites. They adopted the true policy of scattering themselves in small detachments, striking a sudden blow upon some exposed point, and then taking refuge in the almost inaccessible swamps.

Against such a foe regular military operations were of no avail. The only course was to track them to their fastnesses, burn their villages, destroy their crops, and reduce them by starvation. Again and again it seemed as though this end was attained. The Indians would then beg for peace, promise to surrender, gather at the appointed posts, and receive the promised presents. It would be announced that the "Florida war was ended;" the volunteers would be disbanded, and the regulars sent away from the unhealthy swamps. Then all at once the Indians would decamp, and the work of hunting them out was to be done over again.

Still, year by year something was gained. One chief after another was killed or captured, and their bands surrendered, and were sent to Arkansas. Oseola, coming into the camp of General Hernandez, on pretense of treating, was made prisoner, sent to Fort Moultrie, where he died of a broken heart. He had broken truce more than once, and had no right to complain of any want of faith. Cascochee, or Wild Cat, next after Oseola the most formidable warrior, surrendered. "I am leaving Florida," he said; "it was my home; I loved it; to leave it is like burying my wife and child. But I have thrown away my rifle and taken the hand of the white man, and said to him, 'Take care of me.'" So band after band had been broken up and sent to Arkansas. The remaining Indians were slowly forced southward toward the impassable Everglades, where they were sorely pressed upon by the enemy.

The name of Billy Bowlegs appears only rarely during the first three years of the war, and then only incidentally as a sub-chief under Sam Jones.

His first notable exploit took place in May, 1841. General Macomb, then the commander in Florida, had made an arrangement with Sam Jones, who was by this time considered a leading chief, in virtue of which certain limits were temporarily assigned beyond which the Indians should not pass, and within which they should be protected. The spot selected was a trading-post for their convenience. His company, of thirty men, was encamped in an open barren near the Cooloosahatchee River. The Indians were all gone up in the north country mostly unarmed. All suspicion was disarmed, and not even a sentinel was posted to guard against treachery. At daybreak on the morning of the 2d of July two hundred Indians, headed by Bowlegs, attacked the camp. The surprise was complete. The men, suddenly aroused from their deep slumbers, were shot down, tomahawked, murdered in their beds fled to the river, and were shot down in the water. Harney himself escaped by swimming off to a fishing-smack anchored some distance down the river. Of his thirty men twenty-four were slain.



From this time the influence of Bowlegs began to increase. Sam Jones, who was said to be ninety years old, was feeble and infirm. He was therefore relieved from the chief responsibility, and Bowlegs was put in his place. The dignity was hardly worth the having. The band now numbered scarcely two hundred and fifty souls, of which eighty were warriors. The new chief saw that further resistance was useless, and, after sending an emissary to ascertain that proposals for peace would be favorably received, he made his appearance at headquarters, fully authorized to treat.

Our Government had in the mean while grown weary of employing an army to hunt down a few scattered savages. President Tyler, in his Message of May 10, 1842, had said that "the further pursuit of these miserable beings by a large military force seems to be as injudicious as it is unavailing. Notwithstanding the vigorous exertions of our troops, the Indian mode of warfare, their dispersed condition, and the very smallness of their number, which increases the difficulty of finding them in the abundant and almost inaccessible hiding-places, render any further attempts to secure them by force impracticable, except by the employment of the most expensive means."

Both parties being weary of the contest, terms were soon agreed upon. A narrow district was temporarily assigned to the Indians as a planting and hunting ground, and on the 14th of August, 1842, it was formally announced that the war in Florida was at an end, and Billy Bowlegs was recognized as the head chief of the Seminoles remaining in Florida.

This seven years' inglorious war had cost much blood and treasure. The regular troops engaged had averaged something more than three thousand men during the whole period. More than twenty thousand volunteers had been brought into the field from the different States. The records of the War Department contain the names of fifteen hundred and fifty-eight officers and soldiers of the regular army who were killed in action or died of wounds received or diseases contracted in Florida. The losses of the volunteers can not be known. Besides the cost of the regular army, nineteen and a half millions of dollars were paid to the militia and volunteers, and an indemnity for losses sustained by citizens. The whole cost of the war can not be estimated at less than forty millions of dollars, and three thousand lives. The number of Indian warriors killed and sent to Arkansas hardly exceeded fifteen hundred. Each of these, therefore, must have cost the country two lives, and more than twenty-five thousand dollars.

The peace thus concluded between King Billy and the United States continued unbroken for a dozen years and more. At length, something more than eighteen months ago, paragraphs began to make their appearance in the papers announcing the re-opening of the Florida war. Hostilities had again broken out between the King of the Everglades and the Model Republic. Then General Harney was sent to meet his old opponent; but before any thing serious had taken place, we find him transferred to more important duties in the Northwest. Then came news of obscure skirmishes and loss of life. Then it was reported that our new President, Buchanan, reversing the policy of the former who "found a rude bay in his apple-tree," after exhausting the force of grass, tried what virtue there was in stones, had resolved to try what effect fair words, money, and whisky would have in inducing the indomitable Billy to leave his Florida home. At last, under date of May 8, 1858, came "General Orders, No. 4," from the "Head-quarters of the Department of Florida," announcing that the war was closed. "You have," says Colonel Loomis, in mustering the volunteers out of the service of the United States, "with untiring zeal and energy, penetrated in every direction the swamps and everglades of the country, driving the enemy from their strong-holds and hiding-places; you have engaged them in several skirmishes and actions, killing more than forty of their warriors, as acknowledged by the chief, Billy Bowlegs; you have destroyed their magazines of stores and provisions; you have captured more than forty of their men, women, and children; you have rendered them hopeless of remaining any longer with safety in the country, thereby preparing them for, and greatly facilitating, their peaceful emigration, by the delegation under Colonel Elias Rector, Superintendent of Indian Affairs."

LONG JACK, BILLY BOWLEGS'S LIEUTENANT.

YOUNG WIFE OF BILLY BOWLEGS.

BEN BRUNO, NEGRO SLAVE AND FAVORITE.

Then came the intelligence that Billy Bowlegs, with 33 warriors and 80 women and children, had actually embarked for New Orleans, on their way to Arkansas; but that the old chief, Sam Jones, with 38 warriors and their women and children, still refused to come in at any price; that he declared he would not emigrate for two wagon-loads of money; that his women followed King Billy's men, jeering them for selling themselves to the pale-faces; and that King Billy said Sam was a fool, and he did not care what became of him. At last, on the 14th of May, we learned that Billy Bowlegs had reached the Crescent City.

Alas for our lion! It soon appeared that the King of the Everglades was bent upon having a "big drunk" in New Orleans. How he succeeded no one knows better than your correspondent, who had special reasons for keeping his company, which turned out to be far from creditable. In his cups he was sometimes boisterous and sometimes maudlin. Now he boasted that he had killed a hundred white men in a day; then he thanked his white brothers for their "much friendship," and swore that he would never leave them as long as they gave him as much punch as he wanted. The enterprising proprietor of our Museum invited him to visit his establishment, announced his acceptance, and reaped a golden harvest in consequence. Billy drank the punch provided for him, perambulated the rooms, closely attended by three faithful braves, who fanned him when heated, and kept themselves sober that they might watch over him. The wax-figures seemed to possess the chief attraction for him. Scott and Taylor, he said, were "great men, and fought him mighty hard;" as for Harney, he had made him "run like hell."

But why go on to narrate his drunken speeches? He was a sorry lion at the best. At last your correspondent succeeded in bringing him to Clark's Photographic Gallery. A janitor kept the crowd at the foot of the stairs, and finally induced them to disperse, by the assurance that King Billy would not come down for three hours. Thanks to Carden and the camera, his royal features were transferred to the sensitive plate, and here you have them.

My object was attained; but in the mean while my zealous devotion to his Majesty of the Everglades had exposed me to no little misapprehension on the part of my friends. This is a censorious world, very loth to believe in disinterested attachments of any sort. A plausible motive for my proceedings was easily suggested.

Billy, as I have said, is no beggarly German prince, without money to support his hereditary dignity. He has, moreover, a marriageable daughter, whom, it was currently reported, he was anxious to bestow upon some "white brother," with a comfortable dowry of ten thousand dollars in hard cash, besides "expectations" for the future. It was reported that I was to be the happy man. I was overwhelmed with congratulations, pronounced a lucky fellow, and forced to "stand" cocktails and juleps without number.

It is due to all parties that the matter should be properly represented. It is true, then, that King Billy did me the honor to propose an alliance between myself and his eldest daughter. "Betsey," he said, "good squaw—never married—you have her—come with me—I make you great chief—next after me." I was forced to decline this flattering offer for private reasons, which I am not at liberty to explain at present. Suffice it to say that they were perfectly satisfactory to His Majesty, who was graciously pleased to present me, in token of his perfect consideration, with his own royal autograph, a fac-simile of which I send you. The original, of course, I shall carefully preserve, to be handed down to my posterity. I only wish it was appended to an I O U for a few thousands. It would be considered "first-class paper," and I do not doubt that I could have got it "done" at a very moderate shave.

I am ever,
YOUR NEW ORLEANS CORRESPONDENT.

THE DEVIL'S MARK.

I.

ON the morning of August the first, sixteen hundred and fourteen, the village of Hambledon was the scene of much lively bustle, which rallied chiefly round the dwelling of Master Simon, farrier, blacksmith, and wheel-wright for the township. Master Simon's only daughter, Rose—the White Rose of Hambledon, the folks called her—was going to be married that day to her cousin, Richard Nicholl. They were a very well-matched couple of young people, for if she was as blooming and sweet as her name, Richard was the goodliest man in that parish, and many another. She was nineteen, and he was twenty-six—both of them in the full glow and excellence of youth.

In Master Simon's cottage were collected half the women of the place, but Rose's chamber was the favorite point, for there the young maiden's toilet was being accomplished by half a dozen of her particular friends. The costume of those days was not remarkable either for its picturesqueness or its grace; but Rose's pretty shape and sweet face were proof against its disfigurements. She stood in the centre of the room, fair and blushing, in a petticoat of remarkable stiffness and a bodice of preternatural length, her gold-colored hair rolled up elaborately, and a highly-starched ruff lying close at hand to imprison her round white throat.

There was not one of the half-dozen friends so beautiful as Rose; but one of them—the chief, it seemed—from her being the putter-on of the bows and decorative paraphernalia of the dress, had a singular countenance—cold, repellant, and stone-gray. The blackness of her eyebrows, which met and were depressed over her eyes, gave her a furtive, stealthy expression, and her narrow, scarlet lips, while they indicated a sensual disposition, showed also one of cruelty and vindictiveness. Every body, however, Rose included, treated her with a certain respect, for she was waiting-woman to my lady the wife of Sir Roger Bedinfield, at Hambledon Hall. Her name was Mistress Gilbert, and she was reputed to possess philters and love-charms, which, in those good old times, were held in high repute, not only among silly maidens, but even among wise and discreet matrons. One charm, however, Mistress Gilbert did not possess —that charm which would have charmed Richard Nicholl's heart out of his bosom. Her disappointed hopes had been a sly theme of talk many a time in the village, and even Rose herself had shared in it. Possibly that was the reason why, when Mistress Gilbert's chilly hands glided so stealthily about her person, a slight shiver kept running over her flesh.

"You are cold, Rose," said the waiting-woman; "shut the window, some of you. You shudder all over when you are touched."

"It can't be that her enemy is walking over the place where her grave is to be," remarked a careless young body, who looked straight at Mistress Gilbert, and then turned red under the cold scrutiny that she received from her cruel eyes.

"Rose is too good to have an enemy. Every one loves her," said the waiting-woman, slowly: directly she had spoken she approached her lips to the white, polished shoulder, and blew softly at a tiny brown mark, and then brushed it with her hand, carelessly.

"You will have to blow a long time before you blow away that little mole, Mistress Gilbert," laughed Rose: "I was born with it."

"I am short-sighted this morning—I mistook it for a fly;" and the waiting-woman began to arrange the starched ruff.

My Lady Bedinfield and two of her daughters had thought right to honor the ceremony by coming to look on from the elevation of the family pew, and afterward to praise the rustic grace of the White Rose of Hambledon. Mistress Lucy Bedinfield and her sister Elizabeth would have given half their rich clothing for a tint out of her cheeks; they were but sickly young gentlewomen, on whose complexions Mistress Gilbert's various washes had no effect at all, unless it were to make them deader and duller than even Nature—who colored them in one of her penurious, pallid moods —had ever intended.

When Rose walked out of church, her pretty blue eyes downcast, and holding Richard's arm, the folks inside blessed her softly as became the place, and those outside gave them a cheer, after which the bells rang out a famous wedding peal. Mistress Gilbert's clayey visage looked colder and more clayey than ever as they disappeared. Nobody heeded her, and she did not choose to follow the returning party to Master Simon's house; but when my Lady Bedinfield, the rabble being dispersed, issued stately from the family pew with her daughters behind her, she was graciously told that she might walk with them to the Hall.

"They are a pretty pair of lovers, I'm sure, and Rose's dress was uncommon gay;" said Lady Bedinfield, who had a mother's heart.

"Her cheek could not have looked fresher if it had been painted. Gilbert, your new wash for the face is quite useless;" querulously observed Mistress Elizabeth; "I am sure it dries the skin."

"Natural roses have the finest bloom," replied Lady Bedinfield, who had been a beauty herself, and was still a handsome woman. She sometimes had a little spite against her daughters for being so unmanageably plain.

"Rose Nicholl's bloom looks natural," said Mistress Gilbert, with an air of sarcastic respect; "it looks even brighter than nature."

"You are jealous, Gilbert; we know all about the young suitor's indifference to black eyes when blue ones are willing to shine on him," returned Lady Bedinfield, with a jolly laugh.

Mistress Gilbert's face blushed lividly. That taunt was not needed to increase the deadly hatred she had conceived for Richard and his young wife. She dropped behind, and would not answer when spoken to. Lady Bedinfield called to her just as they were entering the house, and said, in the same tone of mockery, "If Rose's beauty is all paint, why don't you put it on too, Gilbert?"

"I did not say it was all paint, my lady. I wish it were. It would be the less harm," replied the waiting-woman.

"If it is neither nature nor paint, what is it?" asked Lady Bedinfield.

"It is devil's beauty. I saw his mark on her neck to-day," said Mistress Gilbert.

Lady Bedinfield laughed again, but this time in a less loud and assured manner. Scarcely any one in these very good old times was altogether free from the black plague-spot of superstition, and she was neither better nor wiser than her age. She entered her house in silence, and Mrs. Gilbert, pacing her room that night vehemently, as a caged wild beast newly caught, rejoiced to think that she had dropped on her rival's fair fame the first deadly drop of that corrosive poison which she hoped ere long to see blacken and blast it utterly.

II.

The apartments of the two sisters at Bedinfield Hall adjoined, and Mistress Gilbert passed from one to the other attending on the young ladies. There was company that day; especially, there was one young gallant named Sir Henry Cavendish, whom either of the girls would have been proud to captivate. Mistress Lucy stood before her mirror, fully dressed; but there was dissatisfaction on her countenance—she had small, delicate features, but her skin was cloudy, her eyes were lacking in brilliance. Mistress Elizabeth was even worse favored, for her visage was long and lean as well as colorless, and her eyes were not so perfectly set as they might have been.

"You will soon be of no more use to us than a mole, Gilbert. Can you not see how thick my complexion is to-day?" said Mistress Lucy, pointing at her own reflection in the glass; she always laid the blame of Nature's defects on her abigail.

"Yes, Mistress Lucy, I see—" She hesitated a minute, opened the door to look into the passage, and then whispered, hurriedly, "I have a powder that I got from Mistress Turner in London; but if I let you have some, my lady must never know."

"Ah! good Gilbert, I will not tell her; speak low, that Elizabeth may not hear. How does this powder affect one?"

"It preserves youth, makes the skin smooth, and gives it a bloom like a little child's; but it is highly dangerous."

"How dangerous? Is it a poison?"

Mistress Elizabeth, overhearing the mysterious whispering, crept stealthily behind her door, watched through a chink, and listened. The arrival of Sir Henry Cavendish had sown jealousy between the sisters.

"It is a mineral poison; but with care, and in very small quantities, it is safe. In a week you would be as fair as Rose Nicholl. Will you try it? or do you fear the risk?"

"Oh! I will try it. I would try any thing to have a face like the young smith's wife; but promise me not to let Elizabeth have any."

Mistress Gilbert gave the required pledge, and then stole away to her own chamber to fetch the powder. The watcher waited for her return impatiently. When Gilbert re-entered the room, she brought in her hand a small box of ebony, which she opened with a key attached to a chain hidden under her ruff. Elizabeth listened breathlessly, but she could not quite catch all that was said. But she saw a small packet given to her sister, and by her, after a portion of its contents had been extracted for immediate use, deposited in her jewel-box. How that taken out was used, she could not see; for Mistress Gilbert carried it to where stood the ewer and basin, and thither Mistress Lucy went to apply it; but she heard the waiting-woman say, "It will sink—mingle it well with the water;" so she conjectured that it was something to be swallowed, and determined that she herself would soon have a face as fair as Rose, the smith's wife, if it only depended on taking the powder hidden in the jewel-box.

The application of the powder made no perceptible improvement in Mistress Lucy's face that day, and Sir Henry Cavendish was by no means charmed out of his senses; but in the course of the week there was certainly a change for the better, and Mistress Elizabeth—who had not yet found an opportunity to lay her hands upon any of the powder—became more and more eager to profit by its beautifying effects. One evening Mistress Lucy left her chain with the jewel-box key fastened to it on her table, and her sister, who had never ceased to watch, availed herself of this chance to possess herself of a good portion of what remained of the powder. She immediately mixed a little of it with water, and drank it.

Very soon she was seized with pain, nausea, and sickness; but not so severely as to enforce greater caution in using the powder, for she repeated the dose daily. She suffered, but her skin acquired a clearness which it had never worn before, and this would have reconciled her to any thing short of martyrdom. Her store being exhausted, and the key falling no more into her possession, she was obliged for a time to desist from her beguiling experiments. Mistress Lucy, however, still steadily continued her applications. At last Mistress Gilbert's ebony box was empty, and no more of the powder could be obtained until Sir Roger Bedinfield went up to London with his family. Mistress Lucy was very impatient of this delay; but at length a supply was obtained, and the beautifying discipline was recommenced by the elder sister at once. Whether some more deadly ingredient was now mingled with it, or it was unskillfully prepared, or—what is still more probable—Mistress Lucy used it incautiously and too often, it now began to work on the muscles of the face, and the miserable girl awoke one morning with her mouth drawn on one side, and frightfully disfigured. Mistress Gilbert, terrified at her appearance, and rightly attributing it to the cosmetic, to shield herself from all suspicion, immediately exclaimed that her young lady was bewitched—and, as all new or ill-understood disease was, in these good old times, laid to supernatural influences, this was readily believed. But, bewitched or poisoned, poor young Mistress Lucy's days of vanity were past, and she would never charm Sir Henry Cavendish, or any gay gallant, with her face again.

III.

Lady Bedinfield devoted herself like a good mother to her afflicted daughter; and, when they retired to their country-house—where the only amusements were such as her health and spirits were far too broken to enjoy—they might be seen almost daily wandering through the shrubberies together, or sitting under the trees. Poor Mistress Lucy could not bear to be seen by the most intimate friends, or even by the villagers; and the idea that she had been bewitched gained ground fast.

Mistress Gilbert was one of those patient haters who never balk themselves of their revenge by rushing upon it prematurely. To screen her own malpractices, she had said at first that Mistress Lucy was bewitched; but it did not occur to her then to turn this to the furtherance of her schemes against Rose Nicholl. One lovely June evening, however, in passing by the smith's cottage, she saw a gathering of the village goodies, who told her that the White Rose, her detested rival, had just got a little son; and a week or two later she saw the young mother herself standing at her open window with the child in her arms, and the stalwart smith leaning in, making gentle, paternal advances, to her great and laughing delight. Mistress Gilbert's heart felt like a lump of molten lead in her bosom at this picture. She stopped and looked at it wickedly over the hedge for several minutes, and then rushed rapidly homeward. Her plan was maturing.

A dreadful scene greeted her when she arrived. The house was in an uproar; every body running hither and thither, calling for this thing and that, in frantic haste. Mistress Elizabeth was ill—she was dying—dying in agonies; her shrieks could be heard half over the house.

"She is poisoned!" said Lady Bedinfield, who was shuddering and weeping by her daughter's writhing form; but Mistress Gilbert, bending over the bed her ash-gray face, said, "No, I have seen these convulsions before; she is bewitched, like Mistress Lucy."

Every one in the room paused aghast with their remedies; but Lady Bedinfield said, "Who can pursue our family with such a relentless hatred? Whom have we any of us injured? There is worthy Parson Phillips coming to our aid; let him be admitted."

While the minister recited his prayers Mistress Elizabeth died. "She has been poisoned," he also observed; but the doctor, not being able to name the drug that had killed her, solemnly countenanced Mistress Gilbert's idea that she had been bewitched. The waiting-woman was not long in discovering where Mistress Elizabeth had found her fatal draught. Advantage had been taken of her absence to break open the ebony box and abstract the cosmetic powder. Too large an internal dose had done its work forever.

From the time of her sister's death poor Mistress Lucy's health also began fast to decline. She became subject to long fits of melancholy depression, and more than ever evaded seeing strangers. Still she would go out of doors, and her favorite haunt was a sunny knoll in the plantations, where she would sit for hours with either her mother or Mistress Gilbert. Any sudden noise—even the flight of a bird from one branch to another—would cause her to tremble convulsively, as if with overwhelming dread; for the poor girl had heard it said that she was bewitched, and the idea worked in her imagination until she believed it. It happened one morning, while in the wood, as usual, that Rose Nicholl passed within sight of Mistress Lucy and the waiting-woman. Mistress Lucy began to shudder and cry out.

"Is it Rose Nicholl that has bewitched you, Mistress Lucy?" asked Mistress Gilbert, earnestly.

"Yes, yes," replied the nervous creature, following the retreating figure with wild eyes.

"I always thought so! I saw the devil's mark upon her neck the day she was married," cried the waiting-woman, triumphantly.

When they returned home, Mistress Lucy told her mother that all her deformity and all her present illness had been inflicted upon her by the malice of Rose Nicholl, the smith's wife, and that the sight of her threw her into convulsions such as those in which her sister died. Lady Bedinfield was troubled, but suspicious. She consulted her husband, who was remarkable for any thing rather than sagacity, and proposed to have Rose tried by one of the common prickers who made it their business to go from place to place discovering witches and bringing them to punishment. Sir Roger consented, and Mistress Gilbert having undertaken to produce a witch-finder, innocent, unconscious Rose was indicated to him as a suspected person; and, full of the importance of his terrible office, the pricker went to the smith's house when he was at his forge. Master Simon also was away from home, and Rose, with her baby asleep in her lap, sat sewing diligently, like the good housewife and housemother that she was. The pricker obtained an entrance into the cottage by pleading that he had walked far and was tired; so the unsuspicious Rose bade him rest himself, and gave him some refreshment. Presently two of the village women sauntered in, ostensibly to see the baby, but in reality, by pre-concert with the pricker, to help in the examination. They all began to talk, and presently led the conversation round to the subject of witches and warlocks. There had been many hundreds of wicked and cruel executions in England during recent years for the crime of witchcraft, and Rose had heard of them, like others: indeed, a witch had been swum and drowned in Hambledon mill-pond within her own memory. She expressed great commiseration for this old woman, and said that she believed many unfortunates were the victims of the malice of their enemies, rather than real criminals, as was pretended. The pricker took umbrage at this remark, perhaps because Mistress Gilbert's bribe lay heavy on his conscience at the moment; and, thinking to daunt Rose, he exclaimed, that she herself was a notorious witch and evil-liver, and he was there to prove it.

Rose started up; and when the two women approached to lay hold on her, she broke from them, and rushed out at the door shrieking, "Richard, Richard, help me!"

The hammer was not going in the forge just then, and the smith heard her. Clutching a stout cudgel, he ran to the spot; and, while the two assistants decamped, he seized the pricker in a grasp like a vice, and, without waiting for explanation, proceeded to belabor him so soundly that the miserable official was likely to have a skin full of sorely-aching bones for a month to come.

When her husband paused, Rose said, bitterly weeping: "He is a witch-finder, Richard, and declares that I am a witch. He came here to prove it. Oh where, where shall we fly? You know, dear husband, that I am your own true wife, and no wicked witch. Don't you, love?" She clung to him beseechingly. In those good old times there were few ties of blood or of affection that did not break under this terrible accusation; but the smith loved his Rose dearly; and, having an intense antipathy to the manipulations of such odious gentry as the pricker, his wrath was so far increased by the idea that they might have been excised on his young wife, as to find it indispensable to beat him again, and then to throttle him until he confessed that he had received a letter from Mistress Gilbert to arouse Rose. A second shaking made him give up the instrument with which he proposed to prick for the devil's mark, which all witches bore on their persons. This instrument was a steel needle with a hollow handle, into which it retired under very slight pressure, coming out again when that pressure was withdrawn, as the finger thought proper to run into the flesh; it in reality did not even break the skin: as the devil's mark could be pricked, as was usual, without the witch feeling any pain, and without blood following the withdrawal of the needle, this instrument proved a most unanswerable and very malicious purpose; and, with its lying witness, did to death many a poor innocent creature. It was, after conviction, was tortured into confessing every enormity that the diseased imaginations of their self-constituted examiners could devise. The smith was something of a mechanician himself, and immediately discovered the secret of the instrument, which he determined to carry to Parson Phillips. As long as it remained in the minister's possession in the grave at the moment, he hailed him to come in, and rebuted what had been threatened against Rose.

"These accursed witch-pricker can make knaves; I hope you have." The parson glanced significantly at the cudgel, as much as to say, "I will." The smith nodded affirmatively.

The pricker was trying to snuff out, but Richard stopped him, and said nothing until he had been before Sir Richard Bedingfield and had a political chat with a church, and then a chapter by the village folk. A good number of the rustics had gathered at a respectful distance from the cottage, and when they saw the official dragged out by the smith, Parson Phillips following, and Rose looking out from the door-way, they began to think glad that the pretty White Rose of their village had escaped the dangerous trial: but when the smith came among them, and exhibited the tools of the witch-finder's needle, nothing would satisfy these excited people but immediate justice upon them and then; so the bruised wretch was hauled off to the mill-pond, docked until he was half-dead, and then driven out of the village with howls and execrations.

Mistress Gilbert was foiled of her revenge for the present; but, she said with a deadly tenacity, "Though he was not a true witch-finder, that does not make him less than a witch."

And the village began to look coldly on the smith's wife, and to regard gossip with her decidest she should slight them and theirs with her evil eye.

IV.

The very name of witch was fatal in those good old times. Nothing could long exist in such company; and this poor Rose well knew. To see herself hated and persecuted around her life with a dread that the general feeling might extend itself to her husband, her father, and her child.

Six months after the visit of the pricker Mistress Lucy Bedingfield died; and the old report that she had been bewitched was revived, with the addition that it was Rose Nicholl, and Rose Nicholl only, who had laid upon her the spells that had destroyed her.

Every calamity that happened in the village was now laid to the charge of the smith's wife. If an old person died from age, Rose had bewitched him or her; if a baby perished from weakness, Rose had bewitched it; if a cow failed, Rose had bewitched the nest; if the corn, when heavy in the ear, was laid by violent rain, Rose had raised the storm; if a horse cast a shoe, Rose had bewitched the nails, or the hammer, or the anvil. Rose might look as innocent and pretty as she would, but popular superstition declared her to be a witch, and popular persecution would have an end.

Mistress Gilbert scarcely found her schemes match so quickly as she desired; but an unexpected event came to her assistance and revenge. A poor old woman at Whistleknowle was tried for witchcraft, and under her tortures she gave a full account of persons whom she said she had herself seen at the Sabbath, or general meeting of witches and warlocks. She did not at first mention Rose Nicholl, but the name being suggested to her, she also mentioned her as present on her, and many more than the previous Friday night. All the accused were immediately arrested, and carried before Sir Roger Bedingfield, and two other magistrates to expose as bismeak. In vain did Richard Nicholl swear that at the time he was said to have been present at the horrible mysteries of the witches' Sabbath she was sleeping comfortably at his side; he was told that the devil deluded him by putting a semblance of her in her place, that he might not discover her innocent slumbers. The poor smith was nearly maddened; but the prisoners were all confined until the day when they were to be tried.

Two days after poor Rose was thrown into prison Parson Phillips brought these tidings to the smith, and said that he had leave to help her lovely home and give her Christian burial. Terrified at the accusation, brought against her, deprived of her child and her husband, the poor young woman was seized with fever, and died in her prison—by God's mercy, both Parson and Richard thought, for she thereby escaped the doom of her companions in misfortune, against whose names stand in the criminal records of the time the fatal words, "Convict and burnt."

The smith brought his poor White Rose home on the third anniversary of their marriage; and the next day she was interred, with all the rites of the Church, amid the tears and lamentations of her parishioners. Master Simon and Richard stood by the grave in mighty sorrow, and shrewdly suspected that, with her wicked eyes fixed on the smith's face, was Mistress Gilbert. She was moving away, at last their glances met; the waiting-woman of Lucy Bedingfield, and pointed downward as the child was a significant air. Richard looked at her steadily for a moment, and then said in a deep, concentrated tone, which he heaven recalled afterward as a tone of prophecy. "Ay, Mistress Gilbert, there lies the body of my poor Rose that you hated, and her spirit is safe in heaven. Yes may laugh now, but you shall not laugh long. The day is near when your body shall rot in the earth that shall be seen from Whistleknowle to Carrsford, and your spirit shall start to be heard from Hockley-stone for three miles round." Mistress Gilbert only laughed the louder as she marched away.

MY WESTERN LAND SPECULATION.

Six years' toil at the desk in the office of one of Gotham's merchant princes (vide Life in the Golden Keys), and I have saved out of my scanty income four hundred dollars. Twenty-five years old. Prospect of being able to support a wife (Chief end of man). Ergo, I must do something with it. Stocks—bull or bear? Pshaw! pick' sin dominoes. Californ'a or Australia? Alas! the utter wicked condition of my health forbids the golden dream. Mistake my employer's funds for my own, and on the strength of the information travel for my health in Europe? Too risky! None but bank and railroad officers, national, State, and municipal officials, do that sort of thing. I have it! The newspapers say there is no place like the West for a young man to make a fortune in a short number purse. I hear every day of men who crossed the Mississippi with ten dollars in their pocket returning, in a few years, with a hundred thousand. And do not Eastern brokers-down politicians go West, and return Governors, Senators, Ambassadors or Representatives, or become Governors, Indian Agents, or something of that sort? I'm going West!

And I did go.

Cold, dismal, and rainy was the afternoon of a November day when I for the first time beheld the Father of Rivers, as we steamed over in the ferry-boat from Jersey City. Nothing to cheer my arrival in Chicago (the terrestrial residence of his Satanic Majesty, as I was informed), and I was pertinatically fleeced. I was not at all surprised to learn that, upon the site of the present city, with its huge hotels, and the great influx of strangers, it was compelled to pay full price for the privilege of sleeping and boarding in a house with a high-sounding name, extraordinary pretensions in the—back of the city, and—à la carte—prices—à la fortarthy settled as above, I repaired to the wash-room. After a spirited controversy with the porter as to the propriety of a clean towel—he one offered me being "clare as coarse, as only a hundred cent or dozen could be"—I was at last able to. I fought my way in to the supper-table, coming out of the struggle with the loss only of my temper, and half of my coat-tails. Disgusted, I seated myself upon the sharp corner of a trunk in the office, but—now, sir (sinning in trinities now in one), and entreasured to realize that, at last, I to was an inhabitant of the Great West. Scattered around me, other visiting strangers, like myself, was a crowd of rough-looking, keen-eyed, smoking, drinking, conversing gentlemen. Many representatives were present from every State in the Union and New Jersey, and for a moment I fancied myself in Congress. I was soon undeceived in this idea. The assembly was too respectable and orderly; and not one word in twelve was in slang. A suspicious-looking man, with a funny hat, hair long and combed behind his ears, and with a heavy gold watch-chain, and a large drab three "horse" of brandy since supper, pulled a copy of the New York Herald from his pocket, and quietly deavored to get up an argument. He was quickly silenced, however, by a burly individual, who immediately took the floor, and called for the stranger to keep his clam-shell shut. "Spect a Yankee's a-comin' round to this town to buy up all the terrible snap—pulled out a note-book and scribbled furiously. Glancing over his shoulder, I read, "Jones, Hogtown, 2 cents; Smith, 3 cents." Outraging on freedom of speech," "Gag-law," and other original and forcible ideas of the kind. Upon reflection, as I thought of the unfortunate readers of that piece about.

I am as promiscuous an assemblage one would naturally suppose there would be as many topics of conversation as there were different individuals. Here, however, was an exception. Every gentleman present seemed firmly impressed with the idea that he was there to purchase land, and talking about but land—forty's, eighty's, township, sections, ranges, timber, prairie, water-power, swamp and prairie. Upon inquiry I ascertained that the gentlemen were laboring under a severe attack of "land fever." The land-offices of most of the counties of the Union to attend the sale of public lands at the time of my visit to Chicago. Also, in the northern part of the State, confident of making a speedy fortune from the purchase and sale of Uncle Sam's acres. The glowing descriptions of fortunes made, and to be made, as it were, simply by the lifting of a finger, were enough to make a fool of a tide," etc. Here was the club. I resolved to plunge in; and at once engaged passage to the land of promise—Iowa.

At four o'the clock next morning nine dleepy, miserable-looking beings were packed inside of the stage-coach—I, e., a lumber-wagon, covered with canvas stretched on hoops—and after fifteen minutes' application of the whip, we moved off at a small's pace. The shiverings of the supper regions were open, and the rain poured, as the gentleman from Illinois remarked, "slightually." If the spirit of the land of Nod had any business to transact in our vicinity that day, I am confident that, in the exuberance of his joy, he at once commenced building a spiritual ark. The mud—to lift it not in error—was bottomless.

I was wedged up on the back seat between two bulky individuals, one of whom breathed forth an aroma of vile whisky, while the other emitted like a volcano in full eruption. This, combined with the tossing and pitching of the vehicle, and a decidedly nauseous effect upon my hyper-delicate stomach; and after I had deposited the remnant of my last night's meal in the over-coat pocket of the individual on my right, that society individual consented to change seats with me.

Dreyling the next few disagreeableness of my companions in misery. Each eyed his neighbor suspiciously, and as it was now certain that all were bound for Iowa, the same errand, I was amused to see how cautiously the all-absorbing topic was handled in their conversation. Not one would admit he had the remotest idea of speculating in land. He was merely traveling to view the country, etc. Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Virginia, Ohio, Vermont (of course), Massachusetts, and New York, had representatives in our company.

"What mout you hail from, stranger?" queried Missouri.

"New York," I replied.

"Ever lin in them y'ere parts afore?" said Illinois.

"No."

"Nor never'll want to begin, I reckon!" growled Kentucky, as a sudden lurch of the coach sent Vermont flying head first into the stomach of Virginia.

Here our conversation terminated. The road had been rapidly changing from worse to still worse, and, practically, the latter, until now it was literally a quagmire. We were continually bowing, whistling, "Yankee Doodle," over clover into ruts, ruts into gullies, gullies into sloughs, now against the top, now against the side of the coach, and then, by way of variety, the bottom floor of our mudgon. We were so beaten, bruised, and shaken up that positively I was in a state of stupefaction. Still in our mute bodies to articulate even—A feeble, "I'll be doggoned!" from Missouri, and Manuchee Indian's "Ugh!" from me, by-the-way, plowed into his left eye, made our inability to give audible vent to our feelings the more aggravating.

Late in the afternoon, as we were descending a steep and slippery hill, a terrific jolt was followed by a loud crash—over we went. Fortunately my side was uppermost, or I should certainly have been killed by the bolt that through the canvas covering, I slowly extricated myself from the struggling mass. The horses were gloriously off as fast as their jaded condition would permit, the driver sat in a hole, digging the mud out of his ears, and the fellow-passengers, having recovered their breath, were going on at a furious rate under the canvas.

"Dod rot it!" groaned Missouri; "my leg's broke, sure pop!"

"Ugh!" said a fellar, can't you?" queried Vermont. "I'm smashed as flat as a pancake!"

"I know I am!" roared Virginia. "I'm any thar or thar'll be a dead nigger here in less than a minute!"

One by one they crawled slowly out. No one hurt. The driver went after the horses, and the passengers in a group of the wreck. After walking some four miles through the rain and mud we came to a big shanty, whose dimensions and appearance at once stamped a respectable specimen of the log-cabin, where permission was given us to remain over night. Having found accommodation in a fried pork, swimming in grease, bread, and molasses (Iowa butter), we rolled ourselves in our blankets and commenced our first night's rest (there were no none), and were lulled to sleep by the whistling of the wind through the crevices, and the pattering of the rain upon our garments.

Three weary, miserable days were we tortured in this delightful vehicle. Late in the evening of the fourth day we arrived at the town of Dubuque. The rain had ceased to snow; and the firmament was coqueting with zero. Starved, and frozen nearly stiff, I alighted at one of the hotels—"All full, sir," said the clerk; "said Kentucky," showed the bar-room, and elevating my way through a crowd of spittoon-like objects, I was received by the landlord, who was dispensing the hospitalities of the house by the dim light of a tallow-candle, with a bottle and glass in his hand. I was informed that the hotel was crowned to overflowing; that the sleigh-ing was splendid and unobtainable; that the floors of the halls, parlor, and bar-room were covered with ledgers; and that I had my choice of the settled plank, hard floor, or nothing. I could find myself. As to supper—couldn't have any that night. A table-d'hote dinner would be ready at one-bone. Finding that the other hotel was in the same predicament I chose a plank in the sitting-room. The apartment was the last, for the only evidence of the, occupied it at once. The furniture consisted of seventeen pairs of wooden chairs and a pine table. The ceiling low; walls dirty, and blackened with smoke. The cooking stove was red-hot, and perfectly overpowering. Musty buffalo robes, old harnesses, tobacco smoke, a disgusting odor of wet boots, and the atmosphere from some thirty very dirty human bodies, made me sigh for a couch in the pig-sty of more well-to-do Eastern farmer. A profane individual near me said, "that you might search the infernal regions and not find a worse place than such as this." My acquaintances with those regions is limited, but I fervently believe the profane was right.

Next morning the cold was terrible—thermometer twenty degrees below zero. Owing to the tremendous crowd I despair of ever getting breakfast at the hotel; so I lunched upon a herring and two crackers, procured at a neighboring grocery. The town consisted of some thirty wood buildings, evidently erected in a great hurry, at a time when lumber was very scarce. About one-half of these buildings were occupied, as fluring signs informed me, by bankers, land agents, etc., whose principal business appeared to be the buying and selling of land warrants, and entering land upon them; but it was chiefly, as I afterward learned (this is private), the freezing of greenhorns. Two were occupied as hotels; four or five as general variety stores, and the balance as groceries.

The great centre of attraction—the United States Land Office—was situated in the upper story of a frame building. To reach the office you were obliged to ascend a rude flight of stairs built up on the outside of the building. As I ascended with the dense crowd filling the street in front of the office, my attention was called to a number of men stationed upon the stairs, who coolly ordered customers to "keep off, if they didn't want their heads punched." These men, I was afterward informed, had, notwithstanding the intensity of the cold, received the right to retain their places for a check of the afternoon previous. To prevent freezing to death they kept a large fire burning in a stove below during the night, which, with frequent and copious draughts of hot drinks, sustained life during this terrible ordeal. I had their objects in view being well, if not life itself, was to enable them to be first at the counter when the land-office opened for sale in the morning, thereby insuring a probability of their being able to get through a batch of warrants, and also subsequent land that privileges entitled them.

The stairs, during some twelve or fourteen hours, in an atmosphere ranging from North Dakota intensity, was so highly priced that it was determined by the sons that the drawers of certain numbers (as agreed upon by the land-speculating band) alloted this favor.

At ten o'clock the door opened, and with a whoop and a yell the crowd rushed up the stairs and into the office. The foremost ones sprang upon the counter, and the scene was only to be likened to that while the rest struggled, and pushed, and pushed each other, endeavoring to get over counter—each one over and one holding his package of warrants above his head, and thrusting them into the face of the clerk, and shouting their names in order that the latter might enter them in the terrible change with the utmost sang froid, and coolly proceed to hand out the amount of warrants any customer had occurred.

Finding myself during the forenoon blowing my fingers, kicking my toes, and watching this crowd of greedy land-worshipers, or shirks as they are called here, I went down to the hotel to dinner. A dense mass of the most ravenous and savage-looking individuals it was ever been my fortune to encounter in a civilized community were jammed together around the door of the dining-room during the hour of dinner. They glared on each other like tigers, and stood with every muscle strained, and every nerve in readiness when he is preparing for a deadly spring upon his dinner. The bell rung—the door opened—the crowd sprang in over the heads of the table, and on the table—each as he fell grasping some article of food that he could lay his hands on. Three times was this disgusting scene enacted ere I managed to get in. I secured a frozen potato, warmed through, and a bit of fried pork, and considered myself peculiarly fortunate in so doing, as I saw many around me eating the potato but a crust of bread. I remonstrated with the landlord, and was told "that 'twas so was table'. He couldn't help it. The crowd were to be fed in the rest. Button my over coat, keep a stiff upper lip, and go in with the crowd." Very reasonably I said then, for this bit of fried pork, and this frozen potato, warmed through, gotten at the risk of my life, I paid the modest sum of twenty-five dollars. Upon complaining with some fifty very dirty individuals, I paid twenty-five cents for a raw dollar and fifty cents per diem. I was told that this was the daily order of proceeding. Was not this a free country?

An old man, with whom I conversed during the afternoon, informed me that he had received a warrant from the United States Government for one hundred and sixty acres of land for his services in the war of 1812. He had been here over three weeks. Had stood night after night on the stairs in the bitter cold, but all for nothing. He believe would not notice him. His money was gone, and the week were now drawing to a close in fact of his warrant. I thought of the gratitude of Republics; but as I was not a candidate for Congress, I prudently commanded not to trouble myself by a stump speech. I learned that the above was but one of many similar cases, and that the class of old soldiers or their relatives receiving any benefit from land-warrants is sheer nonsense. They have to sell immediately, at their ge-. "stripping" are not por soldiers.

Land-warrants with slight acre warrant, and resolved to do my best to secure an entry. But all to no purpose. For ten days did I go in with the crowd, and for ten did I come out with my terrible squeezing, and nothing more. The majority were in a perfect state of despair. Disappointed, prostrated, and heart-sick, they would leave by twos and threes, and, starting the back-load, commenced as follows:

"Excuse me, my dear Sir, but as you don't appear posted in our manner of doing business, and as it the way you are now going on you will never accomplish that which you are after, I thought, as a friend, I would offer you my assistance, I agreeable."

I expressed my gratitude for the offer, and requested the gentleman to proceed.

"In the first place, then, let me take your warrant, give me twenty dollars, and the warrant shall be entered before to-morrow morning, or I'll forfeit twice twenty dollars." You look surprised at this, but it's just as I tell you. You have been here nearly two weeks, at an expense of two dollars a day, and your warrant is not yet entered. You must have to wait two weeks longer, and then not succeed. I offer for twenty dollars to get it entered immediately."

I ventured a remark, that it seemed somewhat singular he should be able to enter warrants where even he pleased, while so many worthy gentlemen were wasting time and money in a fruitless effort to get one through.

"Ah!" replied the Banker, with a knowing wink, "they don't know the ropes. You see, my friend, we make a business of this thing, and it's not at all singular that our head clerk cannot take side up every time. But come now, let's talk business. Here is a choice eighty (pointing to a map of the land district), about a hundred miles west of here, well timbered and watered, and only twelve from Danville City. I don't care if you refused to a highly-colored and well-executed lithographic map of said city, wherein wide streets and squares, magnificent churches and public buildings, and palatial residences, were delineated with great accuracy.] Say the word, and I'll take the warrant on it for you. You'll never get another such chance. The moment this land is patented 'twill bring at least ten dollars per acre. You may believe me or not, just as you please. You are a young man—about my son's standing—I assumed to take advantage of you—wouldn't for a thirty eighty anyhow. And assuredly this same land is all chosen from personal inspection; and I know that this eighty is as I represent it. Do you smoke?"

What could I do? I took a cigar, gave my warrant, and a fifteen-dollar gold piece, and left banking friend; and, sure enough, next morning he placed in my hands the Register's receipt, certifying that I had entered the S. ½ of S. W. ¼ of Sec. 19, Township —, N. of Range —, W. of 5th P. M., and that I was entitled to a patent therefor as soon as Government saw fit to give me one. The banker congratulated me upon having secured the choicest eighty in the district—said it was worth, at the least calculation, eight hundred dollars; but advised me to sell not, and I might probably get a thousand or twelve hundred for it.

A cool thousand clear profit in less than a week! Rather better than grubbing away at six hundred per annum. What a lucky fellow I was to come West!

I resolved to visit Paradise City and view my property. I packed a trunk at ten and a half per five dollars per diem, and started bright and early next morning. The shingling was excellent. The wind blew rather more than was necessary for comfort, but the guide assured me that it was an unusually mild breeze.

We drove forty miles, and put up at a wretched hovel (the third one met with in our day's journey). While we were eating our supper, of fried pork and molasses (no bread), a little girl came up to me, and said, "Aunt thee sent word [Quaker] thee dead boy out on the prairie t'other day, and mammy keeps it up stairs for twelve!"

I asked whom, and, as I leaned against the corner of the shanty, resolved never again to touch, taste, or handle pork.

About noon of the third day the guide suddenly checked the horses, and, turning to me, inquired, "What town lying and rotten is your eighty in?"

I gave him the numbers.

"This is it. We're on it now!"

For miles the prairie swept away to the horizon. Nothing to break the monotony of the dreary waste but two trees and a house.

"Nonsuch! You are humbugging me!"

"Not a bit of it, Sir. That's Potolois City over there!"

"Where?"

"That big-but! To be sure it looks a little different on the map; but then, you must have heard of paper cities?"

"And this is the land, well watered and timbered, worth at least ten dollars per acre, which that infernal scoundrel swindled me out of, selected from personal inspection?"

"It is well timbered, for this country! There are scrub oaks are the only trees within twenty miles of here. As to water, it is covered with that at least six months in the year. As to the land being per acre, you will be lucky—unless you find a rich-mine—if you find anyone for the whole eighty."

"Turn the horses around, driver!"

"Now, my friend," continued the guide, "I don't think this Western climate agrees with you. You land speculation is a confidence game, and a few win, and they will get their fingers burned before they do much with it, I reckon. If you have money, my advice is, buy land, sell, and then—never buy an inch of Western land, nor invest in Western railroad stocks, unless you are personally seen the property. No matter how respectable or honorable the appearance of parties may be do not take his word; for I tell you that, out West, there is no honor even among thieves. And, again; whenever a Western greenhorn visits New York, he is sure to be fleeced by your sharpers. Consequently, Eastern green-horns should not complain if we return the compliment."

I looked the guide full in the eye, and confident the villain was chuckling at my discomfiture.

I arrived at New York with two dollars in my pocket; and once more rolling at my ease, happy and contented, at peace with the whole world—always excepting my friend, the [illegible].

By-the-way, I have a [illegible] well watered and timbered—situated within two miles of Paradise City, Iowa. Price, one thousand cash; terms, cash.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER VII.

Containing much of that information which the wisest men in the world are continually receiving from the latter end.

"I DARESAY," said Colonel Morley, "you remember my nephew George as a boy? He is now the rector of Hunnicston; married—a very nice sort of woman—with him. Hunnicston is a fine living; but his talents are wasted there. He preached for the first time in London last year, and made a considerable sensation. This year he has been much out of town. He has church here to-day. I hope to get him one. Carr is determined that he shall be a bishop. Meanwhile he preaches as one Chapel to-morrow. Come and hear him with us, and then tell me frankly—is he clergyman or not?"

Darrell had a prejudice against fashionable preachers, but to please Colonel Morley agreed to hear George. He was agreeably surprised by the pulpit oratory of the young divine. It had that rare combination of impassioned earnestness, with subdued tones, and decorous gesture, which more ideal of ecclesiastical eloquence conceived by an educated English Churchman—

"Strong without rage, without o'erflowing full."

Occasionally the old defect in utterance was discernible; there was a gasp for breath, or a prolonged sound upon certain syllables, which, occurring in the most animated passages, did not interfere with the original intelligibility, with emotion, rather served to heighten the sympathy of the audience. But for this most part the original stammer was replaced by a felicitous pause—the pause as of a thoughtful reasoner, or a nature overpowered by emotion. He came too quick, into method, or chastening impulse into disciplined zeal. The text of the preacher, thus not only freed from trammel, but armed for victory, came forth with that power which is peculiar to original intellect, and the power which suggests more than it demonstrates. He did not so much appeal to his audience as wind himself through unexpected ways into the hearts of the audience; and they found themselves carried away by a current seeming to themselves. He took for his text, "Cast down, but not destroyed." And out of this text he framed a discourse full of true Christian tenderness, which seemed to raise up comfort as this saving, glorious truth rises upon the midnight of mortal life. The congregation was what is called "fashionable," consisting chiefly of great authors, and fine ladies—people whom the inconsiderate believe to stand little in need of comfort, and never to be subjected to grief. In many an intent or drooping face in that brilliant congregation might be read a sorrow different tale. But of all present there was no one whom the discourse so moved as a woman, who, chancing to enter late, had taken her place the throng into the Chapel, and with difficulty obtained a seat in the far end; a woman who had not been within the walls of chapel or church for long years — a grim woman, in iron gray. Before she took her departure from the sanctuary; and before the preacher had done, her face was hidden from her clasped hands, and she was weeping such tears as she had not wept since childhood.

On leaving church Darrell said little more to the Colonel than this: "Your nephew takes me quite by surprise. Unless I greatly err, he will have a grand career, if life be spared to him." Then he sank into a reverie, from which he broke suddenly. "Colonel, I must speak to you with my boy. Had my son lived, what had been my career?"

The Colonel, never encouraging painful subjects, made no rejoinder.

"Bring Frank to me to-morrow. I shrank from asking it before: I thought the pain of the interview too much even for myself; but I feel I should ascertain myself to face every memory. Bring him."

The next day the Colonel took George to Darrell's; but George had been pre-engaged till late at night to dine with Lord Carr, his home, and at his street-door, when the uncle and nephew came. They respected his time too much to keep his chariot, and as they walked beside him for a few minutes, as he bespoken upon the subject of ecclesiastical duties are sweet to the ear of rising men from the lips of those who have risen.

"I remember you, George, as a boy," said Darrell, "and thanked you then for good advice in a schoolboy letter. Do you have counsel now." He faltered an instant, but went on firmly: "You have been a slight defect in utterance, which, I understand from your uncle, you overcome as you grow older; so that I never anticipated for you the least difficulty in addressing a public—for you must have been admirably taught. In the most important branch of study—the science of your delivery, I see that you are one of those who deem that the Divine Word should not be unrecording. I am sure, therefore, that my bills may be excused from studying the orator's effects; but all that enforce, dignify, adorn, make the becoming studies of him who strives by eloquence to people heaven; whose task it is to adjure the thoughtless, animate the languid, soften the callous, humble the proud, alarm the guilty, comfort the sorrowful, support the weak, and fold the lost. Is the culture to be slovenly where the globe is so fertile? The only field left in modern times for the ancient orator's sublime conceptions, but laborious training, is in the Preacher's. And I owe, George, that I envy the masters who skilled to the Preacher's art an intellect like yours."

"Masters," said the Colonel, "I thought all those elocution masters failed with you, George. You never could be taught yourself. Did not you? No! Why, then, who was your teacher?"

George looked very much embarrassed, and, attempting to answer, began horribly to stutter.

Darrell, conceiving that a preacher whom fame was not sufficient to make unreasonably dislike to confess those obligations to elaborate study, which, if known, might detract from his effects, or seem to his ridicule, hastened to change the subject. "You have been to the Continent, I hear, George; at your living, I suppose?"

"No. I have not been there very lately—living abroad."

"Have you seen Lady Monfort since your return?" said the Colonel, slyly.

"I only returned on Saturday night. I go to Lady Monfort's, at Twickenham, this evening."

"She has a daughter, I think?" said the Colonel. "But if she wish to avoid admiration, she would not make the hands of the river her favorite haunt. I know some romantic admirers who, when she reappears in the world, may be rival aspirants. Have you been taken to the rowing since Lady Monfort has retired to Twickenham, George? Is the river gay?" and return to boast of it. But they report that there is a young lady seen walking with between the extremities—who is she? Do you know? ask me—as if I knew every thing."

"Certainly, I suppose," said George, more and more confused. "But, pardon me, I must leave you now. Good-by, uncle. Good-day, Mr. Darrell."

Darrell did not seem to observe George take his arm, but remained at rest over the fire-place, lost in one of his frequent fits of abstracted gloom.

"If my nephew were not married," said the Colonel, "I should suspect his unreasonable with much suspicion—embarrassed at every question. But I think about the country is the question of a young lady at Twickenham. wonder who that young lady can be—not one of the Yorkshire set, I should have heard. Are there any young ladies on the Lyndsay side?—Darrell, Darrell!"

"What do I care—your head runs on young ladies," answered Darrell, with peevish vivacity, "as he slipped a Carr's pencil into his pocket.

"And your foot do not seem to run from them," said the Colonel, with a look of comic rebuke, walked away, while the expanding portals engulfed his friend.

As he sauntered by St. James's Street, nodding toward the thronged windows of its various clubs, the Colonel encountered Lumley Ferrers, and, taking the young gentleman's arm, said, "If you are not very much occupied, will you come half an hour in me?—I am going homeward.

Lionel readily assented, and the Colonel continued: "Are you in want of your cabriolet today, or can you lend it to me? I have asked a Frenchman, who keeps me a letter of introduction, to dine at the nearest restaurant to which you can ask a hackney-coach. He is a great man in Greenwich; and if I took him in a cabriolet, he would not suspect that he was taken five miles out of town."

"Alas! my dear Colonel, I have just sold my cabriolet."

"What! old-fashioned already? True, it has been built three months. Perhaps the horse, too, has become as ungenteel in some other coxcomb—slieut—um!—cabriolet and horse both sold?"

"Both, Sir, for more than I gave."

"Nothing surprises me that man can do," said the Colonel, "or I should be surprised. When, sitting on Darrell's general magistrate's for your outfit, I bought that horse, I flattered myself that I had chosen well. You have had good horses—rarer still a good judge of them; I suppose I was cheated, and the brute proved a jade."

"The finest cab-horse in London, my dear Colonel, and I would have known it among a score of him. But I wanted money, and had nothing with that would bring the sum I required. Oh, Colonel Morley, be warned by me!"

"Certainly, I am not deaf, nor is St. James's Street. But why, Lionel, says I, have you sold my horse because I wanted money,' I advise you to do no such thing."

"I have been imprudent, at least unlucky, and I must pay the penalty. A friend of mine is that is, not a friend, but an acquaintance—whom I see every day—one of my own set—called me to sign my name at Brix's to a bill at three months' date, as his security. He gave me his honor that I should bear no more of it—he would be sure to take up the bill when due—a man whom I supposed to be as well off as myself. I was silly enough to sign, and when the bill calls on me. He was very civil—offered to cover my acceptance and to take my time, etc.; but I did not like his manner, and, as my friend, I had that, instead of being well off, I'd a supposed, he had not, and that I was not the first he has got into the same scrape—not the last, I'm sure. He's really a very good fellow, and, if I wanted security, would be to-morrow, to any amount."

"I've no doubt of it—to any amount!" said the Colonel.

So I thought it best to conclude the matter at once. I had saved nothing from my allowance, nonsinecure as it is. I could not have the face to ask Mr. Darrell to recommence the old one imprudence. I should not like to borrow from my mother—I know it would be inconvenient to her. I said both horse and cabriolet this morning. I had just been getting the check cashed when I met you. I intended to take the money myself to the bill-holder. I have just the sum—£200."

"The horse alone was worth that," said the Colonel, with a faint sigh—"not to be replaced. France and Russia have the pick of our studies. However, if it is sold, it is sold—talk no more of it. I hate painful subjects. You did right not to renew the bill—it is opening an account with Ruin; and though I avoid purchasing on moneymakers, or, indeed, any other (present) heir to nephew's vocation, not mine), yet allow me to extract from you a solemn promise never again to sign bills, nor to draw them. Be to your friend what you please except surety for him. Orestes never asked Pylades to help him to borrow at fifty per cent. Promise me—your word of honor as a gentleman! Be you Sir Lionel."

"My dear Colonel," said Lionel, frankly, "I do hesitate. I might promise not to sign my money-lender's bill on my own account, though really I think you take rather an exaggerated view of the matter. But, as a counsel, I promise."

"Do I?" said the Colonel, meekly. "On entry to Inner Temple, I detect exaggeration. Or, You might promise not to ruin yourself—but you object to promise not to help in the ruin of your friend."

"That is exquisite irony, Colonel," said Lionel, piqued. "But I see that it does not suit the difficulty, which is simply this: When a man whom you call friend—whom you walk with, ride with, dine with almost every day—says to you, 'I am in immediate want of a few hundreds—I don't like to lend them to me, perhaps you can't—but assist me to borrow—trust to my honor that the debt shall not fall on you,' why, then, in the name as if it were the Jews we to tell the man you call friend that you doubt his honor; and though I have not yet reaped cause in that way, I feel that I must be caught very often before I should have the moral courage to say 'No' to such a request. I ask you, then, to be satisfied with my assurance that in future, as friend, I will be more cautious, and, as the less fall on me, why, the worst that can happen is to do again what I do now."

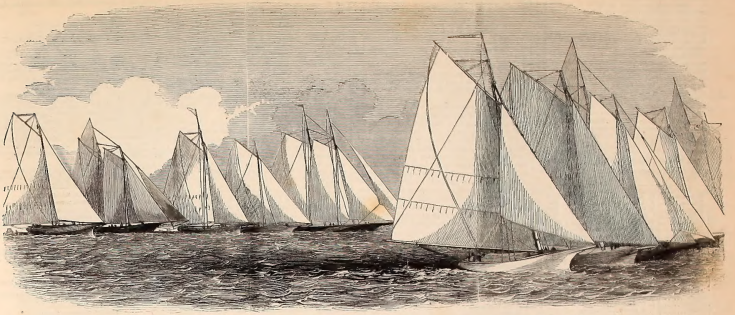
"Nay, you have said and perhaps have another horse and cab to sell. In that case, you would do the tyrannous thing to your friend—you would renew the bill—the debt would run on like a snow-ball—in a year or two you would owe, not hundreds, but thousands. Lionel, Lionel, here we are at my door."

The Colonel entered his drawing-room. A miracle of exquisite neatness the room was—rather effeminate, perhaps, in its attributes; but that was no fault of the Colonel's taste, but of his popularity with the ladies. All these pretty things were their gifts. Those screens by the chairs their work—the score on the consoles—the clock on the mantle-shelf—the inkstand, paper-cutter, and pen-stand on the writing-table—their birth-day presents. Even the white woolen Maltese dog that sprang to his master to welcome him—even the flowers in the parterre—even the tasteful cottage-piano, and the very music-stool beside it—had the same history, prized high with invitations—were contributions from the forgiving sex to the unmarried bachelor.

Surveying his apartment with a complacent air, the Colonel sank into his easy fauteuil, and drawing off his gloves leisurely, said,—

"No man has more friends than I have—never did I feel more secure that I am a bill. Your father pursued a different policy—he signed many bills—and lost many friends."

Lionel, meanwhile, reclining down, and evidently desired to have done with the subject. Not so the Colonel. That dismal topic, though he did not preach, had a way all his own, which was perhaps quite as effective as any sermon by a fashionable clergyman can be to an inexperienced youth.

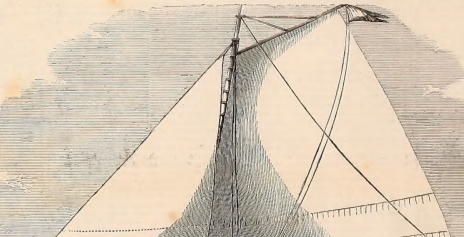


"Yes," resumed the Colonel, "it is the old story. One always begins by being security to a friend. The discredit of the thing is familiarized to the mind by the show of generous confidence in another. Then what you have done for a friend, a friend does for you. Ere you—a hundred or two would be useful now—you are more to repay it in three months. To Youth the future seems as long as the Past—Youth, and distant as the Peaks of Himalaya. You pledge your honor that you will redeem what you release your friend. The three months expire. To release the one friend, you catch hold of another—the bill is renewed—the accumulated interest thrown into the next pay-day—soon the accounts multiply, and with it the liabilities—Lionel—your NAME circulates from hand to hand on the back of doubtful paper—your name, which, in all means of transactions, should grow higher and higher each year you live, falling down every month like the mercury in a thermometer exposition. You begin by what you call trusting a friend, that is, aiding him to self-destruction—proving his weakness to close his companion! you end by dragging all near you into your own abyss, as a drowning man would clutch at his own brother. Lionel Haughton, the saddest expression I ever saw in your father's face was when—this was before I could bear the sight—

"No, Sir; spare me. Since you so insist on it, I will give you my word of honor," said my father—

"What a honorable as you when he first signed his name to a friend's bill; and perhaps promised to do so no more no reluctantly as you do. You had better let me say on; if I stop now, you will forget all about it by this day fortnight—and I give you my word you will forget. There are other examples besides your father. I am about to name one."

Lionel leaned himself to the operation, throwing his handkerchief over his face as if he had taken chloroform.

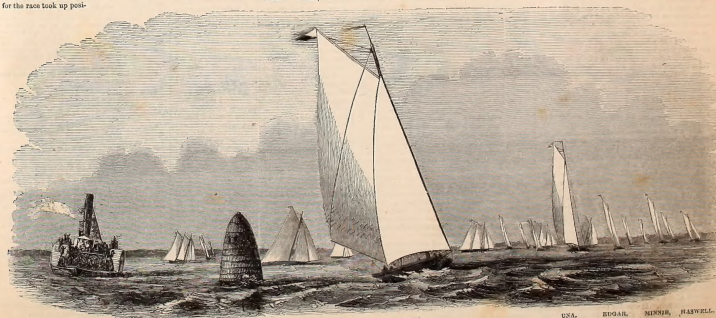


THE REGATTA OF THE NEW YORK YACHT CLUB.

FIRST CLASS. THE START. SECOND CLASS.

Never did a regatta attract more attention than the one which took place in the Bay of New York on Thursday, the 3d instant. Late years have done much to efface the exclusiveness which at first drew a broad line between the yachters and the public; every one now knows all about the yachts, and every one may be, if he choose, a member of a yacht club. The long-existing feud between the great New York Club and the Press seems to have gone the way of other great feuds; on Thursday both parties met on terms of perfect good-will and amity. Tickets were provided for the various journals, entitling a representative of each to a passage on board one of the steamers provided by the Club for their members.

The day was fine—at least there were no signs of rain as the hour approached for the start. The river was crowded with pleasure-boats of all kinds. It is believed that no less than twelve steamers accompanied the race, all crowded with eager pleasure-seekers, among whom lovely faces and bright toilets were conspicuous. Several yachts and sail-boats which were not entered for the race took up positions which would enable them to see the squadron as it sailed down the Bay.



THE "JULIA," THE WINNER OF THE REGATTA.

In order that our readers may understand the race, we subjoin the sailing orders:

"The annual regatta of the New York Yacht Club will come off on Thursday morning, the 3d of June, at 11 o'clock, under the direction of the Committee of Arrangements appointed therefor. There will be a prize valued at $200 for each class of yachts. The classes will be allowed time for sails as follows:

"The first class one second per square foot. The second class one and one-quarter second per square foot. The third class one and one-half second per square foot. This allowance shall be based upon the mainsail and jib of sloops, and the mainsail, foresail, and jib of schooners, and upon any other duly measured sails actually set at any time during a race. As between sloops and schooners, this allowance shall be based upon nine-tenths of the area of the schooner's sails. The courses marked out for the sailing are as follows:

"A flag-boat will be moored, bow and stern, about of the Club-house at Hoboken, on the east side of which the yachts will anchor, head to wind, in the following order of position, commencing from the stakeboat with the yachts of the least area of sails; the third class abreast of said stake-boat, eighty yards apart, on a line due east; the second class, ninety yards apart, on a line parallel with the mast, two hundred yards to the north; and the first class one hundred yards apart, on a similar line, two hundred yards to the north of the latter. They may have their mainsails, or foresails and mainsails, according to their rig, bolted, and gaff topsails set; the Committee reserving the discretionary power, however, of ordering all sails to be lowered before starting, or of adopting any other preparation for starting they may deem proper, should the weather or circumstances render a change necessary.

JULIA. USA. EDGAR. MINNIE. HASWELL.

ROUNDING THE SOUTHWEST SPIT.

"The yachts will pass to the north and west of the light-ship moored off Staten Island, Romer Shoal, Prince Ground; thence easterly to a flag-boat stationed off Long Island, above Fort Hamilton, leaving it to the north and east; thence around the buoy of the South-west Spit, leaving it to the north and east.

"Returning, they will first pass the flag-boat anchored off the Long Island shore, passing it to the north and east; thence to the flag-boat off the Staten Island shore, passing it to the north and west; thence to the flag-boat abreast of the Club-house, Hoboken, passing it to westward. In passing and returning, all vessels must leave Bank, viz., Nos. 11, 13, and 15, are to be passed to the eastward."

The following vessels were entered for the race:

FIRST CLASS—CARRYING 3200 SQUARE FEET AND UPWARDS.

Name.	Entered by	Rig	Tons
Widgeon.....	D. M. Edgar.....	schr.	191 9
Rebecca.....	J. G. Bennett, Jun....	schr.	211
Madgie.....	R. F. Loper.....	schr.	210 6
Julia.....	J. M. Wetherbee.....	schr.	184 6
Haze.....	W. H. M'Vickar.....	schr.	97 2
Phantom.....	T. T. Flynn.....	schr.	87 6
Caroline.....	C. Stebbins.....	schr.	182 4
Fanita.....	A. C. Kingsland.....	schr.	184
Gipsey.....	A. Cozzens.....	schr.	182 4

SECOND CLASS—CARRYING 2200 AND UNDER 3200 SQUARE FEET AND UPWARDS.

Name.	Entered by	Rig	Tons
Haswell.....	C. H. Haslop.....	Sloop	69 63
America.....	R. L. Stevens.....	Schr.	60 6
Stella.....	G. W. Tappan.....	Schr.	63
Undine.....	G. M. Allen.....	Schr.	63
Irene.....	L. G. Brown.....	Sloop	64 4
Sybil.....	J. S. Holbrook.....	Sloop	67
Scud.....	W. Stevenson.....	Sloop	67
Vesta.....	W. B. Duncan.....	Sloop	67
Minnie.....	W. W. Thomas.....	Sloop	67

THIRD CLASS—YACHTS CARRYING LESS THAN 2200 SQUARE FEET OF CANVAS.

Name.	Entered by	Rig	Tons
Lancet.....	J. Morton.....	Schr.	47
Margaret.....	J. Simonson.....	Sloop	17
Jewel Fawn.....	T. T. Caswell.....	Sloop	17
Edgar.....	H. A. Denton.....	Sloop	17
Fanny.....	H. White.....	Sloop	17

To the crowd which was assembled at and around Hoboken at eleven o'clock the greatest sorrow was the want of wind. Barely enough air was stirring to make the signals and flags tremble and flutter, and it was evident that unless Æolus changed his mind there would be no regatta. Eleven o'clock passed—the hour for starting—but the yachts lay still, moored according to the orders: the third class abreast of the steamboat, 80 yards apart, the second class one hundred, 90 yards apart, and the first class, 100 yards apart, on a similar line, 100 yards to the north of the third.

People were beginning to say that the regatta would be postponed for want of wind, when, at 11 h. 32 m., the origin of the glorious breeze appeared, and the third-class yachts floated from their station. Twelve minutes afterward the second-class yachts followed suit; and at 11 h. 48 m. the large first-class vessels hoisted their jibs and swung to the wind. But it was dead calm, and little wind there was died out before noon, and the whole fleet drifted further than ever from the New-York Island. At half past one there was a little puff, which enabled the Gem to take the lead; but on a survey of an hour elapsed she was passed by her. The Staten Island shake-boat was passed by the Edgar at 1 h. 37 m., the other yachts following in this order: Una, Minnie, Julia, Haswell, Margaret, Edward Fawn, Madgie, Gipsey, Lancet, Haze, Scud, Undine, Sybil, Rebecca, Irene, Widgeon, Fanny, Vesta, Phantom, Stella, America, Sea Drift, Widgeon.

The race was for the South-west Spit, and the breeze freshening, there appeared a prospect of some sport. The Julia, which had shot ahead of the first during the calm which preceded the start, showed to equal advantage as the breeze freshened, and came down in grand style to meet the squadron by several minutes. The steamers were ranged in a crescent-shape so close to the buoy that it tested the seamanship of the yachtsmen to round it without fouling. Loud cheers hailed her as she performed the manœuvre with great dexterity; the steamers blew their whistles, and the ladies waved their handkerchiefs.

The other yachts followed in this order: Una, Edgar, Minnie, Haswell, Madgie, Island Fawn, Rebecca, Haze, Scud, Gipsey, Sybil, Irene, Margaret, Undine, Irene, Lancet, Fanny, Vesta, Phantom, Stella, America, Widgeon, Sea Drift, Widgeon.

Great things had been expected of the Julia, which had been provided with an enlarged suit of sails and presented to the first class; but some accident, which occurred between Staten Island and the Southwest Spit, threw her into the background.

For a short distance on the voyage home the wind continued to blow; but as soon as it failed the most yachts crept from the bay of Staten Island it died out. There lay the Hoboken shore, and there was, like the start, a drift-race. The Julia and Una, however, had placed a great distance between them and their competitors to less their advantage.

Night was fast approaching when the Julia—some nine minutes ahead of the Una—passed the stake-boat at Hoboken, and was the first to hear the cheers of thousands on the shore and in the steamers. She was followed, then the Minnie, then the Edgar, then the Haswell. The Rebecca anchored 100 yards from the stake-boat, without passing. The Madgie, Haze, and Island Fawn brought up the rear. So ended one of the most regular regattas we have ever had.

Our artist has given two beautiful pictures of the race, one representing the start, the other the arrival of the yachts in the Hoboken bay at the Southwest Spit. It was due to the Julia that she should have a more elaborate illustration; the third picture will convey to our country readers a correct idea of the beauty and the proportions of this new famous yacht.

Miscellany.

THE Prince Consort—Napoleon, in her Eastern travels, visited

Mostuk Beg,

Prince of the Mountains of the Giaour, who held a levee in his house in the room of his first wife (a dais, that is, and one or two privileges of that important personage.

The room had a curious object, and bore a striking resemblance to a retired tight-rope dancer. This sultana had been very beautiful, and the beauty had not entirely disappeared; her complexion offered a curious mixture of sunburn and a series of layers of paint, beneath which the original color was not visible. Her large sea-green eyes looked like reservoirs placed below the lachrymal gland to receive the tears flowing from the corners from. Her mouth, large and well modeled, displayed teeth still admirably white, but too far apart, and her gums were unhealthily red. She apparently doubled the goat-skin covering for the head, and wore her arms bare, dyed of an orange red. Her dress was carefully arranged, and formed a striking contrast with that of her children, who were dressed like little beggars. As long as her husband was present she seemed as timid as a newlymarried bride, covering her face with the back of her hand, or any thing within reach, and only replying in monosyllables. She remained close to the wall, and suppressed little nervous bursts of laughter: she seemed ready to cry at any moment; in short, presented exactly the opposite to which Eastern husbands are so flattered. The boy soon realized the notion that the Prince had formed of a coarse, and began making pertinent inquiries about Frankish manners and customs, which caused the princess to approach her lord, and whisper to her husband made her out to be. The conversation was interrupted, however, by the entrance of the boy's three other wives: two of them appeared to be sisters, and a swarm of children at their heels; the third was A genuine Beauty.

Behind these ladies came a face rounded hourly in the shade, on which my eyes were at once fixed, and remained so, in spite of the manœuvres executed by the other ruffians to attract my attention. I never remember to have seen so beautiful a face. This woman wore a long trailing robe of red satin, open at the sleeves, and tightly veiled by a chemise of silk gauze, with wide sleeves hanging below the elbow. Her head-dress was that of the Turcomans, and, to form an idea of it, you must imagine a complication, an infinite multiplicity of turbans placed one above the other, and rising to an inconceivable height. There were in it real and artificial hair, with ornaments of gold, and forming a tower after the fashion of the goddess Cybele's handkerchief. A gold coin covered the scarfs, rising or descending without any settled purpose, and forming quaint arabesques; a series of fine medallions, with the Sultan's current whitenesses a part of the scaffolding, carefully leaning to the front, and falling in the form of shells along the cheeks, round the neck, and on the chest. Chains of gold, or small sequins run on a string, or agates, or pearls, were mingled with the woven the folds, and gave them a certain stability which would have been unattainable without support of such slight stuff. Little feet that seemed clothed out of marble appeared and disappeared under the long robe, and were shod with yellow boots, such as I had never seen before, shoe an infinite number of buckles and rings, whose great use appeared to be trifling. All this formed an ensemble at once strange and graceful, but all disappeared suddenly after noticing the face of the Circassian. It was singularly beautiful that I despair of being able to describe it, for how could I give an idea of a beauty not contemplated it an idea of such a charming style of perfect nature, such a ravishing mixture of grace and timidity?

—True your child was unhappy—she was the sport of her brothers and sisters. Poor child! she dwelt alone with tears in her eyes, and said the giggles of the others. Sometimes, shocked at violence, she tried to stop interference which on behalf a Turkish woman. We see nothing comparable to it, except the beauty of the [illegible] and Circassian Girls.

but the Princess has something to say on that head too.

A word here about the two races that represent, to our keenest imagination, the prototype of feminine beauty. Tall, strong, of good health, with a brilliant complexion, masses of black and glistening hair, large and massive features, great expression, innocence, widely-opened black eyes, veraciousness, and frankness, are the characteristics of the best age, pearly teeth, a rounded neck, and a perfect facial color—such is the Georgian woman. Her Circassian sister possesses all these charms, when I have admired them sufficiently, I turn my head to look at those women, for I am certain to find them, whenever I please, exactly as I left them, without a smile more or less, without the slightest variation of feature. If a child cries, no one sees to die, whether their bodi adore or detest them, which is the case, whether or is tenderness, they know it not; the Georgian women never give a sign. Only years can produce an alteration in this face of marble. The Circassian women possess the same advantages nor the same defects. She is a northern beauty, reminding me of the blonde and sentimental girls of Germany; but the resemblance does not extend beyond the exterior. The Circassians are generally blondes; their complexion is deliciously fresh, their eyes are blue, gray, or green, and their features, though delicate and regular, are irregular. While the Georgian is stupid and sensual, the Circassian is false and crafty. The one is capable of receiving her lord, the other of causing him to die of ennui.

—With all the brutal sensuality of the wealthier classes, there is at the bottom of their nature among the Turcomans a sentiment of honor unknown in Europe. The Princess relates a very touching instance of it.

True Fidelity and Affection.

"You must love your husband dearly?" I said one day to an old woman, blind and paralytic, whom her husband, a noble old man, brought to me in the hope that I could restore her sight and activity. She had come seated astride on a donkey, while her husband led. He had then taken her in his arms, and laid her in a corner of my door with all the care of a mother for her child.

"I love my husband as much as I can love," she said. "I should like to have my sight," she replied. I looked at her husband, he smiled sorrowfully but without a shadow of ill-will.

"Poor woman!" he said, passing the back of his hand over his eyes, "her husband would love very wretched. She can not grow used to it. But I am old myself, and I can wait."

When I shook my head, and prepared to protest my impotence, he plucked at my dress, as a sign to be silent. "How can you say children?" I then asked.

"I had one, but it died a long time ago."

"And how is it you did not take another wife, healthier and stronger, to bear you children?"

"Ah! that is a thing said; but the poor creature would have been grieved, and that would have prevented me from being happy with another, even if I had children. You see, Bezjaleh, we can not have every thing in this world. I have a wife I have loved for nearly forty years, and shall not make another choice."

—"Lasciate," said Talleyrand, "ogni gioia un to matrimonio." This was the promise of Dey-Goods Dealer, who had made upon every other pane of glass, "Selling off—no reasonable offer refused—must close on Saturday." He once offered himself as such, or seemed to, some years which we shall not before a magistrate. The magistrate asked him if he took her for his wedded wife. "Yes, sir," he said, "but you are about to remove, are you not?" "No." "Why, you wrote up 'Selling off.'" "Yes; every shopkeeper does sell off." "Yes, sir," "A reasonable offer refused." "Why, I should be very unreasonable if I did refuse such offers." "But you say," 'Must close on Saturday.'" "To be sure; you would not have me open on Sunday, would you?"

—Mr. Dodsworth, some years since a missionary in Texas, was once overcome to tell of the wild life in Texas prairies and backwoods. How once

Catching and Eating a Rattlesnake:

"Our fire-wood was missing, and I went out to look for it. Just about nightfall I was startled by a rattlesnake, which I did not perceive, coiled at my feet. I was about to run away, but I reflected that this snake, if captured alive, would inform my family with plenty of flesh, and I could not afford hair of slippers for my mother. I turned and looked for a stick of earth at his head, which stunned it; and then I twisted a cord round its tail. The horse was now recovered, and we returned to the house. Adam hastily kindled a fire, and I dragging the snake, which began to display fight. I cut off the head, and then the rattles, which almost pulling my arms out. I could not let go. He would have torn me up, while the violence of the effort I made to get free, and as I was in the act of biting him, threw me into a profuse perspiration. I then skinned the snake, and attached the body to a wooden bench, placing my foot on its head to prevent its contraction. The next day there were three at dinner, and had only two eaten of the snake; so the young adult boldly suggested feeding on the rattlesnake. His misgivings were removed the idea, for, as he said, if the experiment proved unsuccessful, he would never want fresh meat in future. Well, the reptile was cooked somewhat fried and spiced, but somehow or other, though the meat was very delicate, having a resemblance to chicken-fowl and turtle, the idea of eating a snake was revolting.

—There are some Ludicrous Incidents.

I had gone to Dhania to christen the child of a German. Being the only priest, I could not speak the language, I had written on a piece of paper the words Ich taufe dich (I baptize thee), and those of Im Namen (in the name), and Amen (so be it). Unfortunately I dropped my paper, and was forced to trust to my good fortune. It was a boy that was brought. I asked him if he had not some children to—taufen? I was saying the word deeply! I saw the worthy Abraham's face, I guessed that I had made a mistake, and hastened to the charge gallantly. Well, then, have you not two children to baptize? This exhausted his patience, and he began a furious attack upon me and master Adam, which I could not understand. As I had only one word left, and that I had already used without another mistake, I said, "If they are not to sell or buy, they are to be taufen." My friend looked at me attentively, and then exclaimed, "Ah! you have deceived us, you are a hearty laugh, in which I could not refrain from joining.

—There appear to be, in that region,

Fine Chances to Marry.

Among the Circassians, in every good circumstances, had three daughters who had long reached a suitable age. The minister perceiving that no one made his addresses to them, and that they were not in danger, so he put in exercise a thoroughly Asiatic device. One Sunday he preached on marriage; he developed the text, "Increase and multiply," declaring to his congregation that it was a command, and not merely a counsel. He dilated with eloquence and warmth on the choice pleasures of wedlock, and ended his sermon by ordering his three daughters, with three thousand dollars apiece. He added that they were willing to marry them. He added that, on the following day he would receive the names of the officers, and that his choice would fall upon those who presented the most valuable offerings. A facetious freshman, who was present (and where are they not?), did not await the following day, but repaired to the priest to raise his voice: he requested that his name should be placed on the list for two.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

A Prize in Private Finance.—Marriages are preferable to a shilling. A salmon never has any change; and the dignity which a bargain of the sea-coin would maintain, would be incompatible with a demand to be returned of that amount. Fishing is giving bits as much, and receiving half of it back again.

A New Order of Knighthood.—We are sorry to see by a statement in the Paris papers that the Emperor has conferred the "anger order" upon Mr. Ingersoll, as the post has been discovered in the Royal parks of Windsor and Hampton Court. We suppose that the angry worm is another and a bigger insect than the terebrans, for, to and a cold shoulder, "anger" is the order he conferred the relation of an anger to a gimlet, and thus reminds a person of the "Worm of Conscience." We refer to the notice at large, may be a subject of interest to the Entomological Society.

Petting Among Birds.—A considerable number of hens this year laid eggs on Derby day. Not a few Chickens also came in for the Plate.

A RETORT IN A BALL-ROOM.

BY A CLOSE OBSERVER, WHO KNOWS THE PERSONS CONCERNED.

"The Extract of Elder-Blossom."—"Nothing to the elderly specimens, symmetrically arranged in a long dowerial row against the walls."

FACILIS DESCENSUS.

Quoth a gallivanter to Derby, "How comes it, I wonder, That the plunge of wives should be so much under? No sooner wive offers than in! tuck or blunder The first leap he comes brings your fall to the ground."

"My good fellow," said Derby, "'tis no use to buy Your wives from me, for I've more rooms than one; When we've climbed to the top of the tree, we get Derby. And, of course, we come down to the run."

WHAT JENNER SAID.

ON HEARING, IN ITALY, THAT COMPLAINTS HAD BEEN MADE OF HIS NOT HAVING BEEN BURIED IN A SQUARE.

England, ingratitude still lists

The orchards of her sons, and frees,

I saved you many a million acres,

Now you grudge me a bed!

A Stage Proper Poster.—Cleanliness is next to Godliness. We applaud the truth with both hands, and are happy to see that the Bowery Theatre has adopted the principle, not only in practice, but for there the cleanliness, as had on with the announcement of engagements, is conspicuous.

Life Fat.—The Chinese proverb says a fat hen no logs, and can not stand; but it has wings, and can fly out of the pot.

Mrs. Speckles says the best vegetable pill yet invented is a spade-ful of exercise, for destroying a gnawing at the stomach, it is a pill that will always fetch a relish.

Third Folio.—Take a chair opposite a blazing fire, place your feet on the top bar of the grate, your uncle mother is to place them across all the bars together; in this position you will sleep with them thoroughly. N. B. Illness may be corked in like manner.

HOMŒOPATHY.—A lady's will.

Difference Between Two Sexes.—Which's officer is a man who never leaves another in distress.

Fact.—One of the nine men of "Greece" recently deceased in Athens, left behind him a will which manages not set as important as the sederial of which they were made.

"Well, Charley," said a gentleman to one of our Baggage-smashers, "how do you get along these hard times?" "Why, I rub and go."

A shoemaker, for the purpose of eclipsing an opposite wag who boasted to him, in the hearing of his last thirteenth motto of "Mens conscii recti," a mind conscious of rectitude, had it advertised, in gilt letters, on a board in his window with them words: "Men's and Women's conscii recti."

A Novel Fact.—A wharf, unlike a horse, runs the better for being tired.

Cause for Divorce.—A North country editor, who confesses by inquisition to lodge with a gentleman of a very respectable family, has the present fashion of ladies' bonnets often tempting fancy to the extent of a wife's wearing one, and rushing, in a moment of joy to female kin abide. There is as much variety in the manner of doing it as in the bent of the bonnet of the sex. Some delicate little creatures merely give a slight brush of the hand, as if to say "I am a real woman." We were about to "have a good time," but actually got nothing. Others, more bold, give a downright hug-look, and seem to close up our countenances. This drives away the bonnet, and we have a glimpse of the lovely features we have been wooing. Why dirt, the kiss is seen by great courtiers, and is not to be had for love or money. Others, more bold, give us first a kiss, and vigorous when a kiss is proposed, but it should not be carried to the extent of a bite. We have had a lady who made a practice to bite us a humming-bird nuts his bill into a honeysuckle, and we believe that she was in the habit of giving a kiss when well delivered. We have the memory of once we bestowed on a lady, which has lasted forty years!

There is only one love, but there are a hundred imitations.—De La Rochefoucauld.

When her young lover went away,
She knit the half of a purse for him;
In one short night her hair turned gray—
Alas! for the other half!

—Grisliebden from a Russian comedy.

Love without confidence is like compared to a pair of shiny-leather boots without soles.

Poetry is said to be a gift, but it very often turns out to be a theft.

VICAR AND CURATE.

A vicar, long ill, who treasured up wealth,
Told his curate such things as he pray for his health.
Which oft having done, a parsjoiner said,
"Why, sir, you pray for your curate, as he were dead."
"For my truth," said the curate, "let credit be given,
He hath more need to die than I, by the help of Heaven."

An Untimed Remark.—With many women, going to church is still looked upon as a matter of bonnet-shop.

A Phenomenon.—A generous advertising for a situation says she is perfect mistress of her own tongue!

Misfortune.—Punch says that the characteristic of a time-piece is no-duty rather than rudeness, for "it always keeps it hands before its face."

A LADY'S MAN.

How much at home was Charles in all
The tasks and duties of a husband "would-be!"
Seldom endangered, never slow,
His maxim was, "Rub on, rub and go"—
From grave to gay he ran with ease,
Secure alike in both to please.

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRIDAY EVENING, Monday, June 7, 1858.

The foreign trade of the port for the past week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending June 5, 1858	$2,205,958	$1,504,115
Corresponding week, 1857	4,354,197	1,139,714
Decrease	$1,995,239
Increase		$364,401

The decrease of imports at this port since Jan. 1, as compared with the same period of last year, is now $10 per cent.

The movement of Specie during the week was in favor of the banks, which are likely to show over thirty-two millions this evening, with a corresponding increase in the loan. The Sub-Treasury in this city holds about five and a quarter millions. Exchange on London 11 rules at 109½ @ 109¾. The rates for money are 5 per cent on call on undoubted security, to 5 and 6, which is the top rate for negotiable paper.

The remaining four millions of Treasury Notes will be put up to the highest bidders, at Washington, on Thursday next. It is probable that they will be disposed of in the neighborhood of four per cent.

The course of the Stock Market during the week has been erratic. At first there was an improvement of from 2 @ 4 per cent in the speculative securities; this, however, was met on Friday and Saturday by a very pronounced activity in the unfavorable construction placed upon the Erie Report, and partly in the effects of operations for a fall. The following table shows the fluctuations for the week:

	Highest.	Lowest.
New York Central	84@84½	83@83½
New York and Erie	30@31	28@28½
Reading	51@53½	48@48½
Rock Island	57@58	55@55½
Michigan Southern	51½@52½	48½@49
Preferred	80@80½	78@78½
Illinois Central	87½@89	83@83½
Cumberland	13@13½	12@12½
Pacific Mail	109½@110	107½@108
Hudson	49@49½	47½@48
Galena	80@85	78@78½
Chicago	75@76	73@73½
Virginia	104@104½	103@103½
Missouri 6s	90@90½	89@89½
Tennessee and Mississippi	68@68½	66@66½
La Crosse	59@60	57@57½
Delaware and Hudson	103@103½	101@101½

Freights were moderately active at, however, reduced rates. For Liverpool—Cotton, 5-32d.@9-32d.; wheat, 6d.; flour, 1s. 6d. @ 1s. 9d. per barrel; Corn, 5d. @ 7d. per bushel; Beef, 5s. 6d. @ 6s. per tierce; Pork, 5s. @ 5s. 6d. per tierce; and Heavy Goods, 30s. @ 35s. per ton. For other ports proportionate rates. The total number of vessels of all classes in port on Saturday was 710.

The Live Stock Markets last Wednesday were more freely supplied with Beeves, which declined a shade, though the demand was fair. Light receipts, and still lighter sales were reported of Milch Cows. Veal Calves were in fair supply, and sold at unchanged rates. Sheep and Lambs were plentiful and cheaper. Swine were dull and heavy. The reported receipts of Live Stock during each of the last two weeks compare as follows:

	Week ending May 26.	Week ending June 2.
Beeves	2,850	3,764
Milch Cows	177	114
Veal Calves	1,051	1,107
Sheep and Lambs	9,007	8,469
Swine	4,500	3,200

Of the Forty-fourth Street Market supply at Beeves last Wednesday their reported sales were:

Illinois	1092	Kentucky	191
Ohio	647	Pennsylvania	97
New York	562	Virginia	91
Indiana	195

The range of prices according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday was as follows:

	Poor to premium Beeves, per pound	3 @ 7½	$ 10
	Common to Extra Cows and Calves, per head	25 @ 60	64
	Veal Calves, per pound	4 @ 6	64
	Fat Cattle, per pound	2 @ 4	10 @ 16
	Lean Cattle, per pound	6 @ 8	11
	Live Swine, per pound	5½ @ 6	64
	Sheep and Lambs	1 @ 6	64
	Sealing Pigs, each	1 00 @ 2 00

The Country Produce Markets are nearly bare of Apples. Cranberries have been in demand, and from Jersey, beginning to arrive. Gooseberries are coming in, and Peaches are abundant. Old Vegetables are freely offered. New Potatoes and Turnips are arriving. Beans have been in good supply and demand. Peas are now plenty. Cabbages and Cucumbers are in very ample supply. Green Peas, from Jersey, are of good kind in market. Eggs are in good supply and in moderate demand. Poultry is in fair supply, and sells readily at former rates. Pigeons continue abundant.

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT AT PRODUCERS AND WHOLESALE DEALERS' MARKET.

Apples, per barrel	$2 50 @	$3 00
Apples, dried, per pound	5 @	6
Peaches, per pound	15 @	20
Prunes, dried, per pound	8 @	9
Pumpkin, per bushel	50 @	75
Strawberries, new, per quart box	10 @	40
Cranberries, per bushel	2 00 @	2 50
Onions, per bushel	1 00 @	1 25
Onions, new, per bunch	4 @	5
Potatoes, per bushel	1 00 @	1 25
new, per 100 bunches	2 00 @	3 00
Beets, new, per dozen bunches	75 @	1 00
Carrots, per bushel	1 75 @	2 00
Turnips, per bushel	75 @	1 00
Watermelons, each	75 @	1 50
Cabbages, per dozen heads	75 @	1 00
Hitchock, per 100 heads	3 00 @	4 00
Cucumbers, per 100	50 @	1 00
Lettuce, per 100 bunches	1 00 @	1 50
Cauliflower, per dozen heads	1 00 @	1 50
Radishes, per 100 bunches	37 @	50
Spinach, per barrel	1 00 @	1 75
Peas, per bushel	1 00 @	1 50
Eggs, per dozen	11 @	13
Butter, per pound	13 @	15
Fowls, per pound	11 @	13
Ducks, per pair	75 @	1 00
Turkeys, per pound	15 @	18
Pigeons, per dozen	62 @	1 00

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CHAS. RUSSELL HOFFMAN, } J. S. CONDER,
MALCOLM CAMPBELL, } JOHN CONDER.

HOFFMAN, CAMPBELL & CO.,
BANKERS AND DEALERS IN DOMESTIC AND FOREIGN SPECIE.

No. 45 Wall Street (Phenix Bank Building).

Sovereigns,
Napoleons,
Bought and Sold.
Bars,
Dollars, and all
FOR SPECIE AND SILVER kinds of GOLD and SILVER.
FURNISHED.

1859 SELECTED CAROLUS DOLLARS for sale.
NEW SILVER for sale AT A DISCOUNT.

A NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE
OF LIBRARIES & Ancient Private Collections, with an Index and Classified Table of Contents, is now ready for delivery, and may be obtained gratuitously by application to the Publishers personally, or by letter inclosing a stamp, at Twenty-Eight Stamps.

The attention of gentlemen, in town or country, desirous of selecting or disposing of Libraries, is particularly solicited to this Catalogue, which will be found to comprise a large number of valuable and interesting collections offered under the most favorable circumstances. THE PURCHASING SOME THAN TWO THOUSAND VOLUMES—many of them in most exuberant, as less than one half the cost of similar productions in England.

The Libraries and others connected with Colleges, Schools, &c., who may not have access to a reliable guide to the Rare and Curious Literary productions, that is believed this Catalogue will prove especially valuable as a book of reference.

Without disproportion, it is suggested that, wherever books can be obtained through the medium of a catalogue, the purchaser will generally find it to his interest to demand direct to the Publishers, which will be promptly attended to.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, New York.

A LAW OF NATURE.

When the natures' outlets for the waste matters of the blood and or obstructed, disease and death ensue by its appearance. It may be headache, or dyspepsia, or diarrhœa, or dysentery, or consumption, or scrofula, or fever sore, or, in short, any other cancer consumption, or worms are generated, or epilepsy or spasms, or rheumatism, dysentery, or colic rack his body. Now, seem to have been adapted by nature to remove all these difficulties; for when they can not injure, they are sufficiently powerful to open all the natural outlets for the blood's impurities to pass off, and the body is at once relieved of all its oppressions, and the human system's disease had made dark. Over a century has proved their virtues, and they are now sold by Dr. B. Brandreth, Jr., at his Brandreth Buildings, also at 206 Bowery and 241 Hudson Street, New York, and by one in a box, with full directions.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS

A FRENCH MANUFACTURER'S SALE OF NEW AND ELEGANT MANTILLAS AND FANCY GOODS.

OVER A MILLION OF FRANCS.

These renowned merchants, Louis Victor Arnaud and Jean Jacques Lamothe, whose productions are known to fame from St. Petersburg to the Mississippi, and from Sweden to New Orleans in the United States, having been forced to succumb to the pressure of the times, the entire assets of their estate comprising that portion previously designed for the Russian market, and which will be found unsurpassed for elegance of design, &c., are now offered for public distribution at the

GREAT SALE AND ELEGANT STORE,
No. 361 BROADWAY,
Between Thompson and Grand Streets,
By Public Auction, for a LIMITED TIME only.

These Goods will be sold in Lots to suit purchasers, and for the purpose of obtaining a speedy and final dividend to the creditors, the sale will positively close on the 30th of August, the period in most cases, will be merely nominal, and will include the entire stock of Mantillas, Fancy Goods, Robes de Chambre, Embroideries, Laces, Ribbons, &c.

THE ALLOTMENT FOR THIS CITY
is under the management of Messrs. SCHELL & D. ESTERBROOK, who has specially retained the above-named Goods for the Retail Trade, and will commence the sale on THURSDAY. It will be open to the public on Thursday, the 10th of June, and continue

FROM 9 O'CLOCK A. M. TO 9 P. M. DAILY,
IT CONSISTS IN PART OF
1000 handsome and elegant Mantillas, at $3.
840 deep flounced silk mantillas at $10.
Rich embroidered mantillas at $15.
Between six and seven thousand of the most costly and recherché mantillas ever imported into this country, at from $14 to $35 each.

ALSO,
Upwards of five thousand French lace mantelets, with or without sleeves, ranging in price from $3 to $50.
Splendid Chantilly bosom, and varying in price from $3 to $50.

ALSO,
MAGNIFICENT REAL GUIPURE LACE MANTILLAS
REAL POINT LACE MANTILLAS,
REAL POINT LACE MANTILLAS,
REAL BRUSSELS LACE MANTILLAS,
REAL THREAD LACE POINTS.
Wholesale buyers can obtain a discount on purchases to 10 in the morning.
Store extremely cool, on or before delivery.
Observe the number,
361 BROADWAY,
between Thompson's and Taylor's saloons.
Sole commissioners, SCHELL & D. ESTERBROOK.
WILLIAM D. ESTERBROOK.

EMPLOYMENT.—PLEASANT AND PROFITable Employment in every neighborhood.—We have beautiful, pleasant, and profitable employment by which persons of either sex can make from $3 to $5 per day. Particulars of a popular and honorable business, and useful books should be placed within the reach of every individual. Thousands of dollars might be realized where they have never yet been introduced. A few agents wanted in this city. Call at our establishment. Young men, teachers, clergymen, traveling agents, all who want to make money energetic, with good references and great zeal to others. Our first class journals and books, and our publications generally will find them well adapted to the wants of the people in every neighborhood. Address, post paid, and inclosing stamp, FOWLER AND WELLS, 308 Broadway, New York.

BULPH'S REMOVAL TO 415 BROADway.
One door South of Canal Street.
Finds his establishment
Filled to overflowing.
Splendid stock of Furniture.
Black lace points.
Black lace Mantillas.
Black lace circulars.
The richest goods at lowest prices.
GEO. BULPH,
Late of Broadway,
Brandreth Buildings.

THE BEST SCHOOL GEOGRAPHY.
MONTEITH'S GEOGRAPHY.
New System. Geography, the use of Globes, Illustrated Maps, and 40 Engravings. 400 to 440 pages. Numerous Engravings on Wood. 4to. Half Bound, 50 cents.

"The plan of this work is the best of many entirely original in its plan, is extremely lucid." "In its pictorial embellishments it is unique. It adapts it to a double purpose of popular institution, as well as by for the classes of all works of the kind ever published. Since its publication over half a million copies have been printed.

The Public School Society of the City of New York have unanimously adopted Monteith's School Geography as the basic system of instruction in the Public Schools introduced into those of Philadelphia and elsewhere.

The Geography of the Geographies in others counties.

1. Arrangement is such that the Map, Questions on the Map, and Descriptive Text relating to each Map come page, or on pages directly opposite, enabling the pupil to study the Lesson on the Map alone without the inconvenience of two books, or even the necessity of turning a leaf.

2. The Maps are more numerous, and generally on a larger scale, than in other Geographies.

3. The Exercises on the Maps are so framed as to present, in a clear and forcible manner, the Physical Features.

4. The Descriptions are a series of short paragraphs written in a simple style, and confined to the most interesting and characteristic matter.

5. The Questions on the Maps of difficult names in detail to facilitate the pronunciation of the same.

6. The General and Comparative Views at the end of the volume are on a plan first introduced by the author in 1839, and since adopted by many other school books. They are models of condensation, and will be found clear and strengthen the judgment.

7. The Table of Geography is applied for the first time to the illustration of a work of this kind, and enables the pupil to learn the Maps at a glance.

The whole work is the result of long and careful study, and is the most complete and perfect book for the public and common schools of geography as will form the best foundation for a thorough knowledge of the science.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

KISS-ME-QUICK
THE FAVORITE PERFUME.
Distilled from Fragrant
TULIPS
Kiss-me-quick Extract Perfume,
Kiss-me-quick, the darkest,
Kiss-me-quick, the lightest.
EUGENE DUPUY, Chemist and Family Druggist,
No. 129 Broadway.

THE ETERNAL PERFUME.
FROM THE BIBLE CITY.
"Oh! I could I but catch that fragrance,
I would ask no other favor,
That fragrance which sweet-scented flowers
Should be coupled with my name."
Bouquet d'Jerusalem.
Frangipanni, the Perfume. Frangipanni, the Sachet,
Frangipanni Soap. Frangipanni Hand Oil.
Sole Agent for the Celebrated
EUGENE DUPUY,
Druggist,
No. 129 Broadway.
Sold every where.

"Death to all Vermin!"
"Death to all Vermin!"
"Death to all Vermin!"
"Death to all Vermin!"

As June approaches,
Ayres and Roaches
Their deadly foes below come out,
And Moths and Rats,
And Mice and Bats,
Gaily sally forth,
Into Barn and Store,
Up in the air,
As on the bed you slumber.
Then Ayres cries,
They'd murder and hush.
"Buy my Vermin Exterminator,
"CONSTAR'S" Rat, Roach, &c., EXTERMINATOR.
"CONSTAR'S" INSECTICIDE POWDER for Ants, Insects, &c.
"CONSTAR'S" INSECTICIDE POWDER for Ants, Insects, &c.
The above are the well known
VERMIN DESTROYERS
Sold every where. Offices, 193 Broadway, Drakes' building (Entrance 1st door in Fulton Street).
Cr "On receipt of ONE DOLLAR, "CONSTAR" sends a large sample of his Vermin Exterminator, carefully packed, post paid, to destroy all vermin on the premises.
Cr ADDRESS "CONSTAR" POST PAID.
No. 193 Broadway, New York.

GODFREY'S CORDIAL FRIEND OF ELDERFLOWERS.
The selected and really the most perfect
BEAUTIFIER IN NATURE.
This admirable preparation of Elder Flowers is very fragrant as a perfume. Elder Flowers have, from the earliest age, been celebrated as a cold and herb tea, the most perfect beautifier of the skin. Thin, Sun-burnt, Freckled, Pimply, and Rough skins will speedily acquire a delicate, soft, and healthy complexion by its constant use.
Its delicacy.—It is singularly beneficial and perfect for infants even in the youngest infant.
Gentlemen.—After shaving, use this thin, assimilating creamy liquid and all roughness, rendering the skin soft and pliable, and the face free from all pain.
FAMILY LETTERS.—Godfrey's Extract of Elder Flowers is an excellent preparation for those who enjoy a trial before accepting.
EUGENE DUPUY, Family Chemist,
No. 129 Broadway, N. Y.

"A GREAT WORK"—"AN HONOR TO AMERICA."
MAURY'S GEOGRAPHY OF THE SEA.
THE PHYSICAL GEOGRAPHY OF THE SEA. By MATTHEW FONTAINE MAURY, LL.D., U.S. Navy. With Charts and Cuts. New edition, revised and enlarged with 10 Charts and Woodcuts. $1 25.

The celestial account of the winds and currents of the ocean—of its depth and temperature, of the numbers and distribution of its animal and vegetable creatures that are called into its realms. The economy of the sea and its phenomena, are subjects of which the author treats in a manner so attractive that they are rendered as pleasant volumes. The descriptions, it will be found, are so graphic that the reader will imagine that the scenes are touched in the records of science. In the hands of Lieut. Maury the ocean is a grand theme, and he has done it suitable imagination. His descriptions of the phenomena of the Gulf Stream, and the currents of the sea in other temperate bodies, are singularly graphic in their style, beautiful in their imagery, and philosophical in their deductions. It truly reads like a treatise on any branch of physical science, and the author has done well to embody it in its restrictions as this volume. It can not fail to be a most popular and standard work.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

"," HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (or any distance in the United States under 300 miles), on receipt of $1 25.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.—To the Public.—Simple, simple, simple. Sarsaparilla made remedy for purifying the blood, and the cure of scrofulous and cutaneous diseases, and every disease with the greatest benefit by every one. Five bottles will cure a case. Be sure and ask for Sands' Original and genuine article.

Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, No. 100 Fulton Street, cor. William, New York.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

MR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL, "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous illustrations by the Author, commenced in the number for June, and number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. It is printed from early sheets corrected from the Author, and will be simultaneous in England—for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
"THE BEST AND CHEAPEST"
FAMILY PAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.

HULBERT'S BRILLIANT ROMANCE, entitled "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?" pronounced to be the most brilliant, powerful, and finely wrought novelty, by special arrangement with the Author, appears in HARPER'S WEEKLY simultaneously with its publication in England.

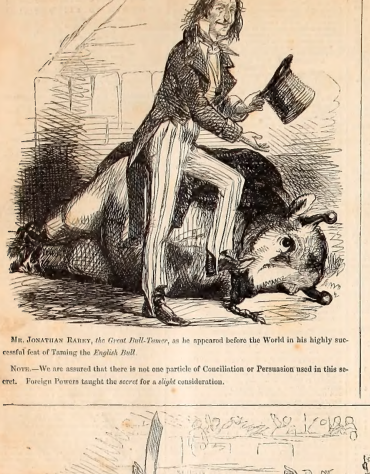
TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.
One Copy for One Year $3 00
One Copy for Two Years 5 00
One Copy for Three Years 7 00
Five Copies for One Year 13 00
Seven Copies for One Year 18 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 60 00
Any additional number may be added at the same rate.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.
One Copy for One Year $2 50
One Copy for Two Years 4 00
One Copy for Three Years 6 00
Five Copies for One Year 9 00
Ten Copies for One Year 16 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 37 50
Any additional number may be added at the same rate.
Any Club of Twenty-five Subscribers may remit $37 50, and receive an extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $1 50, free of postage.

The Volumes of HARPER'S WEEKLY for three years past have been handsomely bound in Cloth extra, and may be had of Booksellers and the Trade.

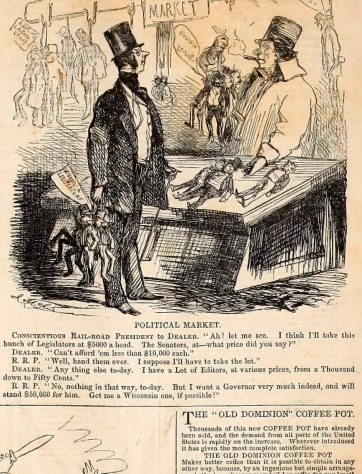
Volumes I. and II. of HARPER'S WEEKLY, when taken together, are supplied at FOUR DOLLARS per volume.



Numbers from the commencement of both the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY can be supplied, and Subscriptions be furnished gratuitously. Clergymen and Teachers supplied at HALF PRICE.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" must be paid quarterly in advance, at the Office where they are received. When prepaid quarterly in advance, the Postage on HARPER'S WEEKLY within the State is 26 cents, and THIRTEEN CENTS a quarter on HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

Subscriptions to HARPER'S PERIODICALS will remain in addition to their Subscription, FIFTEEN CENTS each for MAGAZINE, and THIRTEEN CENTS on the WEEKLY, for the American postage.



"," Persons living in the City of New York wishing "HARPER'S WEEKLY" left at their houses, will please send their names and residences, with the subscription money, to the Office of HARPER'S WEEKLY.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

MR. JONATHAN RABEY, the Great Bull-Tamer, as he appeared before the World in his highly successful feat of Taming the English Bull

NOTE.—We are assured that there is not one particle of Conciliation or Persuasion used in this secret. Foreign Powers taught the secret for a slight consideration.

POLITICAL MARKET.

CONSCIENTIOUS RAIL-ROAD PRESIDENT to DEALER. "Ah! let me see. I think I'll take this bunch of Legislators at $5000 a head. The Senators, at—what price did you say?"

DEALER. "Can't afford 'em less than $10,000 each."

R. R. P. "Well, hand them over. I suppose I'll have to take the lot."

DEALER. "Any thing else to-day. I have a Lot of Editors, at various prices, from a Thousand down to Fifty Cents."

R. R. P. "No, nothing in that way, to-day. But I want a Governor very much indeed, and will stand $50,000 for him. Get me a Wisconsin one, if possible!"

A CALM DEBATE IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE ON A POINT OF INTERNATIONAL MARITIME LAW.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

HEALTH! GRACE!! and BEAUTY!!!

Conferred on the Ladies by wearing
DOUGLAS & SHERWOOD'S
CELEBRATED SKIRTS.
THE UNPARALLELED SUCCESS OF THE
NEW EXPANSION SKIRT
(250,000 of which have been sold during the last 4 months) has induced the manufacturers to make arrangements that will enable them to produce 300 dozen (3600 skirts) per day during the months of June, July, and August.
They also call attention to their
NEW LISEN SUPERIOR SKIRT,
FOR TRAVELING,
which is receiving universal commendation from the Ladies.
They are the sole proprietors of the only
"PATENT ADJUSTABLE BUSTLE"
in use. Beware of the many imitations offered in the market, as they are all either infringements or worthless.
They also manufacture
TO OTHER DIFFERENT STYLES
with and without the "Adjustable Bustle."
These SKIRTS have been recommended by the HIGHEST MEDICAL AUTHORITY as the best article For Ladies' use that has ever been offered to the public.
None genuine unless stamped
"DOUGLAS & SHERWOOD."
"MANUFACTURERS, NEW YORK."
For sale throughout the United States and Canada.

KISS-ME-QUICK. Exquisite Perfume, distilled from Fragrant Tulips.
E. DUPUY, Druggist and Importer, 609 Broadway.

TO ADVERTISERS.
HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A MAGNIFICENTLY ILLUSTRATED PAPER,
CIRCULATION IN EVERY SECTION OF THE UNION.
Offers unusual inducements to those who desire to bring their business prominently before the community.
1. Only a limited space is devoted to Advertisements.
2. The character and diffusion of the circulation are unequaled.
3. The Paper is generally preserved for Binding.
4. The Advertising Pages are rendered attractive, and can not escape the attention of the reader.
5. None but the most respectable class of Advertisements are admitted.
6. The charges are not as large, proportionally, as those of anyother Weekly or Daily Paper.
A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for Three Months or more.
TERMS.—Fifty Cents a Line.
HARPER & BROTHERS.

BARTHOLF'S SEWING MACHINE
FOR FAMILY AND GENERAL USE.
"It is unquestionably one of the best."—Sunday Courier.
Send for a Circular. Office 659 Broadway.
Agents Wanted. Address, care box 3847, P. O., N. Y.

WHEELER & WILSON'S
SEWING MACHINES,
505 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
Received the highest Premiums awarded, 1857, by the American Institute, N. Y.; Maryland Institute, Baltimore; and at the Maine, Connecticut, Illinois, and Michigan State Fairs.
Send for a Circular, containing Editorial and Scientific opinions, Testimonials from persons of the highest social positions, &c.

THE "OLD DOMINION" COFFEE POT.
Can be obtained of
ARTHUR, BURNHAM & GILROY,
Nos. 117 and 119 South 10th Street,
Philadelphia.
MANUFACTURERS under the Patent for the United States.
Also, Manufacturers for the United States of ARTHUR'S CELEBRATED PATENT SELF-SEALING CANS AND JARS.
The Trade supplied at Manufacturers' prices, by E. F. TORREY, No. 9 Platt Street, New York.
Also, by JOB S. GREEN, northeast corner of 8th and Smith Streets, Cincinnati, Ohio.

THE SECRET ART OF CATCHING FISH.
A method by which any Fish can be caught alive with the hook, at any season of the year, and in a few minutes time. Sent on receipt of 25 cents in Stamps. Address, care of Box 226, Fall River, Mass.

PIESSE & LUBIN'S FRANGIPANNI.
An Eternal Perfume from the Holy City. The Perfume, Soap, Sachet, Bronze, Pomade. Exquisite in Perfection.
DUPUY, Chemist and Importer, 609 Broadway,
Sole Agents for the United States.

E. WALKER & SONS,
114 FULTON STREET,
NEW YORK,
BOOKBINDERS.
All work executed with promptness, and in as good style, and at as low prices, as at any other establishment. Special attention given to the binding of HARPER'S MAGAZINE and WEEKLY.
New Patterns ready for Spenser's U. States, 8 vols.

FAMILY SEWING MACHINE DEPOT.
FIFTEEN and FIFTY dollar
SEWING MACHINES.
The Fifteen Dollar Machine will do as fine and best sheep machine ever offered to the Public. Fifteen minutes instruction will enable any person to work it. The Fifty Dollar Machine is warranted to execute all the family sewing machines. We challenge the world to produce its equal. THOMAS & CO., 489 Broadway, N. Y.
☞ Agents wanted.

PHELAN'S BILLIARD TABLES
AND PNEUMATIC CUSHIONS.
SALE-ROOM 756 and 758 BROADWAY,
MANUFACTORY 50 ANN STREET, N. Y.

OUR
ILLUSTRATED FAMILY JOURNALS.
"LEIA ILLUSTRATED" (WEEKLY), at $3 a year.
"THE PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL," at $1 a year.
"THE WATER-CURE JOURNAL," at $1 a year.
The Three Periodicals, a year's subscription, is sent a year. Please address FOWLER & WELLS, New York.
Specimens of the Publications sent for 25 cents.
These journals are among the most valuable periodicals published in this country.—Albany Journal.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. II.—No. 77.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 19, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

CONTENTS.

I. LIEUTENANT-GENERAL WINFIELD SCOTT, WITH A PORTRAIT.
II. EUTHANASIA.
III. THE LOPPARD.
IV. THE FASHIONABLE PROMENADES OF EUROPE, WITH TWO MAGNIFICENT ILLUSTRATIONS.
V. LITERARY.
VI. DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.
VII. FOREIGN NEWS.
VIII. THE BATTLE OF BUNKER HILL, WITH SEVEN FINE ILLUSTRATIONS.
IX. ELASTICITARE EXPERIENCES.
X. INSANE.
XI. DRAYTON'S "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?"—Continued.
XII. THE MOVEMENT TO CELEBRATE WASHINGTON AT CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, WITH AN ILLUSTRATION.
XIII. THE OUTRAGE ON THE "TROPIC BIRD" BY THE GUN-BOAT "JASPER," ILLUSTRATED.
XIV. I HAVE MANY SHIPS AT SEA.
XV. WHO WAS THE AUTHOR OF THE ORDINANCE OF 1787?
XVI. MISCELLANY.
XVII. THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.
XVIII. MARKET AND FINANCIAL REPORTS.
XIX. CORRELATIVES.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL WINFIELD SCOTT.

On the 14th of this month of June the Scott Life-Guard—volunteer company of this city—celebrate, with appropriate ceremonies, the fiftieth anniversary of General Scott's entrance upon the profession which has made him famous. A set of orders is to be on that day presented to the company; and the members and General Scott's friends will doubtless improve the occasion by recounting the exploits and the deeds of the noble old soldier, whose fame was world-wide before most of us who read about him were born.

Fifty years ago, this month, Winfield Scott, then a young lawyer of twenty-two, had returned from South Carolina, where he had proposed to practice law, to his native State, Virginia, and had obtained what had long been the chief object of his ambition—a commission in the army as captain of light-artillery. There were military antecedents in his family. His grandfather had fought at Culloden, and had left his brother dead on that bloody field. The grandson inherited the spirit of the Scottish soldier. He gladly deserted books and briefs, and devoted himself assiduously to the study of his new profession.

In 1809 he served at New Orleans. It was here that the use of just, but indiscreet, expressions with regard to the conduct of General Wilkinson, led to his trial by court-martial, and his sentence of suspension from pay and service for twelve months. It proved a happy accident for him. During the year of his suspension he employed his time in active study of the science of war. And when, in 1812, hostilities broke out with Great Britain, he was probably better qualified to discharge the duties of lieutenant-colonel of artillery—to which rank he was promoted at the outbreak of the war—than very many of the officers who were intrusted with important commands.

His first service was at the Battle of Queenstown Heights. The general features of that operation are familiar to all our readers. Suffice it here to say, that had not the New York militia—consisting chiefly of foreigners, who alleged that they were afraid of being apprehended as traitors if they ventured upon British soil—refused, at the most critical moment, to cross over into Canada, the victory would in all probability have rested with the Americans. Fate had willed it otherwise; nothing that General Van Rensselaer could do or say could induce the militia to cross the line; and after a very severe conflict, Scott and his men were compelled to surrender themselves prisoners of war. It was a sad beginning for a soldier's career. Of personal danger Scott had borne more than his share. His uniform and his height had attracted unusual attention from the Indian sharp-shooters, two of whom, after exhausting their ammunition in vain attempts to bring down the tall officer, at length tried to assassinate him in his prison, and were barely foiled by the timely interposition of Captain Coffin, of the British army. The scene between Scott and the Indian assassin is familiar to the public.

As soon as he was exchanged Scott was appointed Adjutant-General and Chief of the Staff on the Northern frontier, under General Dearborn. He soon distinguished himself by the capture of Fort George, an important post, which was taken after a severe fight, during which Scott was badly hurt by a splinter. During the subsequent disgreefully-important operations against Kingston and Montreal, Scott commanded the advanced guard; there was not a man in the army who felt more hearty contempt and indignation for the imbecility which rendered the campaign a failure.

Next year he was more fortunate. He took a leading part in the battles of Chippewa and Niagara. The glory of the former victory was, as the commanding officer generously confessed, mainly due to the skill and vigor of General Scott's movements. At the Battle of Niagara, where he had fought with even more than his usual coldness and vigor, he was twice wounded—first, by a spent ball, which bruised him; secondly, by a musket-ball, which passed through his shoulder. It is touching to read the dry, official report, in which General Brown states that, being himself badly wounded and weakened by loss of blood, he had resolved to relinquish the command to General Scott; but finding that he also was disabled, he had stood where he was. Both were carried from the field at the close of the battle. Neither had relinquished his post.

For many years thenceforward General Scott's duties were of the practical kind which does not dazzle the public eye. Peace was declared; and the only function which a General could usefully perform was the training of soldiers for future contests. He spent, accordingly, some time in Europe in acquiring information on military matters; being every where received with honors and civilities. On his return he gave the country the benefit of his observations, and proceeded, in conjunction with the War Department, to devise measures for the reorganization of the United States army. He wrote his "Military Institutes," which are the text-book of all soldiers in this country, and laid the foundation of that system of military education which now supplies this country with a staff of properly-educated officers, ready at any moment to take the command of troops. His war of service during several brief Indian contests in the Northwest; and during the prevalence of cholera in the country, he set his officers a noble example of calm courage and devotion to duty by exposing himself constantly to the contagion in attending his dying troops.

But General Scott's greatest services during the period of fortunate tranquillity which intervened between the close of the last British and the outbreak of the Mexican war, were as peacemaker. It was he who, when the unfortunate Nullification controversy threatened to cause a civil war between South Carolina and her sister States, was dispatched to Charleston to prepare for the worst, but to try to avert the greatest of all calamities—a disruption of the Union. It is not too much to say, that to his firmness and skill in providing for every contingency, and to the conciliatory demeanor and exquisite tact which he displayed in his dealings with the nullifiers, the happy settlement of the controversy is in great measure due.

It was he, again who, when the Canadian rebellion so sorely tempted the ardent youth of our Northern States to invade the neighboring British provinces, and assist in the overthrow of the colonial despotism, was intrusted with the difficult duty of keeping the peace and enforcing the neutrality laws. How admirably he fulfilled this duty—how he planted himself alone and unarmed in the midst of the "sympathizers," and told them that they could only cross the line over his body—how largely his exertions availed to avert the probable war with Great Britain, every school-boy knows.

It was he again who was ordered to the frontier when the Boundary dispute between Maine and the British colonies again threatened a rupture of the peace. He conferred with both sides; and, in the large spirit of a statesman and a philosopher, succeeded in persuading individuals who had been ready to draw the sword on each other before he came, to agree to a compromise which ultimately led to a settlement of the dispute.

It seemed now that Scott could add nothing to his fame. He had proved himself a skilful general, a gallant soldier, a sound statesman, a judicious negotiator; he stood already on a par with the greatest men of whom the nation can boast. What could he achieve more? He might safely have retired to the shade of his own vine and fig-tree, and left the care of his fame to the future historian of his country.

Fortune did not grant him so idle a close to his eventful career. War broke out with Mexico, and it being obvious that the Mexicans would not yield till they had been thoroughly beaten. General Scott was deputed to perform the painful but necessary task. He took a small army, a large portion of which consisted of raw levies, and at their head, marched unhesitatingly from the principal en-port to the capital of Mexico. He was opposed with vigor, resolution, and occasionally with courage. He fought successively its battles, won them all, and achieved the purpose for which he had left his country in less time than the most sanguine of his friends had anticipated. On his return, he was hailed with overwhelming glory of a victorious general—the conclusion of a peace honorable alike to victor and vanquished—a peace by which the United States for ever put an end to the prospect of further wars on this continent, and which—should it be observed—will MAKE neither honor nor money.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL WINFIELD SCOTT.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

From the hour of General Scott's return home to the present time, he has been unremittingly engaged in the prosecution of his duties as Commander-in-Chief of the army. The performance of these is, in the performance of his official duties with the strict maintenance which he expected of all subordinates; by him nothing is ever left undone, nothing postponed to the morrow. Kind and forgiving by disposition, he is officially a rigid disciplinarian, never willing to forgive neglect of duty, or to overlook the rules of the service.

In the year 1852, the late Whig party found no man so suitable for their purpose of running a Presidential candidate as General Scott. The selection did honor to their judgment. It may be regretted that the General did not above as much as anybody; but he done so, he would have declined the nomination, and would have spared himself the only great defeat he ever suffered. The contest, however, developed the feeling entertained by the people for General Scott. The very name was, fearing the machinations of the persons who were supposed to stand behind General Scott, opposed his election most strenuously, were also the most energetic in their laudations of his military and public qualities and his private virtues, as soon as the contest was over. It is not likely, at this time, that he ever will be nominated competent for the office. General Scott lately received from Congress an honor which has been paid to no man save himself since Washington's time. He was created Lieutenant-General of the United States army.

General Scott married, forty-seven years ago, Miss Mayo, of Richmond, Virginia. By her he has had several daughters, but no son. When he dies, his great name will die with him.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 19, 1858.

PEACE WITH ENGLAND.

THE war-makers are entitled to public sympathy. The British Admiral in the West Indian Station—the same official, by-the-way, who took our suffering seamen into his hospitals and risked the love of his men in order to relieve our Susquehanna—has, without waiting to communicate with the home authorities, promptly discovered the action of the gale-winds on the coast of Cuba, and given assurances of prompt redress from his Government for the outrages which have been so much feeling on the side of the ocean. No sensible person doubts that the Admiral will be sustained by his Government. It appears that no order has been given to the British cruisers since 1849, and therefore the action of the gun-boats must have been spontaneous on the part of their officers, who, perhaps, wanted to earn a little notoriety by a signature from nature.

This ends the talk about war. Not even the most belligerent of our politicians can persist in demanding now if the conduct of the gun-boats be disavowed. From the moment that Great Britain offers apologies and reparation their vocation is gone. Soon the British subjects, who kindly consent to guide public opinion in this country, must resign themselves to a temporary postponement of their long-cast wealth upon their native land. The trial is severe; let us hope they may find fortitude to bear it.

Now that the immediate peril is past, it is well that measures should be taken to prevent the recurrence. And the best measure that will naturally suggest itself is the strengthening of the Treaty of 1842. That convention was based on error, and the means provided for its execution were impracticable. Daniel Webster, who was the negotiator on behalf of the United States, wrote grand letters relating to Great Britain and right to visit American vessels, while, at the same time, he signed a treaty which could not possibly be executed unless Great Britain did visit American vessels. Furthermore, the aim sought to be attained by the treaty has never been reached. It was to suppress the slave-trade that the treaty was made; it has never contributed in any appreciable degree to the attainment of that result. The only slave-trade that has been dealt to the African slave-trade, since the treaty was made, has been the refusal of Brazil to receive African slaves except as bona fides; so far as the trade to Cuba is concerned, it has flourished under the treaty as actively as before. If it be the real purpose of the parties to that treaty to suppress the traffic in African slaves, the method is plain—they must operate on the colonial government of Cuba. There exists in that island a police ample and vigilant enough to put down the importation of new Africans, if the Governor desires to do so. All that is necessary is, that he should be weaned from his present habit of taking bribes to allow slaves to be landed. It is in the power of Great Britain to correct this vicious practice, by enforcing payment of the bonds given for which Cuba is pledged; it is now time for this method to be tried.

The breeze, which is now happily over, has taught another and a painful lesson. It has woefully impaired public confidence in the United States Steamer. It was generally believed that that body, which is composed of the élite of our political men, the men above all others who are entrusted with the defence of America's can statesmen, could be safely relied upon to act with wisdom, discretion, and prudence, on occasions of great moment. But that belief has been scattered to the winds by the crazy debates which took place on the British outrages. Senators—not of small note, but all—indiscussed the question with the temper of bullies and the logic of school-boys. It is not only gentlemen that a body of which they are unfortunately the leaders, but they brought upon the country a humiliation which the thoughtful consider as well nigh untold reality. It would be well for the country if the war-debates in the Senate during the past few days could be expunged from the Congressional Reports.

THE END OF THE MORMON WAR.

DISPATCHES from Colonel Cumming to the Hon. Jacob Thompson, Secretary of the Interior announce the termination of the Mormon controversy by the submission of the Mormons to the authority of the United States Government. Whether this was the fruit of wholesome reflection on the principles of the case, or the consequence of General Johnston's movements, is hardly worth inquiring. Politicians who desire to make out a case against the Administration will doubtless argue that the Mormons would not have been so long in surrender to the United States without fighting, while the friends of the President are likely to contend that but for the measures of policy now now stationed at Fort Bridger, we should at this moment have been plunged in an expensive and bloody civil war. The probability is that we are likely to be nice in looking into the causes of an event which, on every account, must be regarded as a matter for congratulation.

At the same time, it will be well for the Government and the people to beware of precipitation in deciding that the Mormon difficulty is over. Mere submission to the authority of Governor Cumming and the military establishment of the territory around Salt Lake do not necessarily settle all the pending questions between the Mormons and the United States. It is, as asserted, it be the design of Brigham Young to conduct his followers to an uninhabited portion of Sonora, with the territory of the United States, there is no reason to suppose that they would agree better there with the Government than they have done in Utah—or even than the Territory of Utah and the Territory of Sonora there seems nothing to choose. Rebellion and insubordination would be as likely to arise in the one as in the other; nor would the President be less bound to quell them as the borders of Mexico than in the heart of a distant Territory. If the Mormon people, adhering to their faith and their hierarchy, were to re-enslave upon the American soil within the jurisdiction of the United States, it may be boldly asserted that the quarrel is postponed, not adjusted.

And, be it further remarked, wherever the Mormons go, so long as they remove peaceably, the great question of their relations with the United States Government to polygamy remains unsettled. It was hoped by many who were glad to avoid a direct issue on the subject, that the open rebellion of the Mormons would afford the Government an opportunity to settle the matter practically, without the necessity of legislation. But or no the United States could interfere with the local institutions of a Territory. Should the Government bring new Mormon settlers into Sonora or elsewhere, this opportunity will be lost, and the question will remain open to a distinct future Congress.

A singular and almost unaccountable indifference to the constitutional and legal bearings of the Mormon question has been generally evinced by a school of politicians which might have been expected to regard it with earnest attention. Hardly any subject seems to have been taken of the inevitable bearing which any legislation on the subject of polygamy would have on the graver topics of slavery and popular sovereignty. One is at a loss to explain an inattention seemingly unwarranted and unfounded.

Should the Mormons remove, as it is said they propose to do, to the Territory of Sonora, issues will probably be raised which may attain sufficient numbers and consequence to attract fresh attention from this part of the world. Meanwhile they will undoubtedly be the prey of revolutionary accidents and to casualties from the filibustering population of our Pacific shores. But, if they safely survive those contingencies, it must be expected that the issue now evaded will, sooner or later, return upon our hands in a more embarrassing shape than ever. Each successive expulsion of the Mormons has been more troublesome than the last. If, in or about the year 1859, the Government of the United States be driven to assail them in Sonora, as it has assailed them in Utah, it must be taken for granted that the operation will be very difficult, expensive, and perhaps bloody. And as no one can tell what the issue of the civil and prayer difficulties of our internal politics may have assumed by that time, it may prove a subject of sincere regret that the polygamy trouble had not been settled by the sword, when it was entangled by no analogies or complications, under the presidency of Mr. Buchanan.

THE COMMERCIAL PROSPECT.

THE month of June is now far enough advanced to enable us to decide upon two matters of the first importance to the commercial world —the crops of the year, and the fall trade prospects.

With regard to the former, the accounts are uniformly good. In this country a larger breadth of land than ever has been sown, and the prospect of a corresponding yield is very promising. Nothing but a two months' drought could prevent our harvesting more bushels than ever before. Abroad, equally favorable reports are current. The season of danger for the harvests in England and France has passed, and nothing has occurred to disappoint the farmers. It is now beyond a doubt that the whole harvest land of Great Britain and France will yield a handsome return to its owners this year. Similar accounts have been received from other producing countries of the Old World. On the whole, the news justifies the expectation of even a larger product of food than was yielded in the bountiful year 1857.

There are those who suppose that intelligence of a full crop in Europe is bad news for the United States, as they say that flour and grain rise in price in this country when the crops fail abroad, and they therefore deplore the occurrence of good crops among our European customers. This is a short-sighted view of the case. Among commercial nations prosperity is uniform. What is gain to one is gain to all, and joint sharers in the profits of each nation engaged in trade. No leading nation can suffer severely from disastrous damage to any nations with which it does business. Practically all are partners. If Great Britain has a short crop, she will buy the less cotton from home, and will make the less progress in the general development of trade by which the United States as well as herself. American breadstuffs may command higher prices; but the general prosperity which this country and England will be less active and less gainful for all parties. A few farmers may make money; but the country as a whole will lose. All we take a large and comprehensive view of trade must perceive that the better the crops of Europe, the better will our trade be with that section of the world.

As to the fall trade, a few statistics afford a definite basis for calculation. Since the 1st of January last our imports at the port of New York have declined, as compared with last year, from $150,000,000 to $100,000,000. Assuming that a corresponding reduction has taken place elsewhere, the country has, from January to January, had, from the single article of foreign fabrics, $75,000,000 less of foreign merchandise than it did during the like period of last year. By so much is the country poorer of goods. Yet it has rather increased than diminished in population, and as the yield of produce has increased in quantity, the demand for consumption can not have fallen off. Indeed, as, after all, the revulsion of last year sprang from no general disaster, and affected the pecuniary resources of but a few, the supposition that the demand for consumption has increased.

When we look at the machinery by which this demand is to be supplied, we find that our banks hold sixty millions of specie, where, this time last year, they held but twenty-five. And their accumulation is on the increase. In New York alone, the chances are that the banks will soon hold forty millions of dollars. At present this enormous accumulation of capital lies idle for the want of commercial activity. Those banks are fortunate which can use their means at an average of five per cent. per annum. Should an active demand arise, employment could readily be found for our capital at not less than the legal rate of discount.

These facts should teach every dealer to form his own judgment as to the activity of the fall trade. If with a bank country teeming with population and produce, people can be content with half as much foreign merchandise as was taken last year; and if, with the superabundant capital in the banks, and the immense recuperative energy of the mercantile community, the present period of stagnation can continue; then, of course, the fall trade will be no greater than that of the spring. If these things can not be, the result will restore to business circles their wonted activity.

THE ELECTION AT NEW ORLEANS.

THE vote of the people of New Orleans confirms, in the most emphatic manner, the view expressed in these columns last week of the Vigilance Committee. Gerard Stith, the candidate of the June 1858 party, which the Vigilance Committee was organized, has been elected over the head of the independent or Vigilance candidate—Major Beauregard. The city has relapsed into peace and quietness—the Vigilance Committee has been subdued, a decisive blow of its leaders to the tender mercies of the law.

It is urged that many of the Vigilance Committee men voted for Gerard Stith. If this be so, they must have had singularly little faith in their own movement. But Beauregard was notoriously the Vigilance candidate, on no-party grounds. Why should any Vigilance man oppose him, and vote for the candidate of a very party against which he was in arms? The idea lacks plausibility. Again, it is said that the Vigilance Committee would have been successful but for the popular suspicion that they were working in the interests of a gentleman who seems to be popularly supposed in New Orleans at the present time—Senator John Slidell. It is conceding no slight consequence to the Senator to say that the mere fact of the suspicion of his sympathy suffices to defeat a movement so serious that responsible men rose in arms to put it down. But, even supposing this—which, by-the-way, was strenuously denied—that Senator Slidell was with the Vigilance Committee, it does not defeat the object of that body, what must be the fate of any party with which he is openly affiliated?

It may be safely assumed by disinterested spectators of the affair, that these explanations of the defeat of the movement are more ingenious than just. Victory, even without this, one is irresistibly led to the conclusion that the people of New Orleans have voted against the Vigilance Committee's candidate because he was the candidate of disorder and riot, and sustained Mr. Stith, not because he was a Know Nothing, but because he was the champion of law and order. In this view, the result is comforting to the friends of popular institutions.

THE NATIONAL FINANCES.

BOTH Houses of Congress have passed the bill for another twenty million loan to supply the deficiency in the public revenue, and it now only waits for the President's signature to become a law. It is not certain that even this addition to the twenty millions already borrowed will supply the wants of the Government. Until the Appropriation Bills pass, it is impossible to say how much or how little will be wanted.

The sentiment we are making up against the borrowing of so much money in time of peace, and at a moment above all others when the settlement of the difficulties with Mormon, Kansas, and Central America, might seem to justify an expectation of reduced national expenditure. But the Government reply is conclusive—the money must be had, or the country will become bankrupt, for the income from customs has fallen away to a fabulous figure, and, under the present system, this is the only reliable source of revenue. It is for the people to consider more seriously the financial policy of the Government in raising almost its entire income by customs duties. The inequality of such indirect taxation was long since demonstrated. We are now perceiving its unreliability.

TAMPERING WITH JURIES.

ON the third trial of Cancemi for the murder of policeman Anderson, which is now pending in this city, it is a matus testified that he had been offered three thousand dollars, by one of the counsel for the defence, to abscond, so as to deprive the prosecution of the benefit of his evidence. He further swore that the solicitations of the lawyer were likewise pressed on his acceptance by a Mrs. Samuel Mulley, who, at the time these revelations were made, was actually sitting in the jury-box as a juror on the trial of the culprit.

The fact speaks volumes for the degradation of criminal practice in this city. It is a flood of light on the repeated failures which have occurred in the prosecution of notorious criminals by means of the jury-box machinery of courts. It is made plain by this late experience, and by the similar scandal on the trial of Graham for the murder of Burdell, that a prisoner may somehow contrive to get a friend on the jury when they choose. And that juries will disagree in certain circumstances, can be no matter of surprise to any one.

The remedy for such disgraceful occurrences is clear. The law is powerless to punish a gentleman for such offenses as those which are imputed to Cancemi's counsel and the juryman, Mrs. Mulley. It is the duty of the public officer to enforce its application. If Muller contrived to get on the panel in an irregular manner, the officer of the court who let the irregularity of the panel devolves likewise deserves punishment.

For the rest, the surest plan of defeating the mischievous devices in future, is to alter the jury system so as to assimilate the practice to that of the French, and to give to a majority of the twelve the power of convicting. Experience has amply demonstrated the fallacy of the humane rule of the English and American law, which requires unanimity on the part of the twelve jurors to convict. Whether the public mind is prepared for a change in this direction. But it is made surer every day that we shall come to that at last.

THE LOUNGER.

THE WARS.

The country breathes again. Even the laziest lounger enjoys the reprieve. The wars are over. We have exterminated the Mormons, and swept the British from the sea.

At least, that is what we should have done. But ours were most summer wars. The Mormons invited our Governor into their city; the English naval authorities disclaimed the acts over which the public mind grew hot and our excellent Senators belligerent. In fact, these rumors of aggression are very heady stuff. So far as now appears, there had been no fresh orders from England, and the fiery little Styx was plunging about upon her own responsibility. But the difficulty remains, and might as well be settled now as at some other time. In fact, dangerous differences should rather be arranged between nations in moments of the greatest amity: and this chief quarrel with England might be finally disposed of simultaneously with the laying of the Atlantic telegraph.

War, in any case, is a dismal misfortune to befall a country. It must sometimes be, to avoid direr calamity. But it is the resource of blowing up a building to prevent the spread of a fire. It is the burning of the prairie to limit burning. The present generation in this country knows war only by name. Even those who remember distinctly the last war remember it as a sea-fight. The horrors were not forced upon private homes, except where a friend fell upon his ship. The country was not devastated; every possible pursuit was not interrupted; constant massacres did not occur; all the dreadful detail of war was unknown. So the Mexican war was not of a character or extent to emphasize the real tragedy. It was a kind of belligerent picnic. Sharp and desperate battles were fought, and brave men fell; and the black cloud hangs to-day over many a home—but its woes were single and external. The whole country did not actively share and suffer.

But it must do so in case of any war with a great Power. And while every man knows that the occasion may arise, and that no infringement of the great principle of absolute national independence by any other nation can be allowed—let us, while we are ready for a war, only keep ourselves in condition to defend all the rights we justly claim, and defend them, leaving to other Powers the ugly declaration of war.

HISTRIONIC.

On a stormy evening of two winters ago, two persons might have been seen (not on horseback) hurrying along Broadway to Wallack's theatre. It was Saturday evening, and a first appearance—but the house was not full. The two friends had seen in Western and Californian newspapers some account of the débutante, and were curious to see, not only the player, but the play. The play itself was famous in Paris, and had made a reputation for the actress who personated the heroine. It was founded upon a novel describing a very melancholy career—a novel which no young woman who is not judicious should ever read, but which had also made a reputation for the author, and had been the most popular story of recent times in Paris.

The débutante at Wallack's produced what is called an immense sensation. Her acting was in many points new in character to a New York audience, for it was an exaggeration of the realism of the modern French school. On the other hand, it had the traditional declamation and exaggerated unreality of the stilted English style. In points of manner and in the representation of physical emotion, especially extreme suffering, there was the closest imitation of Nature. In the expression of high passion and strong feeling of the finer kind, there was not Nature, but the substitute provided by theatrical tradition. Part of the unusual interest, also, was due to the peculiar character of the play. Most of the audience probably did not understand the character of the heroine—for we have not exactly that class of heroines in this country—and there was a fascinating audacity in the representation of such people and the incidents of their daily life. The character of the piece and the quality of the player were evident when it was found that the culminating point of interest and action was the death of the heroine by consumption.

The salvo of praise that saluted the débutante on Monday morning was sweet enough, there is no question. Have we a Rachel among us? people asked, in delighted doubt. Shall we say Rachel, Heron, and Ristori? demanded enthusiasts and poets. The town was fairly charmed. Places were taken for weeks in advance. The endless repetition of the piece was placarded. The new actress was discussed in clubs, dining-rooms, and offices. Every night the theatre was crowded. Flowers and tears reigned* in the house. Since Jenny Lind—since Fanny Ellsler—since Fanny Kemble—there had been no such sudden and great success. It was touching to think of it. It was curious to speculate whether the actress herself could understand it; whether she had lived in the public breath and eye long enough to know that it is always April weather in the public mind—that only the great evergreens, whom neither Sirius can scorch nor Boreas freeze, stand unaffected in its presence?

After some weeks she tried a new character. The success was only partial. The public clamored for the first; and, unhappily, the favorite herself had apprised them she was mortal, by not triumphing wherever she stood. After many weeks—months, even—her engagement closed. Excitement had waned a little toward the end, but still the houses were large and enthusiastic. She went away; but she had not justified the expectation of her first impressions. She had not advanced from part to part—like a victorious general from point to point—making every thing her own. She had done the best thing first. After a little time she came again. Not much was said. She went; and again returned, with a new part in the old manner—and after two evenings the doors were closed!

* Rained?—Ed.

The great fault of Miss Heron's acting is the want of intellectual consistency. She takes off her bonnet, and says good-morning, and tosses her head before the glass, exactly as people do in life. But she forgets that the same woman who does all those things does not talk in an artificial tone, and put her tongue upon ponderous stilts, when she is desperately in love or tragically unhappy. Sometimes—but not often, except in the sudden presence of immediate danger—women shriek; and, whatever the mental agony may be, it is seldom manifested by bodily contortions either of frame or voice. If Miss Heron should say to the Lounger that there is no other way of representing violent passion but by violent action, the Lounger would say to Miss Heron that he does not deny it; only she must bring the whole conception into the same key. If she is going to shriek and tear when she is under the influence of strong emotion, then she must make her "good-mornings" and bonnet-tyings conform to the same principle. It may be very true that a painter can not depict sunlight upon his canvas so as to dazzle our eyes as the real light does; but, if he can not, he would certainly produce a poor picture if he painted the grass greener than actual grass.

Miss Heron has adopted the Pre-Raphaelite style of dramatic art. Let her, then, be consistent; and, whether the principles of that art be sound or not, her acting, with her talents, will be a symmetrical specimen of the manner.

MUSIC!

A company of musicians, with the admirable conductor, Carl Anschütz, as President, are arranging a great musical festival for the end of the month. It is to be in the open air; and there will be plenty of lager, doubtless, pleasant people, and sweet music; and if any body can not suspend the search for happiness under such circumstances, he must be very resolute indeed. What a pity that the Central Park is not yet completed, with all its casinos, its music-halls, and fountains! But we must console ourselves with remembering that all the concerts now given are helping the necessity and the enjoyment of that great work. Every musical note scattered by the orchestra is a seed sown in the popular taste; and when it comes to harvest in a national fondness for music, and all kindred and beautiful arts, the charms of the park itself, and all the esthetic opportunities it will afford, will be a thousand-fold more appreciated.

THE HON. SAM. PICKWICK, M. C.

Elsewhere the Lounger has spoken of the recent French duel. But we need not cross the sea to find the field of honor.

When the present Congress opened, there were some signs of some kind of tragedy; but every thing has passed for the present, and it closes, like other heavy dramatic performances, with a farce. It is a farce in two acts. Two Representatives played the first; two Senators the second. Hughes and Harris bluster in the House—challenge—and fizzle. Davis and Benjamin bluster in the Senate—challenge, or don't challenge—and fizzle. Mr. Hughes's friends and Mr. Harris's friends think that Mr. Hughes didn't mean, and that Mr. Harris didn't mean, and are consequently of opinion that they are really very good friends. Mr. Davis acknowledges that he is perhaps dogmatical. Mr. Benjamin has—in fact, without flattery—an admiration for Mr. Davis. So the farce ends, and the actors retire, ready to take part in any new one that may offer.

No one can regret the termination of the play. But are not such plays expensive luxuries to the country? Companies of strolling actors may call themselves "His Majesty's servants," and fatten upon the drippings of the Palace kitchen. But is it a wise economy to convert Congress into a troop of comedians? We might have them elsewhere. Mr. Stuart, for instance, or Mr. Burton, might engage those eminent performers, Davis and Benjamin. But then we should all have the choice of going. We should not be obliged to pay for the sport if we did not share in it. Then Mr. Barnum, who is re-commencing his career, might turn a penny by exhibiting the pistols which were not used by Messrs. Hughes and Harris, in their celebrated affair—the identical ball which did not bereave the country of its Benjamin—a piece of the skin of the knuckle against which Mr. Keitt did stub his eye.

Even as we write there is another act added to the play, in which Mr. Gwin and Mr. Wilson figure. It is not yet determined whether it shall be tragedy or farce.

These are all clever gentlemen, of various sides in politics, and with hosts of political friends. But they have also political opponents. Why should they furnish those opponents with sharp weapons of ridicule?

LANDSEER'S NICK BOTTOM.

There is a pretty water-color copy of Landseer's picture of Bottom and Titania now to be seen at Williams & Stephens's. It is a dangerous subject for the pencil. Shakespeare painted the picture for the mind only. The contrast of the lovely fairy Queen and the donkey-headed weaver, steeped in the rare, sweet humor of the play, is not too sharp, is not in the slightest degree repulsive—because so little stress is laid by the imagination upon the actual ass's head. But to paint a man with a donkey's head, and a pretty woman caressing him—hic labor, etc. The scene in Shakespeare requires subtle delicacy in treatment, to avoid utterly ruining the exquisite humor of the conceit. Landseer has treated it in a good, honest, Saxon way. His fairies are little human creatures, with gauzy wings. Puck is a pudgy pigmy of a blacksmith. Titania is a London belle. In the copy the half-human, maudlin look of the asinine Bottom is admirably humorous. In fact, the peculiarity of Landseer, in all his pictures of animals, is the human look he gives them—that is to say, the look of their sympathy with humanity. There is a great deal of beauty and interest in the picture; and if you are one of the many thousand who are sure to like it extremely, you can put your name down for a capital engraving of it.

THE FRENCH DUEL.

That the army has been supreme in France since the days of the great Napoleon is no news to any student of history. That the great Napoleon commanded the army, and that the army commands the little Napoleon, are equally evident. That French society consists of the army and the people of France is also perfectly apparent. The army serves any government that may happen to exist by adroit fraud, so long as it is itself untouched and paid. It is loyal only to a vague something called the glory of France, of which glory it is itself the only visible manifestation. Its discipline is rigid; its system admirable; its chief officers are brave soldiers and daring leaders, who have risen regularly through the ranks. They are, many of them, rude, ferocious, and uncultivated. Marshal Pelissier is to-day the most conspicuous and the most genuine representative of the glory of France. He could appear in Paris to-morrow and proclaim himself Emperor, and the army, full of esprit du corps and French glory, would immediately install him in the Tuileries.

Of course, where an army is supreme, civilization is properly at an end; because military rule is simply a more gorgeous form of original savage force. It is the reign of muscle, not of reason. Nothing can be tolerated except what pleases the whim of the despot. If a man cracks a joke, he does it at the expense of his head. When, therefore, M. de Pène lately made fun of the ideal lieutenant as he appears in society, he was called to account by some small officers. He explained that he meant only to draw a picture suggested by some ridiculous points of some lieutenants. The explanation was not satisfactory. A club of officers conspired to challenge him, one after the other. It is a rule of Figaro, the comic journal for which he wrote, that the pen must be promptly supported by the sword of the author, and he accepted the challenge. A little series of duels was arranged. They don't fight Pickwickian duels in France, and the combatants of duel No. 1 met. Pène's adversary was wounded; but as they were leaving the field, satisfied, the second of his adversary said the matter must not end so—could not even wait the arbitrament of duel No. 2, which was already arranged for the next day—and slapped Pène's face. They fought instantly, and Pène fell, dangerously mangled by the sword of his fresh foe.

The whole thing was a conspiracy to murder the author by the army, under the forms of what is ludicrously called the code of honor. And this being fully understood, the civilians in Paris have opened a register of names of people willing to enter into a counter-combination against the army. The whole matter—with all its tragedy—has one good point: it forces upon the cool murder of the dueling system the reductio ad absurdum. If every man who is challenged, or who challenges, knows that he is to be fought until he falls by the hand of somebody, the system will, in its most generous application, act upon the friends of the dueler as the Kilkenny cats acted upon each other. There will be only a tale of dueling left.

Its most serious aspect, however, is its revelation of the condition of French society. The arms and the prestige are in the hands of the soldiers. Every citizen knows that, upon all subjects which concern the honor of his country or the national life, he speaks at his peril. Yet there are otherwise sensible Americans who speak of Louis Napoleon as the only man for France in this crisis. What do they mean? Suppose he succeeds by this remorseless, bloody suppression of sentiment in preserving an appearance of peace for some years, do they think he will secure peace to France? Do we not all know that the next French revolution is a question of time? And can any judicious man call him a skillful or desirable engineer who merely sits on the safety-valve?

MR. WRIGHT RIGHTED.

As the Lounger, some months since, defended our Minister in Prussia for giving a diplomatic dinner, and offering no wine to his guests, upon the ground that, as a temperance man, he could do nothing else, he owes it to his readers, who may have thought Mr. Wright in the wrong, to state that it now appears he did no such thing. The Paris correspondent of the New York Times contradicts, "from the word of Mr. Wright himself," the report that he had no wine upon his table on that occasion.

The Lounger's explanation proceeded upon the ground that the Minister probably believed spirituous drinks to be deleterious, and that he could not offer guests what he thought would harm them, whether they thought so or not. The result would seem to show that the Minister's views are less positive upon the point—that he regards it as an open question still; and although he has decided for himself, he will not undertake to decide for other people. The editors who so promptly reviled him might wisely meditate his moderation.

SPORT.

Two or three weeks ago the Lounger was speaking of boxing matches, as unworthy subjects of elaborate reports in decent newspapers. That men will long be found who are willing to pommel each other into jelly is not a matter of doubt: and when men deliberately enter the lists against each other, although it is a disgusting and brutalizing performance and spectacle, yet there are choice and discretion in it, and the cruelty is voluntarily sought and inflicted.

But the case is very different when animals are compelled by men to contend in mortal matches. An ordinary horse-race is not, in itself, a disgusting sight—although its antecedents and incidents are usually mortifying to decent people. But the distances trotted and run are not beyond the probable scope of the strength and training of the animal. No man would hail with delight a tendency in his son to frequent race-courses, but many a man goes often to such places and sees no suffering.

Recently, however, there was a race between two horses in Michigan, which was as inhuman and mean as any bull-baiting in Spain or lion-spearing in old Rome. Two horses were put upon a course to trot twenty miles. One of them came in on the twentieth mile "alone, at a tearing pace." The other broke down on the last mile—dropped into a slow trot—was savagely beaten—dropped into a walk—was still ceaselessly tortured—finally sank upon his knees, and the good Providence which created horses and cares for them as well as jockeys, took care that the poor animal died the next morning.

It was an inhuman outrage, and the decent citizens of Michigan are doubtless ashamed that the name of their State should be associated with any thing so dastardly. There is certainly something dismal in the performances which are called "sport" by people who use the noblest animals as they use dice and cards to win other people's money.

PEACE ON EARTH!

We believe there has been one capital sermon in pickle for a year: and the chances now are that it will be soon taken out and consumed. That it has been injured in the slightest degree by keeping, we do not believe. For surely the occasion that inspired it is not less majestic this year than it was the last.

It is clear that the enterprise of laying the Atlantic cable will be pursued from year to year until it is accomplished, like the search for the North-west Passage, or the removal of Quarantine from Staten Island. During all this year experiments have been making, and the great trial is about to take place. May the fairest fortune befall! And while upon the surface of the ocean there are gusts of suspicion and jealousy, far below in the calm depths may the hands of the two countries clasp in eternal amity!

A BUTTERFLY VIVARIUM.

The sticklebacks and sea-anemones are not to have it all their own way, and monopolize the attention of curious observers. A charming little book has just been published in London treating of the Insect Vivarium, or the glass world in which the varieties of insect life may be studied. The frontispiece represents a delightful bower swarming with wingéd splendors. How soon shall we have the novelty here? How many "in ten know what an" Insect "vivaria is?"

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

"Cincinnati, June, 1858.

"Mr. Lounger,—A friend of mine, who has been gifted with a taste for poetry, has come to the conclusion that he is a poet; to prove which, he recited a few lines of his composition which was intended for some lovely lass. Here they are:

"'Oft when the evening star proclaims that day
Has left our clime, and passed another way,
My memory turns to thee, O! lovely Kate!
And shudders at the thought of destined fate.'

"What the 'destined fate' is I can not tell; but I have given him my opinion flatly, and bet five dollars on the head of it, that there is no poetry in these lines. We await your decision, and have solemnly promised, whatever it may be, to acquiesce in it. Yours,

"Jemmy Blake."

—A wise man once said that he did not require sense in the verses of a young poet, only music. If you have the ring, you can get the sense; but though you may have the sense, it will not always jingle. In the case of the present poem, there is this to be said: that it sounds as if it might mean something. But there is evidently only one person who can know that, and the Lounger must refer his friend Jemmy to "lovely Kate." Meanwhile, he would venture the remark that philological people would doubtless say, that to speak of "destined fate" is like talking of a slanting slope.

"Can the Lounger inform a young gentleman for whom the moon of this splended June will be the honeymoon, who wrote the amusing papers in Punch some three or four years ago, called, 'Our Honeymoon?'"

—The Lounger begs to wish "a young gentleman" the utmost felicity, and to hope that all his married years may be a long succession of honeymoons. He regrets extremely that he can not answer his question. It was generally supposed that Douglas Jerrold was the author of the papers in question. But since his death they are not acknowledged as his. The Lounger appeals to some reader, wiser than he, to answer "a young gentleman."

—"Will the Lounger be so good as explain what he means, when he says, regarding the melancholy demise of Henry William Herbert: 'There is nothing to add but "pray for him"—and that every kind soul will do.' An unsophisticated, uninitiated individual like myself is astonished at hearing such an utterance by the Lounger, and begs respectfully to inquire cui bono? And whether it does not savor a little too much of the Vatican to sound orthodox to the ears of a "Protestant?"

—The Lounger can not, of course, entertain a theological discussion; but a Protestant may be sure that men often scent a doctrine when only a feeling was expressed. The words used by the Lounger were simply expressive of kindly feeling in reference rather to those who remain than to the unfortunate suicide—that they should think of him as tenderly as they could. The sectarian dogma of prayers for the dead was not at all in the intention of the Lounger, who is quite as good a Protestant, doubtless, as his correspondent. Therefore he ventures the more plainly to suggest to him whether it is not much wiser for every man to consider whether a doctrine savors of truth rather than be troubled about the Vatican? And whether an old question was not asked, in precisely the same spirit, about good out of Nazareth?

FASHIONABLE PROMENADES OF EUROPE.—ROTTEN ROW, HYDE PARK, LONDON.

FASHIONABLE PROMENADES OF EUROPE.—LONGCHAMPS, CHAMPS ELYSEES, PARIS.

THE FASHIONABLE PROMENADES OF LONDON AND PARIS.

THE chief end of the Central Park, which is about to be laid out at a cost of several millions to the people of New York, is the establishment of a fashionable and healthy promenade ground for the people of New York. At present we have none. Broadway is the only public place where people take the fresh air publicly and the ladies consent to submit their new toilets to public inspection. The necessity of a public park where the fresh air can be breathed, and the eye feasted on green leaves and grassy plots, suggested the opening of the Central Park; it now rests with the Albany-appointed commissioners to fulfill the public desire.

It is well known that the Central Park Commissioners are men of eminent judgment, refined taste, and large experience. It is believed that several of them have walked in foreign parks at least two or three times. It is not therefore for their benefit—for what more can they need?—but for that of the public that we submit herewith two pictures, the one illustrating Rotten Row in Hyde Park, London, the other the grand promenade at Longchamps in the Champs Elysées, Paris.

Our neighbors over the water appreciated the necessity of public promenade grounds at a very early day. We read that the Greeks, in their colonizing age, laid out a promenade ground and a temple before they began to build private dwellings. With equal judgment our ancestors, the English, and their neighbors of France, invariably allotted a large segment of the land inclosed within their city bounds to healthful exercise and cheerful pastime in the open air. In course of time the old parks of both London and Paris made way for dwellings. But the original intent was not forgotten. As fast as one "common" was built upon, another was opened; the progress of building was never suffered to encroach upon the "lungs" of the city. So it happens that in our day these immense cities—London and Paris—have more acres proportionately laid out in gardens and public grounds than any of the small towns of the United States.

Rotten Row, a corruption from an old name which is almost forgotten, is properly that portion of Hyde Park which is allotted to horseback exercise. It is divided by a low railing from the rest of the park. The soil is soft enough to give the horse a pleasant footing, and the trees yield a grateful shade. It is here that the aristocratic flirtations of the British fashionables are carried on. It is here that Pelham shows his new horse, and that the reigning belle of the season tantalizes her crowd of admirers. On fine days, during the season, every person of note may be seen here. Many a match has been contrived in this alley; many a timorous lover has dared to say the momentous word; many a blushing girl has whispered "Yes" under the broad shadow of the trees which shelter this path from the noonday sun. Rotten Row has been the scene of many a strange adventure.

It was here that the fashionable Lord —— lost his lady-love, the heiress of the great Banker ——, a few months since. The lady, as every one knows, was not fascinated by his lordship. Her family insisted, and positively forbade Mr. S——, a young barrister, who had been a faithful admirer of the Banker's daughter for years, to darken their doors. The lawyer, confident of the attachment of the lady, and satisfied that the only thing needed was to get rid of his lordship, chose an opportunity to meet the pair in Rotten Row on a fashionable afternoon, and, mounted on a fiery and powerful animal, fairly charged his rival. Lord —— was no rider; his horse was handsome, but a light animal; the furious lawyer actually rode over him, throwing both him and his horse into the dirt under the shadow of the fence. The insult might have been forgiven but for the air with which the victorious rider dismounted and offered his rival his arm to enable him to rise. This his lordship could not brook; and a sarcastic smile from the lady testifying her appreciation of his sorry plight, he rose, shook the dust from his clothes, and with an oath resigned the course and his lady to his brutal but practical antagonist.

At Longchamps it is not usual for people to ride each other down. When the Prince Bonaparte inadvertently rode over Mr. Scott, the great London tea-merchant, he declared—with perfect truth—that it was entirely a mistake, and with true French tact offered as the most congenial expiation to box a round with poor Mr. Scott on the scene of their encounter. It is not known what Mr. Scott's feelings were on the occasion. Generally speaking, the riding in the Champs Elysées is moderate and rather slow. The New York Rowdy is an institution which has not yet been introduced into Paris; no doubt, as civilization extends, the species will be found on the Boulevards and in the Champs Elysées. At present, any lady who desires to ride out, either alone with a servant, or with a gentleman, need apprehend no rude behavior on the part of those who will surround her. There is an innate delicacy in Frenchmen which impels them to do the right things in the right place; among others, not to play the rowdy at Longchamps.

On a fine afternoon in the season, Longchamps, and the whole of the Champs Elysées, will be found crowded with the fashionable world of Paris. For hours together the ladies exhibit their rainbow colors and the men their horses and horsemanship, mingling in a throng which looks like a state procession, and forms one of the most striking spectacles that meet the eye of strangers. Not a word is said or an act committed which could offend the most fastidious. Good breeding pervades the entire assemblage. People will laugh and enjoy themselves; they will say severely satirical things of each other, and will tell the most cruel stories even of their friends; but outwardly, neither by word nor deed, will any one's feelings be wounded or the most prudish sensitiveness be made to shrink. With all their faults, Frenchmen are essentially gentle; would that we could say as much for the crowds which are likely to throng the avenues of our Central Park!

LITERARY.

MR. LONGFELLOW has a heavy weight on his shoulders. How will he answer to the public and to himself for having set the example to an Englishman who has published a poem on insects, of which here is a specimen? This man, be it understood, is not joking. His book is a serious poem, intended to be "instructive!"

> "Next in order the cockroaches,
> Swarming in our cockney kitchens,
> In the cupboard, in the pantry,
> In the bread-pan, in the meat-safe,
> Every kind of food devouring,
> Every kind of food defiling,
> And most disagreeably smelling,
> Greedy gluttons, eating all things,
> Hiding always in the daytime,
> Hating daylight, hating sunshine,
> Up and eating in the night-time.
> Their antennæ long and tapering,
> Long and thin, and very thread-like,
> Very, very many-jointed,
> Head bent down beneath the thorax,
> Fore wings large, and tough, and leathery,
> Folding over one another,
> Folding over both the hind wings;
> These are folded, too, beneath them,
> And all lying on the body:
> Their legs all alike and simple,
> Formed for running, not for leaping;
> And their feet are all five-jointed—
> Such are cockroaches Blattina."

The attention of the public is now called daily to new beauties of the stereoscopic process. This is the latest, as it is the greatest, discovery of art, and we notice with pleasure the prospectus of a stereoscopic magazine, to be issued in London by Mr. Reeve, every number of which will contain three stereographs.

It is not very often that we have to thank the French press for a pleasant addition to our library tables. Gossipy, readable books are not common in France. Long and stupid novels, or ponderous volumes of twaddle, with an occasional valuable addition to the scientific departments, are the usual products of the press of Paris. We find, therefore, more than common pleasure in examining such a book as M. Oscar de Vallée's work, LES MANIEURS D'ARGENT.

The book would be read with interest in America, and we hope to see it translated. The subject is stock-jobbing—a comparison of our own times with the days of Law and the Mississippi bubble, a little more than a hundred years ago. Of course there is much that is flat, and much that is French, in the volume, but there is also much that is world-wide in its value and its interest.

He tells us of the immense fortunes that were made in a few hours by speculators, many of whom were of the poorest classes. One footman, after a happy venture, bought the carriage and establishment of his own master, and driving it to 'Change, left it standing while he went in to buy and sell. On coming out he sprang to the board behind the coach, so accustomed was he to his place, and when the coachman looked back and reminded him that he belonged inside, he muttered an amusing apology that he was only seeing how much room there was, and how many footmen could stand there.

One humpbacked man made 50,000 francs, in the Rue Quincampoix, by hiring out his back for men in the crowd to write and sign papers on! It was said of him by the Abbé Terrasson—

> "Supra dorsum meum fabricaverunt peccatores."

Law was, of course, the King of the Exchange. He was the man of France. Vive le Roi et M. Law! was a common cry in the street as he went by. Women, in particular, worshiped him. The passion of French women for stock-gambling is well known, even at this day, to any visitor of the Parisian Bourse. But it then surpassed belief. Noble ladies did not hesitate to ride in the carriage of Law's mistress, by her side. One lady, desirous of a personal interview with the great financier, caused her carriage to be overturned before his door that he might come out to her rescue. Another stopped her equipage before the house where he was at dinner, and cried Fire! till he came out. The book before us abounds in such stories, which are historical. We commend it to French readers.

Among late sales of paintings in London we observe that some pictures brought high prices. The most valuable appear to have been in the collection of the late Mr. Hope. A Claude brought £770; a Holbeina, £1720; a Paul Potter, £804; and, oddest of all, a picture by Teniers, catalogued as "A Man putting on a Shirt," brought £860!

From Ticknor & Fields we have two volumes of QUENTIN DURWARD, in continuation of their elegant household Waverley, of which we have so often spoken. The illustrations are even better than usual, especially the vignette of Quentin saving the life of the King at the boar hunt.

Mr. Duyckinck has written, and the Protestant Episcopal Sunday-school Union have published, a very delightful little book, which we should like to see in every Sunday-school library in the land. It is the LIFE OF GEORGE HERBERT—quaint, glorious old Herbert—who was a blessing to all ages that follow after him. Mr. Duyckinck has executed his work with pure and excellent taste. The book is of a much higher literary class than we are accustomed to find on Sunday-school shelves, and parents will find it instructive and readable. It is especially fit for a summer Sunday morning, when one can be happier and holier for a quiet contemplation of the life of one to whom life was a long Sabbath of calm and purity.

It is not generally known that the name of Meyerbeer, the distinguished Jewish composer, is, in fact, Meyer Beer: he has two brothers, one Michael Beer, a dramatist, of Berlin; the other, William Beer, an astronomer of some note. The Rabbi, Moses Beer, some time connected with the Israelite University of Rome, and a noted Hebraist, was, probably, of the same family; the name Beer being an eminent one among German Jews.

We see the name of Dr. Livingstone in a list of proposed new Fellows of the Royal Society. As a proposition by the council is equivalent to an election, and the election was to take place June 3, we presume it is safe to write him down F.R.S.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

ON Monday, 7th June, in the Senate, Senator Hunter introduced a resolution directing the Executive to confine the expenses during the next fiscal year to $64,000,000. Bills were passed (Senator Toombs objecting) granting pensions to Mrs. General Gaines and Mrs. General Jones. The Naval Appropriation Bill was passed after the adoption of certain amendments.——In the House, Mr. Savage explained that the difficulty between Messrs. Harris and Hughes had been settled. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Senate's amendments to the Miscellaneous Appropriation Bill; after speeches by Messrs. Taylor, Quitman, Sickles, Maynard, Crawford, Branch, Garnett, and Marshall, the Senate amendment respecting the $750,000 for the completion of the Capitol was agreed to, with the proviso that no portion of the money was to be expended for embellishment. Some other Senate amendments were also agreed to.

On Tuesday, 8th, in the Senate, it was resolved to extend the session to June 14. The credentials of Senators Hunter, Clay, and Brown, for another term of six years, were presented. Senator Bigler introduced a bill to repeal the Telegraph Act of 1857. The Army Appropriation Bill was then taken up, and after various amendments was passed; the sum appropriated being but little short of $17,000,000.——In the House, the Miscellaneous Appropriation Bill was taken up, and after debate by Messrs. Letcher, Pettit, Clemens, Phillips, Mason, Stephens, Smith of Virginia, Taylor, and Reagan, the arrangement with Gales and Seaton for printing the American State papers was agreed to. The House rejected Senate appropriations for Custom-Houses at New Orleans and Charleston. The Willett's Point Investigating Committee then declared that they were unable to agree on a majority report. Four reports have been made—one exculpating the Secretary of War, the other three censuring him more or less directly.

On Wednesday, 9th, in the Senate, explanations were made by Senators Davis and Benjamin in reference to a difficulty which had occurred between them. The Indian Appropriation Bill was passed. So was the Ocean Mail Steamship Appropriation Bill, after debate by Senators Hunter, Yulee, Clingman, Pugh, Seward, King, Toombs, and others; the amount appropriated being about $1,500,000.——In the House, Monday, 14th, was fixed for the adjournment. Ten thousand dollars and a salary of $7500 were appropriated for the Commissioner to Paraguay. On motion of Mr. Bocock, it was decided to build ten steam screw sloops of war. On motion of Mr. Ketch, it was agreed to build four war steamers for the lakes. On motion of Mr. John Cochrane it was agreed to build ten iron screw gun-boats. On motion of Mr. Letcher, the President was authorized to borrow, at not over 6 per cent., $1,990,000 for the construction of these vessels. These motions led to much debate, in which Messrs. Hatch, Keitt, Lovejoy, Garnett, John Cochrane, Grow, Savage, Blair, Clay, Covode, and others took part. The House was discussing the Senate's amendments to the Army Bill when the hour came for adjournment.

On Thursday, 10th, in the Senate, the Indian Appropriation Bill was passed. On motion of Senator Jones, the rate of postage was increased to five cents for letters under 3000 miles, and ten cents over that distance; the vote was 19 to 15. On motion of Senator Pugh, the franking privilege of Members of Congress was abolished by 38 to 4. Some other amendments to the Post-Office Appropriation Bill were carried; after which the Senate discussed the Revenue Appropriation Bill, and adjourned after debate by Senators Wilson, Hunter, Gwin, and others.——In the House, various Senate amendments to the several Appropriation Bills were considered. A presidential Message, covering a dispatch from Governor Cumming, was received.

On Friday, 11th, in the Senate, Committees of Conference were appointed to confer with the Senate on the appropriation bills. The Indiana Senators were confirmed in their seats.——In the House, the Maryland Contested Election case was discussed by Messrs. Harris, Stewart, Quitman, Keitt, Davis, and Burnett. The various appropriation bills and the Senate amendments thereto were discussed at length, and Committees of Conference appointed.

On Saturday, 12th, in the Senate, the Conference Committee's Ocean Mail Steamer Bill was passed. The Conference Committee on the Post-Office Appropriation bill reported that they could not agree. The Fifteen Million Loan Bill, with the House amendment, making it $20,000,000, was agreed to. Senator Bigler vainly endeavored to introduce a resolution to prolong the session. ——In the House, a Message was received from the President, requesting the House not to adjourn till the difficulties of the Treasury were adjusted. The subject of the British aggressions was discussed by Messrs. Burlingame, Kunkel, Jones, Sickles, and Blair. The $20,000,000 Loan Bill was agreed to. So were several bills from the Conference Committees.

THE DAVIS AND BENJAMIN AFFAIR.

On 8th inst., the following dialogue took place in the Senate between Senators Davis and Benjamin:

Mr. Benjamin was speaking on the Army Bill, when Mr. Davis said, "I will correct the Senator, as that seems to be the point of his argument. The Secretary of War does ask money for breech-loading arms, costing from $30,000 to $40,000, and part of this $100,000 is to go in this way, according to his application."

MR. BENJAMIN replied, "I do not understand that the Secretary has asked for any part of this $100,000 to purchase breech-loading fire-arms. If he has, I am very much mistaken."

MR. DAVIS. "Oh, I will state the very simple fact that he asks money to buy breech-loading arms. Whether the $100,000 is to be paid out of the Treasury, I do not know."

To this MR. BENJAMIN replied, "It is very easy for the Senator to give a sneering reply as to what was certainly a very respectful inquiry."

MR. DAVIS. "I consider it as an attempt to misrepresent a very plain remark."

MR. BENJAMIN. "The Senator is mistaken, and has no right to state any such thing. His manner is not agreeable at all."

MR. DAVIS. "If the Senator happens to find it disagreeable, I hope he will keep it to himself."

MR. BENJAMIN. "It was directed to me, and I will not keep it to myself. I will reply to it instanter."

MR. DAVIS. "You have got it, Sir."

MR. BENJAMIN. "That is enough, Sir. I shall not again be diverted from my public duties."

Both Senators have since made explanations.

THE WILSON AND GWIN AFFAIR.

Two days afterward, Mr. Wilson had made a speech in reference to the expenditures of the Government of California. Mr. Gwin, in reply, said that he had heard a great deal of demagogism in connection with the expenditures in California. Mr. Wilson asked if he intended to apply the word demagogism to him. Mr. Gwin declined to explain or reply.

Mr. Wilson said: "The Senator declines to answer. Very well. I say to him that demagogism is better than thieving. I had rather be a demagogue than a thief."

Mr. Gwin inquired if the Senator meant to apply his language to him, or to the officers of the revenue in California.

Mr. Wilson said that he had no explanations to give to the Senator from California.

Mr. Gwin then said: "If the Senator means to apply that term to me, he is a calumniator and a coward."

The President called both gentlemen to order, when Mr. Wilson remarked that what the Senator from California said did not change the record.

Senator Gwin has challenged Senator Wilson. He sent him a note by Mr. Fitch of Indiana, merely asking for a meeting outside the District. Mr. Wilson replied by citing to him his reply to Mr. Brooks, to the effect that dueling was forbidden by the laws and by the matured convictions of his whole life. Mr. Seward and other Senators are striving to arrange the difficulty, and will doubtless succeed.

THE LATEST ABOUT THE BRITISH OUTRAGES.

The Navy Department has received the following letter from Commander Rodgers:

"UNITED STATES STEAMER WATER-WITCH,
KEY WEST, June 3, 1858.

"SIR,—I arrived here safely to-day for coal—all well on board. I leave to-morrow for Havana, where I shall find her Britannic Majesty's steamer Devastation, which has brought instructions from Admiral Seymour to the cruisers upon the coast of Cuba.

"H. B. M. steam gun-boat Jasper, commanded by Lieutenant William H. Pym, came into this harbor this morning in search of the Styx, to deliver dispatches from the Admiral. Lieutenant Pym stated to me that his instructions were printed, and were dated, he believed, 1849; that they were, at all events, the instructions he had acted upon on the coast of Africa nine years ago. He said he believed, or rather was sure, no new instructions had been received from the British Government for the guidance of the vessels on the coast of Cuba. He said that the Creole was a slaver, and that soon after her capture colors and papers both disappeared, the captain declaring that he was not entitled to American papers or colors. He said that in another case, where he had sent his quartermaster with a spy-glass to ask permission to ascend the mast of the outermost vessel in the harbor of Matanzas, in order to see whether the Styx was in sight, the captain said, laughingly, afterward, that he had hoaxed a newspaper writer into the belief that he had been boarded by British filibusters. He asserted that he was sure, upon examination, he would be found to have done no wrong to the American flag. He admitted that, in certain cases, he had fired near vessels to make them show their colors, and asked me if he had been guilty of any wrong in so doing? To this I said that I had no official opinion, but that I thought not. However the law may be in this case, it is held, as far as I know, the usage of the service—itself a law—for men-of-war to show their flags to one another; and it is the general opinion of naval men that merchant vessels, upon neglect or refusal, may be compelled to do it without trenching upon their rights. Lieutenant Pym seemed surprised at the light in which the acts of the British cruisers are regarded by the Government of the United States.

"I have the honor to be your obedient servant,
"JOHN RODGERS, Commander, U.S.N.
"HON. ISAAC TOUCEY, Secretary of the Navy."

GOVERNOR CUMMING AT SALT LAKE CITY.

Dispatches have been received from Governor Cumming at Salt Lake City. He says, after describing his journey to the city: "Ex-Governor Brigham Young paid me a call of ceremony as soon as I was sufficiently relieved from the fatigue of my mountain journey to receive company. In subsequent interviews with the ex-Governor he has evinced a willingness to afford me every facility which I may require for the efficient performance of my administrative duties. His course in this respect meets, I fancy, with the approval of a majority of this community. The Territorial seal, with other public property, has been tendered me by William H. Hooper, Esq., late Acting Secretary pro tem."

HIS SPEECH AT THE TABERNACLE

"My presence at the meeting in the Tabernacle will be remembered by me as an occasion of intense interest. Between three and four thousand persons were assembled for the purpose of public worship; the hall was crowded to overflowing; but the most profound quiet was observed when I appeared. President Brigham Young introduced me by name as the Governor of Utah, and I addressed the audience from 'the stand.' I informed them that I had come among them to vindicate the national sovereignty; that it was my duty to secure the supremacy of the Constitution and the laws; that I had taken my oath of office to exact an unconditional submission on their part to the dictates of the law. I was not interrupted. In a discourse of about thirty minutes' duration I touched (as I thought best) boldly upon all the leading questions at issue between them and the General Government.

"Thus the meeting might have ended. But after closing my remarks, I rose and stated that I would be glad to hear from any who might be inclined to address me upon topics of interest to the community. This invitation brought forth in succession several powerful speakers, who evidently exercised great influence over the masses of the people. They harangued on the subject of the assassination of Joseph Smith, Jun., and his friends; the services rendered by the Mormon battalion to an ungrateful country; their sufferings on the Plains during their dreary pilgrimage to their mountain home, etc. The congregation became greatly excited, and joined the speakers in their intemperate remarks, exhibited more frenzy than I had expected to witness among a people who habitually exercise great self-control. I found the greatest difficulty in explaining matters, so great was the excitement. Eventually, however, the efforts of Brigham Young were successful in calming the tumult and restoring order before the adjournment of the meeting. It is proper that I should add, that more than one speaker has since expressed his regret at having been betrayed into intemperance of language in my presence.

THE COMING EXODUS.

"The people, including the inhabitants of this city, are moving from every settlement in the northern part of the Territory. The roads are every where filled with wagons loaded with provisions and household furniture, the women and children, often without shoes or hats, driving their flocks they know not where. They seem not only resigned, but cheerful. 'It is the will of the Lord,' and they rejoice to exchange the comforts of home for the trials of the wilderness. Their ultimate destination is not, I apprehend, definitely fixed upon. 'Going south' seems sufficiently definite for most of them; but many believe that their ultimate destination is Sonora.

"On the afternoon of Sunday last President Brigham Young is reported to have spoken in the Tabernacle as follows: 'I have a good mind to tell a secret right here; I believe I will tell it anyhow. They say there is a fine country down south there—Sonora is it? Is that your name for it? Do not speak of this out of doors, if you please.'

"Young, Kimball, and most of the influential men, have left their commodious mansions, without apparent regret, to lengthen the long train of wanderers. The masses every where announce to me that the torch will be applied to every house, indiscriminately, throughout the country, so soon as the troops attempt to cross the mountains. I shall follow these people, and endeavor to rally them."

ELECTION AT NEW ORLEANS.

The election at New Orleans went off almost quietly. The American candidate, Gerard Stith, was elected Mayor by some 200 majority. All has been quiet ever since. It is understood that several of the leaders of the Vigilance Committee have been held for trial.

PERSONAL.

General Scott left here on Friday for Washington, having been telegraphed by the President to repair thither with as little delay as possible, business of the most vital importance waiting his presence. The General looks remarkably well. He intended to travel all night.

A famous pair of pistols which belonged to General Putnam, and previously to General Pitcairn, of the British army, are now in possession of Mr. John P. Putnam, of White Creek, Washington County, in this State.

The newly-elected Mayor of New Orleans worked as a journeyman on the Picayune when he first went to that city. He learned his trade in Washington, and is connected with some of the "F.F.'s" of Virginia. We hope he will be able to compose the city without the aid of shooting-sticks.

The London Illustrated Times says that Lord Edward Cavendish, son of the Duke of Devonshire, and Lord Richard Grosvenor, son of the Marquis of Westminster, were to leave for the United States during the present month, to spend six months in America.

The New Orleans True Delta says that matrimonial negotiations are now in progress which will result in the union of the Princess Elizabeth Bowlegs, daughter of the Seminole Chief, Billy Bowlegs, with a young New Yorker.

The miserable death of Dr. J. P. Holmes, the distinguished English physician, who breathed his last in abject poverty at Evansville, Indiana, a few weeks ago, has brought out some interesting statements concerning his previous life. His wife is living in England, and it appears that he attempted to poison her because she refused him money to pay debts contracted by his extravagant habits. She gave him £2000, but he demanded £4000 more, which she refused to pay. She left him, and fled to her mother for protection, but on recovering from a long fit of illness, discovered that the Doctor had gone to the bank with another woman who personated the wife, and had drawn the whole amount standing in her name. With this money he came to this country, but could not be traced further than this city. The next tidings received from him brought intelligence of his death in Evansville, after he had run a short career of headlong dissipation.

A young mechanic in Baltimore has constructed a complete model of Mount Vernon, house, estate, tomb, and all, in wood. It is said to be a curious specimen of the art of carving. It occupies a space of twenty square feet.

The sculptor Barbee has in progress, at his studio in Baltimore, several new marbles, among which are the "Young Republican," "Coquette," "Gratitude," and some busts of prominent men. His "Fisher Girl," commenced in Italy, is nearly finished.

The Cleveland (Ohio) Plaindealer says that Mrs. Cunningham Burdell has purchased a farm in Carroll County, about four miles from Carrollton, and about seventy miles from that city. She bought the farm from the heirs of the late Dr. Samuel Sears, paying $5000 down for it, and we understand that she will take immediate possession.

R. H. Hamilton, Esq., who has been United States Consul at Montevideo for a quarter of a century, arrived from Buenos Ayres in the ship Parana on Sunday, and has taken rooms at the United States Hotel. Mr. Hamilton is in very feeble health.

The Rev. G. D. Carrow, Methodist Missionary to Buenos Ayres, and family, arrived in the city by ship Parana on Sunday. They are at the Prescott House.

The Rev. P. M. Sinding, recently from Denmark, has been appointed Professor of Scandinavian Languages and Literature in the University of New York. We believe this is the first Scandinavian Professorship ever established in this country.

SALE OF MRS. FILLMORE'S CARRIAGE.

When Mr. Fillmore became President, his friends in New York presented to Mrs. Fillmore a splendid carriage and horses, which were used by him and his family until the expiration of his term, when it became a question what should be done with this elegant establishment. Mr. Fillmore's fortune did not justify him in living in a style suitable to such an establishment, nor was it comfortable to his tastes and simple habits, as a private citizen, that he should do so. The articles, too, were of a perishable nature, and must soon disappear; and as he desired to perpetuate the remembrance of so munificent a benefaction, it was concluded to sell the whole and expend the proceeds in the purchase of a set of plate. This was done, and the set, consisting of twelve pieces, was manufactured to order in New York, and numbered from one to twelve, inclusive. The principal article, a server, has the following inscription, and is intended to descend as an heir-loom in his family, as an imperishable record of his gratitude:

The
Carriage and Horses generously presented to Mrs. Millard Fillmore, by the Citizens of New York, in 1850,
Having been sold in 1858, the proceeds are Invested in this Set of Plate,
As a Perpetual Memento of Gratitude
To the Donors.

The carriage was sold in this city for $301.

A LONG SWIM.

The Pennsylvanian says: "Captain Smith, of the schooner Sheppard A. Mount, of Brookhaven, Long Island, which arrived at this port a few days since from St. Barts, with a cargo of pine-apples, reports that on the 20th of May, when one day out from that port, he came on deck at half past eight o'clock A.M., and found that his son, Warren Smith, a lad fourteen years of age, was missing. He immediately ordered that the vessel be searched, but he was not to be found. There was a heavy sea running at the time, and it was blowing a nine-knot breeze. The captain naturally inferred that the boy was overboard. He immediately hauled his vessel on the wind, and beat back on the same track over which he had sailed. Nothing could be seen of him for some time, but at twelve o'clock he was discovered swimming manfully against the billows. At ten minutes past twelve o'clock he was picked up, and the vessel resumed her course for this port. The lad had divested himself of most of his clothing, and alleged that he could have kept himself up for two or three hours longer."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT.

The English Parliament has reassembled.

In the House of Commons, on the 28th of May, the editor of the Carlisle Examiner, Mr. Washington Wilkes, was placed at the bar, charged with a breach of the privileges of the House in publishing a libel upon the chairman of one of the Railway Committees. The editor confessed that he was the author of the offensive paragraph, refused to retract it, and was committed to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

In the House of Commons, on the 1st inst., Mr. Lyndsay asked the Government if it was true that the United States vessels in the Havana or Western coast of Africa trade had been fired into, boarded, searched, or detained by British cruisers; and if so, by what authority, or under whose instructions, did the commanders of those ships so act?

Mr. Fitzgerald said the Government had no official information on the subject, but he had reason to believe the reports had been exaggerated. They were as anxious as the American Government to avoid all cause of complaint, and strict orders had been issued to the officers and the stations to be especially cautious.

INCREASE OF ROYAL FAMILIES.

The London Court Circular says that Queen Victoria is in a fair way of making another addition to the royal family before the close of the year.

Her daughter, the Prussian Princess, is expected to present her lord and master with an heir within a few weeks.

IS THE LONDON "TIMES" CORRUPT?

Mr. Disraeli, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, has made a speech to his constituents, in which he says: "The Opposition have succeeded in doing that which no cabal in modern times, I am proud to say, has yet succeeded in accomplishing; they have, in a great degree, corrupted the once pure and independent press of England. Innocent people in the country, who look to the leading articles in the newspapers for advice and direction—who look to what are called leading organs to be the guardians of their privileges and the directors of their political consciences—are not the least aware that because this sort of knowledge travels slowly, that leading organs now are place-hunters of the cabal, and that the once stern guardians of popular rights simper in the enervating atmosphere of gilded saloons. Yes, gentlemen, it is too true that the shepherds who were once the guardians of the flock are now in league with the wolves."

It is understood that the paper alluded to is the Times, whose chief owner, Mr. Walter, is said to have been promised a baronetcy by Lord Palmerston, should he again succeed to power.

THE TELEGRAPH FLEET.

The telegraph fleet sailed from Plymouth on the 29th of May, for the coast of Ireland. It is proposed immediately on the completion of laying the present cable, to lay another cable from the head of Placentia Bay, Newfoundland, direct to Portland, Maine, so as to have the advantage of two lines from Newfoundland to the United States, and thereby, in the event of accident to one, prevent any detention of European messages at Newfoundland.

THE HOUSEHOLD OF THE EDITOR OF "HOUSEHOLD WORDS."

The Herald correspondent says: "More scandal, not about Queen Elizabeth, but about one of our modern reformers. With 'Don Basilio,' we are off at a tangent into 'La Callumnia' and 'la verité en même temps.' Though the 'Household Words' still continues its weekly course, the household of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Dickens is at sixes and sevens. There's division 'between my Lord and my Lady,' and 'a mensâ et toro' is to be the order of the separation. The daughters side with Pater, the son with Mater. The wife of a certain M.P., who upset Lord Pam and his ministerial crew, the infatuated correspondent of Orsini, is said to be mixed up in the affair. 'Do as I write, and not as I do,' is evidently the motto of the author of those pretty little and highly moral Christmas books."

HOW TO TAME A ZEBRA.

The Daily News, in noticing a lecture delivered by Mr. Rarey, on Monday, the 24th, and the feats in illustration, says: "But the great novelty of the day was the introduction of the zebra of the African desert, the latest pupil in Mr. Rarey's school, and one with which, although he ultimately expects to drive him through Hyde Park, he yet makes his account to have a great deal of trouble. The specimen introduced was the most beautiful four-footed beast we have ever seen, with his perfect symmetry of form, bright glossy coat of the richest cinnamon and deepest black, and a pair of eyes that flashed lurid fire as he made his appearance in the lists. This pupil is still only in the rudiments, and yells out his "Propria quæ maribus" in a most uncivilized manner when politely requested to go through his task. But he does it nevertheless, lies down when he is told—though not with the grace and readiness of his more civilized school-fellows—turns over with a helpless whine of despair and sense of subjugation, and finally admits that even he, the hitherto untamable steed of the desert, has at length found a firm although gentle master. Now, we must confess that when at first we heard that Mr. Rarey was going to introduce a zebra to his pupils, we had a shrewd suspicion that something like a theatrical coup was contemplated, and that some venerable 'woolly horse' who had perhaps graduated in a circus, was about to be introduced for the sake of novelty and attraction. But all suspicion of that sort was dispelled when we saw this wild ferocious animal, so beautiful and yet so terrible in its beauty, follow the great horse-tamer reluctantly into the ring. There was positively something unearthly in the scream with which he saluted the company, and the fact of the barricade being only breast high set at least one person who was present about making nervous calculations as to his probable stock of agility. As he lay upon the ground he kept up a low whining soliloquy, which a person acquainted with the Houyhnhnm language might, no doubt, have translated—'It would give me intense gratification to devour this fellow where he stands, and to kick out the brains of these impertinent lookers-on immediately afterward; but, unfortunately, there is no "justice for zebras" now-a-days, so I have nothing for it but to lie quiet, and to behave myself henceforth and forever like a civilized quadruped and a gentleman.' A strong color of probability was given to this translation by the subsequent conduct of this beautiful and now subdued demon. He retired slowly and with dignity, rather sad than sulky in his deportment, gave only one flying scream as he passed through his stable door, had one gentle nip at the groom who held it open for him, and subsequently permitted a lady of distinction, who was present, to stroke him down as he lay in his stable exhausted after his recent exertions, or, possibly, conning over his lesson against the next instruction day."

PROFESSOR BACHE'S MEDAL.

Sir R. J. Murchison, President of the Royal Geographical Society, corrects an error into which the newspapers fell in regard to the presentation of the Victoria gold medal of the Geographical Society to an American citizen. He says:

"The recipient of the medal is not Professor Packe, but the celebrated American geographer, Alexander Dallas Bache, the author of the great Coast Survey of the United States, nephew of the American Minister to England, and a descendant of Benjamin Franklin."

FRANCE.

THE NEW PARIS CONFERENCES.

The Paris conferences, after a multitude of rumors on the subject, have at length been reopened. Plenipotentiaries of France, Austria, Great Britain, Prussia, Russia, Sardinia, and Turkey met on the 22d, at the Hotel of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, to enter upon the subject of the organization of the Danubian Principalities. The Indépendance Belge says that the new conferences will only meet twice a week, and that at the second sitting the members will adjourn to Saturday, to allow Count Walewski and Lord Cowley to accept the Emperor's invitation to pass a few days at Fontainebleau. On Wednesday, the 26th, the plenipotentiaries held their second meeting. Le Nord asserts that at the opening of the conference each power maintained its individual views. The first meeting will simply be for the purpose of conferring, in order to establish an account.

THE HOSPITALS TO BE DESPOILED.

The Moniteur contains a very important circular from General Espinasse, Minister of the Interior and Public Safety, to the prefects of France, recommending them, in terms which amount to a command, to use "their influence and, if necessary, their authority" to compel the trustees of all the hospitals and charitable foundations in France to sell their real property and invest the proceeds in the public funds. It is expected that the Emperor would thus gain 500,000,000 francs.

THE MURDER OF M. DE PENE.

The Paris Figaro has been ordered to discontinue publishing any statements as to the health of M. de Pène; and the list of civilians who avow their anxiety to avenge his savage treatment has been closed. It does not yet appear that Government have taken any steps to punish the murderous lieutenants. The Minister of War, wishing to stop the consequences of the duel between M. de Pène and Lieutenant Hyenne, has addressed a letter to the colonels commanding regiments to forbid the writing of letters by officers to the directors of newspapers, adding that the "honor" of the army stands too high in the estimation of the French people and of the whole world to be affected by the ill-timed pleasantry of an obscure journal.

THE NEW ARMY CENSORSHIP OF THE PRESS.

The London Times says: "Henceforth there will be another check on the press, which may save the necessity of warnings, and deliver the Government from any unpopularity which frequent interferences might bring upon it. The army as a body is the support of the Empire, and it would be a brilliant idea to make its officers, as individuals, a terror to opposition journalists, who may be called to account for a chance expression, and fought by a regiment volunteering for the purpose. The army seems quite disposed to enter into such an arrangement, and an event which has happened within the last few days is a proof of their good-will in the cause. On Saturday last the town of St. Germain was surprised by the sight of a large body of officers, in full uniform, marching to the office of the Industriel, a paper of the locality. Forty-two of these gentlemen, in fact, thought fit to deliver in person a summons to the Director and Rédacteur en Chef, demanding the insertion of a letter received by them from "their comrade, M. Rogé, officer of the 9th Chasseurs." The officers of the garrison of St. Germain "request, and in case of need require," the Industriel to insert an account of the duel of M. de Pène which they think is favorable to the character of M. Hyenne. Thus, it would seem that in France a journalist is not only liable to be called to account for what he inserts, but for what he refuses to insert. M. de Pène received thirty-one challenges for his unfortunate pleasantry, but the Director of the Industriel might have expected forty-two had he hesitated to print what the garrison of St. Germain had determined he should make public."

HOW MEN OF LETTERS FEEL ON THE QUESTION.

The London Court Journal of May 22 says: "A demonstration on the part of civilians in general, and artists and literary men in particular, has been got up in the bureaux of a celebrated journal. This demonstration is nothing less than a polite defiance to mortal combat from the literati of Paris to the sub-lieutenants of the army, to be taken as answer to their challenge to M. de Pène. Each man puts down his name and the address, calls upon each sub-lieutenant to choose his adversary, by placing his own name and address against that of his chosen enemy. The police, ever on the watch to prevent any collision between the civilians and the army, have found it impossible to prevent the list from growing to a considerable length, and the announcement of its existence has caused great alarm among the clubs of Paris, as it is considered the outburst of that feeling of antipathy which is known to exist between the two great representatives of power in France, and which has increased to an alarming pitch during the last year."

THE FRENCH PRÆTORIAN GUARDS.

The Herald Paris correspondent makes the following remarks in reference to the recent duels: "M. Villemessant, the editor of the Figaro, has been made to understand that if he would save his journal from 'suppression,' he must put up with the murder of his colleague as best he may. M. de Pène has troops of friends, is of an ancient family, and his cause is espoused by all who think the amenities of literary life preferable to the brutal manners of an overgorged military. The observations of the pasquinade were true to the letter, only that they fell short of the truth. The lofty chivalry of the French army has disappeared entirely. The manners of the officers are brusque and vulgar. There is the air of the 'unwashed' about them, meet them where you will; and when any thing like feasting is going on they may be said also to have the air of the 'unfed,' for their eager voracity is so unbridled that ladies are rudely hustled, even in the Palace of the Tuileries, and their shoulders lacerated by the epauleted military, anxious to attack the prey. It is well known that the splendid receptions at the Palace, in the way of supper, have been forced on the Emperor by the savage conduct of the military."

PROMOTION OF PRINCE NAPOLEON.

The Paris correspondent of the Times says it is now decided that the government of Algeria shall be given to Prince Napoleon, and that he shall have full powers to administer it without being under the control of a minister in Paris. The Prince will depart early in July.

Letters from Algiers announce that, in consequence of the adoption of the project appointing Prince Napoleon Governor-General of the colony, the entire body of the elevated military administrators propose to return to France with Marshal Randon.

THE IMPERIAL PEARLS OMINOUSLY DISEASED.

An alarm of a most serious nature was spread throughout the Tuileries a few days ago. The Empress having expressed her intention of wearing the beautiful parure of pearls at the ball given in honor of the Queen of Holland, it was discovered, on opening the écrin which contains the necklace, that two of the precious gems were discolored, and sickening of that disease, the terror of jewelers and guardians of crown-jewels, the cure for or preventive of which has yet to be discovered. By this disease the pearls change color, then become scaly, and finally change to powder. The malady is contagious, and if the first pearl attacked be not removed, every one confined in the same écrin will soon be lost. In the present case, the separation of four of the diseased pearls from the necklace was speedily resolved on by Kramer, the court jeweler, as the only means of saving the rest.

TRIAL OF THE CHALONS PRISONERS.

The Chalons trials are concluded. The leader of the émeute of March last was absent. The public prosecutor contended that the accused were enemies of society, members of the Marianne, and bent upon pillage. Their counsel struggled against the imputations, denied that there was any legal definition of a "secret society," and insisted that their clients were simple-minded people, who had been led astray by leaders who had escaped. The court condemned Sercy to four years' imprisonment and 4000 francs fine; Trevez, Douard, and Pouget, to two years and 100 francs; and Blanc, Catherine, and Berthau, to one year and 100 francs. Three others were condemned to three months' and three to a fortnight's imprisonment. The thirteen others were acquitted.

WHAT THE POLICE DOES IN PARIS.

The prefect of police of Paris has daily to provide for the paving, Macadamizing, sweeping, watering, and lighting of 1474 streets, avenues, quays, and boulevards. There are in the streets 13,000 gas-burners, which are lighted in the course of about twenty minutes. The city contains between 32,000 and 33,000 houses, of which 6803 are lodging-houses, that is, inhabited by a population requiring a special surveillance. About 137,000 persons travel daily in carriages—the omnibuses alone transport 25,000,000 of persons per annum—and yet there only occurred last year 380 accidents, of which 24 only proved fatal. The police have to verify the good quality of all the provisions, and keep their eye upon 10,000 dealers in those articles.

CAUGHT BY A BUTTON.

A French lady, of great personal attractions, living with her family, in the neighborhood of Paris, was awakened by hearing some one in the bedroom; and presently a person, in man's attire, approached the bed, and attempted to stifle her cries by placing his hand on her mouth. She offered a stout resistance, and alarmed friends, on the approach of whom the intruder escaped through the window. In the struggle the young lady had torn a button off the coat of her assailant, and it was found to be one of the family livery buttons. On a search being made in the outer premises the coachman was discovered in the stable, pretending to be asleep, but, on being made to get up, a button was found to be missing from his coat. On being taken before the Commissary of Police he confessed that he was the person who had entered the room, and in defense of his conduct said that he had fallen so desperately in love with his young mistress that, in a moment of frenzy, he had made an assault on her. He was committed for trial.

PRUSSIA.

IMBECILITY OF THE KING.

A correspondent of the Times, in the course of an elaborate article on Prussian politics, writes: "The apoplectic fit which attacked the King of Prussia at the commencement of last October, and which had been already preceded by several slighter shocks, did not quite deprive him of his intellectual powers, but left him without the means of expressing himself clearly; his faculties were weakened, but not destroyed. While his Majesty, indeed, understood what was laid before him, he could not, and to this day can not, remember names or events, or find words; his memory fails him constantly on the most trivial occasions, and he continually forgets the very names of his attendants and near relatives, although when their names are spelled, or they come before him, he is generally accurate in remembering them. He is perfectly aware of his own deficient state of mind and deplores it deeply, and sometimes, when he can not recall the word by which he wishes to express himself, falls into a state of rage and agitation which is highly alarming. After such an explosion he remains sometimes in a stupor for hours, but his general state is one of deep depression and disgust; as he has been from the beginning, and still is, forbidden to occupy himself in any serious way, or to receive any society beyond his own immediate court, his main occupation being that of walking, which he does for a length of time when well enough. It is natural to suppose that this life is insupportable to a man of the King's varied and remarkably intellectual resources, and who has been always accustomed to much mental occupation, and that it adds to his general irritability of temperament. But he is still averse to believe that there is little or no hope of his recovering his mental faculties sufficiently to undertake the management of affairs once more, and still more determined never to deprive himself, by any sort of abdication, of the divine right which he imagines it to be his duty to exercise to his latest hour."

RUSSIA.

A NEW CALIF HAROUN ALRASCHID.

An admirable example of justice was lately set by the new governor, Kaminski. He walked in the dusk of the evening, incognito, through the streets of the city, being quite wrapped up in the ample folds of his cloak. Suddenly the carriage of a prince came rattling along with the speed of lightning, being drawn by fiery steeds. Through the same street, a poor jaded Jew, covered with perspiration, was driving a heavily laden wagon. "Out of the way," cried, with a thundering voice, the prince's coachman. But the warning came too late: the wheels of the nobleman's carriage struck against those of the humble wagon. The prince, who sat at ease in his carriage, was somewhat roughly shaken. Wrathful, he jumped out, overwhelmed the cowed Jew with invectives, while giving him a sound thrashing with the whip. At last he left him, bleeding and bruised, threatening him with imprisonment in the morning. The governor, who had witnessed this painful scene, and who could scarcely restrain himself, when the prince had driven off asked the Jew his name. "What do you want of me, and what good is my name to you?" "But will you not claim damages for the hardships sustained?" "I claim damages! do you not know I am a poor Hebrew?" "What of that? Go to-morrow to the governor; they say he is a just man." "God forbid that I should do such a thing! What chance have I against so powerful a man? Let me alone, for God's sake." But the governor having persevered, at last learned his name. In the morning, the very same prince waited upon the governor, in order to give an account of his administration. "All right," he said, "nothing untoward happened yesterday; no grievances to be redressed." "No grievances," replied the governor, "and this poor fellow?" Here he called in the Jew, for whom he had sent previously. The prince, at the sight, grew pale, and confessed his wrong. The governor, in consideration of this candid confession, contented himself with condemning him to pay reasonable damages to the sufferer.

ITALY.

FOREIGNERS AT NAPLES.

A letter from Naples, of the 21st instant, says: "Naples is full of English at this moment, seeking for dwellings in the surrounding country places. Sorrento is nearly full; all the prettiest villas are taken at high prices, and the hotels are making a real harvest this year. Castellamare is a more fashionable residence for foreigners, and is already half filled with Russian, French, and English families. Ischia, for the bathing season, is sure to be much frequented, as the numerous mineral sources are known to be above any for their efficacious virtue. Vesuvius has for some days been in a state of great agitation, and issues flames toward Ottajano. Volumes of smoke cover its huge sides, as a token of a greater eruption."

SPAIN.

HOW THE GRANDEES TREAT EACH OTHER.

Marshal O'Donnell happened to be walking with some of his friends in the beautiful gardens of Aranjuez. He had just paid his respects to the Queen, and was in full uniform. At the same moment another group was coming in an opposite direction. On meeting all saluted O'Donnell, except General Sanz, the military chief of the King's household, who is a warm partisan of Narvaez, and consequently a deadly foe of O'Donnell, under whose orders Sanz served frequently during the civil war. On seeing Sanz pass without saluting, O'Donnell halted, and said, in a loud voice, "General, why have you not saluted me? It was your duty to do so, not by reason of any social consideration, but for respect to my military rank." Sanz muttered some excuse, and pretended he had not seen him. "It is untrue!" cried the fiery Spaniard, who, moreover, is remarkable for his lofty stature; "but now that you do see me, salute me as you ought." Sanz, without uttering a word, lifted his hat and passed on. The incident had no further consequence.

AFRICA.

A STRANGE DISCOVERY.

The Cape Town (C. G. H.) Mail, of 19th of April, says: "On Friday evening, last week, a cask was washed ashore near the light-house, which, on being opened, was found to contain two dead bodies. On examination it appeared that they were adult males, Chinese; one of them very decently dressed, and both free from any marks of injury or violence. The cask in which they were inclosed was seemingly of foreign make—it is thought American; and it seems probable that the deceased were among the coolies on board a Yankee vessel which was in Table Bay some short while ago, that they had died at sea, that the captain had thrown them overboard in this way to save the expense of burying them on land, according to the port regulations, and that they had been washed ashore by the late northerly gales. A considerable quantity of salt was found in the cask. It is thought, from the manner in which one was dressed, that he was a person of some consequence. Both the bodies were inclosed in matting, and were nearly fresh."

INDIA.

THE LATEST NEWS.

The Commander-in-Chief and General Walpole entered Shahjehanpore without opposition, on the 30th of April, and marched for Barclay on the 2d of May. The Maunbie and his followers were flying back to Maqueldee, in Oude. Nena Sahib was in Barclay. The Hindoos were friendly, but the Mussulmans were escaping. The reverses sustained by General Walpole in Oude have been confirmed. General Adrian Hope had been killed. A Goorkha column, under Colonel Jones, had occupied Mogadabad after defeating the enemy at Dugeehabad and Mujeenah. General Penny arrived at Punallee on the 26th of April, and marched the same day to join the Commander-in-Chief. A dispatch from Futteghur, May 2d, states that he followed the rebels into an ambuscade and was killed, but the enemy was defeated by his troops.

WERE THE ENGLISH LADIES OUTRAGED AND MUTILATED?

The Bengal Hurkaru says, "The question so much discussed in England, of the reality of the horrors of torture and mutilation said to have been perpetrated by the mutineers and rebels, has been the subject of much discussion in India also. It is true that, though but few living examples of ladies or children who have suffered these cruelties have been seen by many in Calcutta, instances of the kind have not been wanting. But too much weight has been attached to the existence of living instances of cruel atrocity. The proof of the crime does not rest on that fact. Those unfortunate ladies who survived the horrors to which they had been subjected would be the last to come forward and bear unnecessary testimony against the mutineers, while the reason that so few are comparatively to be seen lies in the fact that in nearly all cases of personal violence to English women, torture, mutilation, and other outrages were the more cruel preludes to murder. Very few, once in their power, escaped with life to show in their own persons the proofs of the cruel sufferings which they had undergone."

ANOTHER VICTIM OF THE SEPOYS.

A correspondent at Allahabad, who writes on the 8th April, states that a lady, whose name we do not give, of about sixteen or seventeen years of age, arrived at that station on the 7th. Her adventures have been great, and are as follows: "She was at Cawnpore, and went to the boats with the party. She was taken out of them by a sowar of the 3d Cavalry, who took her with him to Lucknow, then to Furruckabad, then to Delhi, and after the taking of that city back again to Lucknow. When Lucknow was taken, he brought her to Synee or Sainee, a chokee on the Grand Trunk Road near Allahabad, and left her to make her way into this station. She is in great distress of mind, often in tears, has forgotten much of the English language, and looks prematurely aged."

THE BATTLE OF BUNKER HILL.

EIGHTY-THREE years have elapsed since the scene now illustrated was made famous by the dear-won victory of the English over the Provincials. On 17th June, 1775, the battle of Bunker Hill established the crowning fact that the "Americans" were prepared to fight for their liberties. It was the Alpha and Omega of the Revolution. For it was the first great battle between the people and their armed masters; and, from the hour that the readiness of the former to fight for freedom was made certain, the result—their success—was a mere question of time.

It was on the 16th of June, in the afternoon, that the Committee of Safety was made aware of the design of the English to seize the Heights between the Mystic and Charles River. Boston was besieged. In a strategical point of view, it was an error on the part of both belligerents not to have seized those heights before. The omission the British proposed to repair on the 18th; the patriots determined to forestall them. On the night of 16th-17th, a portion of the regiments of Prescott, Frye, and Bridge, Gridley's Artillery, and 200 Connecticut men under Knowlton, heard prayer from the lips of the President of Harvard, and marched silently toward the peninsula. Their orders were to fortify Bunker's Hill. But the commanders, wisely considering Breed's Hill as the more important point, made it the centre of their operations, and only fortified Bunker's Hill as a subordinate work. The night was fair; the stars shone brightly; the work was done at midnight. Had the sare of the Englishmen been sharper, they might have heard the sound of the pick; as it was, we are told that the American forces were cheered by the monotonous repetition of the "All's well!" at regular intervals from the unconscious British pickets. The intrenchments were six feet high when the sentinels of the British vessel Lively discovered them at early dawn, and awakened his chief and the people of Boston by opening fire on the phenomenon.

All that morning from four, when day broke, to twelve, the Americans labored faithfully to heighten and strengthen their breast-works, while the English spent the time in mustering their forces for the attack which was indispensable. Shortly after noon, on 17th, the British had landed 4000 men on the peninsula; the Americans had hoisted the New England flag, quartered with the pine-tree, at the uppermost corner, near the staff. All was ready on both sides.

PLAN OF THE BATTLE OF BUNKER HILL.

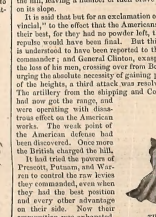
There was some misgiving among the defenders of the new forts. Such is usually the case with militia. There was a rumor that the British force was to be sacrificed for the benefit of those who were snugly ensconced within Boston: there was a general cry for Warren, the President of the Provincial Congress. Happily, shortly after two o'clock,

GENERAL WARREN.

Warren arrived; and amid the quashing the command to his inferior officers, Prescott, he announced his intention of fighting as a volunteer.



From that time forth all was harmony and union among the patriots.

It was 3 o'clock when the British column moved upward from the water-line with every air of a heavy fire from the shipping and Copp's Hill. Howe and Pigot commanded in person. It was then that Prescott uttered the well remembered command: "Men, do not fire till you see the whites of their eyes!" How well that command was obeyed, and how fearfully the assailing column suffered, every school-boy knows. The British troops saw their first rank fall like wheat before the sickle, and rushed tumultuously down the hill.

The second attack followed as soon as reinforcements—some four hundred marines—had been received from Boston. It shared the fate of the first. General Howe, who commanded in person, was at one time left alone, all his aids and orderlies having fallen under the deadly fire from the American breast-work. Once more the British ran down the hill, leaving a number of their brave comrades on its slope.

It is said that but for an exclamation of "a Provincial," to the effect that the Americans must do their best, for they had no powder left, the second repulse would have been final. But this remark is understood to have been reported to the British commander; and General Clinton, exasperated at the loss of his men, crossing over from Boston, and urging the absolute necessity of gaining possession of the heights, a third attack was resolved upon. The artillery from the shipping and Copp's Hill had now got the range, and were opening with disastrous effect on the American works. The weak point of the American defence had been discovered. Once more the British charged the hill.

It had tried the powers of Prescott, Putnam, and Warren to control the raw levies they commanded, even when they had the best position and every other advantage on their side. Now their ammunition was exhausted, their bodies weary, their hope holding so many of his old comrades. It took eighteen years to complete the monument, the work having been repeatedly interrupted by a want of funds. At length, on 17th June, 1843, the monument was dedicated, Daniel Webster being the orator of the day. It is a plain column, two hundred and twenty-one feet in height. On the top are two of the cannons of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company—the "Hancock" and the "Adams."

THE NEW ENGLAND FLAG.

This is but one of the monuments which a grateful people in New England have erected in honor of their Revolutionary ancestry. This time last year we engraved an illustration of the Putnam statue, which was inaugurated on the Bunker Hill anniversary. A few years hence we hope to have the pleasure of giving the colossal monument to the Pilgrim Fathers, which is destined to be the most remarkable work of art in the country.

The New England Flag, which is given above, is considered by Mr. Lossing to have been the one which was raised over the redoubt at Breed's Hill. In the corner was the pine-tree; the flag was quartered; it bore the motto "Qui transtulit sustinet." Some works have described the New England flag as having a sphere in the upper corner near the staff; this was an older flag, and was disused at the time of the battle of Bunker Hill.

We can not better close this brief account than by inviting the reader to peruse the following verses:

BUNKER HILL.

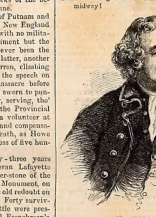
BY ALFRED B. STREET.

It moonlight, sweet and still,
Slept Boucher's peaceful hill:
The roofs and spires of Boston were enameled in the glow;
Shone forest, field, and stream
Beneath the mellow beam;
How lovely was the evening to that storm of blood and woe!

On the hill's illumined brow
Dim forms are moving now,
Hearing ramparts, and they labor as if life is in their toil;
Here a musket glitters, there
Gleams a sword upon the air,
The ramparts every moment growing higher from the soil.

At morn, grand sounds, like thunder,
When skies are cleft asunder,

From the hill-top rolled, and a smoky fold was wrapped o'er all the scene;
Long nuske was softly pealing,
Shrill shrieks are madly pealing,
Shots are flashing, blood is dashing, Battle frowns in furious mien.



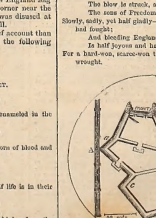
Proud and dauntless at their station
Are the sons of our young nation,
Proud and dauntless where their ramparts are extending rude for strength;
While in rapid columns streaming,
Through the smoke their scarlet gleamings
Up, up, swift toward those ramparts the British soldiers throng:

"Steady, steady, boys; sit steady
Until every aim is ready,
Then pour in true your fire!" cries old Putnam.
All obey!
"Crush the reptiles at their station,
Sweep the rebels from creation!"
Shouts the leader stern of England's hosts. More furious is the fray.

From the earthen ramparts came
Quick darts of deadly flame!
Balls whistled like December's blasts, blood flowed like April streams;
"Fight, fight for freedom's nation!"
"Sweep the rebels from creation!"
Then sound the wurlast battle-cries; War's visage wildest gleams.

Up to those ramparts flashing,
Twice came old England dashing,
And twice the sons of freedom had hurled him, bleeding, back;
Again, for one more blow,
Rallies the frenzied foe;
He comes! he comes! crowds, bayonets, flags, all glittering in his track.

He comes! he comes! O Heavens,
Let Freedom's cause be given
To death, but not to slavery! Rind Heaven be Thee their stay!
Yes, yes, kind Heaven doth heed them;
And, with Freedom's self to lead them,
Swift bounding o'er the ramparts they meet the foe midway!



GENERAL PUTNAM.

Through the gleaming, flaming smoke,
In closest contact broke
The shouted hail of the minute-men, the cap of the grenadier,
The rattle's garb of brown,
The red coat of the Crown,
The long black rifle wanting the thrust bayonet flashing clear.

A cry—a cry of wail!
Flushed brows are quickly pale;
Ah! who has fall'n—ah! who has fall'n, to cause such bitter woe?
There, stretched upon the ground,
With mourners hurrying round,
Is Warren, pouring from his heart his life in latest flow!

But Battle's tumult still Whirls wildly on the hill—
Still up the ranks of England crowd; meet, meet them as you may.
Sons of Freedom, at your station!
For your God, and for your nation,
Strike, strike one blow, one true blow more, as you slowly leave the fray!

The blow is struck, and slow
The sons of Freedom go—
Slowly, sadly, yet bold gladly—from the hill where they had fought;
And bleeding England's chasing
Is half joyous and half fearing,
For a hard-won, scarce-won trophy, to his Lion-fag is wrought.

REDOUBT ON BREED'S HILL.

BUNKER HILL MONUMENT, BOSTON.

THE BATTLE OF BUNKER HILL, JUNE 17, 1775.

EARTHQUAKE EXPERIENCES.

So much has been said of the great earthquake which occurred in the kingdom of Naples in the month of December, eighteen hundred and fifty-six, that the subject may appear almost to have been exhausted. An unexpected freshness, however, has been communicated to it by the narrative of an English gentleman, who, impelled solely by motives of benevolence, visited the afflicted districts, and lived and labored among the poor inhabitants for more than ten weeks. The details which he gives are of such an interesting and extraordinary character, afford so much insight into the actual civilization of localities he visited, as well as into the system of government pursued here, that I shall not make any apology for giving them as I heard them from his own mouth.

On Mr. Major's applying to Monsieur Bianchini, the Minister of the Interior, he found him rather put out by the indisposition which the English had manifested to intrust their contributions to the government for distribution. Without, however, prohibiting him from visiting the scene of the disaster, the minister would do nothing more than promise that no obstacle should be thrown in his way. General Winspear, who is at the head of gendarmery, gave him an especial order to be accompanied by gens d'armes wherever he went; and, with such guarantees, he left Naples on the thirtieth of January, about six weeks after the earthquake occurred.

From this time I shall conduct the narrative as though Mr. Major were speaking, and as nearly as possible in his own words:

My first resting-place was Salerno, where I visited the Intendente, Mr. Ajossa, who received me with great kindness and attention, giving me letters of recommendation to the Sottintendente, and a circular letter to all the gens d'armes, which enjoined them to assist me; and, moreover, sending one officer to accompany me during the whole time of my journey.

A lovely and a well-constructed road leads to Auletta, where the ruin occasioned by the earthquake is first apparent. A great quantity of planks had been put together for churches, barracks, and public offices. So also was it in Polla; where a handsome barrack had been erected for the Sottintendente, of expensive deals, and had been lined with blankets. It consisted of a saloon, antechamber, sleeping apartments, and all the other conveniences belonging to tranquil life. At Sala, too, he had another temporary house built of Petersburg timber. The judge and all the principal people were similarly accommodated; but, for the poor, only a few barracks had been put up. Indeed, wherever I went the same feature was perceptible; the authorities took good care of themselves; and it was obvious that they endeavored to prevent the people from having access to me. I had means of making the inquiry, however; and ascertained that scarcely any thing had been done for them. The government had sent a few blankets, articles of clothing, and deals, but they were insufficient, and had been used principally for the churches and authorities.

On my return in the month of March I found that the temporary church in Polla had been covered with zinc. Convinced that I could do but little for humanity in the province of Salerno, where, what had been done was by the roadside for the sake of show, in case any of the princes came down, I hurried on to Basilicata, where I arrived on the thirty-first of January in Padula. The earthquake had not committed so much injury here as in other places, but little had been done to repair it, for it was not on the high road. There was a fine old monastery here, which had been broken all to pieces. The Syndic of Padula received me well, and, leaving with him sixty ducats for the relief of poor, I went on the next morning to Saponara.

There was no road to this place, and my route lay over the mountains, a heavy snow falling all the time. In some parts the earth was cracked with deep fissures. Saponara I found had been nearly destroyed. On the side of the hill had stood a nunnery, which was now in ruins; the very foundations had been thrown up; of a large church not an atom was left; beds for apartments below in another story, with men and children in them, had been thrown into the rooms of nuns; two such instances I observed in Saponara. Dr. Mallet explained the phenomenon by saying, that it must have happened in consequence of a change in the position of the upper and lower beams of the two stories; but I still hold that it was produced by the immediate and violent action of the earthquake, and Humboldt records similar facts as having taken place in Quito. What was to be done? I asked. Barracks for the poor people were wanted, I was told, and that evening I set to work. The population had fled to a monastery, the walls of which had been thrown down. Some portions, however, remained; and, inside, some huts had been thrown up of board and straw and covered over with clothes, but the wind and the rain beat fearfully into them. The authorities had had some made expressly for themselves. The government officials, too, had erected some of sticks, lightly covered over with linen; they looked just like umbrellas, but no one would go into them. My first dispute here was with the monks, who would not allow me to erect barracks within the precincts of the ruined monastery, as females, misled, might possibly take refuge there. The vicar-general and the priests, too, urged that it would amount to a violation of the cloister, and would be a mortal sin. "It has already been broken," I insisted, "for some huts have already been erected here." "Absolution must be obtained for those who have already got in," was the answer; "but, were others now to obtain admission, absolution could not be procured for them." I then asked, ironically: "if it were really true that it would be a mortal sin to break the cloister thus?" On which a young priest undertook to prove that it would be a tremendous sin; and I simply observed, that the earthquake had first broken the cloister, and had occasioned all the ruin. It was of no use, however, to argue. I built my barracks outside the monastery, and the wind swept away the government umbrellas.

I remained in this place ten or twelve days, feeding all who came daily, with kettles of macaroni or beans; and, on one occasion, I purchased and cooked a pig, and distributed it. No one who applied was sent away without food, and the cost of all this did not exceed thirty-six ducats. Besides this I housed twenty-two families in temporary barracks, so built as to admit of their taking their looms with them. The cost of this amounted to two hundred and fifty-six ducats, seventy grains.

This will be the proper place to speak of a misunderstanding which I had with the bishop on pecuniary matters. At Salerno I had been cautioned not to place money in the hands of the priests. "They will put it in their pockets," I was told. The administrators of charity collected among the great body of the English had, however, placed fourteen hundred and fifty ducats in the hands of the bishop, who, on the twenty-fifth of January, had assured them that a thousand ducats had already been distributed, and that the remaining four hundred and fifty ducats would be so directly. On the first of February I arrived at Saponara, and found the bishop's vicar-general distributing the money in the name of the bishop. From him I ascertained that it was a portion of the thousand ducats which it had been asserted on the twenty-fifth of January had already been distributed; and his orders were to give a hundred ducats to a hundred families. As soon as the people learned that the money had been given by the English, and not by the bishop, they flocked round us, showing their paper packets, containing, not ten, but eight, or even six carlini; his reverence having mulcted the people to the tune of ten or twenty per cent. The vicar-general then ordered the people to be driven away; but as several gens d'armes were under my control, I could prevent this. My next step was to write to the bishop, and ask for the second sum of one hundred ducats which had been intended for Saponara. His excellency sent it with much confusion, and added, in a postscript, that his vicar might distribute a hundred ducats in Viggiano, and two hundred ducats more in another place. Accordingly, I sent a trusty messenger, but he returned empty-handed—in fact, the bishop endeavored to keep back three hundred ducats, and it took me two months to get it out of his hands; but I informed him that until I had done so I should not leave the province. The bishop then wrote to the arciprete, to get an assurance that ten carlini had been given to each person, and many signed it; but the archpriest himself told me that only eight carlini had been distributed to each person. At the same time I had a paper drawn up by the notary, declaring that the people had been robbed, and this paper was signed by many respectable persons.

During my stay at Saponara, I went one day to a small town called Sarcone, the history of which possesses great classical interest, and I shall speak of it when I have given a report of my visit. My object was to distribute money; but so offended were the authorities at my undertaking to do it myself, that, after the Syndic had given me a list of names, they left me unprotected, and told me that I might go into the church and give the charity there. Of course the whole population followed me, and I found myself in the midst of them without gens d'armes, and abandoned by the leading people; indeed, I may tell you that, with one or two exceptions, I was very ill received and much neglected by all the civil local authorities. A huge fat priest met me in the church, and attempted to dissuade me from taking the list which the Syndic gave me; but on running it over, I found that the names were principally those of women, and one of his flock shouted out, "Don't take his list; he will give you fifty such," winding up with observations à propos to such insinuations.

I had distributed fifty ducats, according to the best of my judgment, and had placed twenty piastres on the ground by my side, when, all of a sudden, my fat clerical friend had got on my shoulders, and was making a long arm to get at my money. The people, too, like hungry dogs, were all crowding upon me, had pulled off my cravat in their greedy anxiety to get something, and had torn the buttons out of my shirt. A man in the crowd called out, "You are in danger!" I directly made a snatch at my money, jerked the priest off my shoulders—for you see I am a strong man—and made a rush for it, knocking down forty or fifty people in my way. On getting out of the church I drew a six-barrel revolver, and called out, "Keep off, or I will fire!" and in this way made myself master of the position.

Hearing of some noble ladies who were reduced to great distress by the earthquake, I got a man to accompany me to their ruined dwelling, a vast crowd of poor, of all grades, following. On arriving, I found an elderly and a younger lady almost without clothes. The latter was one of the most beautiful persons I ever met with, and it went to my heart to see two well-born and well-educated ladies thus seated almost amidst the falling walls of their house, and willing to accept the relief which I offered them. I could not help reflecting, as I left Sarcone, what the Roman Catholic religion had done for its inhabitants during fifteen centuries, and I told them, "You are fierce animals; you are not Christians."

I alluded above to the classical interest which surrounds Sarcone, for two thousand years ago it belonged to the old city of Grumentum, of which various authors, as Pliny and Livy, speak. The latter, in book twenty-seven, chapter forty-seven: "Not to meet the Romans in the Bruzz, Hannibal passed into Lucania, and particularly to Grumentum, hoping to recover some cities which had passed to the Romans. The Consul Claudius Nero following him, besieged him. Hannibal had encamped under the walls of Grumentum; the army of the Romans, about five hundred passi distant from the Carthaginians. . . . . . The Carthaginians began to fly, and being followed, left eight thousand dead on the field, seven hundred prisoners, nine standards, four elephants killed and two taken!" A great variety of articles belonging to both armies had been found in this neighborhood, and the Notary of Saponara speaks, among other things, of an elephant's tooth having been turned up. Whether the people have made any advance since the day when they routed Hannibal may well be doubted, for they are in a half savage state, despite the light of what is by courtesy called Christianity, and of the exertions of an all-powerful priesthood. A specimen of that body I have given you, and I might repeat his likeness over and over again.

From Sarcone I returned to Saponara; and before leaving this place, I must mention two or three of the distressing cases. The judge had been buried under the stones of his house, with his wife and child, but he managed to make his voice heard, and one of his people procured assistance, and endeavored to dig him out. His body had been cleared as far as his middle, when his young wife was found lying across his knees. As soon as the rubbish had been cleared, the poor judge took her in his arms, but she was already dead. Unlike an Italian, his manner was utterly undemonstrative—he seemed to be crushed; looking at her, he only said, "Eleonora, cara, tu sei morta!" and a groan escaped him. His child, too, was killed. When I saw him, perhaps about a month after, he had never spoken of the event to any one, nor had he ever smiled. He did all the duties of his office, however, punctually, and took my part manfully against the monks. I took his hand and expressed my deep sympathy with him, but he answered not a word—he only returned my pressure. The Notary of the same place took me into a corner of his hut and related his own story. It was as follows: He had been a man of considerable property, living in a good house, one part of which was occupied by himself and his second wife, and another part by two daughters by the first wife, who were much attached to him. When the first shock of earthquake came he was asleep in bed, and waking up, he called to his wife. They had heard no previous sound. Then came a second shock, and all came down. "We fell close to a door which opened into the street," he said, "and it happened to be open. I could have got out, but my wife held me back, and thus both were saved under the arch of the door. The noise of the falling of the house was that of a tremendous crash, like the rushing of a cataract, and this was followed by the stillness of death. The street itself was obscured by a cloud of dust. I called for my daughters," he continued, "but there was no answer. I scrambled toward their part of the house, but every thing was buried, and when they were found they were seated in their chairs, for they had not yet gone to bed. I thought the day of judgment had come. In a half dreaming, half waking state, but utterly confused, I called again and again for my children, and then I listened for the crowing of a cock, as if to mark the time, but during that night no cock crowed!"

In Saponara alone two thousand persons had been buried.

Thence, resumes Mr. Major, I went on to Montemurro, where six thousand persons had been buried, and a melancholy sight it presented, indeed. There was nothing left. The stench from the dead bodies was almost insufferable, for they had been but slightly covered, so that the pigs dug them out and ate them. I saw one devouring the leg of a man.

Some soldiers had been sent down by the Government; but they gave themselves up to plunder and drinking. They broke into the cellars of Montemurro, drank the wine, and then they and the poor plundered right and left. One man, who happened to be walking with me, was arrested for stealing four thousand ducats. One of the great sufferers in Montemurro was Baron ——. His house had fallen, and he had been buried in the ruins, and his right leg rendered useless. The first shock had buried him up to his shoulders, but two beams above had kept the house from falling upon him. He heard the voice of his daughter up stairs, lamenting and calling out for him, but he answered, that he could not move! "The second and the third shock came," he told me, "and threw the beams upon my head, crushing me to the ground. An opening was, however, left before my mouth, just sufficient to allow me to breathe, and speak to my daughter. The next shock closed up even this aperture. Not a limb could I move, and the only member of my body that I could use was my tongue. With this I worked at the ground, and blew the dust away, until I managed to reopen the communication with my child. For three hours I heard her dying voice, and, finally, her very last tones." The Baron was got out safely, and so was his wife; but the daughter and two sons were killed.

In this place I distributed one hundred and forty-five ducats, and left ninety-six ducats behind me. By my orders, some agricultural instruments, too, were made at Spinosa, which I distributed, as also some working materials for shoemakers. I was, however, deceived by a genteel-looking woman coming to me one evening, and crying and asking for assistance. I gave her ten piastres; but afterward heard that she had five thousand or six thousand ducats in her possession. On hearing this statement I went and asked her for what I had given her, and she restored it. So few people had been spared by the earthquake in the mountains that it was useless to attempt building, and I advised the authorities to get the people away. They were occupied, however, in erecting a great wooden church, and in digging for an old wooden Madonna, which, on its being found, was carried in procession, and stuck up in their church.

The next place I visited was Viggiano; which, like all the others named, may be found on a good map of Italy. One thousand people had been destroyed here; but as a considerable population still remained, and all their houses were broken, I saw the necessity of building huts. For this purpose I rented a piece of ground for two years, at eighteen ducats a year; built over a part of it, and accommodated twenty-eight families. Here I remained a month, three weeks of which I spent in my barrack, ill with fever, and keeping the money under my pillow. For eight or nine days I ate no food, and was in a barbarous country, without any one to assist me; but my good constitution helped me through. While staying in Viggiano I sent some people to inquire into the state of Spinosa, and two hundred persons came over to me, and received relief. I sent money also to Marsiconnovo, and to Brienza; but as the authorities would not put their names to the list of those who were to receive it, the money was brought back again to me. In Tranutola I distributed three hundred and forty-four ducats to the poor. In Viggiano I distributed six hundred and twelve ducats, while the whole cost of housing twenty-eight or thirty families was not more than five hundred and sixty ducats, or one hundred pounds. During this time, too, I never ceased to feed the people, and on one day I fed not less than five thousand persons, and thousands on every day that I remained. The cost of feeding them did not exceed one hundred and thirty-two ducats. On leaving Naples I brought with me five thousand one hundred and forty-nine ducats, and I took back one thousand nine hundred and ten ducats. Small sums I had, however, lent to some reduced persons, at five per cent. interest, for there were some offering it at twenty or thirty per cent. To the people, I stated that I was ready to take as many orphans as they would bring me, and receive them into my silk factory, in Sant Torio, near Portici. Twenty were offered to me. It is my intention to go back to this part of the country in a few months, and build some model houses of stones, with vaulted roofs. One room and one kitchen, I calculate, could be built for one hundred ducats, or eighteen pounds.

Viggiano has a special interest of its own, as being a city of Troubadours. From the Middle Ages, the inhabitants had wandered over Asia and Europe, with their harps and violins, and after the lapse of many years they come back with their thousands sometimes, and build or add to the family house. Every generation adds something; thus, in the very architecture of the place there was a quaintness. As many, too many are abroad, the population is of a varied character; and I found here men with wives from Spain and Germany, England and New York. Poor fellows! they had lost every thing. Their dwellings on the top of a mountain had been all thrown over. I bought a harp for one, and shall assist others in like manner. When Grumento was destroyed by the Saracens, the inhabitants fled to the tops of the mountains, and there erected Saponara, Montemurro, and Veggiano.

It was while I was in this latter place that I was visited by the Intendente of Basilicata—a gentleman who distinguished himself by his activity, benevolence, and good sense, during these trying times. He came to my barrack, accompanied by all the authorities of the district. I offered him a chair, but not the others, who had abused and neglected me. He threw down his cap on my bed, and, looking round my hut, exclaimed, "Bravo, Signore Major!" Then, turning to the authorities, he said, "You have taken good care of yourselves, but little of the poor." Many of the poor presented petitions to him, which he presented to me, at the same time telling the people, "You have a gentleman here who knows what is best for you." "At Saponara," he said to the authorities, when speaking of me, "we had not such a man to show among us." This must have been a great rebuff to them; for they had recommended the population not to take any thing of me, or they would be put in prison. This may sound like self-laudation, but these incidents belong to the case.

After having fulfilled my mission among those people, I prepared to leave; and to their honor be it said, when I bad them adieu, they manifested the greatest gratitude, and shed tears.

It remains for me to make some observations which I could not well insert in my narrative; but which will, perhaps, be of interest to the reader. The agricultural state of that part of the country, where I spent most of my time, was very bad and primitive. There were no olive nor fruit trees, but a good deal of grain was grown, and is exported from the province of Basilicata. A day field-laborer will earn in these parts a carlino (or fourpence) a day, and this not always in money, but in kind. For myself, I paid all who worked at making huts two carlini a day. With the exception of the great road which runs through to Calakia, and on to Tarentum, there are no roads, and every thing is transported on mules. Thus, from Saponara to Portenza, a distance of perhaps thirty or forty miles, it will take four days to make the journey by the same means. Provisions are, consequently, cheap; for there is no market for selling the produce. I observed a very marked difference between the character of those who lived in these parts of the country, which were traversed by roads, and that of the population of those districts which were less favored. Nowhere, however, were they contented with their government; and, in many parts they were greatly discontented. If I were to describe the state of the population, I should say that they are in a state of semi-barbarism; perhaps very similar to that of the English several centuries ago. Nor do I observe any thing in the ecclesiastical or civil administration of the country at all likely to elevate them. As for the religion, it is a modified form of paganism: the worship of Venus under the figure of the Madonna. There is a large statue to her honor which remains on a high hill near Viggiano for a great part of the year; and in the month of September it is visited by fifty thousand people. The masses are as superstitious and as ignorant as they can be, though now and then, perhaps, persons may be found who read more than men of the same class do in Naples; but it is a reading necessarily confined to the patt, and has nothing to do with correct or modern literature.

As for priests in these districts, I do them no injustice in calling them debased and ignorant; I abstain from a number of odious anecdotes which would prove it. On the lists presented to me I observed attached to the names of many Frejoti and Mali, and the interpretation given to me was, that they were the priests' children. The community contributed to the support of the children until they were twelve years of age, when the sexes were treated on the streets, unless nurse became so attached to them as to adopt them. Several adult children were brought to me, who knew not themselves by any other name than that of Mali. I spoke to a priest about it, much lamenting the state of things, and his sole observation was that he thought it a very good arrangement, as the children would otherwise destroy their wives at their birth; but at present their souls were saved by baptism.

Of the officials with whom I met, I can speak in no other terms than as swarms of hungry thieves, who rule the inhabitants; whether the chief there or civil officers, my description is still the same; and, judging the whole of my sojourn among them, I met with only two priests who even spoke like honest men. It is only just, however, to add, that among the civilized I found several subjects who were willing to face the thickest mudslings. In an especial manner I speak of the Bishop of Salerno and of the Basilicata, who fully impressed me with the idea of their being honest and able men.

With regard to myself, a daily report of my movements was made to the police; but as my entry is not so tranquil and prosperous that a man can be suffered to wander freely about with a bag of money at his disposal. It is not impossible that the gens d'armes who accompanied me were sent as much to watch me as to protect me, though they served me well. In fact, except to the local and humbler authorities my best thanks are due for the facilities accorded to me in the work of charity.

Different statements of the numbers who perished by the earthquake have been given. I believe the following to be correct. In the very centre of the disaster there perished of fourteenthousand; in Saponara two thousand; in Vietri, going one thousand; and perhaps a thousand more in scattered villages in the same neighborhood. If to these be added ten thousand more, we certainly shall be within the mark.

Here, for the present, ends the interesting report of Mr. Major. Let his exertions be a lesson to each and all, as to what one man can do, and in every man properly estimate his power and his duties.

INSANE.

Ask day, with fabled hands, she sits apart
From the wild, gibbering group within the cell.
The misery mutters and the laughter leers
In never purer than her spirit's well!
And in her brutish eyes, so strangely dark,
Broodeth a spell.

You would not deem her crazed—too much of peace
Drips on her face from the holy-shepherd star,
And with the sad years of her life's increase
Her clouded reason in new lustre hales
Waiting with trust till angels' hands shall bring
The perfect day.

You sigh—I smile. I know she's happier now
Than when, in girlhood, across knoll at her shrine
Where glowing sunsets painted her young brow
And in her honor flowed the ruby wine—
And high-born peers and nobles bought her vows
She was divine!

Then she walked proudly through her father's halls,
A thing of regnant loveliness and pride
Burning all hearts with her wild passion-falls,
And lonqueror-glorious in her bosom's tide
Waking a yearning in the Duke's proud breast
To call her wife.

Titles and wealth were not her envied lore;
Men called her like the diamond—bright and cold,
Let no breath wake a love-pulse there,
No noble to be either bought or sold!
Seeming to barter her wide wealth of heart
For earthy gold.

Man may love beauty, fortune, wit, or sense,
And love again his first lovely sculpture;
But woman, with her being stamped (intense,
Loves not by simple conception, reasoning code,
But him for whom her life gives out in floods—
Her life is love!

This woman loved her page: a calm-faced youth,
With earnest soul looking out through his eyes,
And forehead such as the glow of genius
And soft hair goddessed by the tropic skies;
And he loved her as the Mohammedan
Loves Paradise.

The first awakening! on her soft, white breast
The boy's head rested. On her neck, a tress
The long, rich skein of burning love he pressed,
And crowd not the King his sovereign
For her warm breath put the whole range of joy
In dark eclipse.

But ah! the page written in her blessed embrace
A far-off gleaming notice in his eyes,
A flash of purple agony swept o'er his face,
One kind, fond look—dead in her arms he died!
Murdered by a cursed elixir, given glad hands
By her own bride!

No more the light of reason leaves her brain—
A shock and harmless nothingness is here;
She sits all day, making a lover's vow,
Beneath the shadows of the morning fire;
No flower, no gem, no kinsman's soothing face
Her heart prefers.

They call her crazed. The dread Arpium's wife
Hold her for the brief time she has to walk,
Ere from the throned vulture of Heaven's high halls
A summons comes to bear her spirit home
Till in the Day of Judgment he shall meet her
At the Gate!

FARMINGTON, ILL., May, 1858.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER VII.—[CONTINUED.]

"If WHEN I was young," resumed the Colonel, "I chanced to make acquaintance with a man of infinite whim and humor; fascinating as Darrell himself, though in a very different way. We called him Willy—you know the kind of mono one calls by his Christian name, cordially abbreviated. That kind of man seems never to be quite grown up; and therefore never rises in life. Willy was born rich, and Willy after the age of thirty, who did not come to a melancholy end! Willy was the natural son of a rich, helter-skelter, eleventh, undistinguished, but four-in-hand Baronet, by a celebrated French actress. Willy's extinct mother was a lady, I believe, in the genus of stylish, mulish, four-in-hand Baronet. A Julian Loselyn—"

"Loselyn!" echoed Lionel.

"Yes; do you know the name?"

"I have heard it till I am tired. I want to tell you what I did hear then—but after your story."

"Sir Julian Losely (Willy's father) lived with the French lady as his wife, and reared Willy in his house, with as much pride and fondness as if he intended him for his heir. The poor boy, I suspect, got but little regular education though, of which, he spoke but little, his mother's tongue like a native; and, thanks also perhaps to his mother, he had an extraordinary talent for mimicry and acting. His father was passionately fond of private theatricals, and Willy had early practice in that line. He was but seventeen at Fulstarf in a country-house, and doubt if Lyon could have acted it better; but then, when Willy was still a mere boy, he lost his mother, and Sir Julian married—had a legitimate daughter—died intestate—and his daughter, of course, had the personal property, which was not much; the rest—at least all the land—and poor Willy nothing. But Willy was a universal favorite with his father's old friends—old fellows like Sir Julian himself; amongst them there were two cousins, with large connexions, powerful men, and rich men. They shared Willy between them, and quarreled who should have the most of him. So he grew up to be man, with no settled profession, but always welcome, not only to the two cousins, but at every house in which Julian Losely lark, 'he came to startle the dull night'—the most amusing companion !—a famous shot—a capital horseman—knew the ins and outs of animals, fishes, and birds; I verily believe he could even conceal a puppy dog to pass off as a cat; and to sing. Void of all malice, up to all fun. Imagine how much people would court, and how little they would care for, a Willy of that sort. Do I bore you?"

"On the contrary, I am greatly interested."

"One thing a Willy; it a Willy could be wise, ought to do himself—keep out of debt. A well dead Willy is in a false position. My Willy wedded—for love, too—an amiable girl, I believe—I never saw her; for I never left Fulstarf that I knew Willy)—but as poor as himself. His friends and relations were furious; but, as is serious; something must be done for Willy. It was easy to say, 'something must be done,' and sometimes difficult to do it. The two cousins were consulting, his half-sister, the Baronet's fateful daughter, died, unexpectedly, and, though she had ignored him in life, left him £2000. 'I have hit it now,' cried one of the cousins. 'Willy is fond of a country life. I will hit him have a farm on a nominal rent, his £2000 will stock it; and Willy's farm, which contains good woods, will be a capital hunting meet. As long as I live Willy shall be mounted.'

"Willy the farmer, Willy astonished his friends by attending to it. It was just beginning to answer pretty well, when, having him only one child—a boy; and her death made him so melancholy that he could no longer attend to his farm. He threw it up, and invested the proceeds as a capitalist, and lived on the interest as a gentleman. Then he married a second Europe for some time—chiefly on foot—came back, having recovered his spirits—resumed his old, desultory, pleasure life at Fulstarf, country-houses; and at one of those houses I and Charles Haughton made Willy's acquaintance. I say that Will Losely at that time impressed me with the idea that he was a thoroughly honest man. Though he was a universal favorite, though he had lived with wild sets of convivial separates—though of sheer high spirits he would now and then make conventional Proprieties lengh at their own long faces; yet, I should have said, from the first, Willy Losely, I would swear no sin could—could not have been more incapable of a lapsed, rascally, blackguard sin. Nay, in the plain matter of integrity, his ideas were so nice and refined almost Quixotic. If asked to give or to lend, Willy would have in his pocket in an instant; but though thrown among rich men—among men who lived by betting—men who hung into their pockets, never borrowed, never owed. He would accept hospitality—make frank use of your stud, your dogs, your dogs—but your money, no! He repaid all he took from a friend with interest; and the pleasantest guest that host ever entertained. Poor Willy! I think I see his quaint smile brimming over with sly sport! The round of his visits was like a cry of 'hold holiday' in a school-room. He dishonest! I should as soon have suspected the noonday sun of being a dark lantern! I remember, when Ian and I were walking home from wild-shock shooting in advance of our companions, a short conversation between us that touched me much at the time, and has since, under all his levity, there were sound sense and right feeling. I thanked him about his son, then a boy at school. 'Why, as IS was the Christmas vacation, he had refused our host's suggestion to let the lad come down there.' 'Ah,' said he, 'don't fancy that I will lead my son to grow up a scatter-brained good-for-naught like his father. His society is the joy of my life; whenever I have enough in my pockets to afford myself that joy, I will have a quiet lodging close by his school, to have him with me from Saturday till Monday all to myself—where he never hears wild fellows call me "Willy," and ask me to mimic. I had hoped to have spent this vacation with him; but I see that his schoolmaster was higher than usual, and after paying it I had not a guinea to spare—obliged to come here where I can feed and—be comforted by the boy's uncle on the mother's side—a respectable man, who has promised to take charge of him for the holidays; but did not ask me, because his wife—and I don't blame her—thinks I've had child enough of my own to educate badly.'

"I asked Will Losely what he meant to do with his son. He hurried that point; got the boy a commission in the army without purchase.

"'No,' said Willy, 'I know what it is to set up for a gentleman with the capital of a beggar. It is to be a shuttlecock between discontent and debt—wishing for what we have not, and having soon waste his life as I have done. He would be more spoiled, too, than I have been. The handsome young fellow is universal bold as lion. Once in that set'—pointing over his shoulder to the groups of fashionable coxcombs, whose loud laughter every now and then reached our ears)—'once in that set he would never be out of a—scrape. I swore to his uncle, on her death-bed, that I would bring him up to be my heir, and so I will, if he turns out a hanger-on and kid-Captain! Swore to her that he should be reared according to his own station—and that is his mother's! a life of his own station!—and I'm not so sure him on honest principles, and with honest aims, to be equal to the highest—because no rich man's dependent, and no poor man's jest—my ambition will be satisfied. Excuse me my understand, Ian, why my boy is not here. You would say a father who left his son rich should not—and so should I. Eh, Lionel?'

"Yes, and a true gentleman's heart, too!"

"So I thought; yet I fancied I knew the world! After that conversation I quitted one of the two houses in which I was a supernumerary, at country houses, met William Losely again. To say truth, the chief patrons and friends were not society in my set. But your father mentioned to me Willy pretty often. They took a great fancy to each other. Charley, you know, was genial—fond of private theatricals, too; the Losely's were famous for them. Some years after, as all luck would have it, Charles Haughton, while selling off his Middlesex property, was in immediate need of £1000. He could get it on a bill, but not without security. His own name would not raise the money in the City, and he had already exhausted most of the friends whose security was esteemed by accommodation bill-brokers. Under his eye, in an evil hour he had learned that poor Willy had just £1000 left in the world. He sent to the money lender, who was lawyer for the property on which the mortgage was, knew it too. It was to the interest of Willy's £1000 that Haughton should have the use of his little capital in settling up his affairs, and in the then commercial house. Charles Haughton went down to shoot at the house where Willy was a guest—dined with him—drank with him—talked with him—proved to him, no doubt, that long before the £1000 could be wanted for the purchase property would be sold; the bill taken up, Willy might trust to his honor. Willy did trust. Like you, my dear Lionel, he had not the most scrupulous to say No.' Your father, I am certain, would have done so, and would have seen the hot blood meant to defraud any human being; but —your father gambled! A debt of honor at your personal honor—the debt of a fellow-creature! The £1200 were forthcoming—your father won them—and Willy's £1000 vanished upon Charley. Sure that Charles Haughton would yet redeem his promise, Willy renewed the bill another three or more successive times; three months over, he came to town to find your father had gone abroad, and Willy remained in debt out for fear of arrest. Willy had no option but to pay the money; and when your father knew that a year or two after that the man's affairs allowed up the whole of Willy's little capital, he, I am sure, was the last man to take from a needy Haughton's hand the exultant expression I ever saw on mortal man's. And sure I am that all the pay-back in the world never knew as much pleasure were not worth the agony and remorse of that moment. Don't reject your evidence, I pray, but you begin as your father began; and if I had not known the story you might have ended as your father ended."

Lionel's face remained covered, and it was not by either word or look he interrupted the Colonel's narrative. "Certainly," resumed Allen Mayle, "a reflective boy, Charley, and that villain—I mean William Losely, for villain his afterward proved to be—had the sweetest, most confiding, most loyal of friends. He might have gone about to his kinsmen and friends denouncing Charles Haughton as a swindler, and his written promises he had been undone. But no! such a story, just at that moment, would have crushed Charley's chance of the chance of ever holding up his head again; and Charles told me (for if I was through Charles that I knew the tale) that Willy's parting words to him were, 'Do not fret, Charlie. After all, my boy is now settled in life, and I am a cut with nine lives, and should fall on my legs if thrown out of a garret window.' Charles Haughton, to his honor, never told the money-lender to hold his tongue. Poor Willy! I never asked a rich friend to lend me money but once in my life. It was then, I went to Guy Darrell, who was in full practice, and said to him, 'Lend me one thousand pounds. I may never repay you.' Five thousand pounds, if you like it,' said he. 'One will do.' I took the money, and sent it to Willy. Alas! he returned it, writing word that 'Providence had been very kind to him; he had just been appointed to a capital place, with a magnificent salary. The rest had fallen on its legs.' He bade me comfort Haughton with that news. The money went back with a heartily packet, and perhaps weakened thence to Charles Haughton's recollections. But it was a temporament. At the country house, to which Willy was invited for the autumn, he had been a stranger (no relation), who said to him, 'You live with Haughton—share their game—break in their horses—see to their farmers—give you nothing! You are no longer very young—you should lay by for your little nonsense left to it. Live with me, and I will give you £300 a year. I am partner in my steward—take his place, but be my friend.' William Losely, of course, closed with the proposition. This gentleman, Lionel, was Guy Darrell's friend, whose slightly in favor times (people say I know every body)—a nonentity—was, nobody, indeed, misanthropical old bachelor. With an intelligent place universally admired, and a large annuity universally envied, he lived much alone, ramming on the bitterness of life and the nothingness of worldly blessings. Meeting Willy at the country house to which, by most professional relaxation of misanthropy, he had been persuaded, for the first time in his life, Guy Darrell was heard to laugh. He said to himself, 'Here is a man who actually amuses me.' William Losely contrived to give the misanthropes a new zest of existence; and when he found that the nuisance could be overcome, the rich man conceived an interest in his own house, gardens, property. For the sake of Willy's merry companionship he would even ride over his farms, and actually carried a gun. Meanwhile, the steward, I am told, ably and well managed. Ah! that fellow Willy was a born genius, and was not likely to neglect any body's affairs except his own. I heard of all this with pleasure (people say I hear every thing)—when one day a strange man came to me by his house at Tattersall's—Do you know the news? Will Losely is in prison on a charge of robbing his employer!'

"Nothing! incredible!" exclaimed Lionel.

"My dear Lionel, it was after further mutual that the evidence was irrefutable in grand law. Will Losely was sentenced to be sent to the hulks at any thing?"

"But of course he was innocent!"

"On the contrary, he confessed, was convicted; pleaded guilty, and was transported! I would have said that Willy said that—though it was best declined to drag him before a magistrate's, or, at the subsequent trial, have abstained from giving evidence against him; that Willy has been till then a faithful steward; the whole proceeds of the estate had passed through his hands he might, in transactions for timber, have clerical understood, to revive the memory of the alleged robbery; it must have been a momentary aberration of reason; the rich man should have let him off. But, all aside with the plea, that His best belief in his species was annihilated. He must have thought that the law, which forgave no amused, never be interested again. He saw inexorable and—vindictive."

"But what were the facts?—what was the evidence?"

"Very little came out on the trial; because, in pleading guilty, the court had merely to consider the evidence which had sufficed to commit him. That was scarcely more than what the London papers. William Losely was not like a man known to the police. His offence was confined to those who resorted to old-fashioned country houses, chiefly single men, for the sake of sport, and fun. His offence was different in the case that I made an abstract or precis, not only of all that appeared, but all that I could learn of its leading circumstances. 'Tis a tale of mine, whenever any of my acquaintances exhibit interest with the Queen's Bench. In the Counsel room, unlocked a small glazed book-case, selected from the contents a file of papers, recounted himself, turned the paper, found the place sought, and, reading from it, resumed his narrative. Guy Darrell, with his characteristic in the case that I made an abstract or precis, not only of all that appeared, but all that I could learn of its leading circumstances. 'Tis a tale of mine, whenever any of my acquaintances exhibit interest with the Queen's Bench. In the Counsel room, unlocked a small glazed book-case, selected from the contents a file of papers, recounted himself, turned the paper, found the place sought, and, reading from it, resumed his narrative. Guy Darrell, with his characteristic in the case that I made an abstract or precis, not only of all that appeared, but all that I could learn of its leading circumstances. 'Tis a tale of mine, whenever any of my acquaintances exhibit interest with the Queen's Bench. In the Counsel room, unlocked a small glazed book-case, selected from the contents a file of papers, recounted himself, turned the paper, found the place sought, and, reading from it, resumed his narrative. Guy Darrell, with his characteristic William Losely's private apartment. Losely had taken rooms opposite to Darrell's himself in one side of the house, which was built in a quadrangle round Whose large court. When Losely opened his door to Mr. Gunston's knock, it struck Mr. Gunston that his manner seemed confused. On entering the room unbidden, Losely said that he had occasion to go to London next morning for a few days on the urgent business of his own. This annoyed Mr. Gunston. He observed that Losely's absence just then would be inconvenient. He reminded him that a tradesman, who lived at a distance, was coming over the next day to be paid for a sum of money already, by correspondence, adjusted the dispute, having suggested that perhaps Losely the tradesman had agreed to, and that Mr. Gunston would not have to give a check for the balance—viz., £270." Thereon Mr. Gunston remarked, "If you were not in the habit of paying my bills for me out of what you receive, you would know that I seldom give checks. I certainly shall not give one now, for I have the money in the house." Losely observed, "that is a bad habit of yours keeping large sums in your own house. You may be robbed." Mr. Gunston replied, "Safer than lodging large sums in a country bank." Country banks have My grandchild's £1000 by the failure of a country bank; and my father, therefore, always took his payments in cash, remitting them to London from time to time as he went thither himself. "I do the same," said Lucely; "so if you are sure you have as much by you, you will pay the bill, and have done with it." I shall be back before Sparks the builder comes to be paid for the new barns to the home farm—that will be about May, I think, by taking money for timber wood. "He can be paid out of that." Gerarve. "No, I can pay Sparks, too, out of what I have in my bureau; and the timber-merchant can pay his debt into my London banker's." Lucely. "Then I mean that you have enough for both these bills actually in the house?" Gerarve. "Certain-ly in the bureau in my study. I don't know how much I've got. It may be £1000—it may be £1700. I have not counted it. I am not a bad man of business; but I am sure it is more than £1000." Lucely made no further observation to the effect that if Gunston never kept an account of what he had, he could never tell whether he was robbed, and that, therefore, he would be robbed; since, according to Othello, "He that is robbed, not wotting what is stolen, Lets fish eat him for it, and he's not robbed at all."

After that, Lucely became absent in manner, and seemed impatient to get rid of Mr. Gerarve. Gunston hinting that he had the liber-book to look over, and some orders to write out for the bailiff, Mr. Gerarve should start early the next morning."

Here the Colonel looked up from his MS., and said, episodically, "Perhaps you will fancy that these dialogues are invented by me after the fashion of the ancient historians? Not so. I give you the report of what passed, ex Gunston reported ut verbatim; and I assure you that my memory was pretty accurate. Well" (here Allen returned to his MS.), "Gunston left Wilby, and went into his own study, where he sat down by himself. When his valet brought it in, he told the man that Mr. Lucely was going to start early the next morning, and ordered the servant to see himself that coffee was served to Mr. Lucely's room. Then he sat down and reasoned that Mr. Lucely had seemed much out of sorts lately, and that it was perhaps a consequence of his affair connected with the gentleman who had come to see him two days before." Gunston had not heard of such a matter, and had not mentioned it. When the servant retired, Gunston, thinking over Lucely's apparent uneasiness, lay his mouth resolved to ascertain what he had in his bureau. He opened it, examined the drawers, and found, secured in a tin box, that Mr. Lucely had given him, a larger sum than he had supposed—and here was the first mention of £1975, of which nearly £100 were in sovereigns. He smoothed the notes carefully; and, for want of other occupation, and with the view of showing Lucely that he could profit by a hint, he entered the numbers of the notes in the memo-ok-book, placed them all together in one drawer with the gold, relocked his bureau, and went shortly afterward to bed. The valet, Lucely by having gone in the morning? the tradesman came to be paid for the scenery, had access to his bureau, took out his notes, and found £250 were gone. He could hardly believe his senses. He had made a mistake in counting the No. There was his pocket-book, the missing notes entered duly therein. There were indeed the sovereigns, 142 were gone of them—nearly £100 in all thus abstracted. He refused at first to admit suspicion of Lucely. But, after interrogating his servants, the valet deposed, that he was directed about two hours after the morning by the back of the house-dog, which was let loose of a night within the front court-yard of the house. Not apprehensive, however, but fearing the dog might also disturb his master, he got out of his window (being on the ground floor) to pacify the animal; but he then saw, in the opposite angle of the building, a figure moving along the casement of the passage between Lucely's rooms and Mr. Gunston's study. Surprised at this, at once he had apprehended that part of the building, and saw the light very faintly through the shutter in the window of the study. The passage windows had no shutters, being old-fashioned stone mullions. He waited by the wall a few minutes, while the light again reappeared in the passage; and he saw a figure in a cloak, with a dark lantern in her color, he recognized at once as Lucely's, pass rapidly along; but before the figure had got half through the passage, the light was extinguished, and the servant could see no more. But to resume me, from his own observation of the cloak, that the man was Lucely, that he ceased to feel alarm or surprise, thinking, on reflection, that Lucely, sitting up late, had went to transact business before his departure, might have gone into the passage to get a book, or any book or paper which he might have left there. The dog again barking again, and seemingly anxious to get out of the court-yard which he was confined; but the servant gradually appeased him—went to bed, and composed himself to slept himself. When he woke, he hastened to take the coffee into Lucely's room, but Lucely was gone. Here there was another circumstance. It had been a question how the bureau had been opened, the key being still in Gunston's possession, and there being no sign of force. The lock was one of those rude, old-fashioned ones which are very easily picked, but to which a modern key does not readily fit. In the passage there was found a long nail crooked at the end; and that nail the superintendent of the police (who had been summoned) had the wit to apply to the lock of the bureau, and it unlocked and relocked it easily. It was clear that whoever had so opened the nail could not have used such an instrument for the first time, and must be a practiced pickeln. That one would suppose at first, might exonerate Lucely; but he was so clever a fellow at all mechanical contriving, so coupled with the place of finding, the nail made greatly against him; and still more so, when some nails precisely similar were found on the chimney-piece of an inner-room in his apartment, a room between that in which he had slept Gunston and his bed-chamber, and used by him both as study and workshop, the door, indeed, being often very long and narrow, with a Gothic ornamental head, were at once recognized by the superintendent on the search, and were found according to Lucely's directions, for a garden-bench, to be placed in Gunston's garden. Mr. Gunston having remarked, some days before, that he should like a seat there, and Lucely having undertaken to make one from an old garden-bench by Brigin. Still both to believe in Lucely's guilt, Gunston went to London with the superintendent, the valet, and the neighboring attorney. They had no difficulty in finding Lucely; he was at his old lodgings in Soho, and, after the commercial house in which the son was a clerk. On being told of Gunston's loss, he seemed at first unaffectedly surprised, evincing no fear. He was asked whether he had gone into the study after his return to Wilby. He replied, "No; why should I?" The valet exclaimed, "But I saw you!" Lucely said that he had grey cloak, with the red lining. "Why, there it is now—on that chair yonder. I'll swear it is the same." Lucely, on being re-taxed, seemed visibly, and grew extremely pale. A question was next put to him as to the nail. He was at once quite stupefied, muttering, "Good Heavens! the cloak—you mean to say you saw that cloak?" They searched his pockets—found in one some sovereigns, silver, and one bank-note for five pounds. The number on this bank-note corresponded with a number in Gunston's pocket-book. He was asked to say where he got that bank-note. "Where?" he repeated, looking round confused, "I am one of the notes stolen from me!" Lucely replied, fiercely, "You are a villain! How do you know?" Gunston replied, "I took my account of the numbers of my notes on leaving home, and made a memorandum in my pocket-book—see—" Lucely looked, and fell back as if shot. Gunston was about to rise in the room at the time, and he exclaimed, "Oh, William! you can't be guilty. You left the locked fellow in the world. There must be some mistake, gentlemen. Where did you get the notes, William?" Lucely made no answer, but seemed lost in thought or stupefaction. "I will go for your father, William"—Lucely then seemed to wake up. "My son! what! would you have me believe my son is a thief? Never—never!" he said, "Lucely, you can't be guilty. You know that I am the reason of the home at the time, and he got into a second-rate carriage, the porter even said to the driver, "Now, mind, you'll be cold." Furthermore, as to the purpose for which Lucely had visited town, the money-lender, Lucely's brother-in-law stated that Lucely's son had been extravagant, had contracted debts, and was even writing from the creditors in a menacing way, which William Lucely had stopped for a few days in the hope that his father, by the help of young man's employer had written kindly to Lucely several days before, lamenting the extravagances of his son, and that his debts were now discharged, he must lose the situation in which otherwise he might easily rise. In reference, for that he was quick and sharp; but that it was impossible not to feel indignant to the full him, he was also said so peculiarly. The trader added that he would forbear to discuss the young man's conduct to his father, as was on the receipt of that letter that Lucely had entered into communication with the money-lender, which he had come to town to seek, and to whose house he was actually going at the very hour of the robbery. Lucely's brother-in-law of the money-lender, if he had just stolen more money than he had any need to borrow.

"The man was mad," exclaimed Lucely, by the discovery in his possession of the £5 note, of which the Gunston had taken the number, was certainly having had to get over; still an ingenious lawyer might have suggested that Gunston's memory was a man confessedly so careless might have mistaken the number, etc. The lawyer could, with force enough, have urged to see Lucely himself in prison; but Lucely declined his help—because very expensive, and he would avoid any direct denial itself than have suspicion transferred to some innocent man; and that, as he could not be long detained, he can carpet bag. So you see, had he he was, there was something unnecessarily humorous in Lucely's non still. Poor Lucely! he would not even subpœna any of his old friends as to his general character. But even if he had, what could the Court do since he pleaded guilty? And now dismiss that subject, it begin to pain me extremely. You were to speak to me about some one of the same name when my story was concluded. Who is that?"

"I am so confused," faltered Lionel, still quivering with emotion, "that I can scarcely answer you—scarcely recollect myself. But—something you were describing this poor William Lucely, his talent for mimicry and skill. I could not help thinking that I had seen him." Lionel proceeded to speak of Gentleman Waife. "Can that be the man?"

Allen shook his head incredulously. He thought it so like a romantic youth to detect imaginary resemblances.

"No," said he, "my dear boy. My William Lucely could never become a strolling player in a village fair. Besides, I have reason to believe that Wily is well off; probably made money in the colony by some lucky hit; for years do you not see that he disappeared? Ten years ago? Well, not very long before that time—perhaps a year or two—I was in Paris. I am sure—this exercise rascal sent Mr. Gunston, the man who had transported him, £100! Gunston, you must know, Lionel, is rather ever bored and injured when he lost Wily, and to show a proper spirit of resentment, put some railway company. The company proved a bubble; all turned bankruptcy—Gunston the ruin man who could pay when others could not. Gunston was ruined—purse and character—fled to Calais; and there, for two years, was seen, when in great distress, he received from poor Wily a kind, affectionate, forgiving letter, and £100. I saw this from Gunston's own lips, to whom he told it, crying like a child; and I believe that he is dead by this time. At the time he must have been too well off to turn strolling player—much more, Lionel, to turn rope-dancer. Pooh! you dream, foolish, infamous, big-hearted Wily." burst out the Colonel. "I wish to Heaven he were innocent!"

"Sir," said Lionel, "rely upon it, that you who describe never robbed any one—'tis impossible.

"No—very possible!—human nature," said Allen Morley, "is very frail. Well, I left Mr. Gunston that £100. For out of the sum stolen, Gunston received back £95 in notes. Before the trial, all the missing notes, minus about that £100; and Wily therefore owed Gunston the money, but not, poor soul, knowing it. Gunston better. Pass on—quick—the subject is worse than the gout. Well, you have heard of the name of Lucely—possibly. There are many members of the old Dorsetshire family; but when and where did you hear it?"

"I will tell you; the man who holds the bill of sale. He went to my father's lodgings, and when he called that I had seen him at my mother's house—a chance acquaintance of hers—professed great regard for my father, great respect for Mr. Darrell—and then surprised me by asking if I knew where he heard Mr. Darrell spoke of Mr. Jasper Lucely."

"Jasper!" said the Colonel; "Jasper!—well, go on."

"When I answered 'No,' Mr. Poole (that is his name) said that he had a communication to my father—very bad business—I could do Mr. Darrell a great service if he would let me;" and then went on to say that Mr. Darrell had an antagonist gibberish about 'family exposures' and 'poverty making people desperate,' and 'being compromise matters;' and finally wound up by begging me, 'if I loved Mr. Darrell, and wished a guard his interests, and save him years of suffering, to persuade him to give Mr. Poole an interview.' I told him that I was then on the theater in the City, and so forth, and entreating me 'not to think of paying him till quite convenient; that he should not be in a hurry, that nobody should know of it; too happy to do me a good turn,' and so forth. I told my father all this away. Tell me, should I say any thing to Mr. Darrell about this or not?"

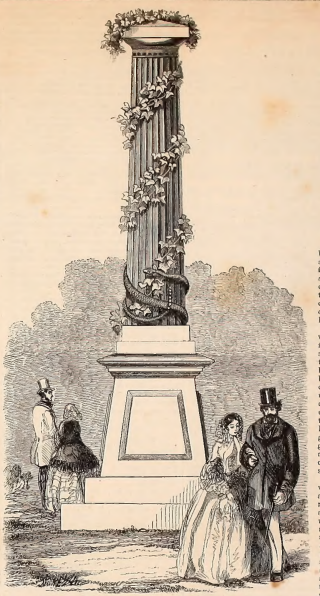
"Certainly not. I will have seen Mr. Poole myself. You have the money to pay him about now? Give it me, and I will pay him myself. I will call and settle the matter. Just ring the bell." (To the servant, entering) "Order my house round." (To Lionel) "Now you can go alone, turning to Lionel abruptly, laying one hand on his shoulder, with the other caressing his hand warmly, cordially, "Young man, 'tis Allan Morley,'! love you—I am interested in you—who would not be? I have gone through this story; put myself positively to pain—which is a last-which I have not felt for years. Love misery and money-lenders bring men to. Look me in the face! Do you feel now that I could have a motive for wishing you before doubted of? Have you done with such things forever?"

"Forever, so help me Heaven! The lesson has been cruel, but I do thank and bless you for it."

"I knew you would. Mark this! never trust your business with lovely-eyed and scarlet TERT! Stop. Have I loved a father's fault to a son. It was necessary—or even in his grey locks faults may be committed. Now, my son, I add this, if Charles Haughton—like you, boy—is ruined, is cruelly betrayed by wife, injured by women—if Charles Haughton, on entering life, could have seen in the mirror I have held to you, the consequences of pledging the unpro-ven to pay for to-day. Charles Haughton would have been spared much sorrow, even as you will be. Humbled by your own first error, be lenient to all his. Take up his cause—plead for him—it may be his last hope. Be his friend in full. Rare out the interval; imagine the worst of existence we thus but out and tear away. Let every error avoided any, "Thus the father runs the son;" in every honorable action or heroic self-sacrifice, say, "Thus the son pays a father's debt."

Lionel, clasping his hands together, raised his eyes streaming with tears, as if uttering such a vow to Heaven. The Colonel bowed his head in discreet with religious reverence, and glided from the room unheard.

MONUMENT TO COL. WM. WASHINGTON, AT CHARLESTON, S. C.



We engrave herewith the graceful monument which has lately been erected to the memory of Colonel William Washington and his wife, in the Magnolia Cemetery at Charleston, South Carolina. The monument was erected by the Washington Light Infantry, a corps to which Mrs. Washington confided the flag which her husband's partisan force bore at Eutaw and Cowpens. It stands near the centre of the cemetery.

The design is simple and appropriate, being a Grecian Doric column, elevated upon three steps and a pedestal; a vine of ivy, springing from the base of the column, entwines its shaft and falls gracefully over its capital, and a rattlesnake, coiled around column and ivy, embraces both within its folds. The Doric column, which by the Greeks was used in buildings dedicated to their gods and heroes, is aptly illustrative of heroic and manly virtue. The ivy symbol of conjugal fidelity in the wife clinging to and supported by her noble husband, whose chief ornament and crown of glory she is; and the rattlesnake entwined around both in the Southern country, vigilant and ready to protect their memory. The die of the pedestal, which is the frustrum of a pyramid, has upon its sides raised panels, bearing appropriate inscriptions. The proportions of the column are in accordance with those from the Temple of Theseus, at Athens. The entire monument is fourteen feet in height, of white Italian marble, and located upon a mound four feet high.

Colonel Washington's life and services are too well known to need to be recounted here. Though born a Virginian, he spent most of his life, won his glory, and found a grave in South Carolina. As Mr. Porcher Miles said, in the speech he made at the inauguration of the monument, "The name and reputation of Colonel Washington are indissolubly united with South Carolina. Upon her soil, when overrun by the enemy, in defense of her people, when almost in despair, he fought long and well. With her he triumphed. Within her borders, which, by choice, became his own loved country, he lived out his honorable and well-spent life, and in her bosom his bones repose. It is not unnatural, therefore, that we should take peculiar pride and pleasure in recurring to his exploits and dwelling upon his services, occupying, as they do, so conspicuous a place in our State history."

Professor J. H. Dickson ("pronounced" an ode on the occasion, from which we extract the following:

"Light lie the turf on all our sacred dead
Who toiled to save us from such foul disgrace;
Over their ashes softly let us tread,
And, on our fond records, familiar read,
Their names find ever a most cherished place:
Let every battle-field its tumulus have,
And o'er our nameless soldiery a storied grave.
Let us no longer blush when asked to show
The tomb where Greene lies mouldering below.
Let well-wrought urn or obelisk, pointing high,
Tell us where Davie, Marion, Sumter lie:
And more than all, and far above the rest,
And dear to every patriotic breast,
Let us redeem and consecrate forever
That holy spot on proud Virginia's river—
The Mecca of our nation's heart, its shrine
Supreme in our affections—not divine—
But only less than that—Mount Vernon's soil,
Secured and set apart with grateful toil:
The garden of our country, crowned, and filled
With all the glories of the rising morn;
With every beauty that best artists skilled
To plant, to paint, to sculpture, to adorn,
Can heap around, within, about the place,
Where dwelt and died the noblest of our race.

MONUMENT TO COLONEL WILLIAM WASHINGTON, CHARLESTON, S. C.

Soldiers!—whose pious care
Has raised, to decorate your native soil
With lasting radiance of the name you bear,
This monumental pile—
Remember that you hold, in sacred trust,
From her whose heart lies buried with his dust
(A generous confidence, most worthily placed),
His glorious banner, faded, pierced, and worn—
A venerable relic, proudly borne:
Such guardianship the noblest knights had graced!
Long in your faithful keeping may it wave
In honor of the true, the free, the brave!
Hand here your lofty mission—thus impressed,
Filling with ardor every youthful breast:
To fix with fond record each fading trace
Of valorous deeds, and point the hallowed place.
Haste ye to allot them now, ere cold delay,
Or Time's dim finger smooth each line away:
Stamp them in stone and iron—thus to bolt
Until our nation's very life is past.
Fulfill your task—as you have nobly wrought;
Mark every field, mountain, or wood, or plain
Where Freedom's battles—ever on wes—were fought;
No drop of patriot blood was shed in vain.
Give thus a great example to our age,
And make our wide domain one bright historic page."

THE OUTRAGE ON THE "TROPIC BIRD."

THE American ship Tropic Bird, Captain C. Faulkes, bound from Port au Prince, Hayti, to Philadelphia, with a cargo of coffee and logwood, was, when about six miles from Inagua, one of the Bahama Isles, forcibly brought to and boarded by the British gun-boat Jasper. The various circumstances attending this incident constitute it one of the most wanton of the recent British outrages. These circumstances, which are more easily understood by sailors than by landsmen, are thus briefly stated by Captain Faulkes:

"The Jasper, on nearing the Tropic Bird, fired a gun, when I run up my colors and kept on my course; she then finding that we were passing her, fired a shot across our stern, and while I was in stays fired another. I then hove to, and an officer from the Jasper came on board. I asked him by what right he stopped an American ship on the high seas? He said that they had been apprized of several vessels being expected with slaves, and that they took us for one. He then asked me to see my papers, to which demand, after remonstrating, I submitted. He then turned toward his boat, and I ordered the ship to fill away; at that order the officer told me that I should be fired into if I proceeded before he left the ship, which threat I disregarded. At the time the Jasper fired the two shotted guns she was not more than four hundred yards distant, and there being on board eighteen passengers in all, eleven of whom were women and children, they could be plainly seen without a glass."

Now to a sailor there are certain signs about a vessel which very plainly proclaim not only her nationality, but also, to a certain extent, her business. A slaver is invariably very sharp-built, with long, rakish masts, carrying a cloud of canvas. To enable her to sail well, care is taken not to load her too deeply, and to trim her exactly. Such a vessel could scarcely be mistaken, if met on the high seas. The Tropic Bird was deeply laden, having on board a full cargo of coffee and logwood; instead of going along under a press of canvas, she was, all the time the Jasper saw her, beating lazily along shore under easy sail: unlike a suspicious craft, whose commander would have shown his appreciation of danger by frequent alterations of his course, the Tropic Bird stood on her course, paying no heed to the presence of John Bull, rapidly as the latter came up; any one but a lubber or a malicious person would have recognized the ship's business ere she hoisted her colors. But the captain of the Jasper was so far from satisfied, when within four hundred yards of his ship, although then able to see standing on her decks white women and children — who would assuredly be had no place in a slaver — that he saw fit to fire a shotted gun across her stern; and then, another last a ship going under way and shotted, when within a few hundred yards, escape a steamer, fired another shot across her bows as she came about. His excuse for this outrageous conduct was that he took the Tropic Bird for a slaver — a statement which must have made him seem sublimely ass. We venture to suggest that it would pay the British Lords of the Admiralty to place more wide-awake men in command of the vessels they send out to overhaul slavers. Such officers as the captain of the Jasper will soon make the British navy a laughing-stock to the seamen of other nations.

OUTRAGE ON THE "TROPIC BIRD" BY THE BRITISH GUN-BOAT "JASPER."

I HAVE MANY SHIPS AT SEA.

I HAVE many ships at sea —
Ships that sail when winds were fair —
When those ships come home to me,
Laden with a cargo rare,
If you wait,
You shall have one-half their freight.

I have one — a gallant bark —
Freighted with a home and love;
Many a time, at midnight dark,
Have I prayed to Heaven above,
If I wait,
That this ship comes not too late.

I have one — a shattered wreck —
Tossing on a troubled sea;
Wife and children walk her deck;
She will not come home to me
But I'll wait —
God is merciful and great.

I have one, with treasure rare,
This one will I give to thee,
If thou wilt but add thy prayer,
That the rest come home to me.
Then I'll wait —
Caring not for worldly freight.

WHO WAS THE AUTHOR OF THE CHRISTIAN'S CODE OF 1787?

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly.

IN an obituary notice of the Hon. Joseph Dane, published in your Weekly of the 15th ultimo, you observe, "Mr. Dane was reputed to be the Nathan Dane, of Beverly, Massachusetts, whose name is so honorably associated with the great charter of Free Soil, the Ordinance of 1787." The great and deservedly popular circulation of your valuable Weekly induces me to ask, Was Joseph Nathan Dane its author? In looking over those great speeches on Free Soil (1849), Mr. Daniel Webster ventured the assertion, without offering the least shadow of proof, that he was the author, and claimed him with Rufus King, and others, for his philanthropy. Mr. Benton, in reply, totally denied the claim on his own merits, and read from the journal of the House to disprove Mr. W.'s assertion, this: "On motion of Th. Jefferson, seconded by Mr. Paterson, of Vermont (with the Ayes and Nays on it), that this identical bill was the labor of Mr. Jefferson many years before Mr. Dane had the honor of a seat in Congress." I beg your attention to these Speeches, and respectfully ask of you to correct a fact in history, and to tell us who was its real author. I am aware that the friends of Mr. Dane claim it for him, as also does he himself; so also does he admit that a great portion of it was taken from Mr. Jefferson's. He further denies the authorship in Fact of the Declaration of Independence to Mr. Jefferson; and on the same parity of reasoning should he deny the author ship this claim for the Ordinance of '87. Mr. Dane was a violent partisan of the old Federal school, and a member of the Hartford Convention; and consequently, the reasons are as plain as blackberries why he would so disparagingly of Mr. Jefferson. Posterity, however, awards to Mr. Jefferson the highest attributes of a statesman and profound reasoner, although Mr. Dane may have him no lawyer, his review of Marshall's opinions on the case of Anthony vs. Kentucky, Mr. Cohen vs. State of Virginia, with the forgery of English dates, show him to be no "well posted up" in matters of Constitutional Law that even the respectable name of Nathan Dane can not alter. As to Mr. "Blackstone's opinion," it is true; but his writings show him well versed in the more elevated study of "Coke Littleton" than most lawyers of his day. Shall we say the ways claimed for himself the invention of the quadrant, which he stole from the Negro Benjamin?

Now, if it is possible through the diversity of opinions prevalent among us to ascertain who is credited to the merit of originating the Ordinance of 1787, I beg of you to set us straight. If it is not in your power to do so, I will not be gratified by a wait ing for the answer to the query, Who was Nathan Dane, and Dixon's ice."

SAVANNAH, May, 1858.

Reply.—We think the question was settled by the publication, by Mr. Charles King, of New York, of an autograph letter of Mr. Dane's to his father, the Hon. Rufus King, written a few days after the passage of the Ordinance. In that letter Mr. Dane says: "When I drew the Ordinance (which passed, a few words excepted, as I originally framed it), I had no idea the States would agree to the sixth article, prohibiting slavery, as only Massachusetts, of the Eastern States, was present, and therefore omitted it in the draft; but, finding the House favorably disposed on the subject, after we had completed the other parts, I moved the article, which was agreed to without opposition."—See Curtis's History of the Constitution of the United States.

Miscellany.

A WRITER on British and German University life thus describes the method of instruction used by that famous institution, so widely read to learning called the University Couch.

The teaching of the "couch" being intended only to "get his man through" the examinations, he takes the shortest and easiest cuts to knowledge. He is very fond of memorizing aides-mémoire, classes. Present, for instance, a four-in-hand, Dullon, Thickbed, Block, and Stone, fat youths coaching for "greats."

"Now then, Dullon," begins the Rev. Billy Driver, the well-known fast coach; "give me the Seven Churches."

Dullon looks down, wags his head slowly, and whistles low, as consulting himself.

"Confound you, Dullon, you'll be sure to go a mucker. Now, Block, you ought to know them."

Block begins rapidly, "Ttessaly, Salamis, Ephesus —"

"Oh! oh! oh!" shrieks Driver, frantically. "Stone, you try."

Stone can only remember Philadelphia.

"Well, that's right for one; but now haven't I told you all, over and over again, that the Seven Churches are in Asia Minor? Don't you remember the cat? Oh! I wish she would scratch all your faces well, just to remember them. Now then, Pitt Puss; what's the P, Thickbed?"

"Philippi," says he at once, thinking rapidly after than corrected.

"No! no! no! Philippi ain't in Asia. Block? Philadelphia!"

"Of course. Now then, the E for Ephesus; I, for Laodicea; T for Thyatira; the other T for Pergamus. Dullon, what about Smyrna, the initial for?"

This puzzler goes round to no purpose, the boys in vain trying to remember a name beginning with U. At last Block suggests Ennion, which raises a great laugh. "Smyrna Block! you ass!"

"For my part," says Thickbed, "I never saw much work with a Universal Joint."

"O Lord! Yes, there's Ulysses and Unicorn," says Stone, with a look of self-congratulation.

"Unicorn, Greek!" bellows Mr. Driver. "Sleighbell! Now, boys, what's the U? Come, sharp!"

"Oh! I got it!" sees little Block. "Unicorn! It means united—the United Churches of Asia Minor—the whole bilding of them. Ain't that it?"

"Oh, sweet shade of Aristotle! Is there anything else?"

"Ha! ha! ha!" all round at Block.

"No, boys; 'tis not yet in to make up the monument."

—It is an English device who relates the following quaint incident. There is much less theology in many a class-room than in Poor Biddy's Dream.

Mrs. Rural was a rigid habit of attending the schools of Romanists, Catholics as well as Protestants, and obtained information where I would not have been received. So conversation was frequently out of the corner of her reticule. No other book did she read than one—the Bible. Sometimes she had on one occasion been reading with a poor old woman, a Romanist. Shortly before her death the old woman told her that she had had a very beautiful dream: Since, she was in a lovely church, that the chapel and altar were richly decked, and had a great altar, all shining with gold and jewels, and sorrow a candle was there on it, but a light far beyond that sun. And there were people in white robes, playing upon geodien harps, and singing psalms, that made her cry with joy. And then, as she looked, there was a throne in a chair, and the blessed Saviour was seated on it—not cold, as she had seen Him on the cross, but warm, and with thorns, as she seen him on the big cross in the chapel. So I but glorious, and sweet, and beautiful. And He spoke to her, and called her plain, "Come to me! Come to me!" And on she walked up to the throne, and He took her hand, and he said, roughly, "You won't pass here till I set you." And up came the Holy Virgin; and she said, mildly, "I'm sorry for you, but you won't get it for it." And up came a blessed angel; and he said, softly, "Come with me, and I'll set you right, ing, "I'm sorry for you, poor woman, but you're not fit to pass, and I can't help you." And her heart went to the top of her throat. But the Lord Himself came down from the throne. "With his own hands He set me right, and He said, "Come in here, poor sinner." And then all the harpers to their harping, and all the singers to the singing—and she woke.

In old time Christian or baptismal names had each a distinct meaning; and when parents named their children, they, in a measure, gave them characters as the characters which those represented in the popular estimation.

Ladies' Names.

Mary, Maria, Marie (French), signify exalted. According to the Mary mentioned in the Bible, Mary Magdalene, Mary Stuart, Mary Queen of Scots, Martha, interpreted, is bitterness; Isabel signifies beauty; Adela and Adelaide, nobility; Cecilia, blind; truth; Eleanor, all fruitful; Ellen—originally, the Greek Helen—signifies allaring, though, according to the Greek authors, it meant one who pities. The interpretation of Caroline is regal; that of Charlotte, is a queen; Elizabeth and Eliza signify true; Clara, bright, or clear-eyed; Agnes, chaste; Amanda, amiable; Laura, laurel; Edith, joyous; Olivia, peace; Phœbe—light of life; Grace, favor; Sarah, or Sally, a princess; Sophia, wisdom; Rosa, a rose; Rosalie, rose of beauty; Hannah; Pauline, little one; Margaret, a pearl; Rebecca, pliuy; Hannah, Anne, Ann, and Nancy, all of which are of the same original name, interpreted, mean grace or kind. Jane signifies dignity; Ella, the morning star; Lucy, brightness of aspect; Louisa, or Louise, one who protects; Emma, tender; Catherine, pure; Frances, or Fanny, frank or free; Lydia, sweet; Minerva, chaste.

—Hear me some tender lines, suggested by a Poet's Wardrobe:

The human heart is like a shirt
Affection puts in tuks of trial,
Then sends it home with love to bind
By hardest knocks of tough denial.

Sprinkled with pattern, starch'd with hope,
It weekly hums the love's heat,
While pins the good dame, queen of soap,
That pains us most — can't be done.

With agate and stains no longer dark,
All lustrous, pure, and neatly mended:
Yet no more now—the laundry mark
Is left for us to fill the line.

—The late Mr. Justice Meale was a wit; and every body knows that is the best. Here are some of the stories related of him:

Legal Wit

"My——strike me dead, my lord, if I did it!" he exclaims a convicted prisoner, on the announcement of the verdict. For a marked space the Judge sits in the attitude of expectation, jury and spectators wondering what next. At last he breaks the silence: "A fellow-creature has not got to interpose, the sentence of this court is," etc.

A city policeman states that he is in the "knee" of driving." Counsel: "Then mean the gentry" inquires the Judge.

"Out with it! the ladies don't mind it, and you needn't be afraid of me," was his exhortation to a hesitating witness, in a case from which it might have been expected that the softer sex would long since have retired, but which they were manifestly sitting out, while the wickedness of their male companions was laid bare.

His reason for drinking beer—assigned while at the bar to a learned and professional brethren, who had proposed a glass of sherry as an accompaniment to the lunch they were taking, while waiting for the return of the jury on which they were both engaged—was, that he found it the only way to bring his mind down to the level of the judges.

Random Readings

from the lost authors.

Dr. Franklin says, Fish is as cruel a beggar as want, and a great deal more saucy. When you have bought one fine thing you must buy ten more, that your appearance may be all of a piece; but it's easier to suppress the first desire than to satisfy all that follow it.

Plutarch speaks of the long white beard of an old Lacedæmon, who, being asked why he let it grow to such a length, replied: "It is, that when my white beard continually before my eyes, I may do nothing unworthy of its whiteness."

Socrates, when asked why a cat, even if also be friendly, never approaches the by a direct course, but more close to the wall, replied: "That she may round thy stupidities, and rubbing up against thy prejudices, it reaches thee gently, and then, perhaps, scratches."

An educated man, says Carlyle, stands, as it were, in the middle of a boundless ocean of air and spirit, filled with all the weapons and engines which man's skill has been able to devise from the earliest time; and he works, accordingly, with a strength borrowed from all past ages. How different is his position who stands outside of this domain of thought, and feels that its gates must be stormed, or remain forever shut against him! His means are scanty at the moment and direct. He uses work done is no measure of his strength. A desert behind his stormy march to conquest or destruction; and he dwarf will hew them down with the pickaxe; and he must be a Titan that hurls them abroad with his arms.

Silence comes very leisurely, and people soon overtakes her.

Bacon says, beautifully, "He that rolls in darkness brooks God's luck." How fine that is!

Affections, like the conscience, are rather to be let than driven; it is to be feared, they that worry where they do not love will love where they do not worry.

What is earthly happiness? That phantom of which we hear so much and see so little; whose promises are constantly given and constantly broken, but as constantly believed; that cheats us in the morning and flies from us before noon, and with the blossom instead of the fruit.—Collins.

You may rise early, go to bed late, study hard, write much, and read the marrow of the last authors, and yet be as meagre in regard of true and solid learning as Harsch's lean kine after they had eaten the fat ones.—Sir Step Sanderson.

Hardness, says Sydney Smith, is a want of mimic structure, and feelings of others. It does not proceed from malignity or a carelessness of inflicting pain, but from the entire non-perception of those little things by which pleasure is conferred or pain excited. A hard person thinks he has done enough if he does not speak ill of your relations, your children, or your country; and then, with the grossest ingratitude and vulgarity, expects from a true gentleman to your individual state and position, gulpays over a thousand fine feelings, and wounds you every day the mark of his passage on your heart.

Let a man but speak forth with genuine earnestness the thought, the conviction, the actual condition of his own heart, and other men—so strangely are we all knit together by the tie of sympathy—must and will give heed to him. In culture, in extent of view, we may stand above the speaker or below him; but in either case his words, if they are earnest and sincere, will find some response within us; for, in spite of all central varieties in outward rank or inward, as face answers to face, so does the heart answer to its own likeness.

Ladies who use an excess of perfume must think men like seals—most insalubrie at the nose.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

LOOT—A dog courtesy quo-mentioned at a serpent on a stick: "Ah, you're the serpent that tempted Eve and killed him. The owner coming out, sweet existence by that his dog was killed, and asked the serpent why he could not as well have struck at him with the blunt end of the bullock. "Be I would say, sir," he did not run at me with his tail."

TRENTON ADVENTURE.—A gentleman was one day arranging music for a young lady to whom he was paying his addresses. "Now, Miss D.," said he, "what time do you prefer?" "Oh," she replied, carelessly, "any time will do; but the afternoon is the best."

During the first settlement of the town of Crawford, ville, Georgia, the native place of Alexander H. Stephens, a leading member of the Legislature from Columbus, sometimes passed an unfortunate and very negative treat. ment of a certain bill, which was finally killed by the treatment of a motion to table. Before the bill was killed, however, the Honorable Board of Commissioners a joggler who had a bill to pass before them. When asked how he knew him to be a conjurer, he replied, "Why, he's got a certificate to tell the fortune by cards."

The distinction between liking and loving was well made by a little girl, six years old. She was eating something at dinner, which she seemed to relish very much.

"Do you love it?" asked her aunt.

"No," said she, with a look of disgust; "I like it. I loved it, I should die it."

Here is an epitaph from a tombstone in Dunlap's Creek burying-ground, Fayette County, Pennsylvania:

JOHN MURRAY,
Aged 1794.

My day is done, my glass is run,
My neighbors it have seen;
This stone was got to save the spot,
I'm more should go between.

An entire Chinese regiment has been sentenced to wear women's clothes for five years for abandoning an untenable fort during the recent attack upon Canton by the French and English forces.

A Boston paper, published almost one hundred years ago, contains the following advertisement:

"Brought from Havana, a box of CIGITOS, a very nice small Penger, and of about five inches in length, between the Pipe. Whoever has delivered the Penger to the Pipe, can have the same by paying charges."

A man in Norwich, Connecticut, who not long ago lost a beloved wife, was recently detected digging away with considerable vigor in a grave. On being questioning friends rushed to him in an agony of conviction that he was about to commit suicide on the coffin. They finally discovered, by questioning him, that he was only desirous of securing the gold ring of a new and beautiful wife which had been interred with the corpse!

A youth who had recently entered the matrimonial yoke had not sufficient courage to "pop the question." On returning late one night to the domicile of his mother-under the old man replied, quite passionately.

"Why you goose, how do you suppose I managed when I got married?"

"Oh, ma," said the promising lover, "you married mother, but I've got to marry a strange girl!"

An old Scotch tailor happened to have a helpmate of a very peevish and quarrelsome disposition.

"I'm gaun to die, Andrew," said the wife.

"Ay ye'll be better the lang as weel as if he had been tryng the tongues o' you."

"Ye'll be sorry for me, Andrew, when I'm telling you that I'm gaun to the land o' rest, where I'll be free to say hame here among the riff-raff o' Lintlugow, but tak' tent to Whitsunday, and say that I was a kind wife and mother."

Andrew, esteeming a promise made to a person on the verge of time as sacred, and not wishing to put himself to the expense which, besides the mourning, would, even giving any answer, but let on a different conversation.

"Oh yes, I mind it weel."

"But, Andrew, what I'm saying: tak' me to Whitbern, and I'll rise and trouble ye nae mair a' day. Do ye hear me, Andrew?"

"Oh yes, I hear ye weel. Is that a' ye have ado troubling ye yet?"

"Ony mair? I'm gaun thegither; but the maist pain to me is, that ye'll buy my dust here."

"Oh weel, Janet, dinna fash yersel' about that simple circumstance."

"Ay, but I'll no rest in peace ye mean tak' me to White born; I'll trouble ye if ye dinna, and ye nay depend on't."

"Weel, weel, then, if ye mean be buried at Whitbern I canna help it, but we'll try if Lintlugow will have ye."

A lady asked a veteran which rifle carried the maximum distance? The old chap answered, "The Minnie, man."

An old toper was overheard, the other day, advising a young man to be temperate in his habits. "Now, my boy you'll have nowcherby to pull off your boots when you come home drunk."

The power of strong drink was forcibly illustrated at one of the Philadelphia hotels the other day. It seems that a certain old sucker had been building a "lech ing" by the carpenter, and when the bill was presented for ferely at the bar, "on account," as the work went on from day to day, the astonished toper said:

"What, —— you here again? Why, you have drank back shed at least a hundred dollars' worth."

The customer wasn't taken aback for a moment, but coolly remarked that he had only drank a shilling.

"Well, look a here, old fellow, give us the pole, will ye?"

And the pole was swallowed.

The following dialogue took place between Coroner Scallingwag and a widow who "would talk back" to him:

"Now, Mrs. Grogan, you say that the prisoner is a thief?"

"Yes, Sir. 'Cause why—she confessed she was."

"And you also swear she worked for you after this confession?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Then are we to understand that you employ dishonest people to work for you, even after their ramskilled confession to you?"

"Is it coorse how should I get assistance from a lawyer?"

What are another's faults to me:
I've faults a vultures like
To peck at every law I see,
And yet they're mine alike.

It is enough for me to know
I've fallen of Adam's kind
And on my heart the cure bestow,
And let my friends find.

In the early part of the American War Franklin went to Paris, in hopes of obtaining pecuniary resources from France. For some time he was unsuccessful, and being present at a large party, a gentleman observed to him, "It must be a source of great pain to America how difficult it is to get a small sum from France."

"It must be a source of much greater pain to France," replied the doctor, dryly; "but the spectators do not join in it."

Such the other night of a natural friend whose love of beer had accelerated his death, Tilmarsh said, "Ah dear, he was a man; but, alas! for half-and-half, we shall never look upon his like again."

Dr. Hall, in his advice to communitive patients, says: "If you want to get well, go in for beef and out-door air."

We shall be glad to hear how a man is to get "out-door air" by "going in."

Trip lightly over sorrow;
Through day may be dark,
The sun may shine to-morrow,
And cheer up the lark.

Fair Hope has not departed,
Though storms may lower still;
Then never be down-hearted,
But hope for joy instead.

A man named Poem, residing near Cincinnati, was called upon by the sheriff and requested to make his property liable, when he denied that he owned any money laid up or any credits. Two nights after he was burned to death in his house, and robbed of twenty-five hundred dollars in gold and silver. The sheriff is the knowledge of the assessor, as put the amount on his property, so that he did not lose not only lost it, but will have the tax assessed upon it to pay besides.

A Yorkshireman, on a railway platform, had Baron Macaulay pointed out to his notice; and, upon its being explained to him that the Baron was an author, who was formerly known as "Tom Macaulay," he exclaimed with astonishment, "What's Measter Macaulay, the butcher, it is now? Noa! Noa! Lawks! thought they 'killed' and neely talk, and ow'st at sleeve, yo no; but that clap'd quite a bit, and he's a good deeal to answer for, I should ne'er ha'en him for an owther!" Stares at him quite bewildered, until the train put a slight.

An Irishman was about to marry a Southern girl for his property. "Will you take this woman to be your wedded wife?" said the minister. "Yes, your reverence, and she ought to, and she will."

Years ago there lived in Worcester County, Massachusetts, an old fellow, apparently crazy, though still almost ready with a joke, a sort of a traveling genius. One day he was going his rounds one day, bedecked with many-colored greens and flowers, when he was accosted by a Mr. Brown with, "Hollos, Grimes, what stirillery do you belong to?" "Belong to?" "The stirillery of Heaven, and there isn't a Brown on the roll!"

A blind man is a poor man,
And blind a poor man is:
For the former sorts no more,
And the latter no man sees.

SONG OF THE BELL.

When mirth and joy are on the wing—I ring.
To call the folks to church in time—I chime.
When from the body parts the soul—I toll.

A man who lighted his cigar with a bullet and had a headache the next day, said he had a singing in his head, and thought it must be the ballad.

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, June 14, 1858.

The foreign trade of the port for the past week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week of last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending June 13, 1858	$2,020,581	$1,318,152
Corresponding week, 1857	4,005,175	938,140
Decrease	$1,315,159
Increase		$380,258

The following table shows the movement for the year up to date:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending June 13, 1858	$2,020,581	$1,318,152
From Jan. 1 to June 5	82,180,851	54,750,619
Total for the year	84,201,431	56,068,857
To same time last year	108,304,031	54,750,619
Decline this year	$24,102,599	6,501,195

In examining the export table, care must be taken to make due allowance for the low rates of freight now and a half. As however, large parcels of specie have gone South during the week, it is likely that the total for the present this evening will show a falling off.

There is no change to report in the rates for money. Exchange is dull at somewhat lower rates.

The course of the Stock Market throughout the week has been irregular. From Monday to Thursday there was a regular decline, amounting on the average to two or a point. But several large holders having been induced to sell, the market rallied, and closed on Saturday at ⅜ @ 3 per cent better than the lowest sales. The following table shows the fluctuations:

	Monday.	Saturday.
New York Central	83@87½	86@87½
New York and Erie	13@14½	14@14½
Reading	43@47½	45@47½
Rock Island	57@60	58@60
Michigan Southern	31½@36½	32@32½
Preferred	45@50	45@50
Illinois Central	85@88	85@88
Panama	107@108	107@108
Pacific Mail	113@120	114@120
Galena	84@85	84@85
Chicago	84@85	84@85
Milwaukee	50@55	50@55
Virginia 6's	91@94@97	94@97
Missouri 6's	70@74@77	74@77
Cumberland Coal Grant	31½@36@40	36@40
Toledo	34@36	34@36
Milwaukee and Mississippi	20@25	20@25
La Crosse	43@46	43@46
Delaware and Hudson	101@101½	101@101½

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, June 14, 1858.

The Wholesale Produce Markets have been for the most part well supplied with Flour. The Canal Boats, each of which commodities have been in good request at, however, somewhat irregular prices. Corn has also been sought after at drooping rates. Only one small lot of Wheat has been offered, which commanded full quotations. Rye is nominal at 80 cents per bushel for Western. It was a very fine lot. It was sold to this market, by sample, at the rate of $1 60 per bushel, or 80 per bushel. Last year the first lot of New Wheat was received and sold here, during the first week in June, and 160 bushels fair quality White Georgia. Later in the week, on Saturday, a lot of New Corn was received yesterday, from the Flath Mills, St. Louis, was sold at $0 90 per bushel. It was the first lot of New Corn received from the West this season. Cotton has been very quiet all the week, and prices have gradually declined to meet with a fair inquiry. Beef was in good request at full prices. But Pork was dull, nominal and depressed. Coffee was moderately sold at, while Teas and Sugars attracted considerable attention at unchanged quotations. Hay was freely offered and purchased at unchanged figures. Hemp and Grass seeds were inactive. Hops and Rice opened with a good inquiry, but closed unsettled. Hides and Leather were in active request, the latter at somewhat higher prices. Naval Stores were quoted at about the same rates as last week. Tobacco was salable, at full rates. Stocks were heavy. The New City will soon supply. Many have been purchasing it in the Street, thereby lessening the demand for Old West in the sea-board Markets. ....The retail trade in Dry Goods is quite active, although the movements are generally confined to parties. Sales are very firm. Cottons are less so, while Woolens and Linens are depressed. The imports of Foreign Dry Goods amounted to $407,358 against $686,384 the corresponding week in 1857. The imports since the 1st of January have been $20,117,469 against $32,032,870, same time in 1857. The movements in the Cotton Goods trade were moderate, and unproductive of any remarkable alterations.....We append a revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

Sedimentary Rock, per bbl.	$2 75	$4 10
Superfine to fancy Western do.	3 75	4 10
Fancy to extra Genesee, per barrel	4 15	4 50
Fancy to extra Genesee, per barrel	4 15	4 50
Super to Extra Southern, per barrel	4 15	5 50
Mixed to Extra Southern, per barrel	4 15	7 50
Fancy to extra Canada, per barrel	4 15	5 50
Wheat, Red Western, per bushel	1 30	1 40
White, Wheat, per bushel	1 30	1 35
Rye, per bushel	80	80
Corn, per bushel	65	70
Oats, per bushel	40	45
Barley, per bushel	60	65
Beans, Oats, per bushel	1 00	1 00
State Oats, per bushel	40	45
Southern Oats, per bushel	40	45
Southern Oats, per bushel	34	40
Mess Beef, per barrel	10 00	11 00
Mess Pork, per barrel	16 75	17 00
Prime Mess Beef, per barrel	8 00	8 50
Prime Mess Beef, per barrel	10 00	12 00
Prime Mess Pork, per barrel	13 00	13 00
Cut Meats, per pound	6 @ 8	8 @ 8
Lard, per pound	8	8
State Butter, per pound	12	22
Ohio Butter, per pound	12	20
Cheese, per pound	7	8
Lard, per pound	3 00	3 00
Dry Cod, per pound	3	3
Dry Cod, per pound	91 00	111
Cuba Molasses, per gallon	24 @ 28	24 @ 28
Cuba Molasses, per gallon	25	25
Cuba Molasses, per gallon	25	25
Cuba Molasses, per gallon	27	27
Cuba Molasses, per gallon	27	27
Domestic Whiskey, per gallon	26	26
Domestic Whiskey, per gallon	25	25
Hops, Crop of 1857, per pound	4 @ 6	7
Crude Turpentine, per barrel	2 50	3
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon	44	44
Common Rosin, per barrel	1 50	1 62½
American Cheese Wool, per pound	28	48
Pulled Wool	15	45
Kentucky Tobacco	4 @ 6	13
Ohio Tobacco	4 @ 6	13
Tobacco, Leaf, per pound	6 @ 10	14
Tallow, per pound	8 @ 10	10
Coal, per ton	4 50	5 00
Prime Sucrose Ayres Hides, per pound	15 @ 16
Rio Grande Cowhides, per pound	15 @ 16
Oak tanned Sole Leather per pound	34	34

Freights opened heavily, but subsequently improved a shade. For Liverpool—Cotton, 7-32d. @ 1d. per pound; Beef, 5s. 6d. @ 7s. 6d. per barrel; Pork, 5s. @ 7s. 6d. per barrel; Rosin, 3s. 9d. @ 4s. per barrel; Beef, 3s. 6d. @ 4s. per barrel, and Heavy Goods, 30s. @ 40s. per ton. For other ports proportionate rates. The total amount of tonnage taken up during the week is 20,000 tons.

There is less demand for seamen. The prevailing rates of wages is as follows:

	Wages	Advances.
To Liverpool	per month $18	$18
To London	18	18
To Glasgow	18	18
To Bristol or Cardiff	18	18
To Mediterranean	18	18
To Australia	18	18
To West Indies	18	18
To Rio Janeiro and California	18	18
To New Orleans	16	16@16
Coastwise	16	16

The Live Stock Markets last Wednesday exhibited more firmness for Beeves, owing to the limited supply. The demand, however, was not brisk .....No improvement occurred in the trade in Milch Cows. Calves were plenty and heavy. Sheep were more freely offered than they were needed, and prices continued ..... Swine were in stock request at easier rates. The receipts reported at the Abattoir during the week and the two weeks compares as follows:

	Week ending	Week ending
	June 9.	June 16.
Beeves	3,574	3,403
Milch Cows	100	100
Veal Calves	197	1,691
Sheep and Lambs	6,618	6,643
Swine	3,199	3,455

Of the foregoing the following were supply of Beeves last Wednesday there were received from

Illinois	139 Kentucky 119
Ohio	634 New Jersey 42
Indiana	1,000 Pennsylvania 1,000
New York	461

The following is according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday and on Monday:

	Wednesday.	Monday.
Prime to premium Beeves, per pound	8 @ 7½	8 @ 10
Common to Good Cows, per head	30 00	40 00
Veal Calves, per pound	5 @ 6	6 @ 7
Fat Sheep, per head	2 00	3 00
Lambs	3 00	4 00
Live Swine, per pound	5 @ 6	6 @ 6½
Dressed "	6 @ 7	6 @ 7
Dressing Pigs, each	1 00	1 00

The Country Produce Markets were pretty active during the week. With stocks on hand of moderate size, the tables have arrived more freely, and have declined. The leading receipts have been in fair demand. Receipts from the neighborhood of Burlington, N. J., have supplied those from the South. Cauliflowers are coming in from Long Island. Strawberries from New Jersey, and Gooseberries from Connecticut are decidedly more abundant, and are lower, with a good inquiry for them. Currants have appeared in small quantities, and sold at high rates. Ice more freely offered, and prices favor buyers. Eggs have been in request at full rates. Poultry has been in fair supply, and has ruled at last quotations.

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT BY PRODUCERS AT WASHINGTON MARKET.

Apples, per barrel	$2 50	@ 3 00
Apples, dried, per pound	5	@ 6
Peaches, per bushel	75	@ 1 00
Plums, dried, per pound	12	@ 12
Cherries, per pound	10	@ 12
Strawberries, new, per quart box	10	@ 25
Gooseberries, per quart	6	@ 8
Currants, per bushel	2 00	@ 2 25
Cherries, per pound	10	@ 12
Lemons, per quart	12	@ 12
Beans, per bushel	1 10	@ 1 75
Beans, Lima, per bushel	1 50	@ 1 50
" new, per barrel	3 00	@ 4 00
Potatoes, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 00
Turnips, new, per 100 bunches	3 00	@ 5 00
Onions, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 00
Cabbages, new, per 100	3 00	@ 6 00
Asparagus, per dozen bunches	1 00	@ 1 00
Asparagus, per dozen bunches	1 75	@ 1 75
Cauliflowers, per dozen	1 00	@ 1 00
Turnips, per 100 bunches	3 00	@ 5 00
Radishes, per 100 bunches	50	@ 50
Radishes, per 100 bunches	50	@ 50
Spinach, per barrel	25	@ 50
Green Peas, per barrel	1 00	@ 2 00
Eggs, per dozen	10	@ 14
Chickens, per pair	50	@ 75
Fowls, per pair	75	@ 1 00
Ducks, per pair	75	@ 1 00
Turkeys, per pound	12	@ 16
Geese, per pound	12	@ 16
Woodcock, per dozen	2 00	@ 3 00

ADVERTISEMENTS,

GREAT SUMMER BOOK

Just out

THE LECTURES

OF

LOLA MONTEZ,

Including her Autobiography, Lectures and Correspondence.

A handsome 12mo volume, elegantly bound in muslin, with a superb steel portrait by Rogers. Price $1.

CONTENTS: Autobiography, Part I.: Autobiography, Part II.: Lola Montez in Bavaria: Gallantry: Heroic Women of History: Comic Aspect of Love; Wits and Women of Paris: Extravagance.

These lectures abound in the most spicy anecdotes and piquant observations, while they show an extensive and peculiar knowledge and amount of candid reflection and research which are surprising. The author has had the most singular career among those beloved representatives of the fair sex, who have gained a world-wide notoriety, and she has improved the opportunity by giving to the public, in these lectures, the results of her observations and experience. They may be compressed into the smallest space, without breaking or injuring them, and when unrolled, may be easily transported in any carpet-bag or valise. They are not to be folded as neat and compact, fall to the drapery in a graceful manner, and are recommended by all who have their wasted shape and beauty being every way RESTORED BY THEIR USE. Ladies who value health and comfort, they are peculiarly adapted for little Misses' Skirts and, Boys' Trousers. Sold by all dealers in dry goods. Sent to strictly PROMENADE and TRAVELING SKIRTS in use. any address.

For sale at his store, No. 379 Broadway; also at his Manufactory, 97 Reade and 96 Duane Street, New York.

JUST RECEIVED,

PER "PERSIA" FROM LIVERPOOL,

PIESSE & LUBIN,

HUNGARY WATER.

The specific virtues of Eau de la Reine de Hongrie has rendered it justly celebrated in all parts of the world. Piesse & Lubin have received from the Queen of Hungary, Paris, the following letter, which is self-explanatory: For two centuries its reputation has steadily advanced, and it has attained a celebrity which has never eclipsed any of the rudest waters, and that simply from the fact that Hungary Water contains in a perfect state of preservation all the virtues of the most valuable herbs, which its fragrant compositors are destitute. Now, as it has been proved that it is the best, it is the cheapest.

Memory and, augmentate the Brain, as noted by the Bard of Avon.

"There's Rosemary, that's for Remembrance,"

we see the Queen surprised to learn that Piesse, Manufacturing Chemists, Lecturers, Authors, Poets, give it the preference. Piesse & Lubin, 2 Chemists, 2 New Bond Street.

DYSPEPSIA AND FITS.

DR. J. C. BROWN'S

THE GREAT CURER OF CONSUMPTION, Who has proved himself the most successful in curing Dyspepsia, that for a part of the time he was confined to his bed. He has now nearly completed his convalescence, assisted him by a young clairvoyant girl. This prescription, given him by a new child, who is now in a trance, has cured every body who has taken it, never having failed once. It is also a sure cure for Fits and Epilepsy. The ingredients may be found in any drug store. Price $1 a bottle, with directions adapted to any person on the receipt of one stamp to pay postage. Address Dr. J. C. BROWN, Box 1,000, New York City.

PIESSE & LUBIN'S FRANGIPANNI.

An Eternal Perfume from the Holy City. The Perfume, Piesse & Lubin's Frangipanni, is unrivalled in fragrance.

DEPOT, Chemist and Importer, 609 Broadway, Sole Agents for the United States.

KISS-ME-QUICK,

THE FAVORITE PERFUME.

Distilled from Fragrant FLOWERS.

For sale at all Fancy Goods Stores, Perfumeries, Rise-me-quick, the Sachet, Rise-me-quick Soap.

EUGENE DUPUY, Chemist and Family Druggist, 609 Broadway.

THE ETERNAL PERFUME.

FROM THE HOLY CITY.

"Oh! could I but catch that fragrance,
I would ask no other bliss;
Than that thou sent scented decore
Should be sealed with my sacred kiss."

Beware of Imitations.

Frangipanni, the Sachet, Frangipanni Soap, the Sachet, Frangipanni Soap, Frangipanni Oil.

Sole Agent for the United States,

EUGENE DUPUY,

Chemist and Importer,

609 Broadway.

Sold every where.

GODFREY'S EXTRACT OF ELDER FLOWERS.

The sweetest and really the most perfect

COSMETIC IN NATURE.

This admirable preparation of Elder Flowers is very fragrant as a perfume. Elder Flowers have, from the earliest ages, been esteemed as a mild and harmless, yet most perfect beautifier of the Skin. Tan, sunburn, Freckles, Redness, &c., it will speedily and completely remove.

CHILDREN.—It is singularly beneficial and perfectly harmless even to the youngest Infant.

SHAVING.—It is valuable beyond any thing, soothing the irritation produced by the razor, and rendering the skin soft and firm, preparing it by subsequent use for a beard.

Sold by all Druggists. Prepared Extract of Elder Flowers only, and manufactured by Godfrey, whose trade mark is about to be approved.

EUGENE DUPUY, Family Druggist,

609 Broadway, N. Y.

"QUERUS'S" COD LIVER OIL JELLY.

A Scientific Discovery, by which the nauseous taste of Cod Liver Oil, and its consequent eructations, are entirely obviated, and the oil rendered as agreeable as Cream.

PENFOLD, CLAY & CO., Wholesale Agents,

No. 4 Fletcher Street, New York.

(From Pereira's Materia Medica, Vol. 8, Part 2, page 2345.)

"The experience of the profession at large appears now quite to have established the fact, that Cod Liver Oil is one of the most efficacious of all remedies in correcting the progress of Pulmonary Phthisis; that it exerts a decidedly curative influence in many other forms of disease, and thus enables those sufferings to obtain the restorative powers of Nature, which otherwise must have produced speedy death."

A GORGEOUS NUMBER.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR JULY.

CONTENTS.

FRANCES MARION. By Bessie J. Lossing. Illustrated by Seventeen Engravings.*

A JOURNEY THROUGH THE LAND OF THE AZTECS.

Illustrated by Fourteen Engravings.

THE WINELOT.

CARACAS.

Illustrated by Thirteen Engravings.

NELLY'S SLUMBER.

THE LAKES OF THE SACRED HEART.

MODERN SAINTSHIPS.

ARCHIBALD BLOSSOM, BACHELOR.

THE CRUISE.

EXPLORATIONS OF THE AMOOR RIVER. By Frederick Whymper.

MY VISITATION.

THE CHRISTMAS DINNER. By W. M. Thackeray. Illustrations.—Preaching and Practice.—A Lay Sermon.—Dinner Time.—Dessert.

CHAPTER XXIX. Where it appears that Harry was not likely to be bad long anywhere.

CHAPTER XXX. Contains a Letter to Virginia.

CHAPTER XXXI. The Rose and the Lender.

CHAPTER XXXII. In which a family Coach is ordered.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

LITERARY NOTICES. Books of the Month.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITORS DRAWER.

GRAHA'S GREAT GIFT ENTERPRISE.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE has now been published for Twelve Dollars a year.

Commencing with the commencement of both the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY can still be supplied. Specimen numbers will be sent gratis to any one who wishes to get up clubs. Address, HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" is prepaid by the publishers, unless otherwise ordered. When prepaid quarterly in advance, the Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty-six Cents a year on the WEEKLY.

Persons residing in the British Provinces will remit, in addition to their Subscription, Thirty-six Cents on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty-six Cents on the WEEKLY, for the American postage.

Postage is due in the City of New York abiding "Harper's Weekly" is at their house, will please send their address at the Office of Publication.

Address, HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Franklin Square, New York.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.—

This long-established and popular remedy for purifying the blood, and for the cure of ulcerous and scrofulous disorders, may be taken at this season of the year with entire safety and confidence. It is a powerful alterative.

Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, No. 100 Fulton street, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,

A PICTORIAL AND LITERARY PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.

BULWER'S BRILLIANT ROMANCE, entitled "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?" pronounced to be the ablest production of the author since Pelham, will be published in HARPER'S WEEKLY simultaneously with its publication in England.

TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

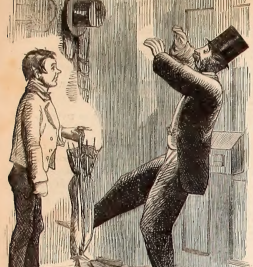
One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Five Copies for One Year 12 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 60 00

An Extra Copy will be gratis to the person who procures a Club of TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Two Years $1 00
One Copy for One Year 2 00
Five Copies for Two Years 8 00
Five Copies for One Year 4 00
Ten Copies for One Year 7 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 16 00

An Extra Copy will be gratis to the person who procures a Club of TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.



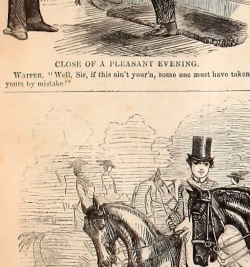
The Postage upon "HARPER'S WEEKLY" is pre-paid by the publishers, unless otherwise ordered. When prepaid quarterly in advance, the Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty-six Cents a year on the WEEKLY.

Persons residing in the British Provinces will remit, in addition to their Subscription, Thirty-six Cents on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty-six Cents on the WEEKLY, for the American postage.

Postage is due in the City of New York abiding "Harper's Weekly" is at their house, will please send their address at the Office of Publication.

Address, HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Franklin Square, New York.



CLOSE OF A PLEASANT EVENING.

WAITER. "Well, Sir, if this ain't your'n, some one must have taken yours by mistake!!!"

LADY. "I am afraid, Cook, we must part this day month."
COOK. "Why, m'm, I think I let you have your own way in most every thing!"

IMPUDENT BOY. "Now, Aunt, put your left heel into him, and he'll have a good trot."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

HEALTH! and BEAUTY!!!

GRACE!!! and BEAUTY!!!

Conferred on the Ladies by wearing

DOUGLAS & SHERWOOD'S
CELEBRATED SKIRTS.
THE UNPARALLELED SUCCESS OF THE
NEW EXPANSION SKIRT

(125,000 of which have been sold during the last 4 months) has induced the manufacturers to make arrangements that will enable them to produce 500 dozen (2500 Skirts) per day during the months of June, July, and August.

They also call attention to their

NEW LINEN SUPERIOR SKIRT,
FOR TRAVELING,

which is receiving universal commendation from the Ladies.

They are the sole proprietors of the only

PATENT ADJUSTABLE BUSTLE.

Beware of the many imitations offered in the market, which are found to be either inefficient or worthless.

They also manufacture

TO OTHER DIFFERENT STYLES

well and cheap the "Patent Adjustable Bustle."

These SKIRTS have been recommended by the HIGHEST MEDICAL AUTHORITY as being the best article for Ladies' use that has ever been offered to the public. Some genuine unless stamped

"DOUGLAS & SHERWOOD."
"MANUFACTURERS, NEW YORK."

For sale throughout the United States and Canada.

WHEELER & WILSON'S
SEWING MACHINES,
241 Broadway, New York.

Received the highest Premium awarded, 1857, by the American Institute, N. Y.; Maryland Institute, Baltimore; and at the Maine, Connecticut, Illinois, and Michigan State Fairs.

Send for a Circular, containing Editorial and Scientific opinions, Testimonials from persons of the highest social position, &c.

BARTHOLF'S SEWING MACHINE
FOR FAMILY AND GENERAL USE.
It is unquestionably one of the best.—Sunday Courier.

Send for a Circular. Office 469 Broadway.
Agents Wanted. Address, care box 1841, P. O., N. Y.

TO ADVERTISERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A MAGNIFICENTLY ILLUSTRATED PAPER,
CIRCULATING IN EVERY SECTION OF THE UNION,

Offers unusual Advantages to those who desire to bring their business prominently before the community.

1. Only a limited space is devoted to Advertisements.
2. The character and diffusion of the circulation are unequaled.
3. The Paper is generally preserved for Binding.
4. The Advertising Pages are rendered attractive, and can not escape the attention of the reader.
5. None but the most respectable class of Advertisements are admitted.
6. The charges are not as large, proportionally, as those of any other Weekly or Daily Paper.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for Three Months or more.

TERMS.—Fifty Cents a Line.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

ATWATER'S PATENT $15 AND $25
SEWING MACHINES received the First Premium over Singer's and Wheeler & Wilson's, at the State Fair, held at Buffalo, October 9th, 1857.
The Cheapest and Best SEWING MACHINE in the market.
Office, 463 Broadway, New York.
Send for descriptive Circular.
H. C. BURTMAN & CO.,
Sole Agents for the United States.

HUNT, WEBSTER & CO.'S IMPROVED TIGHT-STITCH
SEWING MACHINES,
469 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK.

THE INSTITUTES OF MEDICINE. By MARTYN PAINE, A.M., M.D., Professor of the Institutes of Medicine and Materia Medica in the University of New York; Member of the Royal Vereins for Heilkunde in Prussen; of the Medical Society of Leipsic; of the Gesellschaft für Natur und Heilkunde in Dresden; of the Montreal Natural History Society, and other learned Associations. With a Portrait. New Edition, Revised and Enlarged, with a colour Index. 8vo, Sheep, $4 00.

Intended to supply a vacuum in medical literature, and to set forth the principal objects of the Institutes of Medicine. It unveys all the important facts and principles in the various departments of medicine. It is designed as a text-book for medical classes, but is intended not less for the use of practical physicians. In whose aim is practical, giving to all the elevated principles of the science an exposition of their indispensable importance to a right treatment of diseases.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

FRED MARKHAM IN RUSSIA; or, The Boy Travelers in the Land of the Czar. By W. H. G. KINGSTON, Esq., Author of "Salt Water," "Peter the Whaler," "Mark Seacroft," "Hanee," &c. Profusely and elegantly Illustrated. Square 8vo, Muslin gilt, 75 cents.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square New York.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Works by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

FRESH BOOKS OF TRAVEL AND ADVENTURE PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

ATKINSON'S SIBERIA. Oriental and Western Siberia. A Narrative of Seven Years' Explorations and Adventures in Siberia, Mongolia, the Khirgis Steppes, Chinese Tartary, and part of Central Asia. By THOMAS WILLAM ATKINSON. With a Map and Numerous Splendid Illustrations from Drawings by the Author. 8vo (uniform with "Livingstone's Travels"), Muslin, $3 00.

SOUTH AFRICA. Missionary Travels and Researches in SOUTH AFRICA; including a Sketch of Sixteen Years' Residence in the Interior of Africa, and a Journey from the Cape of Good Hope to Loando on the West Coast; thence across the Continent, down the River Zambesi, to the Eastern Ocean. By DAVID LIVINGSTONE, LL.D., D.C.L. With Portrait, Maps, Wood-cuts, and Numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00.

NORTH and CENTRAL AFRICA. Travels in North and Central Africa. Being a Journal of an Expedition undertaken under the auspices of H. B. M.'s Government in the Years 1849-1855. By HENRY BARTH, Ph.D., D.C.L., Fellow of the Royal Geographical and Asiatic Societies, &c., &c. Profusely and elegantly Illustrated. Complete in 3 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $7 50; Sheep, $8 15; Half Calf, $10 50.

EUROPEAN ACQUAINTANCE. Being Sketches of People in Europe. By J. W. DE FOREST. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

SOUTHWESTERN AFRICA. Lake Ngami; or, Explorations and Discoveries during Four Years' Residence in the Wilds of Southwestern Africa. By CHARLES JOHN ANDERSSON. With Numerous Illustrations, representing Sporting Adventures, Subjects of Natural History, Device for Destroying Wild Animals, &c. New Edition. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

A HUNTER'S LIFE IN THE INTERIOR OF AFRICA. Five Years of a Hunters Life in the Far Interior of South Africa. With Notices of the Native Tribes, and Anecdotes of the Chase of the Lion, Elephant, Hippopotamus, Giraffe, Rhinoceros, &c. A New Edition. With Illustrations. 2 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $1 75.

BOAT LIFE IN EGYPT. By WILLIAM C. PRIME, Author of "The Old House by the River" and "Later Years." Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1 25.

TENT LIFE IN THE HOLY LAND. By WILLIAM C. PRIME, Author of "The Old House by the River," "Later Years," &c. Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1 25.

WASHINGTON TERRITORY AND THE NORTHWEST COAST. Three Years' Residence in Washington Territory. By JAMES G. SWAN. Map and Numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1 25.

VIRGINIA ILLUSTRATED: Containing a Visit to the Virginian Alps, and a Journey through Parts of Kentucky and his Cousin. Illustrated from Drawings by the Author. 8vo, Muslin, $3 50; Half Calf antique, $7 50; Half Calf, extra gilt, $4 00.

THE CANADIAN CANOE. Twelve Years of European Travel in 1845. By Rev. JOHN K. EDWARDS, A.M. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

STORIES OF THE ISLAND WORLD. By CHARLES NORDHOFF, Author of "Whaling and Fishing," "The Merchant Vessel," "Whaling and Fishing," &c. Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

EL GRINGO; or, New Mexico and her People. By W. W. H. DAVIS. Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents. Muslin, $1 75.

NOTES. By a Stroller in Europe. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

E. WALKER & SONS,
114 & 116 LITTLE BRITAIN,
NEW YORK.
BOOKBINDERS.

All work executed with promptness, and in as good style, and at as low prices, as at any other establishment. Special attention given to the binding of HARPER'S MAGAZINE and WEEKLY.

Orders may be left at Spencer's U. States, 3 vols.

SEWING MACHINES, S. F. HRATT'S Patent. Price $13 to $30. This is the best family machine in use, and will give satisfaction. Offices 179 Washington Street, Boston, 577 Broadway, N. Y., 263 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia. Agents wanted, apply at Boston office.

DR. MUNDE'S WATER-CURE AT FLORENCE, MASS. (Three miles from the Northampton depot). Price for Patients $11 per week.

KISS-ME-QUICK. Exquisite Perfume, distilled from fragrant Tulips.
E. DUPUY, Perfumer and Importer, 609 Broadway.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. II.—NO. 78.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 26, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

CONTENTS.

I. THE MOST REV. JOHN HUGHES, D.D., ARCHBISHOP OF NEW YORK, WITH A PORTRAIT

II. IMPERIALE.

III. THE LODGER.

IV. EMIGRANTS AND EMIGRANT LIFE, WITH FIVE SUPERIOR ILLUSTRATIONS.

V. LITERARY.

VI. DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

VII. FOREIGN NEWS.

VIII. THE BATTLES OF THE 30TH JUNE, WITH TWO SPLENDID ILLUSTRATIONS.

IX. "ENTER FIRST CITIZEN."

X. THE GALLEYS.

XI. SOWING HIS WILD OATS.

XII. THE FLOODS IN THE WEST, WITH TWO FINE ILLUSTRATIONS.

XIII. POOR PETER.

XIV. MISCELLANY.

XV. HOOF OR DOGGEN DOG.

XVI. THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

XVII. MARKET AND FINANCIAL REPORTS.

XVIII. COMICALITIES.

THE MOST REVEREND JOHN HUGHES, D.D., ARCHBISHOP OF NEW YORK.

No individual, perhaps, in this country, in office or out of it, wields a larger influence over a greater number of minds than the Most Rev. John Hughes, D.D., Archbishop of New York. Occupying the most eminent position in his Church in this land, he possesses those abilities which enable him to fill it most effectively. In his own diocese he has reduced discordant elements to at least a passive harmony, and enjoys an undisputed supremacy, decreed as much, perhaps, from his intellectual as official eminence, which awes into silence any serious opposition. He is indisputably equal to the exercise of the vast power which is lodged in his hands, and he wields it, however imperiously, in loyal subservience to what he regards as the interest of his Church.

Archbishop Hughes bears the reputation of a self-made man, and he certainly exhibits many of those qualities which are regarded as the result of early self-reliance. He was born in the north of Ireland, in 1798. His family was respectable, but by no means wealthy. In 1817 he came to this country, and, according to an apocryphal story, was engaged for a while in the humble position of a gardener. This story, if we recollect right, has been contradicted by the Archbishop himself, although he would have nothing to be ashamed of in the fact that his abilities might have elevated him from so humble a position to the one which he now occupies. The young Irishman at least gave evidence of talent, and was encouraged to pursue his studies preparatory to the priesthood. His course of education was pursued at the College of Mount St. Mary, Emmetsburg, Maryland. In 1825 he completed his studies and received ordination. Shortly after this, he was appointed to the charge of a church in Philadelphia. Here he soon succeeded in establishing a high reputation for eloquence and ability. But it was not only in the pulpit that he attained eminence. His administrative tact and skill were likewise exercised so as to secure commendation. In a very few years he was regarded as the foremost champion of the Roman Catholic Church, at least in that State, and as such (1836) accepted the challenge to a public discussion with the late Rev. Dr. John Breckenridge, then in the zenith and vigor of his power. The two disputants, in point of ability, were not unequally matched, and probably neither left the arena with the consciousness of having been vanquished. The discussion was a prolonged one. It was first carried on in the newspapers, and the articles were afterward collected in a volume, which had for a time quite an extensive circulation. Some years later (1854) the discussion was renewed, but this time orally, and before a public audience. It speaks well for the sagacity and discretion of the Archbishop, then a common priest, that he came forth from the controversy without having weakened his reputation by false concessions, or compromised his standing by positions inconsistent with the doctrines of his Church.

Such had his reputation become, that in 1838, when the venerable Bishop Dubois had become greatly incapacitated by the infirmities of age, Dr. Hughes was appointed Bishop-administrator of the diocese of New York. The position was a difficult one. The diocese was almost in a state of anarchy. Several of the church edifices were heavily mortgaged, and in danger of being put under the auctioneer's hammer. Discipline was at a low ebb, and, on the whole, the state of the Church was sadly disheartening to its devoted adherents. But Dr. Hughes set himself to the task before him with characteristic vigor and resolution. He determined to exercise his authority in restoring the discipline and prosperity of the Church. The evils that had resulted from the neglect of his predecessors were energetically assailed, not without stirring up a strenuous opposition. Already, doubtless, he had formed the purpose, which at a later date excited more public attention, and provoked controversy, to secure the property of the Church, by vesting its title in the Bishop of the Diocese. But, in carrying out this purpose, he came in collision with the democratic spirit of the Church, and was bitterly opposed by some laymen, who in various parishes had assumed the control of the revenues as belonging to the congregation. But the fact and authority of the Bishop carried the day, in some instances, we believe, by a sort of compromise, while, without surrendering the Bishop's principle, attained, temporarily at least, the end in view. In a more public aspect, the measures of the Bishop were successful. Harmony was restored, discipline was revived, the Episcopal authority was acknowledged, and the outward prosperity of the Church promoted.

In 1840 the controversy on the subject of Common Schools arose. The ill-judged suggestions of Governor Seward brought the subject into the political arena, and Bishop Hughes, in behalf of the Catholics of New York, took the field, demanding that the school funds should be so distributed that the children of his Church might not be under the necessity of attending the Public Schools, which he denominated sectarian and Protestant. Either taxes for education should not be levied at all upon the people, or the funds so raised should be so appropriated that the persons taxed should receive the benefit. The policy which he advocated could result in nothing less than in breaking down the entire school system of the State. The Public Schools of New York were denounced as intensely anti-Catholic, and such as no member of his Church could patronize. He complained, therefore, that the whole Catholic community was compelled to contribute to the support of schools contrary to their faith, and to which they could not send their children. Such were the views which he presented on repeated occasions, in public addresses, in communications to the papers, through his own organ, the Freeman's Journal, and before the Common Council. But all his influence could not shake the public confidence in the system of Common Schools. Something, however, was accomplished, as these contests always have been, in the blotted pages and defaced paragraphs of school-books that had been subjected to the Index Expurgatorius of his supervision. For a time the controversy raged fiercely. Bishop Hughes was never wanting in the emergency. As a public champion he might be heard at Carroll Hall and elsewhere, ever ready to defend and vindicate his views, however unpopular, but always sure of masses of his own countrymen at least to cheer him on.

Foiled to a large extent in all efforts, he directed his attention to a system of parochial schools, but we believe with only transient success. The obvious superiority of the Common Schools could not escape the sagacity of the more intelligent Catholics, and, in spite of priestly or Episcopal recommendation, they preferred, and still largely prefer, to patronize the Public Schools. Still we can not but pay tribute to the shrewd penetration and sagacity of the Bishop. He saw very distinctly that if the Roman Catholic Church was to preserve its identity and distinctness in this country, it must be guarded from the contagion of those associations which commingle children representing all creeds at the Public Schools. He saw that the public sentiment of the land, reflected in the text-books and instructions of these schools, was, on the whole, decidedly Protestant, and by no means favorable to that Episcopal or priestly authority in which the harmony and strength of the Church find their support. Hence his effort to divorce the Catholics of his diocese from all connection with them.

In 1850, the efforts of Bishop Hughes, who had already accomplished so much for the benefit of his diocese, and whose labors, if not so efficient here, were better appreciated at Rome, secured their reward. The diocese was made a Metropolitan See, and Dr. Hughes was elevated to the dignity of Archbishop. The Pope, in conferring the pallium, the insignia of his office, addressed him as "Our Venerable Brother," and the Archbishop, in his reply, expressed his gratification at the honor conferred upon him, and his devotion to the Holy See. Since that time he has been the acknowledged head of the Catholic Church in this country, and has exercised a power and influence which have made him a conspicuous figure in the history of the times.

THE MOST REVEREND JOHN HUGHES, D.D., ARCHBISHOP OF NEW YORK.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

ted to the Archbishop by Pope Pius IX. Since his elevation he has showed no abatement of his activity. His influence and authority have been exercised in behalf of the new doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, and he has labored largely to promote the prosperity of the various institutions for education over which he has the official oversight. His controversy with Hon. E. Brooks is so fresh in the memory of our readers, that we only need to allude to it.

One thing is quite characteristic of Archbishop Hughes. We do not hire ever used the word bigotry. He always has his harness on. There must have been originally a large admixture of combativeness in his nature. Doubtless he has come legitimately by it from the Welsh progenitors from whom, we have been so good as to trace his lineage. The moment that the Church needs a champion, he offers himself. He has the instinct of a true Celt. He must in the conflict, and to storm proxies. Whether he has few of sufficient ability whom he dares to trust, or whether he imagines that the controversy of his position and the force of his logic are necessary to crush opposition, he very rarely calls for replies by deputy. Since he has had charge of this diocese, he has not only attended to its religious and secular administration, but he has also been present at his own public avocats. In this character he is best known. What he is not known to be, is the most always in consequence of some assault upon the policy or interest of his Church. Heedless of any fancied dignity of his position which would interfere with the free use of his tongue or pen, he stands forward as the conspicuous and bold leader of every attack or assault may be lanched against the cause which he defends.

The Archbishop is decidedly a sagacious man. He thoroughly understands human nature, and especially that of human nature, and knows how to deal with it. He can be a most logical dialectician when it suits him, and he can declaim in the most approved style of rhetorical flourish, whenever that style suits the occasion. He is evidently one of the best men which the American Catholic Church could place at her helm.

Much might be said of the public labors of the Archbishop—his efforts—his lectures—his efforts in the cause of Roman Catholic education in this land. The sum of these is probably, that he seems endowed with a tireless energy. Nothing escapes his notice, and no possible advantage is allowed to pass unimproved. As a leader he is always acceptable, and he never wants for an audience when it is known that he is to speak. His style, although not involved, is far removed from that broken and fragmentary structure which belongs to the mere school of orators, and he has the good sense to discard the tawdry rhetoric in which some of his contemporaries have acquired a reputa. His manner is grave and dignified, so becoming his station, although he is not unwilling sleeve yielding at times to the temptation of resorting to the lighter weapons of wit or ridicule.

The writings of the Archbishop are mostly of a transient or fragmentary nature. They consist in the main, besides his controversy with Dr. Brownlow, of some eight or ten lectures, delivered on a variety of occasions, and having mostly for a bearing on the policy or interests of the Catholic Church. Besides these there is also his argument before the Common Council on the School Question, and possibly some few other things which have escaped our notice. On the whole, he must be considered, on the ground of talent and the power of speech, administrative ability, industry, sagacity, tact, and energy, a worthy successor of the lamented Catholic Church in this country.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 26, 1858.

BRITISH SENTIMENT ON THE RECENT OUTRAGES.

THE singular unanimity with which the British nation has declined to accept the gauntlet thrown down by the United States Senate, and the willingness of ministers, Parliament, press, and people to make amends for the conduct of the gun-boats on the coast of China, and to prevent a repetition of the offense, indicate a very proper sense of the relations existing between Great Britain and the United States. We are bound to admit that a comparison between the debate in the British Parliament and that in the United States Senate does not tell to the credit of the latter. It is, no doubt, easier for the author than for the sufferer of a wrong to be calm and dignified; but, even allowing for this, the distance which divides the two debates is great.

At the same time, it will not do to be precipitate in concluding that the trouble is over and the dispute settled. So far from this being the case, it is evident, from the tone of both the House of Lords and the tone of the ministerial press, that the real issue is not yet distinctly seen in Great Britain. Lord Malmesbury and his friends seem to think that the United States added insult to injury in that the value of vessels under the American flag shall be conducted with caution and forbearance; whereas, in fact, this country wholly and altogether denies the right of Great Britain, or any other foreign nation, to visit or stop vessels under the American flag in time of peace. The difference between what the United States demand and what the English seem to suppose they demand is thus seen to be pretty wide.

It is likely, judging from the tone of Parliament and the press, that the answer to Mr. Buchanan's remonstrances will be, first, a sharp reprimand to the officers of the officious gunboats; and, secondly, an assurance that for the future care will be taken that no American vessel shall be roughly treated, or unduly delayed, when British cruisers shall deem it necessary to board and visit her.

This will not satisfy this country. A little civility, more or less, will not palliate the commission of an act unjustified by international law and derogatory to the sovereignty of the United States. The people of the United States deny that Great Britain has any right to stop, visit, search, or otherwise molest any vessel bearing the United States flag, on the high seas, in time of peace; and, denying the right absolutely, they can not, and will not, accept it conditionally, or even as a matter of forbearance or caution on the part of the self-constituted police of the seas. This will beguile the people of this country in concealing their police authority, or recognize the maritime supervision they claim.

The way to settle the difficulty, and the only way, was indicated in these columns a week or two back. England's claim to the foreign ships in time of peace rests wholly on the foolish concession made in 1822 for the suppression of the slave-trade. Let that convention now be annulled. It has never been of any service, and in the cause of humanity it has been worse than no abrogation. When it is at an end all parties will be placed in the position which they occupied before the convention was made. England will be left without a shadow of a pretext for molesting American vessels. If she chooses to incorporate the right of searching the vessels of the slave-trade, she can do so, but she will then have no excuse for stopping vessels under the United States flag. As it is now, it will be a deliberate assertion of her purpose to assume the control of the seas independently of the rights of foreign powers; and it will then devolve upon this country to contest the point, or to resign all claim to the rank of a first-class maritime power.

It is, however, quite certain that when forced to elect between an abandonment of the right of visitation and a rupture with the United States, Great Britain will choose the former. The petty privilege would never be deemed worth fighting for.

The question is now fairly opened; the condition of affairs is suspicious for its settlement; it is to be hoped that the President will not allow his efforts till the whole case has been satisfactorily adjusted.

THE ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

CONGRESS has adjourned. The general feeling, on learning the event, was one of satisfaction. Not because there were any measures of detriment whose further consideration which might have become laws had the session been prolonged; but simply from a general opinion that all the necessary work of the session had been discharged, and that any additional labor would be superfluous and might be mischievous.

Considered as a whole, the session which has just ended will compare favorably with most former sessions. There is reason to believe that the members of this Congress are fully equal in point of ability and integrity to those of former Congresses. They are undoubtedly superior to those of the last Congress. None of the members have had the opportunity to use direct charges of corruption. No lobby schemes of any consequence have become laws. On the other hand, measures have been passed by the two houses—has reactively set its face against corruption and lobby rogueries; the light admitted into the session has had the effect to prevent the repetition of the offense, indicate a very proper sense of the relations existing between Great Britain and the United States. We are bound to admit that a comparison between the debate in the British Parliament and that in the United States Senate does not tell to the credit of the latter. It is, no doubt, easier for the author than for the sufferer of a wrong to be calm and dignified; but, even allowing for this, the distance which divides the two debates is great.

At the same time, it will not do to be precipitate in concluding that the trouble is over and the dispute settled. So far from this being the case, it is evident, from the tone of both the House of Lords and the tone of the ministerial press, that the real issue is not yet distinctly seen in Great Britain. Lord Malmesbury and his friends seem to think that the United States added insult to injury in that the value of vessels under the American flag shall be conducted with caution and forbearance; whereas, in fact, this country wholly and altogether denies the right of Great Britain, or any other foreign nation, to visit or stop vessels under the American flag in time of peace. The difference between what the United States demand and what the English seem to suppose they demand is thus seen to be pretty wide.

It is likely, judging from the tone of Parliament and the press, that the answer to Mr. Buchanan's remonstrances will be, first, a sharp reprimand to the officers of the officious gun-of consequence has been the quasi-declaration of war against Paraguay. It is not likely that this act will be followed by any serious consequences. As soon as the petty States of Central and South America discover that the United States are in earnest, they are usually quite willing to act reasonably. Latterly, the Senate has blown off a good deal of steam about the Mexican outrages; but this has resulted mainly from the discussion, and it had best be forgotten as soon as possible. The unequal duties imposed on American ships in French ports, the affair of the Lyonnaise, the Central American disputes, the Mexican troubles, the unsettled questions with South America, are all matters in the state in which they were when Congress met.

Nothing has been done during this session of Congress for improving our commercial and navigation laws. The tariff has not been altered, though a sound economy would have favored a temporary increase of duties with a view to supplying the deficit in the revenue. Mr. John Cochrane and the Committee of Ways and Means have elaborated a plan for the collection of the revenue hereafter; but it is as yet merely a project. The committee on postage and internal affairs have likewise devised a scheme for the regulation of marine postages and mail steamers; but nothing, but this, has been ready for the approval of a future Congress. No additional securities have been afforded by any act of this session to depositors by land or water. But in this matter, as in those above mentioned, the ground has been cleared for wholesome legislation when the next session opens.

The committees of investigation, which have engrossed so large a share of public attention, have rendered a useful service; they have led to the discovery of many improper practices, and have brought some rogues to shame; but we see no reason to complain that one could be paid to the Congress which has just dispersed to say, that there is no prospect that the time of the Congress which met in December will be engrossed by inquiries into any of its proceedings.

FRENCH SHADOWS.

IF there be any truth in the adage about coming events and their shadows, the dark shades which, in these times, are gleaming on the coasts of French dominion, deserve to be carefully studied by all who care for the future of France and the progress of liberal democracy. Not only do actual scenes freighted with ominous facts—startling evidences of rebellion against the French Government—present themselves in the march of military despotism, terrible signs of weakness in the loins of the Imperial regime—the financial embarrassment, the expense of the colossal war, and the great diminution of the receipts of the Empire tell a story of declining confidence and proximate collapse. The robbery of the hospitals to furnish more money for the expedition by the Credit Mobilier of the right of way across Central America. Both indicate the same great, staring, frightful fact—the approach of public, general, sweeping bankruptcy.

It was esteemed by the French journals a triumphant finale for France to have escaped the storm which swept over America and Europe in the latest months of last year. Every financial department of the Empire, is the only country whose finances and trade are in such a condition that she can meet a monetary crisis without serious convulsions. They forget two things: first, that France is no commercial country, that she has no manufactures dependent for their sale on domestic trade, no shipping to speak of, no extensive ramifications in the commercial centers of Europe; and, secondly, that France is one of the conveniences of despotism to be able, for a time, to arrest the operation of natural economic laws. France, like Austria, whose foreign commerce is mostly in the hands of foreigners, and whose internal trade is paralyzed by restrictions, can actually experience profit from embarrassments which involved the commercial world only. And it was in the power of the Government to adopt the shrewd policy of the Republicans of 1848, and for a time to arrest disaster and discontent among the manufacturing classes by hiring employees to bire them, and paying the cost of the operation. No such suicidal scheme could ever be put in operation by the monarchy or in England; nor, if it could, would it have been seriously proposed in any nation where public opinion had influence in government; for the simple reason that such rebellions against inexorable laws only retard and aggravate the final crash when it comes. But the French Government had neither the knowledge nor the fortitude to meet the crisis bravely. It shrieked, and, as we said, took money which happened to be in one pocket and disbursed it with the other. It averted a revolution at the cost of a general fall in the funds.

The embarrassment which now throws the Emperor of the French so completely into the hands of the military and the clergy, has its purpose to despoil the hospitals—which compels the financial department of the Empire to publish statements as absurdly fallacious as any that ever emanated from an American Railway Company—to be traced in a great degree to the influence of the late revulsion. As the innocent stockholder in our great corporate enterprises is unable to discover how much his company spends, how much it receives, and what its net balance is at the end of the year; so the French citizen seeks in vain, at the present time, to find out from the published statements how much the Treasury has—how much France owes, how much she has spent, what her income is, and what her expenditures. All these are State secrets: the reports which purport to reveal them are intended to conceal the facts, and succeed admirably in their object. It is said in Congress to-day that it cost to avert the revulsion. No one but the Emperor and a few of his confidential friends know what the financial condition of France is at the present time: though every one knows that it must be desperate.

Financial embarrassments are the key to political revolutions in every country. In such countries as the United States and Great Britain they may be overcome by a government which has the nerve to tell the truth, and to tax the people freely. In France, autocrats have no such resource. Extra taxation there is impracticable, for the reason that the people are too poor to pay great taxes. Any addition to the annual levy which would not be noticed here, could not be gathered in France at all. The trash and fine of the people have not the means to pay more than they do. They might be used, sold out, or imprisoned; but no matter what was done, they could not pay an additional centime, and could not be made to pay. That is the reason why every successful conspiracy against their will succeeds in France way when the finances came to a dead lock; that is the secret of the peril which now menaces the Empire.

AFFAIRS IN CHINA.

IT is said that Mr. Commissioner Reed, who represents the United States in China, has resigned his office, and is about to return home. It is not stated that Mr. Reed is dissatisfied with what he has seen in the great drama which is now being performed in China; but as much may be suspected. Could Mr. Reed have remained, the United States might co-operate with the European powers in urging their protest demands on the Celestial Government without compromising their neutral attitude.

KILLING NO MURDER IN NEW YORK.

WHEN, some years ago, an unhappy gentleman, the victim of acute and excruciating disease, killed, in the State of New York, a fraudulent schoolmaster who had chastised his brother, and was acquitted therefor by a Kentucky jury, the fact of the acquittal was a cause of indignation, and proclaimed that killing was no murder in Kentucky. The criminal records of this State will show that it is quite as easy to prove that whatever may be the practice in Kentucky, under no circumstances can homicide be called legal murder in the State of New York.

The legal distinction between murder and manslaughter is so clear that it can be grasped by the meanest intellect. Manslaughter is homicide committed under circumstances which, without actually justifying the act, go far to palliate it. If a man runs a gentleman foolishly out of window, without designing harm to any one, and kills his neighbor, it is manslaughter. If, when a man is assaulted by another, and, without having been menaced so seriously that his life is in danger, kills his assailant, it is manslaughter. And again, when a man has received a grievous injury at the hands of another, and kills him to revenge it, he can not plead under the nature of the injury, and where it is really very grave, to find a verdict of manslaughter. But when a man, under the most imperious provocation, and in wait for an unoffending person and kills him, or, in a burst of passion, kills a person who has inflicted a very severe injury, and injures him mortally, the act is murder, not manslaughter.

These principles shed a reliable light on the case of Patrick Lilly, the man who killed Mr. Simonson at Brooklyn, and who has just been found guilty of manslaughter in the second degree. The offense of the victim in this case was a remonstrance against the use of profane language. For this he was first knocked down, and that the language used by Simonson justified his murder. It seems, indeed, to have been actually made a justification rather to benefit than to injure Patrick Lilly. Yet the latter followed it up by deliberately and premeditatedly expelling the death. Upon this, the Brooklyn jury found Patrick Lilly guilty, not of murder, but of manslaughter in the second degree!

The same general practice, in a different form, is exemplified in other recent cases. Cannan has been three times tried for a very clear case of murder, and hardly convicted at last. Mrs. Cunningham lives in some disguised retirement, and is not known to have been the resentment against the wiles and devices of the New York bar: a feeling which, it is said, excedes Dean shares. In Stowe, the convicted murderer of his brother-in-law Littles, has been granted a new trial; let us give the country bar credit for shrewdness enough to equal their city confrères in the art of squeezing a sympathizer or accomplice into the jury-box. His sister and coadjutor in crime has not yet been brought to trial. One of the murderers of Teresa Spitzlein has escaped from the prison to which he was sentenced; another, the principal in the affair, after being rescued from the gallows by the ill-judged lenity of a weak Governor, now patiently awaits the pardon which can not fail to be shortly granted. In a word, no form of murder in this State insures its author the only penalty which experience proves to be efficacious for the repression of such crimes. You may kill a man in a fit of passion, or kill him from revenge; kill him in a house, or kill him in the street; kill a friend, or kill a stranger; batter his brains out with a paving-stone, throw him in the river with a chain-shot round his neck, or run him through with a knife: it is all one to Courts of law in New York—they will not find you guilty of murder.

Lord Mansfield, whose decisions form a large part of our common law, used to say that it mattered but little what the law was, so long as it was uniform, and every one could ascertain what it was. In accordance with this sensible opinion, it now devolves upon the people of this State—not to complain of the innovation which judges, governors, juries, and prosecutors have tacitly effected in the law, but to accept it, such as it is, and govern themselves accordingly. Many excellent remedies have been proposed. It is suggested that the judges should be appointed by the Governor, to hold office during good behavior, instead of being elected as they now are. It is argued that we ought to adopt the French plan of allowing a majority of jurors to convict. It is urged that the pardoning power should be taken away from the Governor and vested in a board of officers—as is the case in New Jersey.

All these suggestions appear to be well founded and well meant. But, in the absence of any probability of their being soon acted upon, it will be well for the people of this State to take for granted that in the present condition of the law, and as it is at present administered, killing is no murder in the State of New York; and that it is far better to kill than to run any risk of being killed.

THE LOUNGER.

JOHN BULLKIN.

On the 29th May the Lounger, in some few and innocent observations which stirred up his Chicago friend, suggested the probable course of England in respect of the troubles. He willingly grants that it evinced no very profound perspicacity, but who does not like to be proved a prophet? After stating why England would not care to proceed to war with America, and allowing that the two countries ought always to dwell together in amity, the Lounger concluded: "In fact, there are many reasons why Mr. John will probably reprove his silly little officers, and inform Jonathan, with an air of loftiness, that he need not lose his temper for nothing."

So it proves. John is even more upon Jonathan's side than Jonathan himself; and certainly the mere tone of the remarks in Parliament upon the subject contrasts favorably with the high cock-a-lorum flavor of our Congressional effusions. There are instances, undoubtedly, little creditable to the demeanor of the British House of Commons; but, upon the whole, its demeanor is infinitely more dignified than that of our Congress. Let all honor be paid to good manners! A polite scoundrel, even, is certainly preferable to a boorish one. But the blandishment of manner should never blind us to facts. Because we are heady and hot, it does not follow that we are wrong; nor must the cool tranquillity of John mean more than it really does. It may be a surprising truth to many minds, but England is not less selfish than other nations.

While, therefore, we grant her all credit for the prompt and gentlemanly manner in which she treats the present matter, it is well to remember that there may be many reasons for her so doing; and, as it is very near the Fourth of July, an impetuous patriot may even whisper to himself—with a view only of keeping himself on guard, and not with any intention of offense—"Would Master John Bull be such a mannerly Bullkin if Jonathan were only half his height?"

PRACTICAL MEN.

Kossuth's Hungarian stock was held to be a pretty poor investment, and there was a loud laugh when a noted merchant bought a few thousand old muskets, if not saddles. Practical men wanted to know how any body could throw his money away so foolishly—particularly the practical men whose funds were invested in New England factory stock and Erie Railroad. Practical men are perpetually wondering why people make fools of themselves; and so practical men quiz an engineer who suggests that railroad-carriages can be drawn at the rate of twelve or fifteen miles an hour. Practical men put their thumbs in their waistcoats, and lean back in parliamentary easy chairs, shaking their feet and sucking tooth-picks, and request the engineer to understand that practical scientific men have reduced it to figures that it can not be done. Presently it is done. Then practical men want to know why people may not be shot along a tunnel like beans through a tin tube? Practical men rush to invest all their money in railroads—rush to prostrate themselves before the great railway king—and when practical men have put all their eggs into one basket, down goes the basket, and smash go the eggs. Practical men "went in" for Mr. George Law, and the Mississippi scheme, and the South Sea bubble—and sneered at George Stephenson. Practical men built the Thames tunnel; and, about a dozen years ago, the steamship Great Britain; and practical men have just launched the Leviathan, which needs only a million of dollars to be put into sailing order, after which she will make eight voyages in the year, and clear, as net profit for the subscribers, seven hundred thousand dollars annually. Practical men will probably laugh at the Kossuth subscribers over the wine they buy with their Leviathan dividends.

A COURT OF HONOR.

In consideration of the recent personal difficulties in Congress, and the impossibility of making laws for the country without the exchange of insults among honorable gentlemen of all parties, proposals are hereby issued for the appointment of a Grand Central National Tribunal of Honor:

I. Said Court shall consist of two representatives of each of the great parties—one taken from the Senate, and the other from the House.

II. It shall be in permanent session.

III. Whenever honorable gentlemen exchange the lie, or a pull of the nose, they shall resume their seats.

IV. A Committee of friends shall instantly bring the case before the Tribunal.

V. The Tribunal shall adjudge that if Mr. A called Mr B a sniveler, he reflected upon his manliness; but if Mr. B retorted with the lie, he aspersed Mr. A's honor. Consequently both were naturally excited, but used expressions which they did not exactly mean. Each, therefore, is to blame; each regrets, and each apologizes.

VI. In consideration that all valor should have a public and permanent recognition, it is decreed that every honorable gentleman whose honor has been pacified by the Court shall be invested with the dignity of the order of Touchstone. The insignia of the order to consist of a leather medal, on which shall be painted a bubble on glass, with an if rampant on the bubble.

VII. When Senators and Representatives cease to bandy the lie upon the floor the Court of Honor shall cease to exist, and each house of Congress shall be considered an honorable body.

A PAIR OF LORDS.

It is announced that the son of the Duke of Devonshire, Lord Edward Cavendish, and Lord Richard Grosvenor, son of the Marquis of Westminster, are coming over to see us. How the English young ladies must sigh! How deserted the ball-room without Lord Edward and Lord Richard! Those young gentlemen will doubtless miss their accustomed homage. They are coming now among simple republican girls, and must not expect to have profound cheeses made before them by the freshest and stiffest crinoline. If there is one thing pleasanter to know than another, it is that the American young lady is never imposed upon by titles. She receives the son of a London tradesman with the same affability as the heir of a duke. She is a practical democrat, and prefers him, of all her admirers, who is most devoted to liberal ideas and generous sympathies. The heart of the American young lady never flutters in the presence of young English lords. It prefers worth to wealth, candor to a carriage, and devotion to diamonds. It makes no calculation of available matches; gilded gout it passes by, to bestow itself upon industrious youth, health, and affection; and even where youth, health, and affection are rich, the heart of the American young lady wishes they were poor, that it might show its disinterested preference.

A RAREE SHOW.

England and France have been enjoying this exhibition for several months. Every steamer has brought us conspicuous notices of the marvels wrought by Mr. Rarey upon wild horses. In all the empires there is no animal so vicious but Mr. Rarey will accomplish him for the boudoir in half an hour. It is as wonderful as the guano which was to grow the salad while you were eating your dinner. Mr. Rarey's favorite pillow is the heels of a kicking horse. He makes the animal defer respectfully to the bridle and solicit the whip. He performs as many wonders upon him as Vieuxtemps on the violin or Thalberg on the piano. He is the great equinist of the age.

There have been many secrets for taming horses, but Mr. Rarey's seems to be the best of all. Unfortunately he is not wealthy enough to treat the world to a knowledge of his spell; but all who see its operation, or who have paid the fee for knowing it, seem to be perfectly satisfied. Chloroform has been suggested; but it is evidently not that, for there is no kind of stupor, and the docility of the animal is perfectly intelligent. Tying up one of the front legs and urging the horse upon three legs is a theory which has its probabilities and very serious supporters; but that process requires more time and practice than is asked by Mr. Rarey. In fact, nobody has yet satisfactorily suggested the Rarey method.

Nor is his skill confined to horses. He has recently been taming a zebra; and there may be no limit to the range of his power. Perhaps there is some common secret of subjection, which, once discovered, will bring all animals under our reasonable control, even to offering themselves willing sacrifices to our sustentation. Fish will lay themselves up on the bank, convenient for the cook; deer will come trotting in, and pass into venison without a pang; cows and oxen will moo their innocuous lives away, and pigs lay them down an' dee.

These, of course, will be the ultimate results. We must not be greedy, and hope for every thing at once.

At a recent exhibition of Mr. Rarey's skill in Manchester, he was put to a very rough trial. He had agreed to meet any horse that might be brought to the arena; and a bleacher who owned a mare, the most powerful and most vicious animal in the county, sent her by his groom with orders to take off the halter and turn her in. He did so—although to remove the halter was hardly fair—and the mare immediately kicked, and plunged, and rushed at Mr. Rarey so furiously that the ladies of the audience, fearful of seeing his brains dashed out, withdrew, and most of the company with them. Within five minutes of their departure they returned to find that Mr. Rarey had bridled the mare, and presently laid his head upon those late so restive heels!

Our own private theory is that Mr. Rarey is a medium, and that the spirits hold the horses for him. The only objection to this view is that in the case of tables the spirits make them kick up, instead of causing them to remain quiet. But then horses are not tables. Tables are made of wood, and when Mr. Rarey tries upon clothes-horses who knows but they may turn the tables upon him, and begin to kick up?

We can not, therefore, be too careful where we hang our clean linen.

SUMMER SPORTS.

The season of college anniversaries is at hand: days of perspiring crowds in hot churches listening to long orations and poems occasionally crackling with puns; days of valedictory ambition and the eloquence of twenty; days of galleries of crinoline quivering with fans, of handsome orators in black gowns, and of bounteous piles of bouquets; of alumni dinners, réunion, and reminiscence; of Presidential levees and flirtations in the garden; of Champagne, punch, and auld lang syne; days longed for, regretted, and forever remembered—nights of moonlight, serenades, and tears.

But the Commencement season is ceasing to be all sentiment, eloquence, Champagne, and music. The old Greeks, at their games, remembered the claims of the body—not of its enjoyment only, but of its health—and consequently, while Plato listened to Herodotus, and the echo of Pindar still lingered, they leaped and wrestled, raced in chariots and on foot, knowing that the State must have able-bodied as well as strong-minded citizens. The nearer we can come to the Greeks in these points the better it will be for us; and it is a good sign of the times that this year a regatta of college boats is to take place, probably upon the Connecticut River, in which Harvard and Yale will contend for the palm. At Harvard there are more than two hundred students upon the roll of the boat-clubs; of which there are eleven, owning boats with six or eight oars each. Will some Yale boatman send the Lounger the details of his college?

How soon shall we have the college cricket-matches, foot-ball, and the rest? It is high time that we exploded the old theory of the scholar—that he is a weak and puny, round-shouldered, pale-cheeked, hollow-eyed, tottering, nervous, and shy schoolmaster. Let us prove that he can row and wrestle with men as well as dictionaries and grammars.

DELICATE GROUND.

Marshal Pelissier, the present French Embassador in London, lately exchanged compliments with the Duke d'Aumale, one of the sons of Louis Philippe, and it was rumored, in consequence, that he would be recalled. But the Times says he will hardly be more than censured. If Louis Napoleon has not utterly lost his head—which really seems to have been blown off, or up, by the affair of the 14th January—he will not alienate the most conspicuous general in his army. In fact, there are certain things he is pretty sure not to do, of which the most comprehensive class is that which concerns the reproof of any thing or any body military. In the present conflict between the army and the press the Emperor is compelled to favor the army, and there is very little doubt that Louis Napoleon will occupy his throne long enough to disabuse the mind of Europe and America of the idea that he is a great man in any just sense of the word.

Perhaps there was never a more fortunate conjuncture of circumstances than in his case. He inherited the name of Napoleon, which, no less by its misfortunes than its glory, was a charm in France. He had a fair natural capacity, and the talent—which, in a public player, is genius—of profound reticence. He was personally brave, and had every thing to gain, with nothing to lose. France was heaving and uncertain in the hands of a revolution which frightened itself. He came to it when it lay under strong military rule—when the people were wanting repose—when there was no sense of security. He was elected President, certainly upon no ground of the ability he had ever shown, for his public career in France began at Strasbourg and ended at Boulogne. As President he was brought in official contact with the army, and the rest was a foregone conclusion.

The capital of the country and the conservative feeling were naturally in favor of a strong, peaceable Government; the popular sentiment, fostered by the Church, was charmed with the "Napoleon idea" and name, and his accession to absolute power required only a stern resolution and an unshrinking hand. So he seized the power; but to maintain and confirm it is a different thing.

That is what he is engaged in doing, and every month exposes the poverty of his real ability. He is less securely seated to-day, after six years of opportunity, than he was on the week after his coup. Poor little Prince Imperial! how earnestly his mother Eugénie must wish he were only a peasant boy, playing on the banks of the Guadalquiver, or the Thames, or the Hudson, or any river that did not water France.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

"Dear Lounger,—If you know the address of any of the Hog family, of whom you have often spoken, and whom I constantly meet, I wish you would send the inclosed. It comes, I think, from the Cincinnati Gazette, and has a sub-acid flavor which is very agreeable in the warm weather. Yours, Traveler.

"'1. Do not puddle a car, where there are ladies, with tobacco-juice—it dirties their dresses.

"'2. A young and healthy man should not occupy more than two seats. Twice as much room as an old lady or gentleman requires is enough for the cloak, bandbox, carpet-bag, and books of a merchant's clerk on a collecting tour.

"'3. Courting should be done at home. The world does not make a sufficient allowance for amours in the cars. When people are seen to be uncommonly affectionate in the cars, the by-standers are apt to make remarks.

"'4. Ladies who must wear hoops in traveling should not make them two yards in diameter, as that is the greatest width with which they can be conveniently seated.

"'5. Men should not talk in the cars more than doubly as loud as they do in any other place, lest they should injure their voice.

"'6. Children who are three or four years old, and in habit of crying for every thing they see without being punished, should be kept at home till their parents learn how to govern them.

"'7. If the first and last of these rules can not be observed, then the tobacco-puddlers and the parents who never punish should be put in the same car together, to enjoy each other's company.'"

Dear Hog,—I have been requested to send you the above extract, and beg leave to recommend that you should cut it out, carry it in your pocket-book, and read it every night and morning. Yours truly, The Lounger.

—A Reader, Hackensville, Georgia, should remember that the superlative of the Latin felix has but one l; and so with infelix. Let him ask the schoolmasters about that. Herbert was certainly most unhappy!

"June, '58.

"Ever-needful Lounger,—Your wide-spread amiability and India-rubberness of temper, tell me that, with safety, I may to you make my complaints. Then, to begin, I must say I am so tired of this dull monotony every where pervading.

"If I were a man I'd collect an army, go off to Utah, and scatter the Mormons to the 'ends of the earth'—that place where all loving maidens persist in accompanying their lovers.

"Oh, if there only could be a war between England and America it would be comfortable! I could then find something to do. No doubt but that I should be a second 'Joan of Arc'—all but the burning, which part of the career I should most religiously avoid.

"Do propose something which shall dispel the tedium; then imagine every rain-drop (and, goodness knows! we have plenty of them) to be the essence of a bundle of thanks from your correspondent. More sorrows anon.

"Yours in ennui, S. D."

—The Lounger is clearly not the person for S. D. to apply to. Let her seek consolation of the belligerent Senators and Representatives who sympathize fully with her war views.

"Dear Mr. Lounger,—I was very glad indeed to see our worthy postmaster listening attentively to the lectures delivered at Mozart Hall for the relief of the Shirt-sewers' Union, in which, you remember, the whole question of women's capabilities was discussed from every point of view. Those lectures have not been without effect, for I notice that a woman has been appointed to deliver letters at the ladies' window in our city post-office. Isn't this the first instance of the kind?

"Yours, respectfully, Anna Maria."

—Anna Maria is surely aware that in many country towns, both in this country and in England, there is such a phenomenon as a postmistress. Mr. Postmaster Fowler has merely, in this instance, reversed the Mormon rule, and ordained that a female shall distribute the mails.

"Respected Sir,—You spoke last week of an original portrait of Dr. Franklin, now for sale in Paris. Have you noticed that it has been purchased by a gentleman in Boston, the city in which Franklin was born?

"Your obedient servant, Optics."

—Here is a tempting invitation to all Loungers:

"Near 'Brown's Tract,' June, 1858.

"Lounger,—When I consulted my doctor this spring, he prescribed Labrador! I shook my head. 'Are there no other waters?' 'The Northwoods for the season,' he replied; by which, I took it, he meant trout-fishing. So here I am, on the banks of the Black River, whose waters—of an amber color, on a near view—seem black, a river of ink, a contrast to other streams. Think of it! a river of ink, with the foliage of the Northwoods over it, in June! Unless you have seen the sight itself—this particular only mirror of the kind—you can not possibly come up to the conception of what is here seen every day, unconcernedly, by the lumbermen.

"A great black serpent winding through the wilderness (come and see its coils). Oh Heaven, what coves! quiet retreats, where the fair heaven is held in a fringe of beauty, and the balsam, the spruce, and the larch rear their saplings. You see only their shape and foliage—cones, as if Art had been there. 'Lovely' is the word I apply to these cone-pictures by the First Artist. But these mirrors are sometimes disturbed, in their greatest placidity, when sunset colors them. The trout then breaks the surface, dallying with golden insects and snowy moths. It is but a flash of the fierce inhabitant, and then the circles run for the shore. The 'Compleat Angler'—I say it upon the authority of a fisherman—has nothing like this. Its trout are great ebon fellows, with saffron-colored bellies, and spots of crimson on their broad, dark sides—flesh, a rich orange.

"It is here, my dear Idler, that I play the fly, of a sunset, when all the odors of pinus are out on the moist air—the Northwoods' 'sheets that smell of lavender.' My seat is of moss, and the ground-ivy is constantly disputing it with me. At every change of seat, or turn, a stream of fragrance goes up, telling the harm I am doing. I have lost several trout in answering this complaint of the herb. There is another complainer at this hour—the whip-poor-will. Soon July will deepen the colors of my picture; the trout will be less venturesome, but more fierce; the moth more tempting; the fish more toothsome. Meanwhile the 'Tract' is overrun with 'pot-hunters'—to use a phrase of the unhappy Herbert's—whom the fly and the mosquito are fast clearing out. Then—if the Lounger has a taste for the thing, and the courage—'the more flies the more trout,' is the adage here. F. G."

DEPARTURE FROM HOME.

EMIGRANTS, AND EMIGRANT LIFE.

THATE AGE, a Canadian governor—not by any means a quick-witted personage, or gifted with deep sensibility—wrote an intensely interesting book, entitled "The Emigrant." Therein he depicted the trials of the exile, from the hour of his departure from his native soil to his final settlement in the land of promise; the naked recital of facts was so touching that thousands read the book eagerly, and the author began to be mistaken for a man of literary talent.

The trials, privations, disappointments, and ultimate rewards of the European emigrant to America, yet await their Homer. No writer has done justice to the domestic romance of the emigrant's fortunes. They are an unexplored mine of pathos, suffering, and hope; rich in yield to him who shall delve therein in the proper spirit, and with the proper tools.

From the hour of his departure to the hour of his settlement on his final resting-place, the emigrant is a prey to human vultures. At the great ports where emigrants embark in the Old World—Liverpool, Limerick, Glasgow, Belfast, Bremen, Amsterdam, Havre—a brood of hungry rascals earn a fat livelihood by cheating them. Some are tricked into purchasing spurious tickets; others are duped into the acquisition of worthless stores; many are robbed outright. The most fortunate are they who simply pay a bonus to the sharks for tickets which are good, certainly, but which are sold at an advance over their proper cost. The business is most profitable at Liverpool—which is the largest emigrant depôt of the Old World—and the chief dupes are the Irish. Englishmen, Scotchmen, Germans, possess a native shrewdness which often protects them against sharpers. The expatriated Irish cotter falls an easy prey to the first swindler he meets. There is a firm in Liverpool—they are rich merchants now—which has carried on the business of swindling Irish emigrants systematically for years. They have had a house in New York and New Orleans; boarding-houses in both those places and in Liverpool; runners not only in the United States and in the port of embarkation in England, but in every emigration district in Ireland. For years this firm has pursued the policy of deliberately fleecing emigrants. It rarely wastes time on the poorer classes, such as those which are shipped to Quebec or Baltimore; but it hardly ever lets an emigrant of the latter class out of its clutches till he has parted with his last dollar.

Once on board ship, and the cruel parting with friends over, the emigrant falls a prey to a new class of masters, the sailors. Enough has been printed about the trials to which young emigrant girls are subject. Both sexes, and all ages, are the victims of a tyranny which is none the less grinding because nautical discipline may justify or excuse it. At sailing, the steerage passengers are mustered, and the emigrant learns—from the blows and jeers of the mate and crew—that he is "under authority." The whole passage confirms this first impression. Sailors interfere with his feeding, his sleeping, and his exercise. If he be ill—as is most easy to be—his sufferings provoke jibes, where they do not lead to violent correction, from the officer of the watch. He may die if he chooses, but he must not soil the purity of the deck or the steerage. To cook his food properly, he must fight man-fully. To protect his wife and daughters, he must unite imposing strength with unusual courage. To resist the brutality of the crew, he must share their pugnacity, and surpass them in shrewdness.

EMIGRANT WOMEN.

At last the voyage is over, and the emigrant lands on American soil. In odious time his condition at this stage in his progress was truly pitiable. Federal, State, and municipal authorities regarded him with as much indifference as if he had been a bale of cheap goods. Scoundrels of the very lowest calibre—emigrant runners—mixed him, and made him their own. If he had any money, they robbed him of it. If he had a pretty wife or daughters, they stole them too, if they could. If he had neither money nor daughters, they merely took his luggage. It was well for him if, after having been robbed of all he had, he was not beaten to death, or entrapped into committing crimes which transferred him almost directly from the emigrant vessel to Blackwell's Island or the State Prison. His temptations were of his own kith and kin. The rascal emigrants to rob were the Irish; and the majority of emigrant runners belonged to the same race. The brogue was part of their capital in trade.

This is ancient history now. A few years ago, the railways of this State grew jealous of emigrant runners, and proposed to monopolize the business. With the aid of certain politicians, they established an emigrant depôt at Castle Garden, in the city of New York, where immigrants are now landed, and whence they are forwarded to their destination. Into this depôt the old class of robbers known as runners are not openly permitted to enter. It is a vast improvement on the old system; though whether it be itself tainted with corruption appears to be matter of debate.

There seems to be some doubt whether European emigration to the United States will continue. Of late years it has greatly fallen off. This year it will not, most probably, amount to one-third what it was a few years since. Germany has thrown off its surplus. Ireland has got rid of its starving thousands, and there is more elbow-room for those who remain behind. Until some convulsion disturb peaceful trade and industry in Europe, there is no reason to suppose that immigrants will flow into the United States at the same rate as formerly; though, so long as we have vacant lands and political privileges to offer, we can hardly fail to levy a large percentage upon the increase of the European people.

LITERARY.

ABOUT a year ago, in noticing a little volume published by Carter & Brothers, entitled THE WAY HOME, a pleasant and touching family story, we remarked upon the fact that an incident was related of a certain Lord N——, whose mother was the author of the well-known lyric, "The Land of the Leal," and we then suggested that an inquiry in the church-yard at Bruseels for the grave of Lord N—— would inform us who was the lady referred to, and enable us to ascertain the name of the author of one of the most delightful poems in the language. This casual remark created an amusing excitement among a class of small critics, and a dingy New York street made itself merry over our supposed ignorance. Among the numerous issues which were brought out by our remark, none was more amusing than a letter from a very indignant Scotchman to a Canada paper, which he probably marked and sent to us. He boiled over with indignation, and said, "How very ignorant some would-be literary critics are of their own business, especially among the Americans!"

All these gentlemen were oppressed with the idea that "The Land of the Leal" was by Burns.

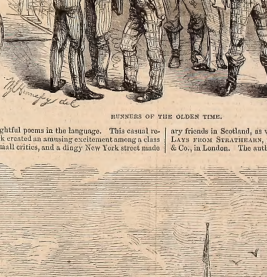
No one acquainted with the poetry of Burns had ever attributed it to him. It has not in thought or construction any resemblance to Burns; and although some such persons as we have mentioned might have considered it his, the authorship of this delicious little poem has long been a subject of discussion among literary men.

The matter escaped our attention at the time, but has since been revived, and we are glad to be able to settle the question by authority of private letters from itself merry over our supposed ignorance. Among the numerous issues which were brought out by our remark, none was more amusing than a letter from a very indignant Scotchman to a Canada paper, which he probably marked and sent to us. He boiled over with indignation, and said, "How very ignorant some would-be literary critics are of their own business, especially among the Americans!"

All these gentlemen were oppressed with the idea that "The Land of the Leal" was by Burns.

No one acquainted with the poetry of Burns had ever attributed it to him. It has not in thought or construction any resemblance to Burns; and although some such persons as we have mentioned might have considered it his, the authorship of this delicious little poem has long been a subject of discussion among literary men.

The matter escaped our attention at the time, but has since been revived, and we are glad to be able to settle the question by authority of private letters from Lord Nairne, a Scotch lady, who died in 1845. The following letter, from a gentleman in Edinburgh, contains some particulars which will be read with interest by all who admire that most exquisite of songs:



EMIGRANTS.

"MY DEAR SIR,—In reply to your favor of 20th ult. I beg to state, that there is no doubt whatever that the late Countess of Nairne was the author of the beautiful lyric referred to. In 'The Wee House,' at page 29, you will find it so stated for a fact, and in a work published by Addison & Co., of London, entitled 'Lays from Strathearn,' which contains all the poetical pieces of the gifted Countess, 'The Land of the Leal' appears among these. I will have the pleasure of sending you a copy of this work; and turn to pages 14 and 15, and you will there find it. There is a short biography prefixed to the volume, from which I extract the following sentences:

"'Passing one afternoon through a village where the yearly market was being held, the elder Countess, heard young voices singing in a favorite air words which she disliked. Returning homeward through Strathearn to the old Mansion House of Gask where her childhood and youth were passed, and which is described so touchingly in "The Auld House," the desire arose to remodel some of those old songs and to write new ones. "The occasion of an agricultural dinner," says Dr. Rogers, in his sketch of Lady Nairne, in the "Modern Scottish Minstrel," afforded her a fitting opportunity of making trial of her success in the good work she had begun. To the President of the meeting were sent some sweetly humorous stanzas, entitled, "The Jacobites," and the production being publicly read, was received with much approbation. She was then encouraged to proceed in her self-imposed task, and to this early period of her life may be ascribed some of her best lyrics. "The Land o' the Leal," at the close of the century, was sung in every district of the kingdom. This song was written for a bereaved friend, and became widely known long before its name was whispered in connection with it. Some years later she added the verse,

"'Sae dear's the joy was bought, John,
Sae fine the battle fought, John,
That nane's mair e'er brought
To the Land o' the Leal.'

BUSINESS OF THE OLDEN TIME.

EMIGRANT-LANDING IN NEW YORK.

Nor was it easy for her to preserve her incognita, as she frequently found herself in companies who disputed about the origin of "The Land o' the Leal," and was appealed to for her opinion regarding it.'"

"So much about the poem in question. Of her latter days it is said,

"'For some years previous, and subsequent to the death of her only child, Lord Nairne, at Brussels, in 1837, she resided at different places on the Continent; yet even when these days came which left her no longer any ties to earth, and when to sing songs in her presence would have been as mockery, the old melodies were not banished. Still, she would ask for "Triumphal arch which fill'st the sky," etc., to the air of "Jock o' Hazeldean" or the tune of "Drink to me only," to such words as these:

"The oak strikes deeper as its boughs
By furious blasts are driven," etc.

She returned to Scotland at the request of her nephew, Mr. Oliphant, of Gask, at whose residence she died in 1845.'"

We trust that the indignant Scotchman at Kingston will not revile the memory of his favorite poet because he did not write what the Countess of Nairne did write, but will make a decent apology for his stupidity, and buy a copy of The Way Home and another of the Lays from Strathearn.

Mr. Sotheby has sold at auction the entire impression of his work on Block Books, which, our readers probably know, were books printed before the invention of movable type. The work is very elegant, containing fac-similes. Copies were purchased for the Astor and other American libraries. The first copy brought £10 10*s*., and the entire number, 215, were sold at that rate.

The Literary Gazette (London) is publishing a very interesting series of letters from Vice-consul Newton, on his explorations at Buddrum, the site of the Mausoleum. Mr. Newton's labors have been great, and crowned with abundant success.

Sixty-six thousand seven hundred and sixty florins have been collected for a monument of Luther at Worms. It is to be erected in the Cathedral.

The name of Calypso has been given to the fifty-third asteroid discovered on the 4th April. We notice less the discovery of a planet than of a new rock in an ocean.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, 14th instant, in the Senate, it was agreed that 6 P.M. that day should be the hour for adjournment. Many private matters were discussed. The Senate, on suggestion of the Conference Committee, receded from its amendments to the Post-Office Appropriation Bill, and it was passed by 33 to 17. Senator Seward moved a vote of thanks to Vice-President Breckinridge, which was agreed to unanimously. Most of the day was devoted to executive business.——In the House, miscellaneous business of an unimportant character was transacted. All unfinished business was handed over to the next session. It being agreed that six was to be the hour for an adjournment, the Committee appointed for the purpose reported before that hour that they had waited on the President, who had no communication to make, and thereupon both Houses of Congress adjourned.

SPECIAL SESSION OF THE SENATE.

Immediately on the adjournment of Congress, the President issued a proclamation convening the Senate in special session. That body met accordingly on 15th June, and a committee waited upon the President to inform him that the Senate was ready to receive any communication. Senator Green presented a memorial from Benjamin W. Perkins, for relief against alleged oppression by the Russian Government. Senator Mason introduced the resolutions of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the British outrages, and speeches thereon were made by Senators Mason, Wade, Benjamin, Doolittle, Clingman, Bayard, and others. Senator Douglas made a personal explanation in connection with State politics in Illinois, and was answered by Senators Bigler and Trumbull. The Senate then went into executive session.

On 16th June the Senate went into executive session, and confirmed a number of appointments. The resolutions on the outrages were then passed unanimously. They are as follows:

Resolved (as the judgment of the Senate), that American vessels on the high seas, in time of peace, bearing the American flag, remain under the jurisdiction of the country to which they belong, and therefore any visitation, molestation, or detention of such vessel by force, or by the exhibition of force, on the part of a foreign power, is in derogation of the sovereignty of the United States.

Resolved, That the recent and repeated violations of this immunity, committed by vessels of war belonging to the navy of Great Britain in the Gulf of Mexico and the adjacent seas, by firing into, interrupting, and otherwise forcibly detaining them on their voyage, requires, in the judgment of the Senate, such unequivocal and final disposition of the subject by the Government of Great Britain and the United States, touching the rights involved, as shall satisfy the just demands of this Government, and preclude hereafter the occurrence of like aggressions.

Resolved, That the Senate fully approves the action of the Executive in sending a naval force into the infested seas with orders "to protect all vessels of the United States on the high seas from search or detention by the vessels of war of any other nation." And it is the opinion of the Senate that, if it become necessary, such additional legislation should be supplied in aid of the Executive power as will make such protection effectual.

The President having no further communication to make, the extraordinary session was adjourned.

THE OCEAN POSTAGE BILL.

The Ocean Postage Bill, one of the last appropriation bills passed, appropriates $346,500 for the transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool, with a proviso that there be paid therefrom so much as may be required to procure the transportation of the mails on such days as the Collins steamers may fail to take them from New York. Out of this same appropriation is to be paid $16,757 for outward trips from New York to Liverpool in February and April, 1857, and February, March, and April, 1858, when the Collins line failed to perform the service, and a further sum of $35,000, or so much as may be necessary to enable the Postmaster General to procure the transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool and back on the 24th of April, 8th and 22d of May, and 5th and 19th of June, 1858, if the Collins line fail to perform the service on those days. Two hundred and sixty-one thousand dollars is appropriated for the mails from New York to New Orleans, Charleston, Savannah, Havre, Chagres, and back; $328,350 for the mails from Panama to California, Oregon, and back; $122,000 for the mails between San Francisco and Olympia; $32,400 for the mails on Puget Sound; $230,000 for the mails from New York via Southampton or Cowes to Havre; $50,000 for the mails between Charleston and Havana, and $100,000 for the mails across the Isthmus. It is not lawful for the Postmaster to make any steamship or other new contract for conveying the mails on sea for a longer period than two years, nor for any other compensation than sea and inland postages. He is authorized to cause the mails to be transported between the United States and by any lines for port or ports by steamships, paying therefor, if by an American vessel, sea and inland postage, and if by a foreign vessel sea postage only. Preference is always to be given to an American over a foreign steamship, when departing from the same port for the same destination within three days of each other.

EXPENSE OF THE GOVERNMENT.

The following table, from the Union, shows how much the United States Government costs:

Regular Appropriations for the Service of the Year 1859.

Pension	$769,500 00
Indian, Regular	1,338,104 49
Indian, Supplemental	959,157 36
Indian, Deficiency	539,5 5 00
Consular and Diplomatic	912,120 00
Military Academy	182,804 00
Naval	14,508,354 23
Sundry civil	5,557,148 07
Legislative, Executive, and Judicial	6,134,063 61
Army	17,145,896 46
Mail Steamer	950,150 00
Post-office	3,500,000 00
Collecting revenue from imports, permanent, additional	1,150,000 00
Total	$53,458,233 22

To which add:

Treasury notes, 1858	$20,000 00
Manufacture of arms, 1858	360,000 00
Expenses of Investigating Committee, 1858	35,000 00
Treaty with Denmark, 1858	408,731 44
Deficiency in printing, etc., 1858	341,189 58
Deficiency for the year 1858	9,704,209 89
Deaf, Dumb, and Blind, Dis. of Columbia, 1858	3,000 00
Expenses of Investigating Committee, 1858	12,000 00
Clerks in Oregon to Register and Receiver, 1858	7,000 00
Running Texas boundary line, 1858	80,000 00
Incident to the loan of $20,000,000	5,000 00	—$10,976,130 91
		$64,434,364 13

Estimate:

Other appropriation bills not printed and indefinite, including all private bills	3,565,635 87
	$68,000,000 00

THE BRITISH OUTRAGES.

A messenger, bearing special dispatches from the British Admiral in the American seas to Lord Napier, arrived at Washington last week. The Admiral had given orders to the cruisers to desist from all interference with vessels bearing the American flag, and had promptly dispatched a fast vessel to cruisers on the coast of Cuba with these orders. As far as the Admiral and the vessels under his command are concerned, there will be no further trouble, at least until instructions arrive from England. Lord Napier reiterates the statement, now received from the Admiral, that no new orders had been given by the British government to the cruisers, and that they had acted with imprudent zeal upon orders given many years ago.

The resolutions of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations were passed, not because they would achieve any thing, but in order to produce a moral effect in England.

LATEST FROM UTAH.

Colonel Thomas L. Kane has arrived, having left Camp Scott on May 16th. He reports Governor Cumming having returned to Salt Lake City after making an ineffectual attempt to stop the Mormon hegira to the South. Salt Lake City and the northern settlements were nearly deserted, a few persons only remaining to guard the buildings. Forty thousand persons are said to be in motion—their trains extending for miles down the valley. The advanced trains were already three hundred miles distant. To evade answering where they are bound, they say they are going South; but their supposed destination is Cedar City, or some part of Sonora. There were no mules at Camp Scott. Colonel Hoffman's train was met twenty miles from the Platte bridge. Colonel Johnston would wait the arrival of the Peace Commissioners. The Indians were annoying the Mormons, call them squaws, and say they won't fight. Brigham Young had delivered the great seal, records, etc., which it was supposed had been destroyed, to Governor Cumming. The recent heavy rains extended far to the west, and all the streams are full.

GENERAL WALKER STIRRING AGAIN.

The New Orleans correspondent of the Herald writes: "You have heard and published the result of General Walker's trial. The termination was highly satisfactory to the little 'gray-eyed' man. He is still in this city, and is surrounded by followers as devoted as ever. His office is at 181 Custom-House Street, where, in company with General Henningsen, he can be seen every day, deeply engaged in writing, and directing singularly good-looking men as they come and go. Colonel Anderson will visit New York immediately.

"You may rest assured General Walker will proceed to Nicaragua immediately. He lives for no other purpose, and believes in no other destiny. His resources are greater now than ever, and his support in the United States more personal and powerful. When he goes your correspondent will take a trip to the tropics."

PERSONAL

Among the number of diplomatic and consular appointments sent in last week to the Senate were Joseph R. Chandler, of Pennsylvania, Minister to Naples; E. T. Fair, of Alabama, Minister Resident to Belgium; and B. C. Yancy, of Georgia, Minister Resident to the Argentine Republic.

The President has tendered to Governor Winslow, of North Carolina, the Sardinian Mission, which the latter accepts. The delegation from North Carolina expresses great dissatisfaction, as they claimed a first-class mission.

The British Minister, Lord Napier, the French Minister, Count de Sartiges, and lady, accompanied by the Hon. Wm. H. Seward and others, arrived in Baltimore on the 16th inst., and left in the cars of the Northern Central Railroad Company on a trip of pleasure, to visit the mineral regions of Pennsylvania, and the works of internal improvement connected therewith. At Harrisburg they were to be joined by the Hon. Simon Cameron, and after visiting the great southern coal-field, on the line of the Northern Central Railroad, they will pass into the valley of the Schuylkill, where they will be received by Mr. Cullin, the President of the Reading Railroad Company, and conducted through the coal-fields tributary to that road.

The Washington correspondent of the Boston Traveler says: "It has been remarked often that the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is the leader of the House. The gentleman who now occupies this position, Mr. J. Glancy Jones, fully believes this doctrine, and acts upon the belief, as you will see from two incidents, which are characteristic of the man. Yesterday, when one of the Appropriation bills was up, and the House having heard a Senate amendment read, and being willing to adopt it without discussion, cried out, 'Question! question!' when Mr. Jones coolly remarked: 'If I hear that cry again, I will speak half an hour!'

"To-day, when the Loan bill was under consideration, after Mr. Burlingame's speech, Mr. Jones arose to close the argument, and when through with the movements that usually precede his speeches, the House feared that he was about to ventilate his ideas in reply, and some of his friends, sotto voce, intimated the hope that he would be short, as time was precious, when Mr. Jones drew himself up and declared that, 'I shall take what time I please, and when I please, and gentlemen will do well to remember that such is my practice.'"

Another Washington letter writer says: "There is a capital story in circulation here about that Indiana Congressman, Foley, upon whom so strong a spell was laid by his famous letter. One of the New York members said to him, 'Well, Foley, they rather had you in that letter, didn't they?' 'Yes,' said Foley, 'rather so. Well, I writ it, that's a fact; but they mutilated it most d——bly in publishing it!' It is thought here that it will require a good deal of mucilage to work Foley again down the throats of his constituents."

Archbishop Hughes attended at Albany last week before the Grand Jury, as an applicant for an indictment against the Albany Statesman, for a libel contained in certain letters exposing a society which it claims exists under the title of the "Circle of Jesus." After hearing the Archbishop's testimony, the Grand Jury refused to indict, on the ground that if the matter is libelous against the Archbishop it should be prosecuted in New York, where he lives, and not at the expense of Albany county. The Archbishop then offered to bear the expenses of the prosecution; but the bill was refused by the Grand Jury.

Mr. Wm. C. Bryant, in a letter from Rome to The Evening Post, says:

"You have heard of the death of poor Bartholomew, the sculptor. He came to the hotel at Naples, where I was, the evening before I went with my family to Castellamare. I was absent a week; and when I came back he was dead and in his grave. He had fought a hard battle with poverty, and had just won it; orders were beginning to come in upon him from all quarters, and his great grief, when he breathed his last, was, that he could not place his mother in that state of comfort which he would easily have secured to her if a brief respite from death had been allowed him. I have been to his studio since my arrival in Rome, and there I saw the last work of his hand—a fine statue, justifying the reputation he has lately acquired—Eve, after the Fall, in an attitude of dejection, and wearing an expression of profound sorrow. I could scarcely help fancying that the marble figure mourned the death of the artist to whom it owed its being."

It is a pleasant thing to be a clergyman in Connecticut. The Rev. Mr. Spring, of East Hartford, lost all his property lately by the burning of his dwelling; but his friends got together and made up a purse of $1300 for him, replaced his wardrobe and that of his family, sent him new furniture, and are arranging to build him a new house.

Mr. Walter, who is superintending the work of the Capitol extension, under Captain Meigs, sent his resignation to the President on 16th, to take effect in six days unless Captain Meigs be removed. These two officers have disagreed for some time past. The presence of the architect who designed the Capitol extension, and who is at Washington looking into the defects and showing how his plan has been mutilated, has probably brought the rupture to a head.

The friends of the culprit Powers, who was to have been hanged on the 18th, besieged the President until he granted a respite for a week. The mother of the miserable man threw herself on her knees before Mr. Buchanan, and implored him for mercy in the most heart-rending manner.

Captain H. A. de Reviere, well known as the distinguished French Zouave, and lecturer upon the campaign in the Crimea, has been arrested at New Orleans on a charge of bigamy, and committed for trial.

HORRIBLE MURDER IN MICHIGAN.

The Detroit Free Press has the following: "A horrible murder was committed on Tuesday in the town of Mill River Point, Macomb County, near the line of this county. It appears that two brothers and a sister were living in that town. They were French. The sister was the housekeeper of the brothers. The two brothers appeared at the house of a neighbor living some three or four miles distant, at about twelve o'clock night before last, and awakened them. Upon arising, he found the two men in a strange condition. They were both naked, and had bands made of straw tied around their waists. With this exception, there was nothing upon their bodies. They said they wanted shelter and assistance, as people were after them, and were about to take them. Being asked why, they said that they had killed their sister. The story was not credited, and they were taken in and placed in an upper room, which was well guarded, as their actions excited suspicions of insanity.

"Yesterday morning the farmers in the neighborhood gathered together and went to the house of the brothers, and there met a most horrible sight. They found the mangled body of the young girl, stripped naked and lying in a wagon which stood in the road near the house. In the house was found a man who had nearly lost his life in defense of the girl. His name is Defair, which is all that we have respecting his case. The house presented all the traces of a desperate struggle, in which the young girl had been murdered, and then dragged out of doors. Her hair was then cut off close to her head by these mad fiends, and she was thrown into a wagon in the barn-yard, which was then drawn around to where it was found. Her breast was full of gun-shot wounds, and her face was cut up in an undistinguishable mass of gashes. She was then left in her blood, while the murderers sought the neighbors.

"The murderers act like insane men, but have not been previously known as such; and how two persons could thus become insane at a moment's notice, and commit so horrible a deed, is a mystery. They said that they were prompted by God to kill her because she persisted in going to church every Sunday, and asserted that they made three attempts before they accomplished it."

A WHOLE FAMILY DESTROYED BY THE FLOOD.

The following is the statement of the Rev. Horatio Ilsley, whose family, consisting of his wife and eight children, were drowned in the flood at Roscoe, Illinois, on the 3d inst.:

"About eleven or half past eleven o'clock, just after the three children had gone to bed, there was a great rush of water passed the house, and Mrs. I. went to the hall-door with a lantern and looked out. She found the water rushing by with tremendous force on all sides of her, and coming in at the door. She called loudly for help several times, but the water was too deep, and rushing with such tremendous force that no one could then get near the ill-fated house. Mrs. Ilsley called to Horatio, the eldest son, and ran up stairs immediately. She then called to her husband to come up, which he did, and opening one of the windows, again screamed for help, but in vain. At this time he was just coming out of his study, and was standing in the entry, when he heard the children cry out, 'Father, father!' and at the same moment he saw one end of the house fall out with a crash. He then felt the whole house swaying up and down like a boat on a wave, and then it fell into ruins. Just as it fell he heard his wife scream, and that was the last he heard of his family. He immediately found himself in the water, not knowing how he got there; and with no power to help himself, he was tossed about, and hurried along with great velocity to the river. He took in some water then, but had presence of mind enough to guard against taking in any more, and try to keep his head above water. His own simple and touching words best describe his feelings at this awful moment, and shows his faith in that God he so long has served. He says: 'I then commended my soul and my family to God, expecting to meet Him and them in eternity in a moment; and I almost wish I had.' He was carried on until he struck against some flood-wood, and soon after was thrown against a tree, into which he climbed, and managed to maintain himself for some two hours, during which time the people had discovered him, and were making a raft to rescue him, when Mr. Richardson swam out to him, and got hold of him just as his strength failed him, and he was dropping off the limb. When it is remembered that Mr. I. has but one leg, and was in delicate health, his escape from death is almost miraculous."

LIEUTENANT PYM'S VIEW OF THE OUTRAGES.

The Key West correspondent of the Herald gives the following account of Lieutenant Pym's views on the outrages as communicated to an American naval officer:

"Lieutenant Pym assured the officer that no new instructions had been given him by his Government, but that he and all his consorts were acting under orders issued in 1849. The activity of the fleet, as manifested by their boarding and firing into some fifty different vessels during the past two months, probably had its origin in this wise: 'A few weeks ago,' said Lieutenant Pym, 'when cruizing off the Moro, I boarded an American vessel that had just left port, and, in answer to inquiries for news, was told that a splendid clipper ship was fitting out for the slave-trade, and would be ready to sail the following day. I accordingly watched for her, and had the satisfaction of taking a valuable prize. She had a complete outfit. A bag containing 2300 doubloons was given up. There were provisions and accommodation for 1500 slaves. The vessel was legally condemned, and sold, with her cargo, for $100,000. The steamer Styx being in sight was entitled to one-half of the prize-money, or my share would have been $10,000. As it was, I received $5000 for a couple of hours' work.' We should have said that seventeen shots were fired at the ship before she gave up, all of which were fired by Lieutenant Pym. It is reasonable to suppose that this success has prompted the British fleet to increased zeal in making our ships show their colors. The seizure and condemnation of this clipper ship would prove that respectability, size, and beauty of model in a vessel passing a cruiser at sea was no proof that her mission was a commercial one. Lieutenant Pym asserts that the American newspaper accounts are much exaggerated, and in a great measure false. The seizure of the Creole—an account of which has gone all over our land—is an instance of the grossest exaggeration. The captain of that vessel, when overhauled by the gun-boat, threw his flag and his papers into the sea, and declared himself to be a Spaniard. Contraband articles were found on board, and he was clearly proved to be a slaver, and justly condemned and sold."

PERSONAL.

Joseph R. Chandler, of Philadelphia, has been appointed Minister to Naples. Mr. Chandler was formerly the editor of the United States Gazette, which, under his control, long stood in the front rank of journalism. It was a conservative, high-toned paper, of the old-fashioned Whig stamp, always decorous and dignified, yet enlivened by wit and remarkable for its sprightly paragraphs. The Gazette gave more attention than is usual in a daily paper to literary style and grammatical construction. It once abused its authority by introducing the expression "being built," and hammered it down the throats of the rest of us as good English; and we suppose it is accepted as such, but it is very unpleasant to the ear. Mr. Chandler disposed of the Gazette to the publishers of the Philadelphia North American, who have continued it with steadily increasing reputation. In 1849 he took his seat in Congress, and continued there till 1855, when he was displaced by the Know-Nothing movement. Mr. Chandler, although of Puritan ancestry, is a Roman Catholic. In the last Presidential election he supported Mr. Buchanan.

Ex-Mayor Wood is not to have his name upon the Worth Monument. It was originally designed to inscribe the words "Fernando Wood, Mayor," on one side of the pedestal; but the Committee of the Board of Aldermen having the matter in charge have reported in favor of omitting them, and inscribing instead—"Honor the brave;" and the Board has adopted the recommendation of the Committee.

A Paris correspondent says: "Mario has refused to sign an engagement with the Italian Opera for the next season. His reason, as given in a letter to one of his friends in Paris, is, that here his expenses are enormous. He says that his salary for the seven months of last season was one hundred and five thousand francs, and that he spent one hundred and thirty-five thousand! If the Duke of Candia spends as much for other articles of the toilet as he does for kid gloves—of which it is said he puts on several new pairs every day, never wearing one pair twice—there is no doubt his expenses are what he states. He is now in his villa of Florence, where he has collected treasures of art that do honor to his taste."

The Senate bestowed a worthy compliment upon the Vice-President, at the adjournment, in recording their unanimous appreciation of the urbane and acceptable manner in which he had discharged the difficult and delicate duties of its presiding officer. The resolution was moved by Mr. Seward, the leader of the party opposed to Mr. Breckinridge in sentiment, and was concurred in by every member of every political opinion and prejudice belonging to the body.

A man who was recently sent up to Sing Sing for ten years for burglary, learning that his portrait and life were to appear in one of the papers of this city, ordered five hundred extra copies, which he circulated among his friends.

William Hunt, the distinguished painter, has returned from Fayal, where he has passed the winter and spring. His studio is in Newport.

Miss Mitchell, the astronomer, recently met, in Florence, the distinguished Miss Somerville, who, though nearly eighty years of age, preserves, apparently, all the natural vigor of her faculties.

Mr. William B. Astor, now in Paris, has bought Powers's statue, called "California," for the sum of $7500, and the Hon. Hamilton Fish has bought a third duplicate of the same artist's "Fisher-Boy" for the sum of $1000.

Her Majesty, Queen Victoria, as a mark of her appreciation of the distinguished scientific acquirements of Professor Faraday, has presented him with a residence at Hampton Court, and has given directions to have it furnished at Her Majesty's expense. This is the second tribute of royal respect to the sciences allied to the profession of medicine; the first being that of Professor Owen, the Cuvier of England.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE "BRITISH OUTRAGES" IN PARLIAMENT.

On 4th instant, in reply to an inquiry from Mr. Wilson, Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald stated that "the American Government had made grave charges against certain British officers, but no official account had been received from those officers. He could only say that, if occurrences such as those complained of had occurred, they would be viewed with the deepest regret by the Government, and immediate explanations given. The fullest information should be laid before Parliament as early as possible. Meanwhile he had only to add that orders had been sent out to the officer in command of the squadron in the Cuban waters to make every inquiry into the subject, and that the greatest caution and forbearance should be exercised toward vessels bearing the American flag."

The general tone of the London press is highly conciliatory to this country; many journals loudly blame the officers of the gun-boats.

THE OFFENDING EDITOR DISCHARGED.

On the 2d instant, in the House of Commons, Washington Wilkes, the editor who was imprisoned for a breach of the privileges of the House, was discharged, having withdrawn the libelous charges made in his journal.

ENGLISH POLICY IN CHINA.

On 3d instant, Mr. Disraeli, in reply to a question, said there had been no rupture of the negotiations which had been opened with the Emperor of China; on the contrary, what the Emperor had done was this—he had not sent to Lord Elgin, at Shanghai, but had sent a message requesting Lord Elgin to meet his messenger at Canton; Lord Elgin, however, had then gone north. He could not lay Lord Elgin's instructions on the table, because, as we were acting with allies, it would be inconvenient to the public service.

And again, in response to inquiries by Lord John Russell as to the affairs in China, he said it was impossible for him to afford any fresh information upon the subject. The present Government had extended to Lord Elgin the same wide discretion given him by the former Government, but they were not aware of his motive in proceeding to the northward after he had been invited by the Chinese Government to repair to Canton; and what demands he had required from the Chinese Government they could not say.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH EXPERIMENT.

The Atlantic Telegraph Fleet returned to Plymouth from their experimental trip on the 3d instant. The experiment of paying out the cable in water nearly three miles deep, and much deeper than it is any where between Ireland and Newfoundland, was entirely successful, and the new machinery is pronounced perfect. The operation of splicing was performed four times, and the cable was paid out at the rate of seven to eight knots per hour. The expedition finally starts from Plymouth on the 9th or 10th of June.

THE NATURE OF THE EXPERIMENT.

The Herald correspondent thus describes the nature of the experiment: "A consultation was had between the captains and the engineers of the Company in regard to the point at which the vessels should commence their experiments, and after due deliberation it was decided that lat. 47°, long. 10°, would be quite far enough. This is just on the verge of the Bay of Biscay, which bears such a terrible reputation for boisterous weather, and which it was supposed would afford every opportunity for testing the practicability of splicing and laying the cable in a rough sea and under the most unfavorable circumstances. So lat. 47°, long. 10°, was selected as the precise locality for the experiments.

* * * * * * *

"We were now in lat. 47° 12′ N., long. 9° 32′ W., or about thirty miles distant from the point decided upon before starting from Plymouth, and, as it was subsequently shown by the soundings of the Gorgon, in 2530 fathoms water. This, then, it was evident, was the place we were in search of, and it was determined that we should proceed to make our experiments at once. According to the memoranda drawn up by the engineers, the Niagara approached the Agamemnon within a convenient distance, when a line was passed in a boat to the Agamemnon, by which a hawser was hauled on board the latter, and by which also the two ships were fastened stern to stern. It must not be supposed from this, however, that they were actually in contact, for they were some seven or eight hundred feet apart, and, as each vessel had steam up, there was no danger, with proper management, of their coming in collision. The two vessels now being firmly secured, the end of the telegraph cable was passed from the Niagara to the Agamemnon, where it was agreed the splice should be effected. The object of this experiment was to prove the practicability of accomplishing what is, or was considered, one of the most difficult operations of the whole expedition—the splicing and submerging of the cable in mid-ocean. The greatest interest was manifested on board our ship while the splicing was being performed on the Agamemnon, and every one was impatient to see the cable lowered from her stern.

THE CABLE OVERBOARD.

"Although the work was performed with praiseworthy celerity, it was about half-past five when the signal was displayed from that ship announcing that they were ready, and a few minutes after we could see the spliced portion hanging over the stern. Down it went until it disappeared below the surface, and the revolving cable wheel on the stern proved that it was on its way to the bottom, which lay at a depth of some twenty-five hundred fathoms beneath the ship. 'A length of cable' having been 'payed out' from the Agamemnon equal to the quantity used in passing the cable from ship to ship, so that the splice might be in the centre of the line formed by the cable between the ships, a flag was hoisted from the Agamemnon conveying intelligence of the fact to the Niagara. This was answered by a similar signal on the Niagara, when the two commenced paying out a quarter of a mile of cable each, at the rate of a mile an hour.

"The cable used in this trial was a portion of that which had been laid last year, and which was much weakened by exposure. In some parts the outer wires or protecting armor was so oxydized that the rust had rotted the hemp which covered the gutta percha. For this reason it parted several times during the experiments, but at the same time without interfering with their successful accomplishment.

"A quarter of a mile, as has been stated, was paid out, and, in conformity with the 'memoranda,' the signals on both ships were hauled down, indicating that no more paying out should be done until they were again displayed. About ten minutes elapsed, when the flags were hoisted, and another quarter of a mile was let down into the sea at the same speed—a mile an hour. This process was repeated until a whole mile had been run out from the coil and over the machinery of each ship, making a total expenditure of two miles from both vessels. The experiments were continued for two days, with very satisfactory results, as stated above."

MR. CHARLES DICKENS'S TROUBLES.

The London correspondent of the Herald says: "Certain vague and painful rumors have been going the rounds of London society for the last week or two, and now they assume definite form. The great novelist, and delineator of the character of the inimitable Mr. Pecksniff, has separated from his wife. There are various rumors on the subject, but I am assured of the truth of the following: It is given out that the cause of their separation is incompatibility of temper. That is all fudge. A married life of twenty-two years, nearly a dozen children, a spotless life on the part of the wife and mother, and now to have uncongenial temper cause a separation, is simply preposterous. You know how exceedingly philanthropic Mr. Dickens, Mr. Wilkie Collins, Mr. Mark Lemon, and Mr. Bulwer Lytton have been of late years; the honorable baronet, the M. P. for Hertfordshire, writing a play to prove that we are not so bad as we seem, and the more youthful litterateurs putting on the sock or buskin—I really do not know which—and acting the tame nonsense to a very select company of very amiable persons—'old maids of both sexes,' as Christopher North would say—all for the ostensible purpose of assisting some charity. At these amateur theatricals it was necessary to get some histrionic talent beyond the benevolent projectors, and a Miss Ternan, well known in Manchester, and latterly on the London boards, was one of the artistes selected to bear a part. A very pure and very platonic affection sprang up between this young lady and the author of Pickwick. I am told she has been on very friendly and familiar visiting terms with Mr. Dickens's family. She is now charged with being the cause of the separation that has just taken place between the eminent author and his wife. The affair has not been out quite long enough yet, I believe, to get in the journals, but very soon the whole world and his wife will be gossiping, and laying their heads together, and rolling the sweet morsels under their tongues as something terrible to contemplate. Dickens does not get much sympathy, the public generally deciding, as it does usually in such cases, in favor of the lady. It is the demon in the household, the shadow on the wall, that has been at his elbow for years, and will form the staple for many a narrative. Mr. Dickens's daughters reside with the father, but his son Charles sticks to his mother."

THE HOUSEHOLD OF MR. DICKENS.

We take much pleasure in giving circulation to the following card from Mr. Dickens:

"Three-and-twenty years have passed since I entered on my present relations with the public. They began when I was so young that I find them to have existed for nearly a quarter of a century.

"Through all that time I have tried to be as faithful to the public as they have been to me. It was my duty never to trifle with them or to deceive them, or presume upon their favor, or do any thing with it but work hard to justify it. I have always endeavored to discharge that duty.

"My conspicuous position has often made me the subject of fabulous stories and unaccountable statements. Occasionally such things have chafed me, or even wounded me; but I have always accepted them as the shadows inseparable from the light of my notoriety and success. I have never obtruded any such personal uneasiness of mine upon the generous aggregate of my audience.

"For the first time in my life, and I believe for the last, I now deviate from the principle I have so long observed, by presenting myself in my own journal in my own private character, and entreating all my brethren (as they deem that they have reason to think well of me, and to know that I am a man who has ever been unaffectedly true to our common calling) to lend their aid to the dissemination of my present words.

"Some domestic trouble of mine of long standing, on which I will make no further remark than that it claims to be respected as being of a sacredly private nature, has lately been brought to an arrangement which involves no anger or ill-will of any kind, and the whole origin, progress, and surrounding circumstances of which have been, throughout, within the knowledge of my children. It is amicably composed, and its details have now but to be forgotten by those concerned in it.

"By some means arising out of wickedness, or out of folly, or out of inconceivable wild chance, or out of all three, this trouble has been made the occasion of misrepresentations, most grossly false, most monstrous, and most cruel—involving not only me, but innocent persons dear to my heart, and innocent persons of whom I have no knowledge, if, indeed, they have any existence—and so widely spread that I doubt if one reader in a thousand will peruse these lines by whom some touch of the breath of these slanders will not have passed like an unwholesome air.

"Those who know me and my nature need no assurance under my hand that such calumnies are as irreconcilable with me as they are, in their frantic incoherence, with one another. But there is a great multitude who know me through my writings, and who do not know me otherwise; and I can not bear that one of them should be left in doubt, or hazard of doubt, through my poorly shrinking from taking the usual means to which I now resort of circulating the truth.

"I most solemnly declare, then—and this I do, both in my own name and in my wife's—that all the lately whispered rumors touching the trouble at which I have glanced are abominably false, and that whosoever repeats one of them after this denial will lie as willfully and as foully as it is possible for any false witness to lie before Heaven and earth. CHARLES DICKENS."

ANOTHER LIVERPOOL MERCHANT PRINCE.

Mr. Charles Melly, a Liverpool merchant, to whom the public of that town are indebted for its numerous beautiful drinking fountains, has just established, at his own cost, a free public gymnasium for the working classes of Liverpool, to whom he has issued the following address: "Friends—This play-ground is intended for your enjoyment, and is placed under your care. The poles, ropes, ladders, and chains will bear any fair usage; it will be for you to protect them from willful damage. The trees will adorn your play-ground if they are allowed to grow up, and you will, I am sure, prevent them from being destroyed. This play-ground is hereby placed in your hands; let it be used for the purposes for which it is obviously intended. Let good humor and good temper prevail. Let there be no quarreling among yourselves; and allow no stone-throwing or fighting among your younger members. It rests with you whether the first attempt at free out-door amusement in our town be a success or a failure.—CHARLES P. MELLY.—Liverpool, June 1, 1858."

FRANCE.

CONCESSIONS BY THE EMPEROR.

The Minister of the Interior has addressed further instructions to the prefects on the subject of the sale of the landed property of the charitable establishments in France, which materially modify the effect of his circular on the same subject. Public opinion, it would seem, has still some power in France; and there are limits beyond which it is not deemed quite prudent to venture.

In another matter also, the Emperor has thought it best to make a little concession. The works which are being executed in the Tuileries for the formation of a reserved garden will not interfere with the grand avenue, which is to remain open to the public. The present arrangement of the statues and vases will be changed. The sunk fence near the palace will disappear altogether. The reserved garden will be closed when the Emperor and Empress occupy the Tuileries—that is, in December, January, February, March, and April—but it will be open to the public during the rest of the year.

THE DE PÈNE AFFAIR.

The lieutenants who so well encompassed the death of M. de Pène were examined by the Judge of Instruction at Versailles; and, at the conclusion of the proceedings, they were invited to a splendid banquet by the officers of the garrison of the latter town. It is said that the colonel commandant actually met them as they came out of the judge's office, and escorted them to the festive board. The colonel presided, and the loudest demonstrations of sympathy with these young criminals were made by their military brethren.

A serious degree of alarm is felt in Paris at the proportions now assumed by the quarrel between the military and civilians. At the military entertainments of Hyène and his second, the toast "To the total annihilation of journalism and journalists throughout Europe" was drunk. De Pène was completely exhausted by an attempt to take his deposition on Saturday, the 29th.

Henri de Pène is so far better that his removal from the wretched hovel at St. Germains to Paris is now in contemplation.

The French Government has aimed another blow at the press by depriving Figaro and other small unstamped journals of the privilege of publishing advertisements. The Figaro has been sold for $40,000.

THE AMERICAN CHAPEL.

The Herald correspondent says: "The American chapel in the Rue de Berri, in Paris, is becoming quite a place of fashionable resort. The chapel is of singularly chaste design. There has been no covetousness in regard to space, and the most liberal allowance is made to every seat. The passages between the seats are large and ample, and the seats themselves every way commodious. What is better than all, the minister appointed (the Rev. Mr. Seeley) is a gentleman of learning and scholarship. His discourses are worthy of an audience of the highest caste, and his delivery—notwithstanding he labors under the defect of a weak voice—is deeply impressive and convincing. In every way the American chapel has been a happy thought. Useful as a place of worship, and highly creditable as representing the United States in the most beautiful city in Europe. The long array of superb equipages which throng the door is sufficient evidence of the wealthy class of hearers Mr. Seeley has attracted to his fold. The singing is excellent, and the tone of the organs every thing that could be desired. The Episcopal service is performed in the morning. In the evening the lessons only are read, and a short extempore prayer delivered by the minister before the sermon, which last is generally about three quarters of an hour in length. The greatest courtesy is shown to all strangers."

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS IN FRANCE.

A commission, some time ago, charged to make investigations respecting railway accidents, has terminated its labors. It has ascertained that since the 7th of September, 1835, when the first railway with locomotives was worked in France, up to the 31st of December, 1855, there were 513 accidents—274 consisting of runnings off rails, and 239 of collisions. Of the 513, 252 were caused by railway officials. The number of victims of these accidents was 2374, of whom 1553 were injured, and 821 killed. Of the total, 472 of the injured and 151 of the killed were travelers; the rest were persons in the employment of the companies. Six accidents caused 97 deaths—Versailles, Left Bank, in 1842, 52; Fampoux, in 1846, 12; Orsay, in 1854, 3; Vaugirard, in 1855, 9; Moret, in 1855, 16; and Peltre, in 1855, 5. In order to compare the accidents on the railways with those caused by diligences, the commission states that the two principal diligence companies had, from 1846 to 1855, accidents which caused the deaths of 20 persons, and injured 238 others, the number of passengers conveyed being 7,109,276. Supposing travelers alone to have been the victims, the proportion is 1 death for every 355,463. On railways the proportion is 1 death for every 357,092, which is nearly the same proportion. It appears, also, from the inquiries of the commission, that railway accident are more frequent in England that in France, and more frequent in France than in Prussia or Belgium.

PRUSSIA.

THE PRINCESS FREDERICK WILLIAM AN INVALID.

A Berlin letter says: "Our charming little Princess (often called here 'Madame la Princess Royale') has been confined to her sofa these last three weeks, in consequence of having sprained her ankle while descending the palace stair-case. She is, however, recovered sufficiently to be removed to Babelsburg—a beautiful chateau near Potsdam, where she enjoys the fresh air and the beauties of the country, and is wheeled about in a very pretty Merlin chair, sent over from London by the Queen of England. Rumors are afloat here that an event of much interest to the royal family will take place before the end of the year. However this may be, the Princess looks delicate. The attention of her royal consort has been unremitting and he often carries her in his arms to and from the sofa. The journey of the royal pair to Dantzic and Königsberg is fixed for the 12th of June, and loyal demonstrations are preparing to receive them. The Princess, with characteristic courage, refused to allow this journey to be postponed. The inquiries of the Court circle, as well as of the citizens, as to the health of their much-loved Crown Princess, have been numerous and unremitting, but no official bulletins have been or will be published."

SWEDEN.

RELIGIOUS INTOLERANCE.

The expulsion from Sweden of five women on account of their conversion from the Lutheran creed to Roman Catholicism has excited great indignation. The energetic protests of the Union and Univers have met with the ready approval of the Siècle, which has hastened to offer its contribution to a fund opened by one of the Catholic journals in favor of these women. A Protestant paper, the Lien, published in Paris, pronounces a severe censure on the verdict of the court of Stockholm, and two Protestant clergymen have inscribed their names in the subscription formed by Catholics. The Patrie notices that the Swedish Government can not in equity be held responsible for a measure based on the extravagant interpretation of an ancient law. In fact, the Government did all they could to prevent this scandal to the principles of religious toleration by protracting the trial, so as to have the principle once more discussed by the Diet, where, unhappily, the majority was bigoted in its Protestantism. The Aftonblad, of Stockholm, advises the women not to appeal to the Supreme Court, as, under existing circumstances, there is not the slightest chance of the judgment of the Royal Court being modified. Such an appeal would only serve, it declares, to delay their departure until the winter.

It is rumored that France and England have both made representations to Sweden touching the frightful examples of religious intolerance lately exhibited in that country.

ITALY.

EFFECT OF THEATRE-GOING.

A Naples letter says: "An extraordinary catastrophe occurred here lately in one of the principal families of the city. The Marchesa Castelluccio took her three children, of whom the eldest is scarcely eight, to the Florentini theatre to see Alfieri's tragedy of Orestes, and the performance made a great impression on them. The next day, to amuse themselves, the children imitated the last scene; the eldest boy, taking a kitchen knife as a poniard, plunged it into his sister's throat, and inflicted so serious a wound that she died in a few minutes. He then wounded his younger brother dangerously, and afterward plunged the knife into his own breast near the heart, inflicting a very serious wound. At this moment the mother entered, and her despair at finding one child dead and the other two dangerously wounded may be imagined."

THE ERUPTION OF VESUVIUS—PREMONITORY SYMPTOMS.

A gentleman who visited Vesuvius just before the eruption, gives the following account of what he saw: "As we were about to start, a French party came in from the top of the mountain, and told us they had seen a grand sight of lava; we therefore pushed along briskly, the strange cloud hanging more heavily over the 'Atrio del Cavallo,' and which I now resolved in my own mind was clearly smoke.

"The Resina guide now informed us, for the first time, that lava was flowing through the valley of the 'Atrio del Cavallo,' and that the ordinary path to ascend the cone to the crater was cut off, and he brought us forward over a path seldom traveled, and of a most difficult nature; we, however, proceeded, the cloud of smoke increasing as we went, on all sides; we had to part with our horses and proceed on foot, and had not gone over 300 or 400 yards from where we left the horses, when we came up to an enormous mass of hot lava rolling onward toward the Somma, and we now became aware we were in the immediate neighborhood of a considerable eruption; our anxiety now became great indeed, and we pressed forward, and presently arrived at a wonderful scene. The entire of the lower part of the great cone of Vesuvius appeared on fire, and thick masses of smoke were thrown up, mixed with red-hot stones and flakes of lava; traveling over a most rugged way of old lava, we made our way up to the point whence the stones, lava, and smoke seemed to rise in greatest quantities, and we arrived on a rise just over the greatest fissure.

"It is difficult to explain our feelings on beholding this wonderful and unexpected sight. We here found several guides, and from them we learned that at about nine o'clock A.M. that morning a number of small craters and fissures had suddenly opened, and lava had commenced pouring out.

"It was now nearly five o'clock, and we went quite close up to the largest crater, which we were enabled to do, as the wind blew steady and strong down the valley, and thus we got within eight or ten yards of the next open. From this we counted five or six distinct fountains of fire, the largest putting forth volumes of smoke, stones, and lava; from another a literal fountain of burning matter was ejected; and from all lava and smoke poured forth in greater or less quantities, the whole torrent of lava uniting into a regular stream of red burning liquid, pouring down the incline side of the valley.

THE DESCENT BY NIGHT.

"Our guide now urged us to descend. The lava was running exactly toward the path close to Monte Somma on which we had traveled, and it was quite evident that the smoke, which was blown down the valley toward the sea, would, in the event of a change of wind, leave our only path of return in a most impassable condition.

"We therefore hastened to descend the cove as well as we could, the conflagration lending us a partial glary light. The descent was difficult and dangerous, sand up to our ankles, intermixed with large lumps of old lava. Every moment we were in fear of tumbling head foremost down the precipitate descent. We, however, got safe to the bottom of the cone, and had now to pass the narrow space between the burning lava and Monte Somma, which here presents a face of perpendicular rock, perfectly inaccessible, and we became quite aware the torrent of lava might intercept our passage totally; we could not possibly get up the side of Monte Somma.

"I must confess I felt here considerably nervous, and I saw the double danger of the lava stopping our path and that of a change of wind, which would certainly have smothered us in an instant; and as we pressed on over the rugged road we saw the eruption increasing momentarily. In one place the lava was rolling down the valley in an enormous burning wave, perfectly red-hot and only a few yards from us, and at our point of exit we could see little or no room to pass; and although the sight was one of wonder I never expected to witness, yet we were obliged to press along smartly for our departure through the fiery gate, and when we did arrive at the point of exit, not ten feet remained between the side of the rock and the burning mass of lava. Our guide, however, pressed on briskly, and we passed the ordeal, not without feeling, I must say, excessively uncomfortable from the great heat and the near approach of this fearful burning mass, and, having passed, we rested to see the wonderful sight, now rapidly increasing."

PROSPECT OF GREAT INJURY.

The correspondent of the Times adds:

"NAPLES, May 31, 1858.

"Since Saturday the eruption has proceeded with constantly increasing violence, and has presented at night a more and more magnificent spectacle. In my last letter I mentioned that there issued from the great basin of fire in the Atrio a single stream of lava, which, after a tortuous course, was descending the declivity of the mountain. This stream has continued its course, varying in breadth according to the accidents of the ground, and seems now to direct itself to a point between Portici and Torre del Greco, but much nearer the latter than the former. It approaches close to the scattered farm-houses which lie above the towns at the foot of the mountain, many of which it can scarcely fail to destroy.

"In the afternoons of Saturday and Sunday, two other streams of lava broke out of the great basin, and are descending the mountains toward the neighborhood of Portici. These streams seem to follow the direction of ravines, which run nearly parallel to the ridge on which the observatory and the hermitage stand. These buildings have been hitherto saved from submersion by the lava, by their great elevation, the fluid naturally following the direction of the lower ground at either side of them.

"Last night the spectacle was peculiarly grand and imposing. The lava was poured in increased quantity along each of the streams already established, and being in a high state of incandescence, presented a peculiarly splendid appearance.

"About eight o'clock an immense torrent of lava broke over the ridge which confines the basin of craters in the direction of the Somma. It flowed down the declivity of the Somma as an immense torrent of liquid fire, and with such extraordinary rapidity that in less than an hour it had descended through a considerable portion of the mountain. Its progress was then retarded, partly by the diminished steepness of the ground and partly by transverse ravines, which must be filled before the fluid can advance. Nothing could exceed the splendor of this torrent of liquid fire, forming the fourth principal stream of lava; but the most extraordinary burst of splendor which has been presented since the commencement of the eruption took place soon after nine o'clock, when all the mouths seemed to be simultaneously called into violent action, and to vomit forth such torrents of lava that the entire mountain seemed one blaze of fire; the varied colors produced in different parts, owing probably in part to reflection, presented a beautiful and striking appearance. The lurid light diffused from this enormous burning mass rendered visible the subjacent country, the towns, the coast, and the bay.

"On each night several thousands of persons of all ranks, from the peer to the peasant, urged by curiosity, repair to the scene of this extraordinary spectacle. The darkness being complete, and the route in many parts difficult, each party is furnished with a torch, and the view of these hundreds of torches flitting about between the streams of lava is most curious, presenting the appearance of multitudes of fire-flies.

"The hermitage, which is close to the great basin of craters and rivers of lava, is approached by a tolerably good carriage-road, and, as may be supposed, hundreds of vehicles of every description, from the calêche of the millionaire to the humble corricolo, are collected there toward midnight. Donkey parties abound, of which ladies do not fear to form a part."

ST. HELENA.

LONGWOOD GRANTED TO THE FRENCH.

The St. Helena Herald of the 4th of March contains an ordinance of the Governor, granting to the Emperor of the French, and his heirs in perpetuity, the lands forming the sites of Longwood and the tomb of Napoleon I. The lands in Napoleon's Vale, where the tomb is situated, comprise about twenty-three acres, while those of Longwood comprise about three acres. They recently belonged to private owners, and have been purchased by the Crown for the purpose of the present transfer at a cost of £1600 for the tomb, and £3500 for the house.

INDIA.

THE LATEST NEWS.

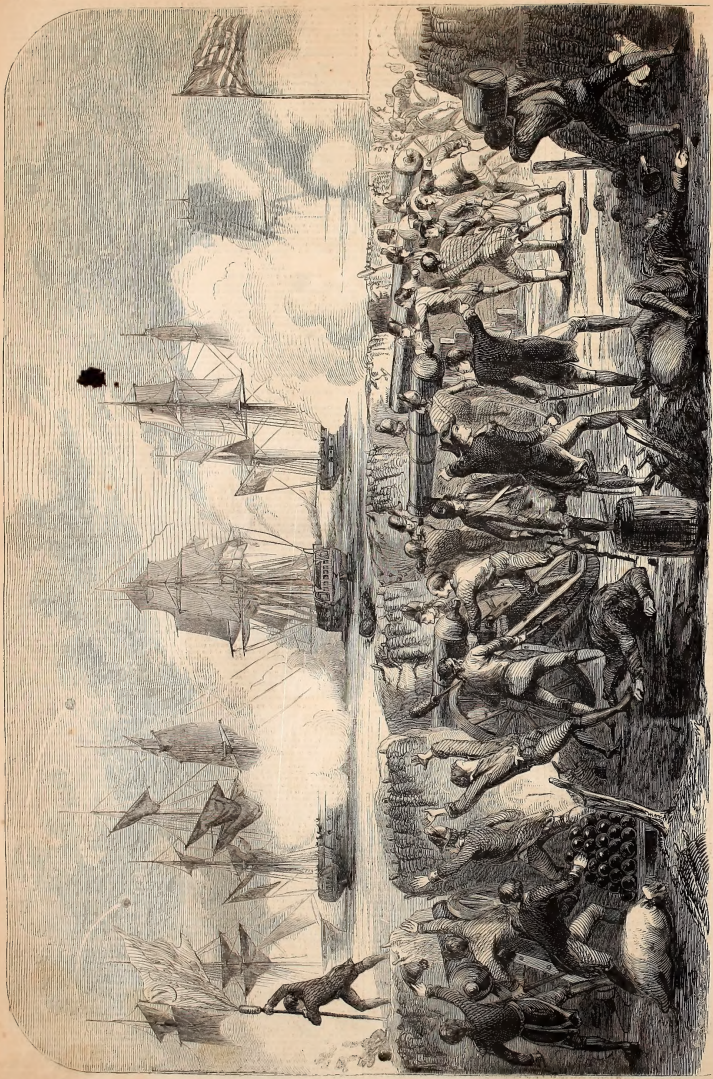
A week's later news from India has been received in England, via Alexandria and the telegraph from Malta.

Sir Hugh Rose met the rebels and defeated them with great slaughter, no less than four hundred having been left dead on the field. The rebels are collecting rapidly at Calpee, where they are making another stand against the British forces. Nena Sahib seems to have become somewhat alarmed for his own safety, and attempted to escape to Central India. His retreat is, however, cut off. A detachment of Europeans and Ghoorkas have been repulsed by the rebels in the mountains.

THE HEAT.

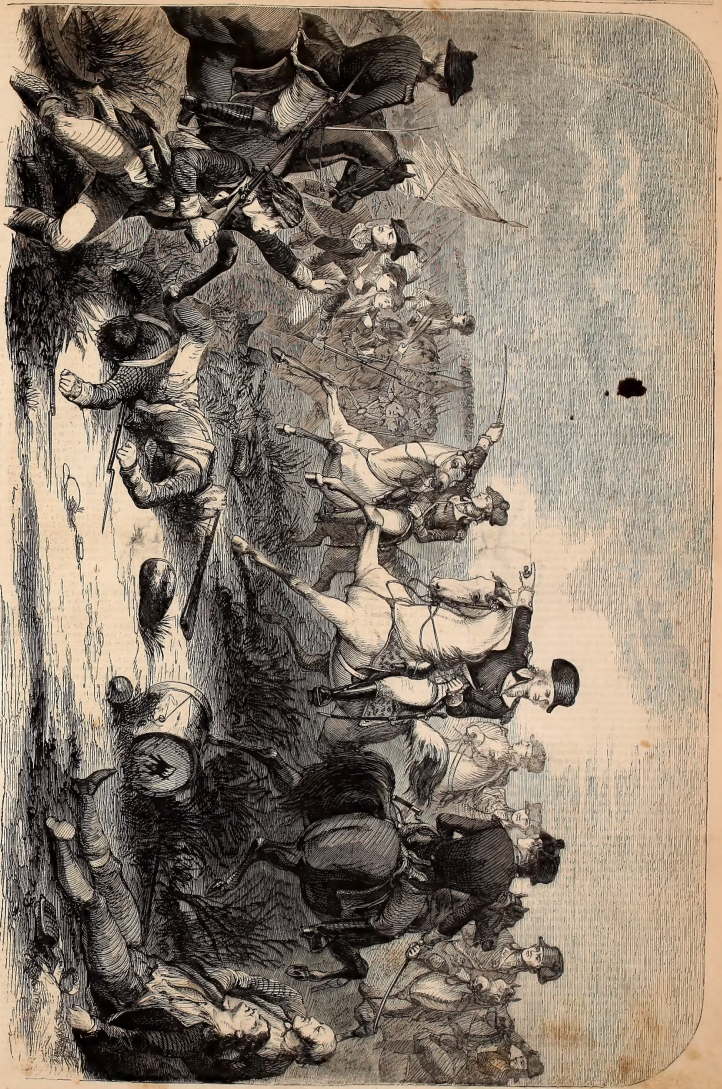
Mr. Russell writes: "The thermometer at 108° in the shade, and inside the tent at noon three days ago, was a warning of unmistakable cogency that 'summer was coming.' Since that time the heat has not been quite so great, but the hot winds, which set in about ten o'clock daily and last until sunset, are all but intolerable, charged as they are with dust of a revolting nature, which fills every pore and fires the blood—which seems to penetrate the internal mechanism of the body, as it does in reality force its way into the works of a watch—which renders all out-of-door exercise a sort of severe penitential infliction, and makes dwelling in tents utterly miserable and hopeless. By the time this letter reaches you—and when that may be I have not the slightest notion—you will be enjoying the rigors of the merry month of May, and, in common with the rest of the English army, I shall be experiencing the pleasures of an Indian summer; but already has the premonitory symptom of the latter satisfied me that campaigning can only be conducted at an enormous cost. The hottest day that comes, let some one, who is sincerely desirous of understanding what the dry winds are like, repair to any iron-foundry in full activity, and stand in front of the fire when the furnace-door is opened; but unless he can add to it the odors procurable by standing over the grating of a Strand cook-shop in the dog-days, he will have but a poor idea of the nastiness of the blast, which, sweeping over burning, sandy plains covered with putrefying remains, whisks clouds of pulverized animal matter along with it, and rushes in dense yellow all over the city and the plains around it. To the increasing heat there is added length of days, greater power to the wind, and, if possible, more dust. Of the latter it is quite beyond the powers of writing to give a description. It is so fine and subtle, that long after the causes which raised it have ceased to exert their influence, you may see it like a vail of gauze between your eyes and every object. The sun, while yet six or seven degrees above the horizon, is hid from sight by it as though the luminary were enveloped in a thick fog, and at early morning and evening this vapor of dust, suspended high in air, seems like a rain cloud clinging to a hill-side. When this dust is set rapidly in motion by a hot wind, and when the grosser sand, composed of minute fragments of talc, scales of mica, and earth, is impelled in quick, successive waves through the heated atmosphere, the effect is quite sufficient to make one detest India forever. Every article in your tent, your hair, eyes, and nose are filled and covered with this dust, which deposits a coating half an inch thick all over the tent."

CHINA.



WHAT THE BELLIGERENTS WANT.

The Evening Post states, on the authority of a private letter, that the Plenipotentiaries have agreed to make the following demands of the Chinese Government:



1. The opening of the coast and great rivers of China to foreign commerce;
2. The access of foreigners to the interior, under the restrictions of passports;
3. A reduction of duties on certain articles of commerce;
4. Residence of an embassy at Pekin;
5. Indemnity—but no territory.

MORE TORTURES.

The Morning Post correspondent thus writes: "It is now about a week since that two maimed and mutilated wretches crawled into our lines. They were coolies in our pay, but having wandered away from our camp had been seized by the mandarins in the very city of Canton, within sight of our sentries, and almost within call of the yamun where our commissioners were sitting adjudicating laws. They were conveyed away to the city jail, and there cruelly tortured, wedges having been driven into the bones of both legs, crushing the ankles. By some means or other these poor wretches were permitted to escape, when they crawled, as well as they were able, to those they knew would protect them, and through the medium of an interpreter made known the atrocities that had been committed. From statements thus made, the city jail and another jail in the distant western suburb were visited, where several more of these, our own coolies, were discovered, all more or less subjected to torture. The gun-boat that came down last evening brought word that six more of these coolies had presented themselves within our lines on the previous evening, with their legs frightfully mutilated."

THE ATTACK ON FORT MOULTRIE, SULLIVAN'S ISLAND, SOUTH CAROLINA, ON JUNE 28, 1776.

THE BATTLE OF MONMOUTH, NEW JERSEY, ON JUNE 28, 1778.

THE BATTLES OF MONMOUTH AND SULLIVAN'S ISLAND.

On the 28th of June, two of the most important battles in the Revolutionary struggle were fought. These were the battle of Monmouth and the attack on Sullivan's Island in the harbor of Charleston.

To understand the former, the reader must be aware that the British had, almost throughout the Revolutionary struggle, maintained the control of the Jerseys. In the spring of 1778 the British commander felt the necessity of concentrating his forces and occupying a shorter line of coast. Accordingly, in the month of May of that year, it was resolved to evacuate Philadelphia, and measures were taken for the conveyance of all the military stores from thence to New York. Washington was at the time encamped at Valley Forge; his army was suffering acutely from want of provisions and from inadequate supplies of all kinds. The chief eagerly seized the opportunity for active motion.

The Delaware was instantly crossed, and the entire American army under Washington was in pursuit of the enemy. The chief, as it seems, was in favor of an immediate attack with the whole army. Some of his officers were in favor of merely harassing the enemy's retreat. Lee and others, again, were opposed to any interference with the retreating column. Contrary to his usual practice, Washington allowed himself to be somewhat swayed by the counsels of his officers, and merely ordered out a few detachments, under Lafayette and Lee, to harass the enemy in their march eastward. This policy was but temporary.

By 27th June it was obvious that a general action was inevitable, and General Lee was ordered to prepare for battle. Sunday, 28th, was the hottest day of the season. As day broke, the British showed that they were ready for the conflict. General Knyphausen set his troops in motion at early dawn. After breakfast, Sir Henry Clinton followed his example. Dispatches were forwarded to General Washington, who was in the rear, and orders from him directed Lee to commence the attack at once. Lee obeyed. The entire advance column of the American army was set in motion, and both the flanks of the British army were simultaneously attacked. Clinton, who commanded the English, perceived the danger, and instantly concentrating his forces, made a furious attack on Wayne's corps. Lafayette desired earnestly to be allowed to operate a diversion by attacking the enemy in the rear; but Lee, for some reason or other, would not allow it.

"You do not know English troops," he said; "we must take care, for at the first shock our men will give way."

A few minutes afterward, before the action had become general, indeed before any musketry had been used, Lee gave the word to retreat. No one has ever satisfactorily accounted for this movement. Lee is known to have been a man of undoubted courage, and a general of more than average skill. It has been asserted that he fell back purposely, in order to disgrace his chief; but this is hardly credible. On the other hand, it is said that Lee's force was quite inadequate, in the position it occupied, to sustain a conflict with the entire army of the enemy, and that to maintain himself would have involved an unjustifiable sacrifice of men. Whatever his motives were, it is certain that he ordered a retreat, and while he was leading his men from the field, he was met by Washington, who expressed, in indignant terms, his dissatisfaction at the retreat of the advanced body without a general action. Our artist has selected this moment as the most dramatic point of the battle, to be the subject of his picture. What precise words Washington used it is now difficult to tell. They were, no doubt, homely, energetic, and precise. They were followed instantly by action.

Washington ordered up his reserves, and a general action began. It is not necessary for our purpose to delineate the features of the battle of Monmouth. It will be enough to say that, beginning with the retreat of the Americans, it ended in their victory. Washington had planted his cannon in commanding positions; with his two other arms he commenced a contest which was only terminated by night. Both parties fought with determined resolution: when night came, the soldiers on either side lay down where they were and slept. Such was the heat that many have wondered at the small number of deaths from sunstroke.

When the sun went down, English and Americans occupied their respective positions. But Sir Henry Clinton was too experienced a soldier to continue the contest. At midnight orders were given throughout the British camp to strike the tents, and long before daybreak the field of battle and its vicinity were in possession of the Americans. The loss was comparatively moderate on both sides; but the practical victory remained with the Americans. By the time the Americans were astir, the British were in full retreat toward Sandy Hook.

The other battle portrayed by our artist, is the famous attack on Sullivan's Island, South Carolina, by the British fleet under Sir Peter Parker, on 28th June, 1776. Charleston was one of the points which the enemy deemed it peculiarly necessary to occupy. Accordingly, in June, 1776, a powerful fleet, commanded by Sir Peter Parker, sailed over the bar at the mouth of the harbor, and prepared for the attack. Some five or six hundred men were landed on Long Island, under Sir Henry Clinton, in order to attack the fort on Sullivan's Island in the rear. Early in the morning of the 28th, the assault commenced by the firing of a broadside from Sir Peter Parker's flag-ship, the Bristol. It was promptly returned from the fort, and the action soon became general. All the vessels of the British squadron sailed into the channel between Sullivan's Island and the opposite shallows, and opened fire. On the other side, General Clinton commenced offensive operations in the rear from Long Island.

The fighting lasted all day. The advantage of metal was on the side of the enemy; that of position, coolness, and skill on that of the Americans. So well was the fire of the fort managed, that hardly a shot was fired which did not tell; while the British shells fell into a large tank which had been prepared for their reception inside the fort, and the round shot buried themselves harmlessly in the palmetto logs. So destructive was the American fire, that toward the close of the day there was but one man—the Admiral—standing unhurt on the decks of the Bristol: this is the scene which our artist has portrayed.

The land force, under Sir Henry Clinton, fought bravely enough all day, but made no progress. They could not gain a foothold on Sullivan's Island; and, witnessing the defeat of the fleet, they were glad to relinquish the attempt and to seek shelter on board the ships. At nightfall, the vessels slipped their cables, and having received on board the men they had landed on Long Island, stood out to sea. So ended the Battle of Charleston harbor—a conflict which has immortalized Colonel Moultrie, whose name the fort now bears, and Serjeant Jasper, the hero of the flag-staff, who is commemorated by one of the principal streets of Charleston. It is well that these stirring scenes should not be forgotten.

"ENTER FIRST CITIZEN."

The first time I saw him he wore a brown tunic, of the value of ten cents a yard; he had orange-colored legs; his naked arm was branded with a rude device, indicating that he had been carelessly leaning against a fresh-painted wing; and in his hand he bore a staff, as Roman citizens are wont to do on the stage. His name was not in the bills; he was an "auxiliary"—one of that stalwart band which fills the eye of an audience when the stage-directions say, "Enter citizens" or "soldiers." On this particular evening he appeared to be a fellow of turbulent disposition; and though he spoke but seldom, his actions and bearing were so rebellious, that, in the course of the evening, he and his disorderly comrades were thrice driven from the scene by a small but determined body of lictors, consisting of two men and a youth—an illustration of the natural triumph of discipline over revolutionary anarchy. I next saw him as the "servant, with a torch," in "Macbeth." He was that Scottish menial who receives directions relative to the Thane's drink, and is then summarily sent to bed by his agitated master. He had the same legs and tunic, but the tunic was this time adorned with plaid by the liberal management. Since then I have seen him fighting in the wars of York and Lancaster, enlisting, with careless bravery, sometimes under the White, and sometimes under the Red, Rose. His modest merit has been rewarded with the Cross of the Legion of Honor, given by the Emperor himself, in the spectacle of "Napoleon;" and with undaunted patriotism, he has battled for liberty under the immortal Washington, for no reward save the consciousness of duty fulfilled, and the small nightly stipend received, not regularly, from the theatre. After a grand personation of a loyal Sepoy in the "Cataract of the Ganges," he has, a few nights after, assumed the character of that traitorous rascal who receives his death-blow from Mr. Forrest, in the council-chamber scene of "Metamora."

He was a man of genial presence; a mild blue eye gave a guilelessness to a face whose general expression was not unpleasing, and although he appeared on the stage so often in connection with the famous legend, "S. P. Q. R.," that he might have been considered a type of the senate and people of Rome, his amiable features seemed out of place in the mobs and legions of that great empire. However, he was soiled by no histrionic conceit; and even sometimes came on to remove tables, chairs, and loose properties, preparatory to a change of scene, receiving the customary hoots of the "gods" with the equanimity of a well-balanced mind.

Notwithstanding the simplicity of his duties, I became interested in the man; and one night, pointing him out to a person attached to the theatre, asked his name. It was, as I had supposed, Jones. There was, indeed, a chance of its being Smith; but having a presentiment in favor of Jones, I had already rejected that remote possibility. His Christian name was unknown, but, owing to the Roman circumstances in which I had so often seen him placed, he was, by an unconscious movement of the mind, imbedded in my memory as S. P. Q. R. Jones.

One day, fractures suddenly appearing in some window-panes at my house—nobody knew when or how the damage was done, and, as we had neither cat nor children, I, of course, believed the glass had fallen to pieces from old age, especially as I had never known a servant of alien birth to state any thing but artless truth—I sent to a neighboring glazier for aid, who dispatched to me one of his journeymen. It was S. P. Q. R. Jones—a painter and glazier by day; at night, a Roman senator, or some gallant, though generally speechless, knight, near the loved person of his liege and honored king.

I spoke to him, commencing with a little of that flattery not utterly despised by any profession, but which strikes the not unexpectant ear of an actor or musician with singular pleasure. Supposing, in my ignorance, it impossible to be a glazier and professional gentleman at the same time, I asked him how he contrived it?

"The manager and I have long been professionally connected," said he. "He finds me trustworthy, and willing to do many little jobs about the theatre, so he excuses me from rehearsals. In this way I have all the daytime for my trade. I very seldom have any thing to say on the stage; and when there are one or two lines in the part, I can commit them in a few minutes; and in all the stock pieces I know my exits and entrances by heart. You must know I always had a liking for the stage; my wife, too, was one of the profession; she played chamber-maids, and such like; but her voice was not very strong; so, since her marriage, she hasn't been on in speaking parts. She is a villager sometimes, or a virgin of the sun, when an extra force is wanted; but never appears except on extraordinary occasions, as we have a little girl at home, too young to be left alone; and the manager don't like to see children about the theatre, which is very proper."

With this explanation he set the panes of glass in the places of those which nobody had broken, and went away whistling some familiar music from the "Forty Thieves."

After this interview I saw him frequently, both on and off the stage, and finding that Mrs. S. P. Q. R. Jones had cultivated a natural taste for dress-making, my wife occasionally employed her. Thus was drawn closer the bond of acquaintance between her husband and myself. The lady was about twenty-five years of age, very pretty, and charmingly conscious of the fact. Not disinclined to admiration, and possessing a large share of vivacity, it was to be feared that, with the opportunities found in the dissipated atmosphere of a theatre, she might sometimes be placed in an equivocal position; but, as yet, slander had never soiled her name; while the affection she honestly evinced for her husband and child seemed to be an effectual barrier between her and evil.

There came a period when the legitimate drama, never, perhaps, adequately supported by a fickle people (who, as time moves on, seem more and more inclined to reserve the legitimate article for their closets), was withdrawn, and the equine had usurped its place. Mr. Blank and his splendid stud of horses, consisting of a dozen white and parti-colored ponies, combining their talents with those of the stock-company, were drawing enthusiastic audiences in "Mazeppa," and the like. I attended a representation of this drama. The beautiful Arabian mare, Bloody Mary—so styled, probably, because she was cream-like in color and remarkably kind in temper—portrayed, with her accustomed docility, the Ukraine steed. On her first entrance she threw about, with well-simulated rage, her delicate limbs; but stood commendably quiet when Mr. Blank, as Mazeppa, was bound upon her back; and then, like an arrow from a bow slackly pulled, started off at a moderate amble up the canvas precipice which concealed the rear of the stage. Instead of completing her route, the unfortunate animal, when half-way up the ascent, stumbled and fell upon the stage, a distance of ten feet. The injuries received by Bloody Mary and Mazeppa were but slight; but, in falling, she struck with her hoof S. P. Q. R. Jones, who was standing beneath, and broke his collar-bone. This occurred out of sight of the audience, who, with hisses, demanded another flight; so, while Bloody Mary was again prancing upon the stage, poor Jones was tenderly lifted up and carried home senseless.

A few hundreds in the Savings' Bank, the fruits of former economy, furnished the means for proper attendance, medicines, and the little comforts expected in convalescence, while his wife was one of the most careful and affectionate of nurses. For a week every thing went on well, and poor Jones seemed to have all a damaged mortal should expect under such circumstances. What was it that changed all this? Why did the wife, still devoted and kind, lose the loving earnestness which had characterized her manner? Where was the old home-light in her eyes—those beautiful eyes whose sparkling glances the downcast lashes now concealed? Why, at the sound of some unexpected knock at the door, or footfall on the stairs, did she start almost wildly, as if ill fortune were near? And, bending over the little girl, she would smother deep sighs and gaze wistfully toward her husband, with the anxious face of one seeking the confessional; and he, dozing, his brain clouded by opiates and confinement, seeing nothing, hearing nothing, blind and deaf, when each mortal sense should have been soundest. Deaf to the low, musical tones of a manly voice, trained to love-speeches and husky with the importunity of passion, which sometimes came unheeded upon his drowsy ear, from adjoining rooms, in the watches of the night. Deaf to the click of closing bolts and the stealthy sound of retreating footsteps! Blind, when a dark mustache and evil eyes appeared at the open door, and she, whom he loved with all the power of an honest and noble heart, left him to follow the beckoning finger from his presence.

It was the old, sad story. Before the invalid had left his room, and while he was recovering his former health, his wife went away. Noon came, but she came not; and when the shadows deepened, and the little girl raised her melancholy wail for the absent mother, the poor father, anxious and fearful, sent messengers to seek for her; then news came from the theatre which made his limbs tremble, and the muscles of his face twitch, and heavy groans come from him, as from one in convulsions. At last the manager arrived; and then he knew that the woman he had cherished had stolen his honor and fled, leaving a legacy of shame to her child. A handsome actor attached to the company—a man famed for excellence in light comedy and juvenile tragedy—had fascinated the poor woman, and the opportunity afforded by Jones's sickness completed her ruin. They went to another city, where the seducer, being very popular with the younger part of the female portion of the theatre-going public, readily obtained an engagement.

After the first explosion caused by the intelligence, Jones, to every one's surprise, rapidly regained his strength, and in a few days was able to attend to some portion of his usual avocations. He did not, like a proper hero of romance, arm himself to the teeth with the deadly weapons of American civilization, follow the fugitives, and commit what a jury might have called justifiable homicide. But he felt more than the pangs of the hero of romance, and deeper was the agony from his efforts to conceal the wound. It needs not Othello's visage, nor station, nor the sombre scenery belonging to medieval tragedy, to awaken in our time the same passions which drove the noble Moor to murder, despair, and death.

Only four short weeks passed and the lost woman, bearing on her face the aged, weary look with which guilt and remorse brand their victims, opened the door of the room which once enshrined a happy fireside, and knelt sobbing at his feet—a discarded mistress! He did not spurn her; his eyes, from which the light of happiness was gone forever, did not blaze with fury on the unhappy wretch before him; but he took her up, drew her tenderly to his breast, and kissed her; then leading her to the bed where the little girl lay asleep, he said,

"Kiss her, Mary dear; she has been waiting long for you!"

No upbraidings, no noisy ebullition of rage—nothing but the loud sobbings of the false wife and the clamorous joy of the awakened child.

She lived with him but a little while. There was no longer any hope or object in life for her. Broken-hearted and abased, she never left the house again. Hour by hour she faded, and when the cold time of autumn came he took her from the cheerless, noisy city, and laid her to sleep in the sun, near the trees of the country church-yard in the sight of whose spire she was born.

He toiled on for the sake of his child, faithful to all his duties; never misanthropic nor moody, although silent, and sometimes, when alone, tearful; and time passed on until it was two years from the death of his wife. The actor with the black mustache and winning voice came back; two years had wrought some change in him, too. The black mustache was there still, but the voice was hoarse from constant drams, and the speaking eye was yellow and sunken. Whether this loss of personal beauty struck the audience unfavorably, or whether the disreputable circumstances under which he closed his last visit, excited against him the strong moral feeling which is always supposed to pervade an American audience, it would be impossible to decide; but no sooner did he spring, with the old, elastic, light-comedy step, upon the stage, sideling toward the boxes with the professional smirk which begs applause, than a hiss oozed from one corner of the house and spread with fearful rapidity from pit to gallery—a hiss which seemed to remind all that this man had violated the decencies of society, and was now insulting the proprieties of life by his very presence. It may be remarked that the juvenile moral sense of the young gentlemen in the gallery appeared to be so severely outraged that from that quarter proceeded by far the fiercest and loudest expressions of disapprobation; to such an extent did the enthusiasm of these young supporters of a pure life carry their opposition, that many half-consumed apples and other seasonable fruit were discharged with considerable velocity and tolerable aim at the stage. Pale through his paint, the actor cast a deprecating look at the more respectable part of the audience, and his knees involuntarily trembled when his practiced eye saw the excitement against him was too strong for him to calm. Cries of "Off! off!" forced him from the foot-lights, and bending to the storm, he ran from the stage. The tempest immediately ceased; and he, panting with agitation, beheld before him the pale countenance of S. P. Q. R. Jones, who chanced, at that moment, to step to the prompter's table. Jones started, for until then he had not seen the man since his return.

"Ah! it is you, then!" exclaimed the disgraced actor; "you, you cowardly villain! This is the way you take to revenge yourself. You pack the house, curse you! with a gang of hissing, dirty, sweaty mechanics, to drive me from the stage—to ruin me—and all because your wife—"

He said no more, for Jones's hand was on his throat, and the insult trembling on his tongue died away in an unmeaning gurgle. The blows fell fast, and the pent-up misery of many a month added weight to the arm; no one—not even the mighty manager, who was attracted to the scene by the tumult—attempted to restrain the supernumerary; and when, after a last effort, he cast his enemy on the ground, the remains of manly beauty which dissipation had spared to the actor were destroyed forever.

After this unfortunate affair the theatre became more and more distasteful to Jones—more so, perhaps, from its being stained with the memory of revenge desperately taken. It is indeed certain that he felt more remorse for this than the actor ever did for the great wrong he had inflicted. A few months after, I accompanied him to the cars, for we had been good friends from the first, to see him off to the West, where, with his little girl, he had determined to settle.

"I shall never come back again," said he, as he shook my hand at parting. "Every thing here makes me shudder and think too much of things which must be forgotten."

I stooped and kissed the little girl; the bell rang, the train started, and the "first citizen" made his final exit.

THE GALLEYS.

Vidocq, in his most impudent, but most amusing Autobiography, in which he is as demonstrative of his vices as other men are of their virtues, describes with great unction the sensation that a long chain of prisoners bound for the galleys of Marseilles creates in the streets of a French town. "Come, Jeanette! come, Fanchette! here is the longest chain we have seen for many a month," is the cry from door and window, as the red-capped men tramp along, grinning, singing, and thinking of the file hidden in a snug box in the belt of their rois-rasi, at night to "fiddle" off their chain.

But, terrible as the galleys even now are, I would invite my reader's attention to a few facts about those galleys of Louis the Fourteenth, in which he shut up the unhappy Protestants of the Cevennes.

The galleys were long, shallow, flat, decked vessels, with two masts, seldom able to use their broad fan-sails except in gentle, blue summer weather; trusting rather to their broad wings of oars, except when out of sight of land, and fearful of being surprised by sudden gusts that lash the Mediterranean to madness. They were fair-weather birds, were those galleys, and, in a storm, were like so many butterflies caught in a gusty April shower. There were five slaves to every oar, and in all three hundred slaves. The top-sawyers, or upper-end rowers, were generally shaven Turks, who were willingly granted the honor, since the place was the most laborious in the vessel. Honor would not be so much envied, if it were known with what labor it was burdened. To keep down these three hundred chained demons, each galley had a crew of one hundred and fifty men, including officers, soldiers, seamen, and servants. Men who shouted orders, who reefed and clomb, who dragged out guns and fired from the rigging, and boys and varlets, who ran here and there with dishes and salvers, were unchained slaves. At the stern of each galley there was a covered chamber, rounded like a cradle, in which the captain lurked at night or in foul weather; but in the daytime it was frequented by the officers and chaplain, who repaired here to swear and quote their texts, while the subaltern officers had also their several lairs and haunts; while all the rest of the crew sweltered by day in the full glare and blaze of Neapolitan and Genoese suns, or the damp and moon hours of Corsican or Marseillese nights. There was, indeed, a sort of tent or awning suspended by a long cable slung from head to stern, that afforded some thin shelter, but only in bright, fair weather; for in the least capful of wind or puff of storm it was taken down, being dangerous overweight for a boat like a bark; so that, after blood-sweats of passionate rowing, whether pursuing the English or flying from the Turk, the wretched slaves, off Morocco, often found their broad backs coated with snow till they could reach the open arms of a friendly port.

The slave's yearly allowance for clothes was two coarse canvas shirts and a little red serge jerkin, slit up on each side to the arm-holes to give their brawny arms full play. The short, loose sleeves did not reach to the elbow. Every three years they received a coarse frock, and for their shaved bullet-heads a little red Phrygian cap that the Revolution afterward rendered so terrible. Sick or well, their only bed was a board a foot and a half broad; the sleeping-places most dreaded were those nearest the officers of the galley, for if the vermin roused the slave, so that his chains rattled and awoke his neighbor, he was torn to pieces with the gashes of rope scourges.

The fatigue of lifting the great oars of a galley, though pleasant to read of in the Odyssey, was extreme. In all seasons the perspiration trickled down their limbs; and when they began to grow faint and flag, one of the three comites (the comites were boatswains) ran down the gangboard which intersected the ship to find out the rascal who did not keep touch and time with the rest. Weak or lazy, dying or worn-out, they did not care; he might be a sapless boy, he might be a decrepit old man—down came on his bare shoulders the large centurion's rod, which was so long, generally, that the two or three nearest rowers also felt the blow, which left triple scars and red letters on every back on which it fell. To scowl, or swear, or groan, was only to draw down fresh sorrows and fresh blasphemies and threats. Renewed toil was the only received mark of submission.

Reaching port brought no end to the slave's labors, for rowing ceased only to bring fresh toil and grief. The comites prided themselves on dexterously casting anchor, and while the cable ran out their lash went faster as the prisoners' arms moved quicker.

To support these hardships, the slaves received every morning at eight o'clock a portion of good biscuit, and at ten a porridge of hot-water soup, with some rancid oil, musty peas and beans floating at the top. When on duty they had handed round a pischione (two-thirds of a pint) of wine morning and evening. When quiet at anchor in any Mediterranean port, all the slaves who had any money were allowed to have a jubilee, and to buy meat; and the Turk who commanded the oars, that is, who pulled at the end and was not chained, was the agent to the meat market, and was also employed to watch it dressing in the cook's room. When the cook was a sullen villain—villains not being rare cattle in the galleys—he would sometimes, in a brutal passion at the trouble or hindrance, break the poor men's earthen stew-pot, and throw it overboard to the fishes; while the poor fellows, chained by their ankles, fainting for want of food, were unable to murmur or complain.

The officer's table, however, was all this time well furnished both for plenty and delicacy, the smell of the dainties giving the slaves a more exquisite sense of their misery by seeming to scoff and deride their poverty and hunger. Sometimes the galleys were lying in the ports of Morocco or Nice during the full swing and hubbub of the carnival. Then the prince or doge, with all his retinue, armed, comes on board, as Don Quixote boarded the galleys floating on a stream of music, with a rustle of perfumed feathers, and a fluttering of long flags; there was mirth, and song, and revel, while the slaves sat doubled up upon their benches, ready to burst their chains, and cut every honorable throat, if they could or dared. They were hungry, wretched, hopeless. They had, indeed, come to help in the ceremony, for, when the great man's gilded feet touched the deck of their flying ship, the comites would give two shrill whistles: the first was for attention; on hearing the second, they gave a lamentable, piteous howl of welcome, which must have been most dolorous and terrible to hear.

When the waves were rolling up in green alps, snow-capped, and threatening, the galleys could not put to sea, and such slaves as had trades took to working, planing, shoemaking, weaving, and painting; such poor serfs as had none were taught to knit coarse stockings, the comites supplying them with yarn, and paying them for all they did half the usual price—and that not in money, but in broken meat and watered wine. To be caught sending for wine from the shore, was to be turned up and bastinadoed incontinently. The most touching sight of all in these wet, stormy, dark days, was to see the poor, low-browed boors, who knew no trade, and could not even read or knit, busying themselves, and trying to make themselves useful and acceptable, by cleaning their comrades' clothes, or freeing them from the torments of parasitical life; for even the beggar has his courtiers.

Such perpetual toil, imprisonment, and bad diet, was already breaking out in fever and sickness. For the sufferers there was a snug hospital in a close, noisome, dark corner of the galley's hold, to which light and air came only in a Rembrandt sort of way, through a miserable scuttle two feet square. At each end of this room was a fanlar, or scaffold, on which the sick were thrown without beds or pallets. When the scaffold grew full, the slaves were laid out on the cables, sometimes as many as eighty at once, stench and pestilence ruling supreme, and tormenting them in various ways. The chaplains, who came into this den of death to confess the dying, wore a night-gown to protect their clothes from the vermin. In this dreadful hole there was only three feet space between the scaffold and the ceiling. The confessor had to throw himself down on his stomach at the dying men's sides, so as to listen to the groans of their confessions. The place was so horrible that the sick preferred to die straining at the oar rather than sink into the stinking darkness.

There was a surgeon kept to attend to these lazars of humanity; but how could he fight against such invitations and bribes to pestilence and death? There was also a supply of the best drugs furnished by the French Government; but the surgeon generally considered these as mere perquisites.

Every one preyed on these poor wretches. For instance: during sickness, the king ordered every man in the dark hold to have a pound of fresh bread, a pound of fresh meat, and two ounces of rice, every day; but the steward stole the allowances, and let the slaves die unheeded, generally contriving to make a fortune in about six campaigns. Seventy sick men would be fed on twenty pounds of bad, cheap meat, soaked in hot water. At these frauds the surgeon and steward connived. Sometimes a simple-minded, warm-hearted chaplain would astonish the silk-coated minister of marine at Versailles by the narrative of these horrors, and obtain a promise of redress, forgotten as soon as made.

There were in the galleys five sorts of persons—seamen, Turks, deserters, criminals, and Protestants. The Turks were brought as stout-limbed gladiator-men to manage the stroke-oars, and were called Vogueavants. They had the same allowance as the soldiers, and were ranked with the upper slaves, who pulled in the Banc du quarta, or the Camille and les Espaliers. They were generally very stout men, who wore no chains, but had a ring round the ankles. They were servants to the officers, and were eminently honest and trusty. When they arrived at any port they had liberty to trade, so that some of them were worth three or four hundred pounds, which, to the shame of Christians, they generally sent home to their wives and families. They were very kind and charitable to each other, and very strict in their religious observances: natural enough; for exiles keep religious by the pressure around them of a repugnant faith. These Turkish rowers, especially at the Ramadan fast, the first moon of the year, never ate or drank from sunrise to sundown, in spite of all the toil and labor at the oars which they pulled, looking faint and hollow-eyed as ghosts. If a Turk were imprisoned, his companions always interceded, in a turbaned mob, with the captain for him. If one was sick, the rest clubbed to buy him meat, or purchase him drugs or tonics. In short, as an eye-witness says, the Christians in the galleys seemed to turn Turks, and the Turks to turn Christians. They were very obdurate against any chaplain who tried to convert them, declaring they would rather turn dogs than be of a religion that was so cruel as to suffer so many crimes.

These Turks, during mass, were put into the caïque or long boat, where they smoked, talked, and scoffed; safe from the last of the comites. In spite, however, of their being so well treated they sighed for liberty—the very name of a galley being terrible to them. They generally remained slaves for life, unless, when they grew very old and unserviceable, they met with friends who would buy them off.

Fops in the Palais Royal used to tell stories of men who, when released, would not quit the galleys: we now may judge how far these stories were probable.

The fançoniers, or deserters, were generally poor peasants who had committed the unpardonable offense of buying salt in some illegal district, such as Burgundy or Doubs, where it is cheap. At this time (Louis Fourteenth's) four pounds of salt cost three shillings and sixpence; so that some poor families could not often eat their soup for a whole week together for want of this precious condiment. If discovered buying it in a cheap district, they were instantly sent to the galleys. It was a cruel sight to see a wife and children watching a poor rustic being bound with chains for the humble offense of buying salt in a distant country contrary to some miserable custom law. The fançonier's term of imprisonment was generally only for five, six, or eight years; but the misfortune was, that if strong or robust at the oar, and a useful workman, he was never released.

The mere deserters, though generally brave young countrymen, driven to despair by a cruel conscription for unrighteous and foolish wars, were a lower class than even the fançoniers. At one time they used to cut off their ears and noses; but, because this led to noisome diseases that made them the dread of the crew, they continued the practice of merely slitting them. Many of these patriots were men of education and birth. A still more degraded class were the criminals, felons, sharpers, or highwaymen. These wretches soon took courage, striking up friendship with old friends in chains, telling over their rogueries and boasting of their crimes. They generally grew more desperate, hopeless, and wicked, the greatest villain passing among them for the greatest hero. If a stranger came on board, gaping and timid, hey presto! away went his handkerchief and snuff-box—pinch from hand to hand, all down the benches. The rogues forged titles, engraved false seals, counterfeited handwriting, which they sold to knavish friends who came to see them.

When they were released, they returned to the world twenty times worse than they went in. When they were attending the minister, they poured out oaths and blasphemies that set the chaplain's hair on end. Sometimes they would show the blue stain that the ropes had left round their thievish necks, boasting that still they were no cowards; but that on their reprieve, had robbed the first person they met, and that now, not being known to the judge, they had only been sent to the galleys, where they rejoiced they had bread and good company. Even in the galleys they committed the most horrible of crimes.

The slaves were sometimes, when old, quiet, and highly favored, allowed to keep shops about the port, and work, sell, and even walk in the town upon giving a penny to the Turk with whom each of them was coupled, and eightpence to the pertuisane or partisan leader who guarded them. They were also allowed to receive letters and money from their friends—only if they were criminals, but not if they were Protestants.

The galleys were much used in Mediterranean sea-fights, to guard the level line of coasts, rock, or sandbank; to convoy merchant-ships when they were in danger of being set on by the Duke of Savoy's brigantines. They were used with their long stern-chasers, or howitzer guns, to sink the flaming fire-ships, and to tow along disabled men-of-war. They would also attack a becalmed ship, working at her fore and aft, to avoid her sweeping broadside, and occasionally overpowering her with a howitzer shot between wind and water. A ship, however, needed but a little breeze to crush five or six galleys.

When a Protestant slave refused to kneel at the elevation of the mass, he was sentenced to be bastinadoed on the coursier gun. The chains were first taken off, he was then stripped naked by four Turks, and stretched on the gun. A Moor then beat the wretch with a tough cudgel or a knotty rope's end dipped in brine. Vinegar and salt were then thrown on his wounds, and he was dragged into the hospital, seldom reviling, but piously calling on God for help.

When a prisoner was a saint, or obnoxious in any way to the comites or officers, either because he did or did not complain, they placed him next some ribald thief, who would annoy and taunt him, or chained him near the pump, or invented work for him. Then they would make him serve round water to all the benches, or beat him for concealing letters, or lashed him for leaving open, unchained, or for breaking a water-barrel. Then they would set him to carry cordage, or clean iron balustrades; or would keep him without food till noon, and cut it small, to prevent his selling it. Monsieur le Fevre, a French advocate, eighteen years in the galleys for being a Protestant, says, "There were some who, to make themselves sport, beat me continually; but chiefly our captain's steward, who called it painting of Calvin's back with cudgels, and then asked, scoffingly, whether Calvin gave strength to work after having been laden with so many blows; and when he had a mind to begin again, he asked if they would not give Calvin his commons, and it was his delight to see me cast down daily with blows and fatigue. The wheedling officers that would please him, made use of that means, as if they tickled him, to make him laugh. When they saw me lift up my eyes to heaven, he said, God does not hear the Calvinists; they must suffer their due until they either die or change."

This is what the Jesuit Revocation of the Edict of Nantes led to. This is what the Grand Monseigneur tolerated.

SOWING HIS WILD OATS.

In one of Connecticut's most charming valleys, on a balmy, quiet evening, Harry Grey and his Jenny Ellis walked homeward with reluctant steps. They had been enjoying one of those hours known only to lovers. Harry's right arm encircled the round and delicate waist of Jenny, and her golden ringlets were wafted by the evening breeze across his breast. They had been earnestly conversing—he in entreating the beautiful girl to delay no more their now long-retarded union; she in endeavoring to prove to Harry the propriety of waiting until he was more settled in life, and of a more serious way of thinking; or, as she termed it, had "sown his wild oats."

Harry Grey, affectionate, yielding, and convinced that his wise and lovely Jenny knew best about all the realities of life, had ceased to urge, with the few momentous words that, had he but Jenny, he would find no occasion to sow his wild oats—they would all be blown away like chaff before the breath of heaven. But she was resolute; and, dearly as the effort cost her, she had done what she believed her duty to Harry, and even added her arguments to those of her family, that a voyage to a distant land, on his uncle's trading ship, would do him the service required, and that at the close of another year he should return a responsible, sober-minded person, quite fitted to call Jenny his wife.

"You know, Harry, I am young to leave my home yet; seventeen is hardly more than a little girl."

Harry looked down upon her with the tenderest sentiment. "Then Heaven protect us both," said he, "until the right day comes! In one week I shall leave the country, to be gone a year. No letters or communication of any kind can pass between us. If you can not yet trust me for your husband, can you put faith in my absence from you, my guardian angel?"

"There are invisible angels, Harry, watching over you and me," she said, wiping the tears from her eyes; "and, if you continue to love me, they will bring you back as you should come."

Whether Jenny was wise in her decision I leave my readers to judge at the close of my narrative. For myself, I believe in gathering roses when the buds are opening.

Silently they walked until they reached Mr. Ellis's garden-gate. Harry opened it, and Jenny passed in before him. The blue-bells and lilies nodded their heads as the two went by, but neither cast a glance upon the flowers.

It was with no small satisfaction that the parents of Jenny heard Harry's decision; for much as they were charmed by his manly, generous disposition, they could not but think with anxiety upon trusting their child to one whose reckless manner of life, and lightness of thought and action, led them to fear that, however devoted as a lover, Harry, as a husband, might be less so, and their daughter might suffer a premature sorrow.

They all sat about the tea-table, the elder members being the talkative ones. Harry scarce took his eyes from Jenny, and she was so magnetized by his ill-concealed sadness, that it was with difficulty she could withhold the gathering tears from rolling down her cheeks, now becoming paler as the night came on, and she knew she must part from what her heart held most dear. When the meal was finished, Mr. Ellis, passing his arm through Harry's, led him out into the garden.

"Don't be dispirited, my dear fellow! This is a wise decision of yours; and I promise that, on your return, you shall have as fine and merry a wedding as ever was seen in B——."

"Yes, Sir, you are very kind; but I have a strange foreboding that something will occur to separate Jenny from me."

"What folly! It is unworthy so brave-hearted a boy! You should believe Jenny as true as steel. I never knew her to break her faith to any living soul."

"Do not think me a fool, Mr. Ellis; I have no doubts of her—she is an angel."

"Certainly—a nice, good girl. You are both so young, that you could as easily wait five years as one."

Harry shuddered. "Let us speak of other things, Sir. I have the opportunity of making some good speculations in this trip. My uncle will favor me in every way."

"That is well; make money when you can—I need not say honestly—and I will do my part to the full with my daughter's marriage-purse. But I'll not detain you. If you leave for New York to-morrow morning, I doubt not you have some words to say to poor Jenny. Stay here; I will send her to you."

Harry seated himself upon a garden-bench, and fell into deep thought, quite unusual to his vivacious temperament. At any other time a trip to some foreign country would have been a pleasant anticipation, fond as he was of change and excitement, but now a heavy cloud hung over his spirit; and not until Jenny's quick step struck his ear did he rouse from his melancholy reverie. Her presence gave him new courage, and when she sat by his side, begging him to look ever forward to a happy réunion, he felt stirred to do something worthy a man who might claim so lovely a creature for his wife.

Long and late they tarried together, and when the heavy damps of night warned them to seek shelter, Harry folded Jenny to his heart, bidding her his last adieu. He kissed away her fast-flowing tears, himself growing strong as he perceived her weakness. In his turn he now entreated her to look forward to happiness, and assured her over and over of his faithful attachment.

The next morning found Harry Grey en route to New York, where he would take sail in the Pelican for South America. Falling in with his old friends, from whom he had for several weeks been separated, he soon found a balm for his wounded spirit in their lively company. His week in New York was spent in merry-making and jollity—the favorite of all, the last to leave a frolic, and the first to pay for it. Jenny's image remained sacred in his heart, however; and he believed himself a most happy man, notwithstanding his separation, never doubting his own strength nor her faithfulness.

It was a fresh and glorious morning when our friend set sail. A strong breeze sent him rapidly out of the bay, and the church spires of his native city soon faded from his sight. The vessel was in excellent trim, and every one on board in good-humor with each other; consequently the voyage, though long, was scarcely tedious.

In the frequent hours of idleness Harry's thoughts dwelt in that pleasant valley where he had bid adieu to Jenny Ellis; and now, left to his own reasonings, his soul was sometimes shaded with slight doubtings, when he considered that this parting was altogether of her causing. He tried in vain to find no wrong in a case where Jenny was concerned, but his clear perceptions still showed him a folly somewhere, loth as he was to realize it. Leaning, one calm evening, over the bows of the vessel, much troubled in spirit, and nervously passing his fingers through his heavy hair, he reasoned with himself in this manner:

"I was perfectly able to support a wife without this adventure to precede my marriage. Can it be that I have been made a fool of? I do not recollect hearing of an instance quite like this. A young woman acknowledges she loves, at the same time proposes to defer her marriage with the object of her affection until he shall have braved the perils of the sea, and encountered the chances of sickness in a dangerous climate. Her reasons are simply that she wishes him, in this manner, to 'sow his wild oats.' Am I such a hair-brained fellow, after all? I know I profess no form or sect of religion, nor am I horrified at being in the company of jolly boys; but I believe I am, notwithstanding, an honest man—and, I may add, a stupid, that I did not bring this reasoning to bear when I was in the position to make it forcible. But now I must do my best with what lies before me, and regret nothing."

With this conclusion he descended to the cabin, where, to drown unpleasant thought, he joined a party of merry-makers, and laughed and sang away half the night.

When left to his own reflections, Harry's thoughts invariably returned to Jenny. Sometimes he was lost in a dream of her loveliness, when, so great was his desire to be in her presence, that he could only cover his face with his hands and groan at his inevitable separation from her. Alternating with these passionate moods were those of doubt and displeasure, when he seemed to realize in her image only a selfish, conventional girl, who would always cultivate the mere proprieties of life to the exclusion of generous impulses.

It was during one of these doubting phases that the vessel, having received some damage in a spell of rough weather, touched at the Island of Guadaloupe for repairs. Glad to escape from his own thoughts, Harry rejoiced in the event. His ardent temperament could in no way withstand the beauties of nature and the novel scenes that here presented themselves. All he beheld seemed luxurious and attractive. He again became cheerful and light-hearted, finding pleasure at every turn; and before a week had passed he was the favorite and friend of old and young. More especially was he attractive to the young Zara, whose gazelle eyes, dark as night, were often turned in timid affection upon him, as, reclining in the low hammock swung between two cocoa-nut trees, he sang to her his pleasant Northern songs. Her long and glossy braids had more than once been allowed to slip through his thrilling hand without rebuke; nor was he repulsed when, one starlight evening, under a bower of thick matted vines, his lips had pressed her olive cheek. Zara ran from him then, however, nor was he able again to catch a glimpse of her for several days, and each day, as it passed, was more weary than the last, until he seemed to have but one wish left, and that, to tell Zara that her cheek was soft and rich as the ripe peach, her eyes more beautiful than stars, and that he loved her with the fullest passion man ever knew.

Waiting thus, his ardor growing more intense at each hour of delay, the vessel was announced as ready for departure. With a troubled spirit he once more vainly sought for Zara, when, leaving her habitation in despair of ever again beholding her, he heard his name gently called in a voice of sad and yearning expression. He turned, and saw Zara standing in the bower of vines. He ran to her, and, seizing her hands, kissed them many times; then drawing from his little finger a ring, slipped it upon hers.

"Adieu, lovely one!" said he; "it breaks my heart to leave you."

"Must you go?" murmured Zara, the large tears brimming her eyes.

"Not if Zara loves me! Tell me, shall I stay and be her lover—her husband? She shall have all that a woman desires, and we will be happy—oh, Zara, happy as angels! Shall it be so? Speak quickly."

Zara's eyes glowed like burning coals, and her red lips parted as if in a dream of ecstasy. "You will come with me to the Padre!" she exclaimed; "he will bless us—make us one!"

"To the Padre? Yes, to the farthest end of the earth will I go with Zara if she calls me, my beautiful star!" and clasping her in his arms, Harry strained her to his heart while she lay upon his breast with swimming eyes.

"Ah, Jenny, Jenny!" muttered Harry, sotto voce; "had you so trusted, so loved, you were not now deserted!"

Zara and Harry went to the little church and were there united. It did not take long, nor were any words wasted; but as they emerged from the shadowy walls, blind with joy and love, they saw neither the past nor the future.

"Tell my uncle," said Harry, going to the master of the vessel, "that I have a desire to remain at Guadaloupe, and not continue on the voyage; say that the climate suits me, and I see much to be gained. I will remain a year, and then take the first opportunity to return."

The vessel sailed, and Harry sped on the wings of love to his own, his beautiful Zara. Each day, each month, she became more lovely. He taught her many things, and sought to cultivate her mind in the most careful manner. She was a bright and charming pupil as, seated upon the grass in the shade of the orange-trees and trailing vines of scarlet cactus, she listened to his words, sometimes twisting his fingers about her own, or with her cheek against his breast, drinking in the pleasant tones of his voice.

Harry's conscience was not dulled during this delicious season. He remembered Jenny full well and often; but he allowed only the critical side of his reasoning to take effect. Indeed, his love for the passionate, generous Zara quite obliterated that sweet and tender affection he had known for Jenny, and he felt assured that she would soon meet with one more staid and prudent than himself among the many suitors who visited at Mr. Ellis's house, far better mated to her quiet heart and fastidious tastes; and so, folding the past in a mantle of oblivion, he gave himself up to the sweet enjoyment of present happiness.

Harry's heart bounded within him one morning when Zara brought him a son. All that was good and great rose up in his breast. With his boy in his arms, he knelt by his young wife and thanked God for such precious blessings. The child grew in beauty and grace. The father looked upon him with swelling pride—his cup of joy seemed to overflow.

"I must take my treasures with me to my native land. I will show my friends what priceless jewels I wear upon my breast."

About this time a vessel arrived at the island bringing letters for Harry. Nervously he opened them, dreading some unexpected terror; but no, all was smooth and placid as the surface of the ocean that lay before him. His uncle had just learned his determination of staying at Guadaloupe and was satisfied, provided it was agreeable to his nephew. The envelope contained another letter. It was from Jenny Ellis. Harry well knew the delicate deciphering of his name. At the sight he caught his breath. He crushed the small, enveloped note in his hand and went out among the trees to read it alone. The contact of his palm with her letter burned him with magnetic fire. He tore it open:

"MY BEST BELOVED,—Patiently I have waited, and faithfully have I prayed for you. The year has expired, and now my soul rises and blossoms with fresh hope, for I know my Harry is coming. I have given my dear parents all they required of me, another year at home, and your mind has been agreeably occupied with a foreign land and engrossing business, instead of leading the life and keeping the society I always so dreaded for you in New York. Come to me as soon as possible, dearest, for our best hopes will soon be realized. . . . . ."

Harry leaned against a tree gazing at the letter. Not until he re-read it did he fully realise the fearful position of all. She had not forgotten him as he had foolishly hoped. Mistaken she might have been in her decision, but nevertheless faithful, expectant, hopeful, loving. He let fall the little letter as if it had been a stinging wasp, and ran forward blindly, purposeless, toward the hills; he fled like a madman, never stopping for rocks or dangers of any sort, until he reached the edge of a stream whose soft murmurs seemed to sound in his ears like the wailings and tear-droppings of a hopeless, love-lorn maiden. He panted, and great tears rolled out of his burning eyes.

"Miserable man that I am!" cried he; "why do I live! For what purpose do I stand in this garden of the earth, a blot upon its pure surface? Would I had never seen the face of a woman! Oh, Jenny, Jenny! I have wronged you cruelly—irretrievably! What atonement can I make to one so patient, so excellent?" He paced the river's edge with long and heavy strides, the veins swelling upon his forehead from his intense suffering. "Shall I dishonor her by offering myself now, a faithless lover? Love! I will not stain the word by coupling it with pity—I am lover to none but Zara, and she too—she must suffer for my folly! O God! if thou hast not already placed thy curse upon my soul, help me, wretch that I am, to act so that I may not destroy either the one or the other of those who live but upon my constancy!"

In an excess of misery he threw himself upon the ground and groaned in anguish of spirit. Nightfall brought Harry to some fixed purpose. Bathing his face in the cool water of the stream, he retraced his steps to Zara.

"My duty," he said, "if I am able to see it through so terrible an entanglement of circumstances, is to begin again and do as I first promised. I will therefore leave Zara and the child, and return to Jenny, whose poor heart I must satisfy. Why needlessly grieve her, perhaps destroy her reason by saying what I have done? Once every year I will leave her a few months, on pretense of business, when I will console Zara for my absence and rejoice again in the sight of my son." Harry recoiled within himself at so base a deception, and yet he was determined. "I must, I must!" he said, shuddering; "I have but to think of the happiness of those dependent on me."

Resolving thus he reached home. Zara came out to meet him with her usual embrace, but she started and paled when she saw the misery revealed upon his face.

"What sorrows my husband?" said she, clasping her arms around him and kissing his eyelids as he bent toward her.

"Alas! dearest," he said, "I must leave you and my son for a while—my letters call me home."

"We will go also, and then you will not suffer," said Zara.

"Not this time," said he, averting his eyes; "you can not go this time: I must tell them of my marriage first, you know, and they will make preparations to receive you."

"If that best pleases you, then I will wait; but be happy, Harry; be happy, or Zara will die."

"Yes, love, yes, I am happy; bring me my boy!"

At the sight of the child Harry revived. He felt that there is some sweetness in the bitterest cup, do we but seek it. That night he entered into arrangements with the master of the vessel to sail with him next day.

Meanwhile Zara walked among the trees; she saw a letter lying at the foot of one, which she picked up. Alas that her husband had ever taught her to read manuscript! and yet, but for this circumstance, she might have lived a dishonored wife. But her great nature was incapable of suspecting wrong of Harry, and it was his relief only that she sought, when, with a woman's keen perception, she understood his position, and in her passionate devotion resolved to tear him from his terrible difficulty. With a calmness almost sublime, placing the letter in her bosom, she returned to her home. She saw now why Harry must go; she also saw why she must stay, but nothing of her knowledge did she reveal to him—she would not add a feather's weight to his grief. It was sufficient for her soul that she knew Harry loved her.

Neither slept that night, but no moment were they parted. Their feelings were too intense for words, and one concealed from the other the great and terrible determination each had in secret.

At the breaking of the morning Harry prepared for his departure, ever ceasing from his work to embrace Zara, or, upon his knees, to bury his head in her lap to crush the rising sobs. Zara, on the contrary, seemed possessed with a superhuman calmness, and she consoled and caressed him with angelic tenderness. From her he would turn to his sleeping child, imprint soft kisses on its parted lips, and gather courage as he contemplated its innocent beauty.

The hour came. "I will stand upon this cliff, my husband," said Zara, now as pale as marble, "and I will uphold the boy, that you may see us as long as your eye can reach the shore."

"God bless you!" cried Harry, with agonizing tears. "I will come back! Farewell!"

He entered the boat that carried him to the distant ship, and Zara climbed the cliff. Harry turned his face toward that point and gazed as the vessel gradually distanced the land, when, suddenly, he uttered a loud and fearful cry, and, clasping his hands above his head, was about to throw himself into the sea; but he was strongly withheld and carried down into the cabin, where, almost raving, he told how his wife, his Zara, had waited until all help was gone, and then, clasping her babe upon her breast, had leaped from off the cliff into the water beneath.

Fiercely did he war with his own soul, poor Harry Grey, as he lay in a brain fever for many days and nights, and, when he began to recover, he sat upon the deck the shadow only of a man. Reflecting upon the strange and terrible experience of the past year, "It is gone," he said, "gone like a dream! The miserable remainder of my life I will give to Jenny, if she can now accept it. Perhaps she may find some comfort still in her poor Harry Grey; but it is a matter of doubt whether she likes me as well with my wild oats sown."

One night, during his weak and sorrowful condition, broken in spirit and weak in body, they were overtaken by one of those storms too often met with off the coast of Carolina, and, unable to withstand such angry elements, the ship bowed her head before the terrible power and gave up her precious cargo to the fathomless depths of ocean. When the blackening storm hurled destruction upon the struggling ship, and Harry Grey sank beneath the raging water, he seemed to feel invisible arms raising and sustaining him, until he grasped a fragment of the wreck. Exhausted and careless of life, he was strangely borne upon this frail support, and swayed and floated upon its surface over the rolling waves as if he were but a leaf, or a weed of the sea.

With the coming of morning came a calm upon the ocean. It was not without a sensation of relief that Harry perceived floating toward him a small boat, as if sent by some kind water-spirit for his safety. Had he but felt the strength of a child he would have thrown himself into the sea, the quicker to reach his approaching succor; but illness and grief had robbed him of all save life. He grasped the side, however, as the little boat floated by, and detained its aimless voyaging, while he dragged himself into its friendly lap. He then curled himself into the stern and lay quietly, to be carried whither God willed.

Looking dreamily forward, he seemed to see Zara seated near him with her babe upon her breast. Her long glossy hair hung heavy about her polished shoulders, and she was draped in festoons of shining sea-weed. He stretched forth his weary arms, and she seemed to bend forward to him; he felt the cold sweep of her hair, and the waft of her breath across his lips. From that moment he knew of nothing save Zara and the child, with whom he seemed to walk among leafy shades and balmy zephyrs on an island far away, where the very atmosphere was life and love, and the ground elastic under the touch of their light feet.

From these delights our poor friend was brought back to a knowledge of his whereabout when, one morning, he found himself lying in a comfortable berth. He endeavored to bring his faculties to a clearer point as he lay quiet and alone. He heard much bustle and confusion overhead, and, after a while, his cabin door was opened and the visage of a negress appeared within the space. At the sight of his reasonable eyes and calm face she showed a double row of large white teeth, and gave a chuckle peculiar to throats of her color. She closed the door quickly, and Harry was left alone once more; but for a moment only. His next visitor was a hale, sunburned man, with so sympathetic and generous a face that Harry put forth his trembling, emaciated hand to greet him.

"All right with you now, shipmate?" said the captain.

Harry passed his hand over his eyes. "I believe so, my friend; but I feel strangely."

"I suppose you're starved, lad. You've laid here this past week without giving a signal; but the brandy Aunt Sal kep' leaking down your throat has hove you to again. I'll send you some breakfast."

Left to his reflections, Harry drew the most natural conclusion to be drawn under such circumstances: that he was rescued soon after losing consciousness, by a friendly vessel, and his especial desire was now to know whither they were bound. Raising himself upon his elbow, he endeavored to reach the port-hole that he might look out. After one or two trials he succeeded. It needed but one long look to perceive they were entering the harbor of New York. He sank back again, and closed his eyes.

"I have lived, then, it seems," thought he, "for some marked purpose. My work is only begun. This weakness of body will not serve me. I must be up and in action."

The captain entered with a bowl of hot tea and a dish of simple food. "Eat this, lad, and I will find you some clothes." These were soon brought, and when enrobed in them Harry was shocked to find his body so emaciated. The captain laughed at what he called "a bean-pole in breeches." Harry affected a laugh, but he knew too well the cause of his broken frame to find much merriment therein.

I will pass over the details that lay between Harry's leaving the ship and reaching, by easy journeys, his mother's house in the village of B——, near where we first met him with Jenny Ellis.

Still weak, broken much in constitution, he was once more ensconced in his own room, upon the bed where his dreams had always been of Jenny. The little table and writing-desk stood near upon which he had so often written his love thoughts to her; above his looking-glass, even, hung the well-dried bunch of June roses once given him by Jenny. All, all was as of old, except the heart that throbbed dull and slow in the breast he had given to another; and that other, look where he would, the beloved face seemed ever present. Harry sent immediately for Jenny. He was dressed, and lay half-reclining upon the bed.

She came with speed. She had just heard of his illness and wreck, and was prepared to find him feeble and suffering. He listened to her tremulous step upon the stair, and a quiet determination took possession of his soul.

The door opened—she stepped in, as fair, as fresh as when they parted. There were the bright, golden curls, the sweet, drooping lids, the misty, blue eyes; but where was the spell? Where? Harry knew too well. He turned his pale face toward her, and his steady eyes fixed their gaze upon hers. She was about to rush forward with rapturous greeting, but his look transfixed her.

Clasping her hands, she cried, "Oh, Heaven, how altered!"

"Yes, Jenny: is it not as you wished?"

Her eyes dilated, and her slight form swayed as he spoke so quietly—so calmly. "Are you dying? You look so strangely—oh, Harry! what is this?" She sprang forward, and clasped his neck: covering his face with kisses, she did not at first perceive that his arm lay listless at his side, not returning her pressure. She stood up wondering and grief-stricken.

He put his hand to his heart a moment, as if in pain, and said, "I am a broken reed, dear Jenny, not very fit for a bridegroom; but it is the best I could do for you. My wild oats are quite sown, now. Sit down by me; or wait—let us go over to the sofa. Will you help me?"

She passed her arm about his waist, and he leaned his slightly upon her shoulders. In this manner they went slowly across the floor. "Yes, dear," said he, nearing the sofa, "they are all sown. Sit here by my side, and I will tell you how. Don't tremble, Jenny. I am yours, you know, if I am worth your taking; but listen to me— Are you ill?"

"No," she gasped; "talk—talk!"

"Well, then, you sent me from your presence, where I was purely happy, as you know; where one word of yours was sufficient to make me do your smallest wish. You sent me away to meet temptation in foreign lands, there to 'sow my wild oats.' You were all-powerful to influence me, but your power did not reach over the wide ocean, Jenny; and when at last a maiden looked into my heart, and saw there the loving nature, she entered therein and became one of those very sinful grains you had so coldly banished." He took Jenny's hand—it was cold as stone. "Let me cover your neck and shoulders, you are chilly; or shall I hold my arms about you, so—" and he put his arms around her almost fainting form. She burst into tears as she recollected the last, loving, powerful pressure, with which they had held her. "Shall I go on, Jenny?"

"Have you not told all, Harry? The maiden loved you, and you forgot your Jenny for a little while, but now—now you have come back a serious, calm-minded man, with all the old affection renewed, and even more durable from its very quietude?" She spoke excitedly, caressing his cheeks with her little hands.

"Mistake me not!" exclaimed Harry. "This is not so. I intend telling the whole. I married this maiden—married her, because I loved her generous nature that would die for my sake, never fearing my evils, whatever they were."

Jenny sprang forward and turned upon him wildly. "Faithless! faithless! Why are you here? Why do you not go back to her? What have you to do with me; miserable, miserable as I am!" She swept her hair from off her face with her quivering hands, and the tears rushed in torrents down her pallid cheeks.

Harry, too, rose up with unnatural strength. "Because," cried he, despairingly, "she lies in the bottom of the ocean with her child—my child in her arms; and she took with her—" He stepped forward and seized Jenny's hands with a sudden and terrible calmness—"she took with her, all my wild oats. Is not that what you sent me away for, Jenny Ellis? Are you not satisfied?"

Long they looked at each other, these two unfortunate children, until each saw the heart of the other. Gradually their expression softened. Harry let go his close grasp of her hands, and she again supported him to the sofa.

"It is early for us to suffer so much, Harry," said Jenny, in a low, changed voice; "but the fault is my own, and only mine. I see it now when it is too late. Would that I could find happiness for you, but I fear that is not my mission! Farewell, Harry—dearest—dearest—God keep you!" She leaned forward to kiss his forehead. He detained her.

"Jenny, Jenny, you are an angel! I always said it. You deserve something better than the mere fragment of a man; but it is your happiness I wish to live for always; can you find it now in me?"

"My poor Harry, you misjudge me. My happiness, indeed, depends on yours; but the first light that ever sheds its rays over my dark and desolate soul will be when I know you have gone again to that maiden who lives in your heart."

Harry shuddered and concealed his face upon Jenny's shoulder. "To console you, sweet angel, I would have committed a crime—a base deception; but God has saved me."

"And He has saved me also from being the cause, for at my threshold would have been laid your sin, as is now your sorrow and blight."

Ten years have passed since the events related above. Jenny Ellis has never married. She is the staff and consolation of her father's declining years. There is a seat at the foot of the garden where she loves to sit of a quiet evening, alone. She seems then to be watching the stars; some say she communes with departed spirits.

Harry never recovered his natural health and vigor. He went many years ago to join Zara and the child.

SCENE DURING THE INUNDATION AT CAIRO, ILLINOIS.

THE GREAT FLOOD.

On 12th June one of the most furious storms ever known in this country swept over the Northern and Western States. It can be traced by its disastrous effects from Maine to Kansas. Many of the "oldest inhabitants" declare that they never knew so much rain fall in so short a space of time.

The Connecticut River rose four feet. At Worcester, 4½ inches of rain fell—more than the total fall of any month of June for the past sixteen years. At Baltimore the fall of rain was greater than any that has occurred there since 14th June, 1837. Both the Delaware and the Schuylkill overflowed their banks at and near Philadelphia, causing great loss of property. But it was in the West that the storm was most severely felt. At St. Louis the whole levee was covered with water, and quite a number of villages and towns on the Upper Mississippi were surrounded by the flood and partly submerged. The amount of property and crops destroyed will prove to be immense.

Cairo, Illinois, has narrowly escaped total destruction. On Saturday, 12th, in the afternoon, a crevasse opened on the Mississippi side of the town, through which the water poured at a fearful rate, filling up the whole space between the levees, and running over the embankment on the Ohio side about a thousand feet. The Illinois Central Railroad was washed away on the south wing. A part of the new hotel fell in on Sunday. Nearly all the houses tumbled down and drifted away. In the second story of the Taylor House the water stood 2½ feet high on Monday, 14th. At latest accounts, the Engineer of the Illinois Central gave it as his opinion, that if the waters rose one foot higher every trace of Cairo would disappear. Our artist has depicted the scene of desolation after the waters had broken over the levee.

In connection with this scene we subjoin an illustration of a very remarkable spectacle which is thus described by the correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette, on board the cars of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad:

"On crossing the bridge of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad, at Vincennes, the traveler westward witnesses a novel sight in railroading. Before him is a lake (the Wabash valley overflowed) over six miles wide, and longer than the eye can reach. Across this sea the train runs on a trestle-work that sticks out just four inches above the top of the water. Nothing is seen on its broad surface save these two iron rails, around which the waters eddy and whirl, and dash madly against the slender frame which seems to tremble under their force. All over the lake are whirling eddies, carrying big trees and drift round and round. These soon make your head swim, and you feel that the trestle-work is certainly moving; the bottom seems to be undermined and is moving; while the top is tipping over against the current, and you expect every moment to hear the splash of the train going down into the sea. But it don't go, and there is no danger, frightful as it looks.

RAILROAD CARS TRAVERSING THE SUBMERGED WABASH VALLEY

"But now we come to a place that really seems fearful. We are in the middle of the lake. It is just twilight. Almost out of sight of land—nothing but a waste of waters on every side of that long, solitary railway train—we leave the straight line, and go curving southward like a snake's track. Why? Simply because the flood has carried the trestle-work away from its straight course, and left it in a zigzag line (and half upset at that) some distance below where it originally stood.

"So badly upset was this trestle-work that in some places the rail on one side was two feet lower than on the other, and it seemed as though it wanted only the weight of the train to throw it entirely down. The lower rail had, however, been taken up, and timbers placed on that side to bring it up as high, and in some cases a little higher than on the other, so as to throw most of the weight on the upper side. It was also braced up and stayed as well as could be done in the present state of the flood.

"On this half-overturned, racked, and tottlish-looking trestle-work our train crept cautiously along. A railroad train out at sea, with iron enough about it to anchor it safely at the bottom, and creeping along on a shaky trestle-work that the engineer is afraid to jar for fear he may jar it down."

POOR PURSE.

Oh! if I had money galore—in store,
I'd just build a sweet cottage—no more;
In a deep-valleyed glen, far away from rude men:
But when will that time be—ah! when?
And when the sunrise came to open my eyes,
I'd forth with the bees, and the bright butterflies,
And my children all fresh from their sleep:
And we'd cull brightest posies,
Sweetest wall-flowers and roses,
And our hearts in blest gratitude steep.
Oh! they say that great wealth is a curse,
But, what's worse,
My heart is too big for my purse,
Poor purse!

Oh! if I had money galore—in store,
I'd open the lattice, and widen the door
Of my heart and my mind, and all human kind
I'd invite to come in, and a true welcome find.
From sunset to dawn I'd seek out the forlorn—
Lean poets, wan artists, frail daughters of scorn—
Oh! I'd hurry all in to the feast;
And we'd hail one another,
As sister and brother,
Till the bright sun of hope came to gladden their East.
Oh! they say that great wealth is a curse,
But, what's worse,
My heart is too big for my purse,
Poor purse!

Oh! if I had money galore—in store,
That cottage should ring, from the roof to the floor,
With glad voices of joy from old man and boy—
From age, with her crutch, to the child with his toy.
And the warmth of the heart should melt out the cold
Which they say is the soul and the spirit of gold:
That is—to the mean and cold-hearted.
And our hearts should arise,
To our God in the skies,
Each night when my guests and I parted.
Oh! they say that great wealth is a curse,
But, what's worse—
Far worse,
My heart is too big for my purse,
Poor purse!

Miscellany.

—In a lecture recently delivered at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, the Reverend lecturer gave, under the head of Manliness of Speech,

this amusing vocabulary of slang:

There are many young men who seem to consider it essential to manliness that they should be masters of slang. Now just listen for a moment to our fast young man, or the ape of a fast young man, who thinks that, to be a man, he must speak in the dark phraseology of slang. If he does any thing on his own responsibility, he does it on his own "hook." If he sees any thing remarkably good, he calls it a "stunner," the superlative of which is a "regular stunner." If a man is requested to pay a tavern bill, he is asked if he will "stand Sam?" If he meets a savage-looking dog, he calls him an "ugly customer." If he meets an eccentric man, he calls him a "rummy old cove." A sensible man is a "chap that is up to snuff." A man not remarkable for good sense is a "cake"—a "flat"—a "spoon"—a "stick"—"his mother does not know he is out." A doubtful assertion is to be "told to the marines." An incredible statement is "all gammon." Our young friend never scolds, but "blows up;" never pays, but "stumps up;" never finds it difficult to pay, but is "hard up;" never feels fatigued, but is "used up." He has no hat, but shelters his head beneath a "tile." He wears no neckcloth, but surrounds his throat with a "choker." He lives nowhere, but there is some place where he "hangs out." He never goes away or withdraws, but he "bolts"—he "slopes"—he "mizzles"—he "makes himself scarce"—he "walks his chalks"—he "makes tracks"—he "cuts his stick"—or what is the same thing, he "cuts his lucky!" The highest compliment you can pay him is to tell him that he is a "regular brick." He does not profess to be brave, but he prides himself on being "plucky." Money is a word which he has forgotten, but he talks a good deal about "tin," and "the needful," "the rhino," and the "ready." When a man speaks, he "spouts;" when he holds his peace, he "shuts up;" when he is humiliated, he is "taken down a peg or two," and "made to sing small." He calls his hands "paws," his legs "pins." To be perplexed, is to be "flummaxed;" to be disappointed, is to be "dished;" to be cheated, is to be "sold;" to be cheated clearly, is to be "done brown." Whatsoever is fine, is "nobby;" whatsoever is shabby, is "seedy;" whatsoever is pleasant, is "jolly." He says, "blessed if he does this," "blowed if he does that," "hanged" if he does the other thing; or he exclaims, "My eye!" "my stars!" If you asked him which were his stars, he would be "flummaxed." Then he swears, "By George!" "by the piper!" on select occasions he selects "the piper that played before Moses!"

—Mr. MacCarthy, an Irish poet, in his "Voyage of St. Brendan," describes, as follows, the Paradise of Birds:

"Oft in the sunny mornings have I seen
Bright-yellow birds, of a rich lemon hue,
Meeting in crowds upon the branches green,
And sweetly singing all the morning through;
And others, with their heads grayish and dark,
Pressing their cinnamon cheeks to the old trees,
And striking on the hard, rough, shriveled bark—
Like conscience on a bosom ill at ease.
* * * * * *
And other larger birds with orange cheeks,
A many-colored, painted, chattering crowd,
Prattling forever with their curvèd beaks,
And through the silent woods screaming aloud."

which a wicked reviewer thus

Parodies:

"My grand-aunt had an aviary in Dalkey,
In a back yard behind her mansion set—
There the white cockatoo went talkey, talkey,
To the bright-green and orange parroquet;

And pert cock robins, with breasts red as bricks,
And other warblers yellow as a custard,
Came and sang songs, upon a pile of sticks,
To birds all streaked with feathery lines of mustard."

—This little rhyme is of Consolation.

There's not a heath, however rude,
But hath some little flower
To brighten up its solitude,
And scent the evening hour.

There's not a heart, however cast
By grief or sorrow down,
But hath some memory of the past
To love and call its own.

—The names of the principal editors, and managers of, and contributors to, the chief London journals are not generally known, even in London. An English "gossip," however, has found himself unable to keep the secret, which he therefore communicates to the reading world, in the hope that it will be there in better keeping. Of the London Times,

the actual editor is Mr. John Delane; but the person intrusted with the greatest responsibility is the "manager," as he is called, Mr. Mowbray Morris. There are several leader-writers, among whom are Mr. Delane himself; Mr. Dallas, husband of that admirable actress Miss Glyn; Mr. Chenery, who was the correspondent of the journal at Constantinople during the Russian war; Mr. Moseley, etc. The literary reviewer is Mr. Samuel Lucas, the theatrical critic Mr. John Oxenford, the musical critic Mr. J. W. Davison; fine art subjects are treated by Mr. Tom Taylor, a playwright, who edited the autobiography of Haydn, the unfortunate painter; and the city article is written by Mr. Sampson. The heads of the reporting staff are Mr. Woods, who was the Crimean correspondent of the Morning Herald, and Mr. J. Macdonald, who will be recollected as the administrator of the Times fund at Scutari.

The Daily News

is edited by Mr. W. Weir, a gentleman well known in journalism, and a favorite pupil of the late Mr. Rintoul, of the Spectator. The leader-writers are principally barristers of the liberal party, and Miss Harriet Martineau is a constant and esteemed contributor. The literary reviewer is Mr. Arnold; the theatrical critic Mr. Edmund Yates; the musical critic Mr. George Hogarth, the father of Mrs. Dickens.

The principal writers on the Morning Post are Mr. Algernon Borthwick, Mr. Dumfy, and Mr. Howard Glover. The author of those wonderful paragraphs descriptive of balls and fêtes is Mr. H. Rumsey Foster, the original "Jenkins" of Punch.

The political editor of the Morning Herald is Mr. G. A. Hamilton, M.P., now Secretary to the Treasury; the general manager is Mr. Morier Evans, formerly second City correspondent of the Times.

Punch

is edited by Mr. Mark Lemon, originally keeper of a public house, where the idea of an illustrated comic paper, to be made up by a coterie of jolly spirits who gathered there, was originated. He has since written successfully for the stage, and for various magazines. He now writes nothing for Punch, confining himself entirely to his editorial duties. The staff consists of Mr. Shirley Brooks, Mr. Tom Taylor, Mr. Percival Leigh, and Mr. Horace Mayhew. The illustrations are by Mr. Leech and Mr. Tenniel; those signed with a trident are the productions of a Mr. Howard, a pupil of Mr. Leech's. They dine together every Wednesday, and their old comrade, Mr. Thackeray, is frequently one of the party.

Of the Literary Weeklies.

The Athenæum is edited by Mr. Hepworth Dixon, and numbers among its contributors Messrs. Chorley, Moy Thomas, Thornbury, Hannay, Doran, and Heraud.

The editor of the Literary Gazette is Mr. Lovell Reeve; its most efficient writer Mr. Theodore Martin.

The responsible editor of the Saturday Review is Mr. Cooke, who edited the Morning Chronicle in its palmy days; and the principal writers are Messrs. Venables, Vernon Harcourt, Merivale, Kingsley, the author of "Alton Locke," Scott, and Robert Bell.

The Examiner is under the joint editorship of Mr. Savage, author of "The Bachelor of the Albany," and Mr. Morley, author of "Palissy, the Potter."

The Leader is edited by Mr. E. S. Pigott; its principal contributors are Messrs. Thornton, Hunt, and Horace St. John.

Messrs. James Hannay, author of "Singleton Fontenoy," G. A. Sala, author of "A Journey Due North," A. Mayhew, H. S. Edwards, Edmund Yates, and Draper, are the principal members of the staff of the Illustrated Times.

Mr. Thackeray is said to receive $1000 a month from Messrs. Bradbury and Evans for the "Virginians."

—The same writer thus describes the person of

Charles Dickens,

who is now reading his Christmas Carol to crowded audiences in London. He is about forty-five years old, rather above the middle height, and of a slight lithe figure: if you did not know who he was, you would take him, at first glance, for some remarkable man; his is a decidedly striking face, rather long and thin, with shaved cheeks, a mustache, and pointed beard. His hair is light brown, long and silky; his forehead broad and high, but his eyes are his most remarkable feature, dark brown in color, and flashing, when he is animated, with extraordinary brilliancy. His voice is deep and sonorous, capable of exquisite modulation, and of expressing the deepest feeling. The pathos which he throws into one short line in the "Carol," where the Cratchit family are mourning their lost child—"The color! Ah! poor Tiny Tim!" can not be described. One slight peculiarity may be noticed, a hissing manner of pronouncing the letter "s."

HOOP DE DOODEN DOO.

A FASHIONABLE BALLAD.

Me go to ball de oder night,
De room wid gas was blazing bright,
De gals were dress'd in de fashion's height
Wid de Hoop de dooden doo.

Dere air-tubes dey were so blown out,
Each Miss was as good as a mile about,
De leanest figure she look stout
In de Hoop de dooden doo.

But dere was one dey call de Belle,
As Big as Ben afore he fell;
O Golly! she were such a swell
In de Hoop de dooden doo.

Her dress was white, her sash was red,
She wore a bucket* on her head,
Her neck look like de garden bed—
Hoop de dooden doo.

She stretch so far from left to right,
She cover up a sofy quite,
She put six chairs clean out of sight
Wid de Hoop de dooden doo.

I ask dis gal to hab a dance,
But soon as we begin to prance
The Crinnylean stop our advance:
Hoop de dooden doo.

De garment which dey call de skirt,
It trail behind to catch de dirt,
It trip me up, it gib me hurt:
Hoop de dooden doo.

When I get up de truth I tell her;
Says I, "Miss, you'll excuse a fella,
But I can't dance wid de gig umbrella!"
Hoop do dooden doo.

At dis my joke I laugh Yup! Yup!
She look as though she eat me up,
So den I take her down to sup
In her Hoop de dooden doo.

MORAL.

Now, gals, if you at parties show,
And in de dance would shake de toe,
Not like balloons, but ladies, go:
Hoop de dooden doo.

You tink the Crinnylean de ting,
But your partners it to grief do bring,
It bruise dere leg, it break dere shin—
Dis Hoop de dooden doo.

In polka, waltz, or in quadreel,
Dis child you see he lub to feel
Soft flesh and blood, not bone and steel:
Hoop de dooden doo!

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

We know an old lady, who, when she alludes to the leader of the Mormons, always calls him—either unintentionally or else by a curious jumble of ideas—"Mr. Bigamy Young."

Some one has said of those who die young, that "they are like the lambs which the Alpine shepherds bear in their arms to higher, greener pastures, that the flocks may follow."

That was a very singular mistake made by Digg, at the wedding, who, when introduced to the bride, wished that she might enjoy many returns of the present happy occasion.

Eliza Amherst, a young Parisian lady, resolutely discharged a gentleman to whom she was to have been married because he ridiculed religion. Having given him a gentle reproof, he replied "that a man of the world could not be so old-fashioned as to regard God and religion." Eliza started, but on recovering herself, she said: "From this moment, Sir, when I discover you do not love and honor God, I cease to be yours. He who does not love God can never love his wife constantly and sincerely."

Colonel Benton, in speaking of Congressional matters, said he never "paired off" but once in his life, and that was with a young woman, whom he married.

* Bouquet?—Ed.

Dr. I. H. Mount, in the upper part of the State of New Jersey, lost his wife, and thereupon set out to repair the loss by getting another. He was very contemptuously rejected by a smart young lady of the village in which he resided, but finally married another. The first one composed the following epitaph, which is ready for the Doctor's tombstone whenever he follows his labors:

"This monument posterity raises,
O'er one whose head was red as blazes;
Before he died, for many a year
The town he lighted far and near;
And if a neighbor did desire
To boil a kettle without fire,
Rumor, best of authority, said,
They hung it over the Doctor's head.
At length this lovely man did die—
He left the world—we know not why.
For head and foot they purchased stones,
To show where rest his weary bones,
Of 'Varmount' marble, as 'tis seen,
For he, like that, was streaked with green:
A sun-flower blossoms on his grave,
And fragrant flowers o'er it wave,
And to the sun their fond looks cast,
As he to girls in days long past.
His obsequies were done all right;
He's out of mind and out of sight;
United to his partner fair
And little Marietta Clair."

A Vicksburg correspondent writes: "Not long ago Jack Brandon was arraigned before the Circuit Court of Warren County, Mississippi, on a charge of assault and battery on the person of Sam Burgess, who had lately made his appearance in the neighborhood as an itinerant vendor of notions and other small ware. Sam detailed at length the circumstances which led to the affray, and concluded his evidence with the following philosophic reflection:

"'The way they do things in this country is considerably different from what I was accustomed to in Connecticut. There, if a man called you a liar, you called him a liar back agin, and that was the end on it. But down here, if you call a man a liar, he knocks you down, and commences hurtin' on you.'

"The Court instructed the jury that the Connecticut custom was not in force in Mississippi; and this instruction, coupled with an insinuation by the defendant's counsel that the prosecuting witness was probably an abolitionist, led to a speedy verdict of 'Not Guilty.'"

"Belle Britain" is down on artificial head-dresses, as worn by some ladies she has met with. She writes like a sensible woman. If she was a man, she could not be more correct in her opinion. She says: "There is no ornament for the head of a woman like the 'natural glory' of a clean, soft, simply-arranged head of hair. If I were a man, I should almost feel as if I would like to put my hand on such a head, smooth it, pet it, kiss it, and ask a blessing on it. But a huge mass of braided conceits, stuck full of pins and artificial flowers, looking like a spread-eagle in front, and a spread-peacock behind, smelling of grease and curling-tongs—ugh!"

In another family, not far from us, a little one of four years was worrying and teasing her amiable mother greatly, and for once exhausted her patience. "Grace! Grace! if I had not the baby in my arms I would whip you." "There's Isabelle (the nurse), give her to her!" That child knew her mother's amiability, and had not much fear of chastisement.

Farmer Downs was out in his orchard the other day, and was taken all aback by seeing his bull rushing down upon him full tilt. The farmer took to his heels, for there was no time to pause and reason the matter with the beast, who had never made such an onset on any body before. On the good man ran or flew to reach the fence, but the enemy in his rear caught him on his horns as he reached it, and gave him a toss that plumped him into the dirt on the other side. The bull was mad with rage at having placed a barrier between him and his prey, and tore up the earth with his horns and hoofs. Old Downs rose from the ground, and, turning upon his foe, cried out, "Oh, you rascal, you needn't stand there, bowing and scraping and making apologies; you done it a purpose, you know you did!"

A Georgia correspondent says he has just received the following order in the "dry-goods" line:

"Mr. Fletcher pleas tape this beelt bak & Sen me arribbon won read ore bloo. if youe haint got that coller dont send non, if you send me eny pleas dont sen me airy enruber won. And sen me ayearde of that calecow that I got when I was doun thair if you hav eny of hit. I will cum down en a fue days and sea you.

from samantha barber to Mr fletcher & youngo

But the next, from Louisiana, beats the above.

The "document" inclosed is from a Southwestern Judge. It is in his own proper "hand of write," unaltered in a single syllable, letter, point, or mark. If you could only print the writing it would be appreciated.

"There is one Points on Which I Shall Charge the Jury on To which I wish To Call your attentions before the Argument it is this If A Hola a Priveledge on Property of B—— & B. Sells it To C. & C. Gives his notes to B—— & Transfers. C notes to A. & A. Pursues his Prevelege & Sells the Property in the Hanas of the Purchaser C. & it Doeus not. Pay the Price. Can See Refuse To Pay His notes if So to what Extent

We had all just returned from a picnic out in the country. My friend E——, who is a little too fond of a toddy, had not omitted to take several on this occasion. On our return home E—— was met by the witty and sprightly Miss H——, who inquired how he had enjoyed the day. "Very much," he answered; "but that he had been badly dusted in his buggy coming home, and he now felt like he had a turnpike in his throat, and that he did not like so great an encumbrance without the usual dividends." Miss H—— replied, that if he would only charge toll for all the drinks that went down the road, and all the nonsense that come over it, he would soon realize a fortune!

An attorney before a bench of magistrates, a short time ago, told the bench, with great gravity,

"That he had two witnesses in court, in behalf of his client, and they would be sure to speak the truth—for he had no opportunity to communicate with them!"

"Can you tell me, Bill, how it is that a rooster always keeps his feathers sleek and smooth?"

"No," said Bill.

"Well, he always carries his comb with him."

A lady, complaining how rapidly time stole away, said, "Alas! I am near forty."

Scarron, who was present, and knew her age, said,

"Do not fret about it, madame, for you will get further and further from that frightful epoch every day."

Voltaire had an actor named Paulin, at Ferney, who played the tyrant in his private theatricals. Voltaire slept very little, and passed half the night in making changes in his pieces. About three o'clock one morning, having thought of a new speech for Paulin, he woke up his servant, and ordered him to carry it to the actor.

"But, Sir," said the servant, "the poor man isn't up at this time!"

"Go to him," cried the poet, "immediately; tyrants never sleep."

Satire is an ugly weapon in the work of reform. It tears asunder, it cauterizes, it blisters. No one is really made better by it. The one assailed, though he may fear the sting, will never be better through its application, though he may seem so. A satirist lives all the time in boiling water.

The following epitaph may be found upon a tombstone in Connecticut:

"Here lies cut down like unripe fruit,
The wife of Deacon Amos Shute;
She died of drinking too much coffee,
Anny Dominy eighteen forty."

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, June 21, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets opened more firmly, but closed heavily for Flour, Wheat, and Corn. Early in the week a good demand prevailed for home use, shipment, and on speculation, which had the effect of advancing prices. Toward the close the inquiry was mainly for the supply of the immediate wants of home dealers, and as holders appeared to be eager to sell, buyers had any existing advantage. Rye was scarce and dearer.... Cotton has been more sought after, and it has improved ¼ @ ⅜ c. per pound in price....Pork, Oatmeal and Lard were freely offered, at drooping rates, yet the sales were not very extensive....Beef was in fair request at full quotations....Coffee, Teas, and Sugars were more liberally dealt in, the latter at strengthening prices....Rice was salable and firm....The trade in Dry Goods is restricted, the sales now making being chiefly to near by and local retailers. Silks and Cottons are held with more firmness. Linens and Woolens continue depressed. The week's imports of Dry Goods amounted to $743,138 against $1,125,902 the corresponding week in 1857. The imports since the 1st of January have been $20,922,634 against $44,155,472, same time in 1857. The movements in other commodities were moderate, and unproductive of any remarkable alterations....We append a revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

Ordinary to extra State Flour, per bbl.	$3 85	@	$4 10
Superfine to fancy Western do. "	3 85	@	4 15
Extra Western Flour, per barrel......	4 10	@	7 00
Fancy to extra Genesee, per barrel...	4 25	@	6 50
Super to Extra Canadian, per barrel..	4 15	@	5 20
Mixed to Extra Southern, per barrel..	4 50	@	7 50
Fine to Superfine Rye Flour, per bbl..	3 00	@	3 40
Corn Meal, per barrel................	3 50	@	3 90
White Wheat, per bushel..............	1 00	@	1 35
Red Wheat, per bushel................	80	@	1 10
Corn, per bushel.....................	72	@	79
Rye, per bushel......................	71	@	71½
Barley, per bushel...................	50	@	60
Western Oats, per bushel.............	45	@	46
State Oats, per bushel...............	44	@	45
Jersey and Penn. Oats, per bushel....	39	@	43
Southern Oats, per bushel............	34	@	39
Cotton, middlings, per pound.........	12¼	@	12½
Mess Pork, per barrel................	16 85	@	—
Prime Pork, per barrel...............	13 75	@	13 80
Country Mess Beef, per barrel........	10 75	@	11 50
Prime Mess Beef, per tierce..........	18 00	@	22 00
Beef Hams, per barrel................	15 00	@	17 50
Cut Meats, per pound.................	5¼	@	7¼
Lard, per pound......................	10½	@	11
State Butter, per pound..............	12	@	22
Western Butter, per pound............	10	@	17
Cheese, per pound....................	4	@	8
Rice, per 100 pounds.................	3 00	@	3 75
Rio Coffee, per pound................	9¼	@	11½
Cuba Sugar, per pound................	5	@	7¼
Cuba Molasses, per gallon............	22	@	28
New Orleans Sugar, per pound.........	5	@	7½
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon.....	36	@	37
Hyson Teas, per pound................	27	@	55
Oolong Teas, per pound...............	27	@	60
Domestic Whisky, per gallon..........	—	@	23½

Freights have been more active, at, however, irregular rates. For Liverpool—Cotton, 7-32d. @ ¼d. per pound; Flour, 1s. 6d. per barrel; Grain, 4½d. @ 5d. per bushel; Rosin, 1s. 9d. @ 2s. per barrel; Beef, 3s. @ 3s. 6d. per tierce; and Heavy Goods, 17s. 6d. @ 25s. per ton. For other ports proportionate rates. The total number of vessels of all classes in port on Saturday was 716.

The Live Stock Markets last Wednesday were firmer for Beeves, though the demand was not brisk....A somewhat better inquiry prevailed for Milch Cows at unchanged rates....Veal Calves were in demand, and were quoted a shade dearer.....Sheep and Lambs were in request at, however, irregular prices....Swine were plentier and cheaper, yet not active....The reported receipts of Live Stock during each of the last two weeks compares as follows:

	Week ending June 9.	Week ending June 16.
Beeves....................	2,806	3,015
Milch Cows................	111	132
Veal Calves...............	1,080	1,021
Sheep and Lambs...........	6,638	7,087
Swine.....................	8,655	6,561

Of the Forty-fourth Street Market supply of Beeves last Wednesday there were received from

Illinois............	1328	New York...........	77
Ohio...............	465	Iowa...............	71
Kentucky...........	322	Indiana............	47
Pennsylvania.......	162

The range of prices according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday was as follows:

Poor to premium Beeves, per pound..	$ 8	@	$ 10½
Common to ex. Milch Cows, per head.	20 00	@	60 00
Veal Calves, per pound.............	4	@	6½
Sheep and Lambs, per head..........	3 00	@	6 50
" " per pound.........	5	@	8
Live Swine, per pound..............	4	@	4½
Dressed " "	5	@	6
Roasting Pigs, each................	1 00	@	2 00

The Country Produce Markets have not been quite as brisk during the week. Strawberries and Gooseberries have been more freely offered at reduced prices. The demand is good, especially for the former. Cherries are scarce, as are also Watermelons and Squashes. New Potatoes are plentier and cheaper. New Turnips, new Carrots, and new Cabbage, have been received, chiefly from New Jersey. Cucumbers are in from the South, as well as Tomatoes and Green Peas from New Jersey. Onions are in better supply. Poultry is in fair supply, while Game is rather sparingly offered. A slight decline has occurred in Fowl and Ducks. Wild and Wild Squab Pigeons are dearer. The demand is restricted.

WHOLESALE PRICES OBTAINED BY PRODUCERS AT WASHINGTON MARKET.

Apples, dried, per pound............	$ 5	@	$ 6
Peaches, dried, per pound...........	—	@	20
Plums, dried, per pound.............	18	@	19
Strawberries, per basket............	2	@	6
Gooseberries, per bushel............	1 75	@	2 00
Cherries, per pound.................	7	@	12
Currants, per quart.................	4	@	7
Beans, per bushel...................	1 00	@	1 75
Potatoes, old, per barrel...........	1 25	@	2 75
" new, per barrel...................	3 00	@	5 00
Onions, new, per barrel.............	4 00	@	4 50
Turnips, new, per 100 bunches.......	2 00	@	4 00
Beets, new, per dozen bunches.......	1 25	@	—
New Carrots, per bushel.............	1 75	@	2 00
Cabbage, new, per 100...............	5 00	@	7 00
Watermelons, each...................	30	@	40
Asparagus, per dozen bunches........	1 25	@	2 50
Cauliflowers, per dozen.............	1 25	@	3 50
Radishes, per 100 bunches...........	75	@	1 25
Spinach, per barrel.................	62½	@	—
Green Peas, per barrel..............	1 50	@	2 50
Tomatoes, per basket................	4 50	@	5 00
Cucumbers, per barrel...............	7 00	@	8 50
Eggs, per dozen.....................	9	@	13
Chickens, per pair..................	62½	@	1 25
Fowls, per pound....................	10	@	12
Fowls, per pair.....................	62	@	87
Turkeys, per pound..................	10	@	16
Pigeons, per dozen..................	1 00	@	—

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, June 21, 1858.

THE foreign trade of the port for the past week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending June 10, 1858	$2,456,238....	$1,732,439
Corresponding week, 1857	4,214,790....	1,954,659
Decrease............	$1,758,552	$222,220

Of specie the movement was an export of $68,000 only, and an absorption by the Sub-Treasury of some three millions in exchange for Treasury Notes. It is thus likely that the banks will this evening exhibit an average of specie below thirty-two millions. Money is unchanged in value; discounts at five per cent. are quite common. Exchange closed on Saturday at 109 @ 109½.

In stocks there has been but little done. The quarrel between the Central and Erie has indisposed people to touch any securities whose value may be destroyed by speculative stock-jobbing movements. The following has been the course of the exchange for the week:

COURSE OF THE STOCK EXCHANGE FOR THE WEEK.

New York Central....................	82@80½@82½@82
New York and Erie...................	17½@16@17½@17½
Reading.............................	42½@43@45@44½
Rock Island.........................	72½@70@72@71½
Michigan Southern...................	22½@20@21½
Preferred...........................	43½@41@43
Illinois Central....................	85@82@83
Panama..............................	109½@109@109½
Pacific Mail........................	75½@79@76
Hudson..............................	26½@25½@27
Galena..............................	85@82@84½
Missouris...........................	87@86½@87½
Virginias...........................	95@95@95
Tennessees..........................	93@93½@93½
La Crosse Land Grants...............	30@31@33
Toledo..............................	34½@32@33
Milwaukee and Mississippi...........	21½@19½@20
La Crosse...........................	6½@6½@7
Delaware and Hudson.................	98½@99@100

ADVERTISEMENTS.

NAHANT HOUSE.

SEASON OF 1858.

THIS spacious Summer Hotel—LOCATED ON THE ROMANTIC PROMONTORY OF NAHANT, IN MASSACHUSETTS BAY—will be conducted the present season as heretofore, on a liberal scale in all respects, combining the luxury of sumptuous entertainment with the genuine comforts of a quiet home.

To meet the demands of modern tastes, and for the better accommodation of families, MEALS WILL BE SERVED AT PRIVATE TABLES AT ALL HOURS, thereby avoiding the disagreeable formalities and confusion of a crowded table d'hote.

NAHANT is conceded to be the most delightful and HEALTHY SEA SIDE RESORT on the New England coast, enjoying the luxury of a constant ocean breeze, and families desiring a Cool Retreat during the hot season, will here find every desirable attraction for a pleasant summer home.

N. B.—Gentlemen having business in Boston can enjoy their Evenings on the cool beach and a morning sail to town.

Boarders received upon terms to correspond with the times.

Orders by mail or telegraph will receive prompt attention.

J. E. P. STEVENS, Proprietor.

, Parties leaving New York by morning train take supper at Nahant, or leaving by evening boats, can breakfast at Nahant next morning.

KISS-ME-QUICK,
THE FAVORITE PERFUME,
Distilled from Fragrant
——TULIPS——
Kiss-me-quick, the Perfume,
Kiss-me-quick, the Sachet,
Kiss-me-quick Soap.
EUGENE DUPUY, Chemist and Family Druggist,
609 Broadway.

SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE. The Sad Fortunes of the Rev. Amos Barton.—Mr. Gilfil's Love Story.—Janet's Repentance. A Novel. By GEORGE ELIOT. (Originally published in Blackwood's Magazine.) 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

Their quiet and original humor, the delicate insight into character displayed, the tender and subtle pathos of the several stories, have gained for Mr. Eliot a considerable, and not a common reputation.—Leader (London).

Mr. Eliot, in a succession of sketchy stories, draws from the every-day life of country parsonages an infinite fund of grotesque and diverting scenes, set off and enhanced by a certain by-play of pathetic interest.—Literary Gazette (London).

Very amusing pictures of actual life.—Churchman.

Mr. Eliot has fine powers of description and a familiar acquaintance with the workings of the human heart.—Boston Courier.

Among the new writers of fiction who have recently appeared in Great Britain, we should place George Eliot, the author of Scenes of Clerical Life, at the head. We should be at a loss to name any English novelist of the present day who has excelled the author in his pictures of domestic life, or who has shown a higher order of talent in the delineation of individual character, than the author of these admirable tales. They make us acquainted with an entirely new phase of English life—that of the middle-class religious family—and they are wholly free from the flippancies, affectations, and maudlin sentiments which are peculiar to the majority of the so-called religious novels.—N. Y. Times.

Obviously the production of a peculiar and remarkable writer, whose style showed little or no family resemblances with that of any living author. * * He has made us weep over this pathos, and laugh over this comedy; and he has done so with a quiet truth which we find in few of his contemporaries.—Saturday Review (London).

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

, HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (to any part of the United States), on receipt of Fifty Cents.

GODFREY'S EXTRACT OF ELDER FLOWERS.

The sweetest and really the most perfect BEAUTIFIER IN NATURE.

This admirable preparation of Elder Flowers is very fragrant as a perfume. Elder Flowers have, from the earliest ages, been esteemed as a mild and harmless, yet most perfect beautifier of the Skin. Tan, Sun-burns, Freckles, Redness, &c., it will speedily and completely remove.

CHILDREN.—It is singularly beneficial and perfectly innocuous even to the youngest infant.

SHAVING.—It is valuable beyond any thing, annihilating every pimple and all roughness, rendering the skin soft and firm, preparing it so completely for the razor.

FAMILY LOTION.—Godfrey's Extract of Elder Flowers will be found beyond all praise, and needs only a trial to be approved.

EUGENE DUPUY, Family Chemist,
609 Broadway, N. Y.

"QUERU'S" COD LIVER OIL JELLY. Approved by the New York Academy of Medicine, June 3d, 1857, containing 85 per cent. pure Oil.

A delicious preparation, having all the soothing and healing properties of the Oil, without any disagreeable taste.

PENFOLD, CLAY & CO., Wholesale Agents,
No. 4 Fletcher Street, New York.
(From Pereira's Materia Medica, Vol. 2, Part 2, page 2243.)

"The experience of the profession at large appears now quite to have established the fact, that Cod Liver Oil is one of the most efficacious of all remedies in arresting the progress of Pulmonary Phthisis; that it enables patients to struggle on longer against the inroads of disease, and thus enables them sometimes to obtain cicatrization and contraction of cavities, which otherwise must have produced speedy death."

A FRENCH MANUFACTURER'S SALE OF NEW AND ELEGANT MANTILLAS, Amounting at cost, in Paris, to
OVER A MILLION OF FRANCS.

Those renowned fabricants, Louis Victor Arnaud and Jean Jacques Lamontaine, whose products are known alike from St. Petersburgh to Constantinople in Europe, as also from Boston to New Orleans in the United States, having been forced to succumb to the pressure of the times, the entire assets of their estate (except that portion specially designed for the Russian market, and which will be simultaneously disposed of at St. Petersburgh), are now offered for public distribution at the

COMMODIOUS AND ELEGANT STORE,
No. 361 BROADWAY,
Between Thompson's and Taylor's saloons,

By PRIVATE BARGAIN, for a LIMITED TIME only.

These sales being instituted by order of the FRENCH COURT OF BANKRUPTCY, for the purpose of declaring a fourth and final dividend to the creditors in Europe on or before Monday, the 2d of August, the prices in most cases will be merely nominal, but none will be sold for less than the amount of customs dues, broker's, commissioner's, and assignment fees.

THE ALLOTMENT FOR THIS CITY.

is under deed of assignment to Mr. WILLIAM D. ESTERRE, who has specially retained the above-named spacious premises for its more efficient display and distribution, and is now open.

Hours of business from 10 to 5 each day.

IT CONSISTS IN PART OF

1000 handsome deep flounced silk mantillas, at $3.

800 deep flounced silk mantillas at $10.

1500 superfine silk mantillas at $12.

Between six and seven thousand of the most costly and recherche garments ever imported into this country, at from $14 to $55 each.

ALSO,

Upwards of five thousand French lace mantelets, with one, two, and three flounces, chiefly the product of the celebrated Chantilly looms, and varying in price from $5 to $50.

ALSO,

MAGNIFICENT REAL GUIPURE LACE MANTILLAS
REAL THREAD LACE MANTILLAS,
REAL PUSHER LACE MANTILLAS,
REAL PUSHER LACE POINTS,
REAL THREAD LACE POINTS.

Wholesale buyers can only be waited on previous to 10 in the morning.

Terms strictly cash, on or before delivery.

Observe the Number.

361 BROADWAY.
between Thompson's and Taylor's saloons.
WILLIAM D. ESTERRE.

JUST RECEIVED,
PER "PERSIA," JUST RECEIVED,
PIESSE & LUBIN,
HUNGARY WATER.

The specific virtues of Eau de la Reine de Congrie has rendered it justly celebrated in all parts of the world. It was originally distilled, A.D. 1550, by Paracelsus Piesse, the Alchymist and Physician of Transylvania. For two centuries its reputation has steadily advanced, till, at the present time, it has fairly eclipsed all other odorant waters, and that simply from the fact that Hungary Water contains a small portion of Rosemarinus, of which its fragrant competitors are destitute. Now, as it is certain that Rosemary has the power to increase the Memory and invigorate the Brain, as noted by the Bard of Avon,

"There's Rosemary, that's for Remembrance,"

we can not be surprised to learn that Orators, Clergymen, Lecturers, Authors, Poets, give it the preference.

EUGENE DUPUY, Agent, 609 Broadway.

CURTIS'S HISTORY OF THE CONSTITUTION. History of the Origin, Formation, and Adoption of the Constitution of the United States. By GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS. Complete in two large and handsome Octavo Volumes, Muslin, $4 00; Law Sheep, $5 50; Half Calf, $6 00.

This new Constitutional History of the American Revolution may most justly be regarded not only as one of the principal works in transatlantic literature, but as a rich and important addition to the science of government every where.—MOHL, Staatswissenschaften, I., 540.

It will take its place in all general libraries as one of the standard works of political history.—Boston Adv.

We hope that Mr. Curtis's work, now that it is completed, will be generally read, by young and old, by men and women, and not merely by students of political and constitutional history. It is an interesting as well as a valuable work; the style is uniformly clear and accurate.—Boston Courier.

The great value of this work will be appreciated by the most intelligent and thoughtful minds.—N. Y. Observer.

It will become classical in the political literature of the country.—Worcester Palladium.

Mr. Curtis presents the whole story in a calm, dispassionate, and lucid manner. While the work is thus thorough, and will command the attention of statesmen and all students of American history, its patriotic spirit and animated style will deservedly render it popular.—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

A work of the highest value, and merits to become the hand-book and guide of every intelligent and patriotic American citizen.—Buffalo Courier.

This great and desirable undertaking.—N. O. Delta.

Every American should ponder this lucid and frank, as well as authentic history.—Boston Transcript.

There never has been made a nobler contribution to our national literature. * * The country owes the author a debt of gratitude for his work.—Baltimore Observer.

Mr. Curtis deserves the thanks of his countrymen for placing before them so complete a history.—Providence Journal.

Every American citizen, and especially our young men, ought to read these volumes.—Presbyterian Magazine (Phila.).

Comprehensive and exact, moderate and fair.—N. Y. Examiner.

Worthy of the subject, and an honor to the nation.—Cincinnati Journal and Messenger.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

THE ETERNAL PERFUME,
FROM THE HOLY CITY.
"Oh! could I but catch that fragrance,
I would ask no other fame,
Than that those sweet-scented flowers
Should be coupled with my name!"
Beware of Imitations.
Frangipanni, the Perfume, Frangipanni, the Sachet,
Frangipanni Soap, Frangipanni Oil.
Sole Agent for the United States,
EUGENE DUPUY,
Importer,
609 Broadway.
Sold every where.

A GORGEOUS NUMBER.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR JULY.

CONTENTS.

FRANCIS MARION. By BENSON J. LOSSING.
Illustrated by Seventeen Engravings.
A JOURNEY THROUGH THE LAND OF THE AZTECS.
Illustrated by Fourteen Engravings.
THE WINE-CUP.
CARACAS.
Illustrated by Thirteen Engravings.
NELLY'S SLIPPER.
THE LADIES OF THE SACRED HEART.
MODERN SAMARITANS.
ARCHIBALD BLOSSOM, BACHELOR.
FRUITION.
EXPLORATIONS OF THE AMOOR RIVER. By PERRY M'D. COLLINS.
MY VISITATION.
THE VIRGINIANS. By W. M. THACKERAY.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Preaching and Practice.—A Lay Sermon.—Four Head-Pieces.
CHAPTER XXIX. Where it appears that Harry was not so black as he had been painted.
CHAPTER XXX. Contains a Letter to Virginia.
CHAPTER XXXI. The Bear and the Leader.
CHAPTER XXXII. In which a family Coach is ordered.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERARY NOTICES. Books of the Month.
EDITOR'S TABLE.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
GRAB'S GREAT GIFT ENTERPRISE.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Mr. Grab ponders.—Sets his Trap.—The Bait.—References.—Sends Circulars to Postmasters.—And to Editors.—Buys Jewelry.—And Books.—And Watches.—Procures an Office.—Takes it quietly.—Customers pour in.—And Letters.—Grab springs the Trap.—And is off.—Public Sold.
FASHIONS FOR JULY.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Country Costume and Children's Dresses.—Straw Hat and Vail.—Skirt Supporter.

The Publishers of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE refer to the Sixteen Volumes already issued as the best assurance that no labor or expense will be spared to render it worthy of the liberal support which it has received. They believe that the Magazine now embraces in its general plan every thing essential to an attractive literary miscellany, adapted to the wants of the American Public. Its regular circulation has not been diminished even during the unexampled financial revulsion, which has proved disastrous to so many literary and commercial enterprises; and they are assured from every quarter that the Magazine is recognized as a necessity rather than a luxury. They therefore announce no "New Features" for the future. They will continue to fill the Magazine with articles inculcating sound views in Life and Morals; leaving, as heretofore, the discussion of sectarian opinions in Religion, and sectional questions in Politics to their own appropriate organs. Wise men and true patriots agree upon points far more numerous than those upon which they differ. The object of the Magazine will be to unite rather than to separate the views and feelings of the people of different sections of our common country.

The Publishers do not find it necessary or expedient to appeal to public attention by issuing "Specimen Numbers" containing an unusual amount of matter or illustrations. They intend that every number shall prove the Magazine to be the best and cheapest periodical published. It will contain a larger amount of matter, more numerous and better illustrations, printed in a better manner, than any other Monthly Magazine; and the Publishers are confident that it will deserve and receive the same cordial appreciation and liberal patronage which have been accorded to it during the Eight Years of its publication.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.—GENUINE!!

This long-established and popular remedy for purifying the blood and the cure of ulcerous and eruptive disorders, may be taken at this season of the year with salutary effect by every one. No change of diet necessary.

Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, No. 100 Fulton Street, cor. William, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.

BULWER'S BRILLIANT ROMANCE, entitled "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?" pronounced to be the masterpiece of this polished, witty, and learned novelist, by special arrangement with the Author, appears in HARPER'S WEEKLY simultaneously with its publication in England.

TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

One Copy for One Year.	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for One Year.	2 50
One Copy for Two Years	4 00
Five Copies for One Year	9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year . . .	40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

Volume I. of "HARPER'S WEEKLY," handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $3 50, is now ready.

Muslin Covers are furnished to those who wish their Numbers bound, at Fifty Cents each. TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT. DISCOUNT allowed to Bookbinders and the Trade.

"HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY," when taken together, are supplied at FOUR DOLLARS a year.

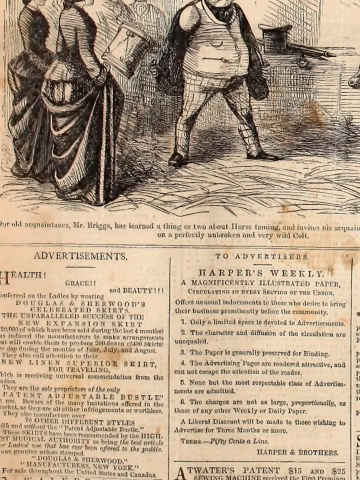
Numbers from the commencement of both the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY can still be supplied. Specimen copies furnished gratuitously. Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest Club rates.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" must be paid at the Office where they are received. When prepaid quarterly in advance, the Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty-six Cents a year on the WEEKLY.

Persons residing in the British Provinces will remit, in addition to their Subscription, Thirty-six Cents on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty-six Cents on the WEEKLY, for the American postage.

, Persons living in the City of New York wishing "Harper's Weekly" left at their houses, will please send their names and residences, with the subscription money, to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.



PARTY WITH THE MUSTACHE. "That Girl seems quite fascinated with my Portrait. I think I'll speak to her."

YOUNG LADY (arranging her Ribbon). "What a delightful idea these large Photographs are! Really, they answer almost as well as Looking-glasses."

LORD OF CREATION. "I'd have you to know, Madam, that the law will grant me a Divorce whenever I want it, on the ground of uncongenial temper. So none of your violence!"

Our old acquaintance, Mr. Briggs, has learned a thing or two about Horse taming, and invites his acquaintance to witness an experiment on a perfectly unbroken and very wild Colt.

TRIUMPH OF MR. BRIGGS.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

HEALTH! GRACE! and BEAUTY!!!

Conferred on the Ladies by wearing

DOUGLAS & SHERWOOD'S CELEBRATED SKIRTS,

THE UNPARALLELED SUCCESS OF THE NEW EXPANSION SKIRT

(170,000 of which have been sold during the last 4 months) has induced the manufacturers to make arrangements that will enable them to produce 200 dozen (2400 skirts) per day during the months of June, July and August. They also call attention to their

NEW LINEN SUPERIOR SKIRT, FOR TRAVELING,

which is receiving universal commendation from the Ladies.

They are the sole proprietors of the only

"PATENT ADJUSTABLE BUSTLE!!"

In use. None of the many imitations offered in the market, as they are all either infringements or worthless. They also manufacture

TO SUIT DIFFERENT STYLES

with and without the "Patent Adjustable Bustle."

These SKIRTS have been pronounced by the HIGHEST MEDICAL AUTHORITY as being the best article for Ladies' wear that has ever been offered to the public. Some genuine unless stamped

"DOUGLAS & SHERWOOD,"

"MANUFACTURERS, NEW YORK."

For sale throughout the United States and Canadas.

E. WALKER & SONS, 314 FULTON STREET, NEW YORK.

BOOKBINDERS.

All work executed with promptness, and in as good style, and at as low prices, as in any other establishment. Special attention given to binding for HARPER'S MAGAZINE and WEEKLY.

New Patterns ready for Spencer's U. States, 8 vols.

AGENTS WANTED.—Persons out of Employment, or any one desirous of engaging in a profitable and permanent business, will please address for terms and full particulars,

L. M. DAGGETT & CO., BOSTON, MASS.

TO ADVERTISERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,

A MAGNIFICENTLY ILLUSTRATED PAPER,

CIRCULATING IN EVERY SECTION OF THE UNION,

Offers unusual inducements to those who desire to bring their business prominently before the community.

1. Only a limited space is devoted to Advertisements.

2. The character and diffusion of the circulation are unequaled.

3. The Paper is generally preserved for Binding.

4. The Advertising Pages are rendered attractive, and can not escape the attention of the reader.

5. None but the most respectable class of Advertisements are admitted.

6. The charges are not as large, proportionally, as those of any other Weekly or Daily Paper.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for Terms Months or more.

TERMS.—Fifty Cents a Line.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

ATWATER'S PATENT $15 AND $25 SEWING MACHINE received the First Premium over Singer's and Wheeler & Wilson's, at the State Fair held at Buffalo, October 9th, 1857.

The Cheapest and Best SEWING MACHINE in the market.

Office, 403 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Send for descriptive Circular.

H. C. BERTMAN & CO., Sole Agents for the United States.

BARTHOLF'S SEWING MACHINE FOR FAMILY AND GENERAL USE.

It is unquestionably one of the best.—Sunday Courier.

Send for a Circular. Office 469 Broadway.

Agents Wanted. Address, care box 2347, P. O., N. Y.

GREAT SUMMER BOOK.

Just out

THE LECTURES

OF

LOLA MONTEZ.

INCLUDING HER AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

A handsome 12mo volume, elegantly bound in muslin, with a superb steel portrait by Rogers. Price $1.

CONTENTS: Autobiography, Part I.; Autobiography, Part II.; Beautiful Women; Gallantry; Heroines of History; Comic Aspect of Love; Wits and Women of Paris; Romanism.

These lectures abound in the most spicy anecdotes and piquant reminiscences, while they show an acuteness of observation, a fund of social reflection and an originality which are truly surprising. Those who had the pleasure of hearing the fascinating Lola Montez lecture, they produced as being inimitable, as effect all the more striking from the highly moral tone which runs all through them, and adds to their beauty without detracting from their brilliance and art.

This book will be sent by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on the receipt of the price, $1.

RUDD & CARLETON, Publishers and Booksellers,

No. 310 Broadway, New York.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.

For all manufacturing purposes SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES are deemed indispensable. The public, relying upon having their clothing, &c., made by them, SINGER'S FAMILY SEWING MACHINE is the latest production of inventive genius, and being arranged with full knowledge of the defects of other machines for similar uses, has avoided or remedied them. It is the only Lockstitch Sewing Machine ever made, and the easiest to learn to operate. Using one of these machines is an exquisite amusement. Price $100, with iron table complete.

I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway, New York.

WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES,

343 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Received the highest Premium awarded, 1857, by the American Institute, N. Y.; Maryland Institute, Baltimore; and at the Maine, Connecticut, Illinois, and Michigan State Fairs.

Send for a Circular, containing Editorial and Scientific opinions, Testimonials from persons of the highest social position, &c.

THE MONTHLY MASONIC MAGAZINE OF THE AGE

IS THE

"THE AMERICAN FREEMASON."

Published regularly at Louisville, Ky.,

BY J. F. BRENNAN,

32°.—Sublime P. R.—Sovt. 33°.—

IT IS

Devoted Exclusively to the Instruction and Entertainment of Freemasons, their Wives, Families, and Friends.

Each Number Contains Portraits of Distinguished Freemasons, and other Engravings, by the best Artists;

AND

Articles by Dr. A. G. MACKEY, Rev. GEO. OLIVER, GILES F. YATES, ALBERT PIKE, ROB. MORRIS, JOHN DOVE, J. THEO. HOLLY, and others,

COMPRISE

Masonic Law, History, Jurisprudence, and Belles Lettres, from the Pens of the Leading Masonic Authors of the Present Century.

As a Masonic Monthly Magazine it has no Equal, Either in Beauty of Mechanical Execution, or Value of its Articles,

IN THE

Each Monthly Part Contains as much Reading Matter, not to speak of the Costly Engravings illustrating the same, as the other monthly issues of the Masonic Press of America, rolled into One.

It is Acknowledged to be the Monthly Masonic Magazine of the Age.

TERMS—PER ANNUM.

Single Subscription, 1 year, postpaid $2 00

2 years, " 3 00

Clubs of Two to Eight, each 1 50

Clubs of any number above Eight, each 1 00

The Club in all cases must accompany the orders. Specimen numbers will be sent on receipt of 10 cts. January number of each year, thus supplying the subscriber with the Masonic Record for the current year, as the work being stereotyped, any number or series of numbers will be mailed, postpaid, on receipt of the price, 25 cents each. Address

J. F. BRENNAN, Publisher,

Louisville, Ky.

It is Acknowledged to be the Monthly Masonic Magazine of the Age.

OCEAN HOUSE, PORTSMOUTH, VIRGINIA.—A new, airy, first-class house, affording sea-shore luxuries of every kind, unrivalled by the resort and host of fashionable watering-places. Regular and commodious steamers ply hourly to Old Point and the Upper of Virginia. Those who wish sea-bathing, combined a great source of health, pleasure, with ease, exhilarating sea-breezes, delightful suites of single rooms, can now be obtained on moderate terms.

ADDRESS, CHARLES PEGRAM, Proprietor.

Circulars to be had at 104 Murray Street, New York City.

DR. MUNDE'S WATER-CURE AT FLORENCE, MASS. (Three miles from the Northampton Depot). Rates for Patients $12 per week.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. II.—No. 79.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 3, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

CONTENTS.

I. THE WAR-MESSAGE.
II. THE SIGNERS OF THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, WITH A SPLENDID ILLUSTRATION.
III. EDITORIALS.
IV. THE LOUNGER.
V. INDEPENDENCE HALL, PHILADELPHIA, WITH THREE ILLUSTRATIONS.
VI. MODERN VERSION, WITH SIX ILLUSTRATIONS.
VII. LITERARY.
VIII. DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.
IX. FOREIGN NEWS.
X. FAC-SIMILE OF JEFFERSON'S DRAFT OF THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, WITH HISTORICAL NARRATIVE.
XI. TOWN AND COUNTRY, AN ECLOGUE.
XII. MY ELDORESS.
XIII. STEPHEN GIRARD.
XIV. GREAT NUGGET FOUND IN NEW ZEALAND, WITH AN ILLUSTRATION.
XV. REGATTA AT BOSTON, WITH AN ILLUSTRATION.
XVI. MISCELLANY.
XVII. THINGS HERE AND OTHERWISE.
XVIII. MARKET AND FINANCIAL REVIEWS.
XIX. COMICALITIES.

THE WAR-MESSAGE;

HERALDED THROUGH THE LAND ON THE DAY FOLLOWING THE BATTLES OF LEXINGTON AND CONCORD BRIDGE, APRIL 19, 1775.

"Darkness closed upon the country and upon the town, but it was no night for sleep. Heralds, on swift relays of horses, transmitted the war-message from hand to hand, till villages repeated it to villages; the sea to the backwoods; the plains to the highlands; and it was never suffered to droop till it had been borne North and South, and East and West, throughout the land."—BANCROFT'S History.

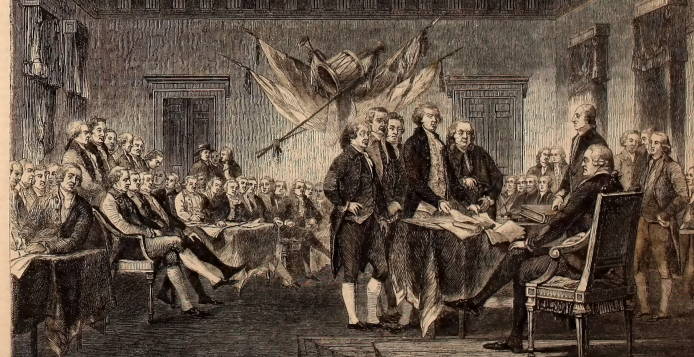
BY ISAAC M'LELLAN.

"SPEED with the news!—with frantic speed
Spur, horseman, on your fiery steed,
Speed the war-message on;
Through towns and cities of the land,
Upon, wge with clattering hoofs your route;
Let each tall steeple sound alarms,
Let all the people fly to arms,
Pealing the battle-shout!
Tell that the first stout blow is dealt,
Tell that the first free blood is spilt,
Tell that the green of Lexington
Blushes with gore—that Concord Bridge
Is this day lost and won!"

Fast flew the heralds. Their revelle
Awoke each sleeper from his dream;
Red beacon-fires flashed o'er the hill,
And blazed o'er wood and stream:
Village to village sent the cry,
The backwoods to the sea replied;
The farmer left his panting team,
The fisher left the salt-sea tide,
And the swart smith forsook his toil
To mingle in the war's turmoil.

Far spread the summons—o'er the bays
Of Maine, where swift the Saco pours,
And where Penobscot laves its shores,
The tocsin sounds, the watch-fires blaze:
It breaks the burly trapper's rest
Far o'er the white New Hampshire hills;
And, ringing like a bugle-note,
O'er the Green Mountain rage it thrills;
Sweeps Northward o'er Canadian wilds,
Peals o'er St. Lawrence like a knell;
Till stern Quebec re-echoes back
The wild, the warning swell!

Fast, far it flies: the hills that skirt
The noble Hudson caught the wail,
And Southward, o'er Potomac's wave,
Sent the loud war-cry on the gale.
Fast o'er the Dismal Swamp it flew,
O'er Carolina's groves of green,
Till the lone settler caught the sound
Beyond Savannah's tide serene.
The Blue Ridge, vocal, spread the call
Through all its soft Virginian vale;
The Alleghanies, grand and tall,
Open'd their rocky barriers wide,
That through them might resound the wail
To sweep remote Ohio's tide,
And rouse the brave Kentucky men,
And hunters in the Elk-horn glen;
That each and all, by mount and flood,
Might know how valiantly had stood
The Northern men in battle field—
—Had bled, had died, had scorned to yield.



All sprang to arms. Throughout the land
The sledge on anvil rang a peal,
Where busy armorers shaped the brand,
Or frolock, or the pike of steel.
All sprang to arms. Through village lanes,
'Mid the embowering groves, there shone
The flash of arms; there rang the strains
Of war, in music's martial tones:
And well they held, with sword and spear,
Through many a long and bloody year,
Their stern, victorious career.

THE SIGNERS OF THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

THE UNITED States have never known so illustrious an assembly as that which adopted the Declaration of Independence. Most of the signers are known, by their portraits, throughout the country. We have, however, thought it well, for the better preservation of the features of those fathers of the country, to present our readers, on the occasion of this our national anniversary, with the subjoined picture of the signing of the Declaration of Independence, which has been carefully drawn from reliable portraits, by the artist to whom the portrait department of this journal is especially committed. We need not suggest that such a picture at this is well worth preserving.

Two of the signers—Adams and Jefferson—became successively Presidents of the United States. Jefferson was comparatively a young man when the high duty devolved upon him to draft the Declaration; he had but just completed his thirty-third year. Adams was older—nearly forty-one. Both were men of the pen, not the sword. Disastrically opposed in all their instincts, they typified between them the spirit of the Revolution—Adams standing for the rugged old Puritan Republicans; Jefferson representing the more modern school of French Democrats. Both lived and learned much before they were rewarded with the highest honor the country could bestow. Adams waited twenty-one, Jefferson twenty-five years, for the Presidency. Both, as every one knows, died on the same day, and that day the 4th of July, 1826—one of the most striking historical coincidences on record.

Many other signers became, in their time, conspicuous pillars of the State they had so largely helped to found. William Whipple, of New Hampshire, was a prominent soldier of the Revolution in the campaign against Burgoyne. Elbridge Gerry, of Massachusetts, served as envoy to France, and died Vice-President of the United States. Oliver Wolcott, of Connecticut, was an active officer during the Revolution, and subsequently saw his son rise to the highest political office. Robert Morris sacrificed a princely fortune for the sake of the independence of the colonies, and died in abject poverty—a melancholy proof of the often-marked ingratitude of republics. Samuel Chase, of Maryland, served for fifteen years as Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States. Thomas Nelson, of Virginia, was serving with the army when Cornwallis was made prisoner. Thomas Heyward and Arthur Middleton, of South Carolina, both fought during the war, and were made prisoners by the British.

THE SIGNING OF THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, 1776.

Many others left names imperishable, though less prominently interwoven with the political history of the confederacy. The world will always be proud of Benjamin Franklin, the type of truly common sense. Samuel Adams will always be remembered as particularly a master mind, who unobtrusively stamped his opinions on the society in which he lived. Nor shall mankind ever forget generous, chivalrous John Hancock, the first impersonation of high-souled enthusiasm for liberty and disinterested patriotism. Richard Henry Lee deserves the honors his countrymen are now proudly paying to his memory.

All the signers either were eminent at the time they signed the Declaration or rose to eminence afterward. A few, like Charles Carroll, Thomas Middleton, Rutledge, and others, had but little to gain from political station, and rather accepted it as a duty than sought it as a prize. A few lived, and did not prefer obscurity, were rewarded by their countrymen for their labors in the cause of it. Most of them lived to great ages. Four—John Adams, Ellery, Lewis, and Carroll—lived past the age of ninety. Two lived beyond eighty. Three were but five out of the whole number who did not live to see their fiftieth year. Two—Button Gwinnett, of Georgia—was killed in a duel; and another—Lynch, of South Carolina—was lost in a vessel which sailed a few months after the signing of the Declaration of Independence. They were all, as their most infidelic, men of good character, and, as we so often find it, their mental strength was coupled with corresponding physical vigor.

The motto at the New-Nothing meetings is to know that eight signers of the Declaration of Independence were born in North Britain. This may be urged, however, in apology for them, that at the time of their birth the United States were not much a part of the dominions of the British King as the British islands themselves. Had it been otherwise, and had the spirit been abroad in the unfortunate person, they would doubtless have elected to have seen the light on the other side of the Isratic. For the rest, Massachusetts bears the palm among the States as the largest producer of signers, having contributed ten members to the Congress. Virginia follows, owning nine signers. Maryland comes next, as the birth-place of four. Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and South Carolina, each contributed four; Delaware and New York, three each; and Rhode Island and New Hampshire, one each. North Carolina, New Hampshire, or Georgia, was proud.

It is sad to think that, while the country has made such progress in wealth and prosperity, so little has been done toward collecting the data for the perpetuation of the memory of these men. In a few years, unless Plutarch's mantle has fallen superhuman, their features and their appearance may be as much matter of controversy as those of the founders of the old colonies. What a worthy act it would be for so rich a city as New York to give an order to some first-class artist to engage in a cenotz statue, or at least busts, of these fifty-six patriots! How noble an ornament it would be for the new City Hall! How paltry the expense, in comparison with the credit the work would reflect on the city!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 3, 1858.

MORE TROUBLE IN MEXICO.

THE news from Mexico is much more alarming to the lover of peace than that from Great Britain. It seems that the present Government of Mexico, which is the offspring of the clerical cabal against the liberal and wise Government of Comonfort, no sooner came into office than it fell a prey to the pecuniary embarrassment which had proved the ruin of its predecessor. Comonfort had sold the property of the clergy to save himself by relieving the Church of a portion of its exorbitant wealth. Zuloaga had been raised to power by the priests; but they did not decently plunder them; nor would they, it appears, come forward voluntarily and surrender a part of their money for the sake of the cause being a Government which would have sustained them in possession of the rest. Driven to the wall by want of money, Zuloaga resorted to the only scheme which offered a prospect of speedy relief; he proclaimed a forced levy on the property of all residents, foreigners as well as natives. When the proclamation was issued, Mr. Forsyth, United States Minister to Mexico, very properly protested against the application of the levy to property owned by citizens of the United States. This protest has been disregarded, property of United States citizens seized, and Mr. Forsyth, as in duty bound, has demanded and obtained his passports. Thus, for the present, diplomatic intercourse has ceased between the United States and Mexico.

The incident would be grave if there were a clear prospect of the continuance in power of the Zuloaga Government. Simultaneously with the appearance of this last outrage, we perceive we learn that President Zuloaga is seeking a safe exile, and that Juarez, the leader of the anti-clericals or liberal party, is in a fair way to become the master of the State. The United States are thus estopped, for the present, from taking energetic measures to vindicate the property of Mr. Forsyth's course. Before a United States ship of war could arrive at Vera Cruz, it is likely that the offending Government may be overthrown and destroyed. We could hardly, with any show of generosity, demand that the Juarez indemnity for an injury committed by his antagonists.

At the same time it is gravely to be regretted that citizens of the United States should be so constant sufferers by the turmoils and anarchies of Mexican political troubles. Much American money was invested in Mexican enterprises on the faith of the pacts of the Santa Anna Government. These pledges were not necessarily binding on Comonfort. In like manner, the contracts made by the Comonfort Government have not been universally assumed by the Zuloaga party; nor is there any reason to suppose that, with the capacity of Mr. Bright, who is in charge of the operation of laying the cable on the Agamemnon. Grave charges have been brought against Mr. Bright by persons connected with last year's expedition; it is to be hoped that the directors of the Company have not allowed personal or wealth to influence their selection of an engineer.

Altogether, the margin for failure is large. The cable may break—and, as the late experiment proves, it may be impossible to recover it. Or, without breaking, it may refuse to transmit the telegraphic spark. Or the Niagara may arrive at Newfoundland and the Agamemnon at Valentia Island, with no end of throw, and, consignals being transmissible, it may be impossible to say whether the wire has snapped or the current been diverted. All these contingencies are not only possible but probable.

Let us hope that they may never become realities. The possibility of submarine telegraphic communication has been demonstrated. Cables have been successfully laid across the British Channel, the Mediterranean, and the Black Sea. There is no scientific reason why a telegraphic cable should not be as safely laid under 1000 miles of sea. The difficulty naturally increases in proportion to the length of the cable—that is all. The possibility remains the same.

Let us make up our minds that, if this attempt to lay the telegraphic cable fails, it shall be renewed next year. The British Government must has done its share nobly—three of the four vessels composing the telegraph squadron are English. The rest will probably vote of the work. But it would do credit to Mr. Buchanan and to Congress, if, should the present attempt fail, the attempt to lay the cable next year were renewed with at least as many United States as British vessels.

ANOTHER EL DORADO.

THE accounts from the newly-discovered gold region in the possessions of the Hudson's Bay Company, on the Pacific shores of this continent, are calculated to excite quite a sensation. It is stated by persons who are said to be worthy of reliance, that the tributaries of the Fraser river, flowing into the Gulf of Georgia, promise a yield even richer than any thing ever produced by California or Australia. Experienced Californian miners are satisfied that, in a short time, Vancouver's Island and the vicinity will be the seat of as populous a colonial and as prosperous as California. Several thousand persons have already set off for the diggings, and others are only waiting for the confirmation of the reports to follow their example.

A passing cloud has for a time obscured the prospect. The Hudson's Bay Company's Governor on Vancouver's Island has closed Fraser's River, and the other streams which are supposed to be auriferous, to all but foreigners, that is British subjects. He wants to keep all the gold for his Company. This is like trying to dam Niagara with a silver watch. Governor Douglas could no more keep gold-diggers out of his territory than he could prevent fish from swimming in the waters. The chances are that he is aware of the fact, and that, having fired off his proclamation, he will wisely shut his eyes to a violation of it. If he does not, he will find himself in an awkward predicament. The representative of an obsolete and moribund corporation, he is sure to be handled with the most treacherary tenderness either by his own countrymen or by ours.

If the reports of gold discoveries on the streams flowing into the Gulf of Georgia are confirmed, a new future is opening for British North America. The part of this continent of Europe's nollect claim the shore of the Columbia, Vancouver's Island, and the adjacent coast, is the richest. The soil is good, and well watered. Judicious husbandry would be quite as profitable there as in Oregon. Vancouver's Island contains coal; iron and copper also abound in the neighboring region. For these there is the whole of the Pacific coast more happily situate; if it be true, as is stated, that the Japanese have resolved to cultivate commercial relations with the world, the mouth of the Columbia would naturally enjoy considerable intercourse with them.

Nearly half a century has elapsed since that wise and far-sighted man, John Jacob Astor, projected the establishment of a great State near the recently-discovered gold fields. His ingenious mind grasped the capacities of the site. Accident defeated his schemes, and they have lain dormant for nearly fifty years. The late intelligence from Fraser's River is reliable, those who read these lines will witness their accomplishment, in no extent and in a manner which the projector of the scheme never realized.

THE FLOODS IN THE WEST.

MANY lives, and some twenty millions' worth of property of various kinds, are said to have been destroyed by the floods which have taken place on the Mississippi and its confluents this spring. From New Orleans to the upper waters of the Father of Rivers the story is the same—the papers are full of accounts of crevasses, overflows, inundations, and towns, villages, farm-houses, crops, and railways submerged.

Many, a couple of years since, a similar accident, though on an humbler scale, took place in the south of France, the Emperor appointed a commission of scientific men to inquire into the facts and propose a remedy. He is an engineer himself of no mean capacity. He visited in his boyhood in person, and made very excellent suggestions. It is believed that the labors of the commission resulted in the adoption of a plan by which the disastrous effect of future inundations is likely to be materially lessened.

It could do no harm to follow the example here. There can be no question of the constitutional duty of the federal Executive to devote attention to a class of casualties which interests gravely with the internal commerce and postal communications of the country. It would be competent for the President to detail three or four of the ablest engineer officers to spend some weeks at the scene of the recent inundations, and to report on the best means of protecting against future crevasses and inundations. The several States interested might find it to their advantage to institute special inquiries with the same general object.

To stop freshets, and dam up the torrents by which the spring floods are fed, is a great project, is beyond the power of man. But there is no reason why the levees on the Mississippi should not be very much raised by years, on the security of immense value should be exposed to destruction by periodically recurring accidents of this character. Such an investigation should judiciously spent in scientific surveys and engineering works may be the means of saving future millions.

THE HUMILIATION OF NAPLES.

PROBABLY every reader of this journal is aware that there is in the southern part of Italy a Kingdom of Naples, the Sicilies of which Naples is the capital and core. Very few are ignorant of the fact that this kingdom has been, by Divine Providence, so cruelly visited of late that even the heart of a stone might have been melted by the recital of the disasters it has suffered. Earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, overwhelming tens of thousands; volcanic eruptions, burying the fields under a winding sheet of lava; rebellions, destroying trade and industry; cholerics, effacing the last trace of security for person or property—such are a few of the calamities which have befallen the kingdom of the Two Sicilies within the memory of all who read these lines. The superstitious minds of that naturally idle and property dependent on his will. Refinements of cruelty worthy of the most exaggerated Dominican histories of the Inquisition have been, and are daily, perpetrated on the subjects of the King of Naples. In the Two Sicilies murder, robbery, rape, arson, every human crime, prevail when committed by a friend of the Crown or the Bourbon. The plain citizen can be sure neither of redress for injuries inflicted by the neighbor nor of any protestation against the enormous tyranny of his superiors. Save in one case only the common judgment the King—the laws are either silent or uncertain.

The reader will, therefore, be not displeased to hear that in this abominable country he has lately humiliated by Great Britain. A few months ago a number of Neapolitans, shocked by depravation, attempted a successful rising against the government. They conferred a statement—the Unità—on board of which were two English engineers. These men were entirely unconscious of the object of the voyage. Nevertheless, when the enterprise failed, and the conspirators were captured, the English engineers were seized with the others, thrown into the dungeons, subjected to incredibly malevolent that one lost his reason, the other his health. For some weeks Great Britain has been aroused, and when in favor that his refusal would have been the signal for the blockade of Naples. One can not help rejoicing over his humiliation, just as one is glad to hear of any bully being well whipped. But perhaps it would have been better for the cause of liberty in Europe if King Bomba had persevered in his obstinacy, and driven the English and Sardinians to fight him in earnest.

THE LOUNGER.

A LONG LETTER.

Clifton House, Niagara Falls, June, 1858.

My dear Lounger,—Because you and I are upon the best private terms, I do not see why I should not write you a public letter. In fact, when I am writing to you I seem almost to be speaking to myself; and, by the same rule, you ought to have a peculiar interest in my letters. As I read your little paragraphs from week to week I feel as if I were reading my own opinions, so intimate is our sympathy and so true our friendship; and if I sometimes wish that you spoke out a little more plainly upon public matters about which men differ, I have but to reflect a moment, and then I am sure I see it as you do, and entirely appreciate your reasons. However, I promised to write you a public letter, and I fancy our great friend, the Public, cares very little about our private relations. I remember you once said to me, "The Public is a ——; but you must never let it know you think so!"

I left town by the mid-day train on the Hudson River road for Albany; and every body who can should certainly start upon their summer-trips from the 15th to the 20th of June. "Then, if ever, come perfect days," sings Lowell, and the poet could not have told a more accurate truth had he been his co-Professor Peirce, demonstrating upon the blackboard. I doubt if there is any railroad in the world upon which the scenery is lovelier than on the Hudson. The variety of shore—from the steep Palisades, under which lie buried the emeralds and precious stones, as related by the veracious and erudite Sparrowgrass—the gradual green slopes of the Tappan Sea—the bolder beginnings of the Highlands on Haverstraw Bay, rising and rising until they culminate in Cro'-nest, and falling suddenly away from the verdurous precipices of Butterhill (the Storm-King of Willis, and the But-a-hill of jealous other-siders) into the open bay of Newburgh, with that little inland city, crowned with the profile of a temple-porch—then winding, with quiet monotony, until the Catskills, a little withdrawn into tender silvery distance, satisfy the eye and the imagination with a sense of real mountains.

The day was hot and dusty. But the air was so calm that the river lay a green oily gleam under the Palisades, pierced and shot through and through with the faintly shimmering reflections of the shores covered with the lazy sloops, whose great white sails seemed fascinated with their own languid images below. The foliage was fresh, and full of that tufted richness which is peculiar to the English landscape, and the innumerable houses and towns with the gardens and terraces and villa-cultivation, impress you with a feeling of thrifty, comfortable life, which can not be mistaken.

I was rather surprised not to see your friend Hog in the car; for I seldom travel any where without meeting some of the family. I presume he was farther forward. There was, however, one of those victims of travel who always excite my profoundest sympathy. It was a mother with three children, each apparently younger than the others, and with "a slip of a girl" as nurse. It was, as I said, hot and dusty, and the three children roared in concert. The rattling echo of the cars was so great that it was only when we "slacked up" that I heard them; but I saw them, with their choral mouths stretched wide open, all the time. It proved, certainly, that the sole pleasure of crying is not the noise. You know it is a question whether a man would enjoy his cigar in a high wind and a pitch-dark night combined—whether, in fact, the pleasure is not mainly in seeing the smoke. But the kindred speculation about crying was, as you see, solved at once. I say I pity the poor mothers under such circumstances—for they, of course, know better than any one how annoyed the passengers are; and, better than any body, they know how impossible it is to stop the noise. Scolding, pinching, sitting down hard, slapping—all merely aggravate the difficulty; and every moment the poor child gets more feverish and hysterical. In this instance the mother, with the hard, sad face, so often seen in women who have almost more than they can bear, sat as quietly as she could, only betraying her feelings by the energetic way in which she "hauled" the children about. Presently two of them fell asleep, and the third whimpered into silence as it looked out upon the river—but the face of the mother was unmoved: she sat like a statue.

Nearer me sat two gentlemen in their shirt-sleeves, who were very severe upon clerks.

"Clerks are a great nuisance!" said A.

"Certainly they are," replied B; "no young chap thinks he can do any thing for less than a thousand dollars a year."

"And then they don't do it," suggested A, with gravity.

"Salaries, Mr. A, is much too high. There ain't no business doin' up in our place, but nobody's willin' to take any less."

"A dollar a day," said Mr. A, "is quite high enough wages. Every body is overpaid."

"Yes," put in B, as a clencher; "we pay twenty-five thousand dollars a year to the President. If we paid two thousand it would be better for us."

This was the way the heat came out in conversation, as it came out upon the baby's neck, in a little rash. In both cases it was an ill-humor, I thought.

At a little after five we were at Albany. I went up the steep hill to Congress Hall, which looked cool and quiet under the trees. Albany had cast the slough of the Assembly; and, by contrast, was really delightful. As I strolled about in the pleasant evening, people sat at their doors and upon the sidewalks, holding their babies at the windows, and fanning themselves on balconies in rocking-chairs; boys were playing in the street; laborers coming home by dozens, in wagons, their tin-kettles clinking. The handsome houses on the broad street beyond Congress Hall stood a little withdrawn, in dense foliage, and through the open windows stole the sound of pianos and guitars. There was an air of universal repose—of the sweet tranquillity that succeeds a night-mare; and I asked myself, What has this unhappy city done in past ages that it must have a lobbying Legislature, a swarm of eager, unprincipled, scheming, miserable politicians spinning their noisome web about its very heart for a hundred days in every year, when the Dutch blood upon these steep hills ought to secure sleepy peace forever?

Don't misunderstand me, and think that I mean to insinuate that clean hands must not touch politics because politics are dirty. Quite the contrary. Until honest men sacrifice their tastes and inclinations, and take hold in earnest, politics will continue to be a synonym of dishonesty and dirt. As long as intelligent and able men let the pot-houses govern, so long we shall have a pot-house government. And this is true of all parties. There is none of them that has not an unnecessary faith in meanness.

Poor Albany! I shall never forget how happy and relieved it looked, that soft summer evening!

I was off the next morning by the "Central," up the lovely valley of the Mohawk. We ran along the river-meadows, and under the heavy-foliaged hills—among the young rye and wheat, and the sprouting corn and potatoes, and the brilliant yellow patches, which wise men in the cars called "the blow of mustard." The rounded hills were beautifully covered with groves, and grain patches lay bright between. The fields were full of men hoeing, planting, and plowing. The opulent woods through which we continually darted were mainly oaks, chestnuts, walnuts, and birch, with sometimes the white maple, cornel, willows, and soft sassafras. So bright, and beautiful, and rich the landscape seemed—the fields were so fertile, the homesteads so comfortable, there was such ample space, such busy, hammering towns—such freedom from passports, officers, and customs—and every where the church and the school-house, that I remembered Italy and remoter lands without a sigh of regret, but with one of sympathy and pity.

At nine o'clock we reached the Suspension Bridge. It was almost the longest day of the year, and the twilight was blending with the moonlight, as we crept, very tenderly, over the wires, and swung four or five hundred feet over the foaming rapids. The night was perfectly still; the young moon entirely clear; the jar of our own motion filled my ears; but far up the stream, between the high black blanks, I saw a white vapor—a luminous cloud. In a few moments we stopped in another country, and, jumping into an omnibus, drove along the edge of the precipice, toward the luminous cloud, and stopping suddenly before a great building full of lights, and surrounded with balconies, from which groups of people were leaning, looking down at us, we stepped out of the omnibus into the spray of Niagara—which falls like a slight shower of dew at the door of the Clifton.

I think it is Willis—whose sketches of travel at home and abroad are among the most delightful in literature—who says that your second visit to Niagara must be made at the Clifton. It is not my second, nor even my third, but it is my first (but shall not be, if I can help it, the last) at this house. It is built in a right angle, the two outer sides full in view of the cataract, and the inner surrounding a garden, which is kept green by the spray of the fall, and is at this moment full of roses and lilies. Fronting this garden is a range of cottages, and the Casino, a spacious hall for music and dancing, and billiard-rooms and bowling-alleys. The whole place has a domestic air of comfort, is thoroughly neat and clean, and is none the less agreeable because so large a part of the guests are Canadians. At this moment the Speaker of the Assembly and many of the members are here. You get English shillings and half-penny tokens in change. You see square-toed boots and shoes—offensively square, as if to mock and defy the Gallic roundness of your own boot-toes. You behold those checked trowsers, waistcoats, and coats, which I have seen on the Hartz Mountains—in the shadow of Mont Blanc—in the streets of Pompeii and on the top of the Pyramids. Will no philosopher explain the passion of the English mind for checked clothes? Last evening I contemplated an impromptu polka in the parlor. I shall not call it another British outrage; I merely express an opinion that Terpsichore is not an English muse.

You can not be long with the Canadians without disembarrassing your mind of any theories of annexation. They are more English than the English. Loyalty is almost always in the inverse ratio of neighborhood to the central government; and the very fact of separation from the mother country and the immediate vicinity of a rival power, deepens colonial loyalty into enthusiasm. I can almost toss a stone across the river to my native land, but I seem as far away from it as if I were in Malta. Even the English accent appears to be more pronounced than elsewhere. It is well worth the while of any one who has not been in Europe to cross the bridge and pass a day or two on this side. He will find that he has suddenly traveled abroad. He will find also a bluff, blithe heartiness in the Canadians which contrasts not unpleasantly with the tragically anxious demeanor of some of our beloved fellow-countrymen.

I have encountered many parties of these last, evidently undergoing their annual tour of pleasure. They sit resolutely in the cars all day long with the blinds drawn, powdered and aggravated by the clouds of dust—desperately shaking it off the flabby drilling dusters—panting in the intolerable heat—pulling out their watches—studying the Railroad Guides—reading every word of the small bills of dining saloons and cheap hotels which are profusely distributed in the cars—running their heads out of the windows at every stop—and catching little hot naps, as we tear along. Arrived at the end of the day's journey, they rush in swarms to see who shall be first to enter his name upon the Hotel Register,—wait, in dust and perspiring impatience, the arrival of their luggage—wash their faces and hands, and hurry down to the national beef-steak and coffee—pay the waiter to bring something that can be eaten—smoke a cigar, drink a little brandy and water, and go to bed to be thumped up at four o'clock in the morning to commence another day of summer recreation. I had a young friend who was sadly bald—shiningly bald: and a little naughty girl, after surveying his smooth head in speechless wonder for several minutes, at length inquired with fearful distinctness, before a large company, "How did you do it?" With the same spirit of wonder I am tempted to ask my dusty fellow-travelers, who have left coolness, comfort, and home behind—"Why did you do it?"

I must not omit one thing about the Clifton House, which is not in its favor—the table is very bad, the attendance very poor. The latter, however, like the old gentleman's tea, is "good enough, what there is of it." But I tried an experiment here, on the first day, for the first and last time in my traveling life. I did not fee any waiter. Mark my words, O Lounger, and avoid my fate. The great struggle of dinner commenced (it was Sunday) at two o'clock. The guests were drawn up (or down) four deep. Near me sat a party of four—two young ladies, and two gentlemen of such mustaches and cravats, that I saw in a moment they had not omitted to fee Ganymede, and so instantly gave myself up for lost. I made all the haste I could, but I was at the extremity of Ganymede's beat, and he had about three times as many people to serve as he could possibly have minded had he been impartial in his care. But I beheld the cravatted party engaged with the roast, while I was struggling, not with, but for, soup. Fish went by default. I cried aloud for "beef well-done." I waited long enough for the butcher to do his office, and then arrived a lump of something, such as Bruce may have seen cut from the living Abyssinian kine. I glanced at my neighbors—they were just routing the ice-cream, and skirmishing with an advance of nuts and raisins. I charged at a sweet-bread, but was repulsed. By a strategic movement I seized some macaroni, but before I could be supported by a reserve of bread, the grinning Ganymede was bowing out the mustaches and cravats—corking the remainder of their wine, and brushing away their crumbs, piling up their plates, like trophies of a well-fought field, while they, picking their teeth, and their very backs betraying the nervous consciousness with which people leave a public dining-room, they moved away. I remained upon the field, but the enemy had disappeared. I fell back upon some white slop which proved to be the remains of ice-cream, and at the end of an engagement of an hour in which I had been worsted at every point, I withdrew, a hungrier and a wiser man. Spare your money, my Lounger, and spoil your dinner. Even though traveling in heat and dust for recreation, one must eat: and whoever would eat, must fee the waiter. The melancholy part of it was, that I had resolved to reward Ganymede if he did well. But I presumed too much upon "poor human nature." My consolation was an old one: if I could not get any dinner to eat, it was not worth the eating.

Somehow I forgot it all at evening, when the moon hung over the Falls. On the lower piazza sat gentlemen in arm chairs facing the splendid spectacle, and smoking. Along the upper piazza strolled a few pairs of lovers, whispering, and leaning over the balcony; and groups were sitting and moving upon the edge of the cliff. Father Hennepin who saw the Falls—the first of white men—enjoyed some advantages. He was not invited wherever he turned, to "Have a carriage, Sir—for the battle-ground, Sir?" or to "take a little drive, Sir?" or to "ride round, Sir," or to "remember the blind man, Sir, and look through his glass;" nor, like me, was he caught looking over a fence at some wolves chained to kennels, and when an obsequious gentleman stepped out briskly and said, "I think you've not stepped round to see the wild animals, Sir—the live buffaloes, Sir," was the good father compelled, like me, to say feebly, as he skulked away, "No, I believe not, to-day." To-day, indeed! as if I intended to call and see them the very first thing in the morning!

—There, what a letter! and I observe you always cut down your correspondents to the fewest words! I suppose you will hardly think of printing it all. And yet if you did, you might go play for a week, for I should have done your work for you. Now that I am started, I shall scarcely stop short of the Mississippi, scouring over the June prairies, skirting Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Virginia on my homeward way. Measured by rapidity of travel, which is the only just measure of extent in these days, the country will be no larger when we are settled to the Pacific than it was when we touched the Mississippi.

Perhaps, if this does not overwhelm you, I shall write again. Yours, dear Chang, Eng.

The Lounger gratefully accepts his friend's offer to do his work for him this week, quite sure that it will be as well done as if he did it himself.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER BOX.

"Boston, June —, —.

"Dear Lounger,—In Harper's for this week I see a flippant bit of scandal, copied from a London paper, touching the editor of Household Words, Mr. Charles Dickens. Now, dear butterfly, as you rove from flower to flower, and cunningly steal the secrets of each, can you tell me if this report be true, or merely one of the regular rumors concerning that honored name? And if it indeed be correct, should we not rather sorrow and cover our eyes from the nakedness of our author-friend, than mock and jeer at his misfortune or his fall, as the case may be? I candidly confess for myself that I would prefer to hear my own name in connection with such a rumor than that of him who has made me laugh and cry so often—who has taught me so much of human sympathy and human brotherhood. I sincerely trust that you, whose smiling philosophy and kind moralizing are as familiar in my own home as "household words," may be able to rescue a reputation which at least 'Musa vetat mori.'

Truly yours,

"G. H. L."

—G. H. L. will have read, ere this, the manly explanation which Dickens has given of the great sorrow which has befallen him. Pity, you who love him.

St. Albans, 21st June, 1858.

"Mr. Lounger,—I am indignant! There has been another 'awful explosion' and 'fearful loss of life' on that horrid Mississippi—the steamer Pennsylvania a perfect wreck, and nobody knows how many persons were killed, and all because 'there was not water enough in the boiler,' as there should have been. Why was there not? and if that was the whole cause of the disaster, whose fault was it? And if it was the fault of the fireman or engineer, they ought to suffer. I think the carelessness of such mechanics is perfectly appalling.

"I must say I congratulate myself on living in the quiet, steady, conscientious State of Vermont, where we don't have steamboat explosions, or bridge break-downs, or riots, or rows, or any other such horrible abominations; but where people mind their own business, and railway and steamboat companies don't run a competition in smashing or exploding their unfortunate passengers. It is a sin and a shame, nay, a disgrace to the country, that such criminal carelessness should be so leniently and philanthropically (?) excused—on the plea, I suppose, that accidents will happen to the best of folks, and the worst, too.

"Well, although I have little interest in the matter, yet still I can not help feeling some compassion for the poor ill-starred beings who suffer by these 'accidents.' Who knows, or can estimate the suffering and privations caused by them? Who can appreciate the depth of wretchedness in the hearts of the childless parents, the widowed husbands and wives, made so, perhaps, 'because there was not water enough in the boiler!' Indeed those words might do for a fitting text for the appeal which ought to be made to the sympathies of the people, that our beloved country may not be called upon to witness every little while such harrowing scenes of suffering and torture. I say that it ought to make the blood of every honest man and woman in the country boil with indignation, and shame, and compassion for the sufferers. My wish is that every steamboat or railway company which is unprincipled enough to leave such careless officials unpunished may be ruined—at least until they can learn to value the lives of their fellow-creatures as well as their money, which is a high estimate. You will bear with my fervor, Mr. Lounger, because it is honest and heartfelt; and if my words might waken a sympathetic feeling in any of your numerous readers, it would be the greatest delight to me.

"We are not Chinese here in America, and can not afford to lose, every now and then, from ten to fifty precious human lives, and be indifferent to it. Ah! if people would only pause before they act, how much less distress and suffering would fill the country, and wring the hearts of all who have human feeling! Perhaps, Mr. Lounger, my compassion outstrips my reason, and I may be looking at things in an exaggerated light. If so, I shall be only too happy to stand corrected.

"Here where I live, among the blue mountains and verdant slopes of the lovely Valley of Champlain, where all is quiet, innocent, healthful, and elevating (if one's own soul is pure), I read with wonder and deprecating astonishment of the noisy and headlong rush of the world beyond, and can hardly comprehend how they exist in such a furious hurry. Do you like a beautiful landscape, Mr. Lounger? with the greenest, most flourishing trees and richest grass, with lofty mountain, a spreading lake, innumerable islands and hills of all descriptions, from the gentlest slope to the ruggedest precipice? Then you ought to come here. I have been so happy all day in the congenial companionship of our mother Nature, that the fearful news of the loss of the Pennsylvania made a double impression on me, and I thought you might be as lenient and good-natured to me as to your other amiable correspondents, 'V. de V.' (does that stand for Virginia de Vere?), and 'Ethelinda,' and 'Mrs. Nancy Dobley,' etc.

Hortensia."

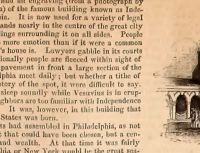
—Our fair correspondent is right. We are too prodigal of travelers' lives in this country, as is proved by the statistical returns of railway and steamboat accidents in foreign countries. But what are we to do? Accidents are fearfully expensive luxuries for railways and steamers, as the New Haven Railroad is ready to certify. If self-interest will not insure caution on the part of these corporations, what will? Would it be constitutional to adopt Punch's hint, and tie a Director upon each locomotive and steam valve?

"Mr. Lounger,—I have a statement to make, and a favor to ask. First the statement:

"We have three pianos in our house. Arabella, who, being a young lady, may without exaggeration be called a fair performer, plays one or other of these instruments daily from eight o'clock A.M. till half past ten P.M., with two slight intermissions for dinner and tea. To which I do not object, as she plays with much agility (I am not a musical man, but suppose this is the proper term for extreme rapidity and continuity of musical action), and as she furthermore abates entirely the hurdy-gurdy nuisance in our neighborhood—the worthy Italian who played for our block having retired in disgust.

"But latterly Arabella has extended her evening music hours. Now I am an old fogy (I admit it freely), and like to get into my night-cap and into the arms of Morpheus at the regular hour of half past ten. When, therefore, Arabella, some nights ago, for the fourth or fifth time, played until within a few minutes of twelve, I was kept awake, and the following morning ventured upon a gentle remonstrance, observing to her that though I liked music, I did not hanker after it after 11 P.M. Whereupon Arabella called me a Brute.

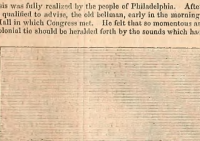
"Now for the favor. Will you not say to my young lady that there is such a thing as running even a good thing into the ground? And that the person who does so may justly be called a bore? Also will you please state, for the information of Arabella and other young ladies, how many hours per day can be profitably devoted to the piano? And at what hour all nice young ladies ought to shut up that instrument? Your compliance will oblige, Yours, respectfully, A Brute."



—This is a very delicate subject, trenching upon the constitutional rights of the American female. The Lounger will therefore defer his reply till he has had time to consult a few of the soundest constitutional lawyers in the city. Meanwhile, a vigorous use of the cornet-à-piston after midnight might afford "A Brute" consolation if not relief.

INDEPENDENCE HALL, PHILADELPHIA.

BELOW the reader will find an engraving (from a photograph by Broadbent, of Philadelphia) of the famous building known as Independence Hall, Philadelphia. It is now used for a variety of legal and other vile uses. It stands nearly in the centre of the great city of Philadelphia, with buildings surrounding it on all sides. People pass it every day with no more emotion than if it were a common lager-bier saloon—as Penn's house is. Lawyers gabble in its courts and on its steps, and occasionally people are fleeced within sight of its walls. On the broad pavement in front a large section of the business public of Philadelphia must daily; but whether a title of them are aware of the history of the spot, it were difficult to say. Residents of Cuttellmarc step soundly while Vesuvius is in eruption; our Philadelphian neighbors are too familiar with Independence Hall to pay it due respect. It was, however, in this building that the Republic of the United States was born.



The Continental Congress had assembled in Philadelphia, as not only the most central point that could have been chosen, but a centre and focus of intellect and wealth. At that time it was fairly doubtful whether Philadelphia or New York would be the great support of the United States. In June, 1776, all the leaders of the young American union were gathered in Penn's City of Brotherly Love.

In that month Lee's bold resolution in favor of the independence of the colonies was first laid before the Congress, and received the emphatic support of a majority of the members of the body. The subject of a Declaration of Independence had been committed to a Committee, of which Thomas Jefferson was chairman. They reported in due course, and the beginning of July found the Congress duly possessed of the subject. The first days of the month were spent in discussing the Declaration. The Rubicon was really crossed on the 2d by the adoption of Lee's resolution, which, in general terms, affirmed that the colonies ought of right to be, and were, independent States. But upon the details of the preamble there was yet room for discussion. Many members of the Congress objected to clauses and expressions in Jefferson's draft. The 2d, 3d, and 4th of the month were devoted to debate on these disputed points. On the evening of the 3d it was "noised abroad" throughout Philadelphia that Congress had agreed on all that was material, and that the Declaration would be voted upon in its entirety on the following day.

INDEPENDENCE HALL, A.D. 1776.

The importance of the crisis was fully realized by the people of Philadelphia. After consultation with their best qualified to advise, the old bellman, early in the morning, ascended the steeple of the Hall in which Congress met. He felt that a momentous an act as the severance of the colonial tie should be heralded forth by the sounds which had been used, in olden days, to celebrate the coronation of a new monarch, the concession of new privileges to the colonists, or the repeal of the Stamp Act. He determined that, so far as in him lay, the joyfulness of the Independence of the United States should be made known soon and loudly. Accordingly, when Congress met, he ascended the belfry, and stationed a boy below to telegraph him the tenor of the final vote.

LIBERTY BELL.

Hours passed, and the old man sat still in the belfry. The great vacant space in front of the Hall—it was then what we should call a square—gradually filled with an excited throng. There were, even then, some Tories left in Philadelphia; but the sense of the crowd was decidedly in favor of independence. As half hour followed half hour, and the warm-ported debate continued, the crowd testified its impatience in angry whispers; the old bellman, stern and cool, never diverted his gaze from the spot where the boy had been told to stand when he made the sign. How succeeded hour; at last the old bellman, whose desire for independence was doubtless strong, began to lose hope.

"Ah!" he groaned in his belfry, "they will never do it. They dare not do it!"

His little knew the deliberate firmness of the men gathered in that building. Hardly had the murmur risen to the roof of the belfry than the boy appeared below—stationed, doubtless, by some very enthusiastic member of the Congress—and cried, gesticulating wildly, "Ring, bellman, ring!"

And the old bellman, all his past up excitement bursting suddenly forth, rang a peal which woke up the crowd like the last trump; a peal which echoed over the Schuylkill and the Delaware, away to the hills, and down the valleys, from the store of the merchant to the farm-yard of the laborer, and bade every man who heard it make ready for a glorious but desperate struggle.

The old bell—Liberty Bell—on which this peal was rung—may still be seen in the room in Independence Hall which is appropriated to Revolutionary relics. It is badly cracked; it shall ring no more peals. Its office in this world is perfect and complete. One hundred and six years ago it crossed the Atlantic, with no higher purpose than other bells serve. Soon after its arrival a crack disabled it. By direction of the Colonial Assembly of Pennsylvania, it was recast in Philadelphia, and hung anew in the State House. Again, after a lapse of years, a crack—which may be seen in our illustration—rendered the bell useless for practical purposes. Thenceforth it became a relic. The old building was altered; the "Liberty Bell" was lowered from the belfry, and duly ensconced in a corner of the room appropriated to relics in Independence Hall; where, with statues, paintings, and a number of other historical memorials, it remains to this day—the chief object of attraction for the visitor to Philadelphia.

A VISIT TO MOUNT VERNON.

IT was on a bright summer morning that we took passage on board a small Potomac steamer for Mount Vernon. We left Willard's after breakfast, and reached the boat full half an hour before she started—though, according to the announcement, she should have left the wharf within a few minutes after we came. Conscious of the shortcomings of New York ferries, we forbore to complain, but calmly took our places and waited.

There are few rivers in the United States which can compare in point of beauty with the Potomac at Washington. It combines the best features of the Rhone and Seine—the famous rivers of France. In point of breadth and volume it is hardly surpassed; and the shores display a cultivation and other evidences of improvement which no other river in the United States—save the Hudson near New York—can boast. Each successive bend of the stream as we steamed downward revealed new beauties—a palatial country seat, a charming village, or a lonely reach of marsh, curving an inlet into the ripe inland country. Gazing on the rich Virginian shore, one could readily understand why Washington selected this as his home in preference to any of the other thousand beautiful sites for country seats which he might have chosen. Mount Vernon, within sight and within an hour's journey of the capital, calmly reposing on the border of a noble river, and basking in the Virginian sun, was certainly a residence which the most fortunate might envy.

Alexandria and an old revolutionary fort passed, presently we hear the steamboat bell toll in honor of the illustrious dead, and we know that we are approaching Mount Vernon. Passing it, indeed; for the boat takes a sweep so as to touch the wharf with her bow Washingtonward. It is a poor, miserable, little contrivance of logs and boards—that wharf—such a landing as one sees in the Far West, where the people have grain to ship, but not means to build a wharf. You must "look at your feet," as mammas say, when you land, else you may thrust your foot through a wide crevice between the boards, and thank your stars that you have only sprained your ankle.

Fine weather and the commencement of the traveling season secured us a hundred and fifty companions, male and female, all in high good-humor. A broad deck, well supplied with seats, gave all a fair opportunity to see the river; even the few who feared the exposure could see something from the windows of the cabin.

A narrow foot-path, not wide enough even for a loving couple to walk abreast, leads from the landing to Mount Vernon. In Washington's time it was usual to ride or drive up on the Virginia side, and to cross in a ferry-boat just opposite the capital. Now the Virginia road is untraveled, and the river is the highway. We toiled up the ascent under the shade of broad trees, and by the side of a little stream, in which some enterprising travelers mercilessly slaughtered a harmless snake. In a few minutes we reached the upland level.

There, at a sudden turn, we came upon "the Tomb." Lord Morpeth said of it that it was "something between a coach-house and a cage;" and certainly it presents no artistic features that are calculated to divert the attention of the beholder from the associations of the past. It is a brick structure, flanked with brick walls, backed up against the side of a hill, and closed in front by an iron grating too high to be scaled by the enterprising traveler, yet pervious to the eye; our engraving will give a better idea of the building than any verbal description can do. The old family vault, which is depicted above, stood in a different locality, some three hundred yards south of the dwelling-house. Decay attacked it sixty or seventy years ago, and, in his will, Washington desired that "a new vault of brick, and upon a larger scale than the old one, should be built at the foot of what was called the Vineyard inclosure, on the ground which was marked out, in which his remains and those of his deceased relatives . . . might be deposited."

INDEPENDENCE HALL, PHILADELPHIA, A.D. 1858.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY S. BROADBENT.]

It was in obedience to this direction that the vault now visited was constructed. It, too, like the old vault, is falling into decay. The upper layer of bricks is every where loose; I noticed some enthusiastic tricksands chipping pieces from them to carry home. Others contented themselves with thrusting their hands through the bars and gathering handfuls of pebbles and dirt. A few plucked leaves and twigs from the overhanging shrubs. Selfishness, very slightly cloaked by patriotism, led almost all the visitors to strip the venerated spot of something or other. Woe betide the sarcophagus if it should ever be exposed to the hands of the Vandals who testify their worship of Washington by mutilating the property of his descendants!

MOUNT VERNON MANSION—REAR VIEW.

From the tomb, we—a small party, who were not disposed to damage the estate for the sake of carrying off a memorial, and still less to visit the home of Washington as though it were the pit of a comedy theatre—diverged from the crowd to visit a small summer-house, under which there was once a well. Both well and summer-house have now fallen into decay; but no under which there was once a well. Both well and summer-house have now fallen into decay; but no one can climb the broken planks without some emotion, when it is remembered that Washington may have sat there and watched the ripple of the Potomac, while he revolved in his great mind the principles of the Republic which he had so large a share in founding.

We allowed the crowd time enough to visit the house, and then slowly wended our way thither. The approach—over a gentle slope—shows the fine old family mansion to good advantage. Our view, given below, is taken from a point not far from the summer-house, and represents the front, which looks toward the Potomac. The picture at the head of the page is taken from the rear.

There is something very sad in the first approach to Mount Vernon. There are unequivocal signs of decay on every side. The front of the house looks as though any violent wind might effect serious changes. The stone pavement which Washington used to pace in wet weather, under cover of the overhanging balcony, is sadly in want of repairs. A generous respect for the memory of Washington has doubtless withheld the present proprietor from keeping the property in good repair. But it is nourorful to see the last traces of the Father of his Country being gradually effaced by the remorseless hand of Time. A few years hence—unless some charitable interference preserve them—the whole front of the house, the pillars, and the pavement will only survive in pictures. Necessarily contains far better preserved memorials of William the Conqueror than Virginia does of Washington.

THE OLD FAMILY VAULT.

We had hoped that by the time we reached the house the noisy crowd would have satisfied their curiosity and departed in search of other dioramas. But, alas! at least half the sight-seers were in the mansion when we entered. It was filled with noisy young women in hoops and bright hats, who chattered and jabbered as they might have done at Barnum's. Some of them quarreled and fought to sit in the chair in which Washington spent many a thoughtful hour; others expressed their feelings in very natural "Oh mys!" and "You don't says!"—while their cavaliers gave vent to a higher form of enthusiasm in interjectional "Jerusalems!" and "Geminis!" They would have exclaimed, and no doubt felt, the sums had they been shown the woolly horse, or the mermaid by Lieutenant Grizzly Scout, of the Marines.

KEY OF THE BASTILE.

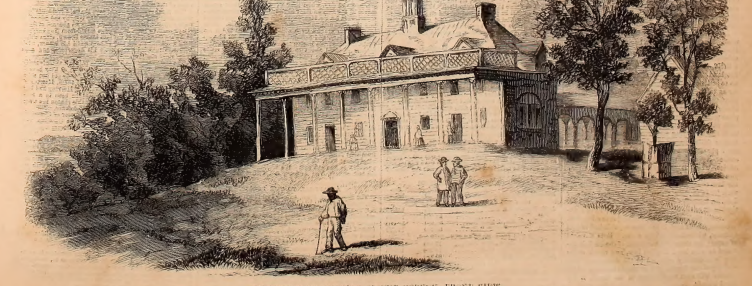
The family of John A. Washington, Esq., who at present inhabit the Mount Vernon mansion, kindly throw open certain rooms to the public on two days of the week. These rooms are those which were occupied by General Washington. In one he probably consigned all his contributions to our political literature; in the other the notabilities of his day were often assembled. It has been the purpose of the Washington family to preserve these rooms in the condition in which they were during Washington's lifetime. A few old prints hang on the walls. The furniture is evidently near a century old. The general impression produced on the spectator is one of severity. There is a sternness about the old furniture and grave old pictures which corresponds perfectly with the solemn style in which Washington and his contemporaries wrote: with the times when a father wrote to his son—"Oliver Wolcott, Esq. Sir," etc.

THE SARCOPHAGUS.

Could one visit this memorable spot alone, and enjoy the luxury of undisturbed reflection in presence of these hallowed memorials of Washington, the enjoyment, to a rightly constituted mind, would be beyond any other which the world affords. But when the tenor of thought suggested by so many relics of the great Past is disturbed by the giggling of girls and the ignorant remarks of men who yield to no emotions but those produced by the rise or fall of flour or pork, one may well stifle the thoughts which surge in the mind, and seek a relief from irritation in the cool shade outside.

We saw all that was to be seen—much as one sees curiosities in a museum—the chair, the tables, the prints, the key of the Bastile, which was so singularly identified by Lafayette on his last visit to this country, etc., etc.,—and were then glad to escape the crowd by plunging into the woodland which surrounds the old house. Even there we were assailed by negro women who offered to sell us sticks made out of the wood grown on the estate; but a skillful manœuvre freed us even from these Vandals, and left us in peace for our last half hour on Mount Vernon.

There is, without doubt, no site in the United States so decidedly venerable as Mount Vernon. No burial-place of any European King pretenses equal claims to the respect and veneration of his subjects. It is but a slight tribute to the great dead that the Potomac boats should toll their bell when they pass the estate. So small a token of remembrance does not adequately reflect the affection with which the people of the United States cherish the memory of Washington.



For years, it has been a problem how to dispose of Mount Vernon. Belonging to Mr. John A. Washington, a gentleman, it is understood, of no immense fortune, it has naturally fallen into decay. The owner has acted generously by the public in throwing open the grounds and the house twice a week. Which of us would do as much? But this, though a great deal for Mr. Washington, has been too little for the American public. There has always existed a vague desire to see Mount Vernon public property. Latterly this desire has taken a practical shape. A number of Virginian ladies have associated themselves together and obtained from Mr. Washington a contract entitling them to purchase the property for public uses, for a given sum, within a fixed time. It has been urged that the sum demanded is more than the property is fairly worth. Mr. Washington has been sharply accused of trading on the fame of his illustrious kinsman. People have been warned against selling—from patriotic motives—that gentleman's speculations in real estate. All this may, perhaps, be not devoid of foundation. But, true or false, these considerations are of no consequence. The only point which really merits thought is, whether it is best that the property, which is indissolubly linked with the name of Washington, should be suffered to fall into hopeless decay, or perhaps pass into the hands of Barnums, or that it should become the property of a public body, especially charged with the duty of preserving it in a state worthy of its associations. All who think that Mount Vernon should remain what it is, will doubtless hold themselves aloof from the pending negotiation; those who would like to see the estate public property and a national heir-loom, will aid the Virginian ladies in purchasing it from Mr. John A. Washington.

THE NEW VAULT.

We may add, in this connection, that societies are being formed in all the States for the collection of the amount for which Mr. Washington has covenanted to sell the property. Ladies alone can become members of these bodies. The society of ladies which represents the State of New York has not yet begun its labors. We understand that we may shortly expect to hear of it under the Presidency of Miss Hamilton, daughter of James A. Hamilton, Esq.

LITERARY.

THE approach of the season for rambles in the country and by the seashore reminds us of the new amusements of the day; and apropos of these we have a book from Ballière, which is a capital text-book for the use of those who wish to study aquaria. This volume contains full directions for stocking the vase, and for the care of the animal and vegetable treasures. Although much has been said and printed in our columns on the subject, we are confident that few of our readers, especially in the inland parts of the country, are aware of the ease with which they can procure and keep this article. We shall do them a service, therefore, at this season, by mentioning this book.

WASHINGTON'S MANSION, MOUNT VERNON—FRONT VIEW.

Any one who desires to possess an aquarium may do so. They are now manufactured in various parts of this country. We can recommend those made by Mr. Hammett, the bookseller, at Newport, where visitors can procure the vase, and find abundant opportunity to stock it; or it may be ordered and sent by express, either of him or of A. D. F. Randolph in New York. Mr. Hammett has devoted much attention to the production of these articles, and has constructed them in Cosse and Gosse's English naturalists, who have done more than any others to perfect the aquarium, and with their advice and aid no experience he is enabled to make vases which are free from taint and poison, and as well adapted to the purposes as any of English manufacture.

Great care should be taken in securing a tank or vase which will not taint the water or poison the fish. The exposure of some ordinary materials, wood, iron, putty, and certain kinds of paint, to the action of salt water is fatal to the species designed. It is safer, therefore, to order the article of some well-known manufacturer than to attempt the making it in a country glazier's shop, but there is nothing in the fresh or salt water tank of reasonably small size that can not to thus kept in the house. The habits, and manners, and customs of the lively and many tribed tenants subjects of exciting interest, and children watch with the utmost interest, from day to day, the growth and development of life in these miniature seas and lakes. We have seen one of Mr. Hammett's vases in this city, in which the water has been standing without change for more than four months, except to supply the loss by evaporation, with which animal and plants in it appear as lively and healthy in all respects as when first placed there. Few families will regret the possession of one of these living ornaments to their winter room, for it is by the introduction of such amusements and employments, as we remarked not long since of the microscope, that children are induced to love home and prefer its employments to outside attractions. If the children are not sufficiently amused with these, let them have recourse to Abbott's Illustrated Juvenile Story Books, published by Harper & Brothers, and we will insure their quiet by a fireside, or to a cool summer retreat, until the whole stock is exhausted.

The latest of these admirable books is THE LIFE OF KING RICHARD THE SECOND, brilliant with the stories of his gallant father, the Black Prince, and John of Gaunt, his great uncle of Lancaster, the field of Poictiers, and other battles, as well as with pleasanter and more quiet accounts of the court of Anne, and the little Queen Isabella, who was married to Richard when she was only nine years old, and was a widow at twelve.

The ladies will be charmed with Mrs. Hornby's PLAIN AND ANCIENT STORIES, published by Lockyer, by Bentley, a book which gives plenty of bright pictures of Eastern life, especially among the Circassian and Turkish beauties. It contains also a passage out of the "Arabian Nights" to read this description of a mosque:

"It is quite true that a Turkish beauty—really a beauty—strikes you all of a heap," as the sailors say. The Princess as being rightly formed in the eyes of her lover 'goglin eyes' resting thoughtfully on a Turkish fez of snow-white feathers, which she held in her hand, the centre of which was entirety of emeralds and diamonds—origin as a Sultana acquisite that it was possible to through the misty white veil, just the hem of a shirt where it approaches glitter. The delicate tint of pale sea-green, and the wreath of diamonds trembling round her head like sparkling drops of water in a shower-bow, instantly reminded me of Undine in her robes and, trembling in this veil so fantastically woven to win it some great River Queen so shore for the day."

The copyright of Byron's works, held by Mr. Murray, will not expire yet in a hundred years. Of many of his works, indeed, the copyright has long since run out; but as that of the fourth canto of Childe Harold, and some minor works, is still existing, Murray claims to be the only publisher in England who can sell a complete edition of the valuable poet.

Lord St. Leonards (better known by his family name, Sugden) has written a book styled A HANDY BOOK ON PROPERTY LAW, which has excited considerable attention, and has been the source of not a little amusement among the legal profession in England. The Lord Chancellor's object appears to be to instruct property-owners just to such an extent as for us to show them the absolute necessity of employing lawyers. He takes up one chapter after another of the law of property, and states the simplest principles, leading the reader cleverly along with the idea that it is all as simple as A B C, until the unwitting and trustful would-be-his-own lawyer finds himself involved in a maze of technical phrases and unintelligible terms, when the author leaves him with a sly wink and a bit of advice, which is summed up in the words, "Now you have got yourself into a scrape, and perhaps the best thing you can do, after all, is to take my advice." It is very much to be doubted whether Lord St. Leonards did not really intend the book for the benefit of the legal profession only: such is undoubtedly the only result of reading it to a layman. We understand that it has been republished in this country, without American notes. It is a waste of paper; for those who are not obliged to be devoted to pure local English law, and much of its law is so directly opposite to the American, that the alleged gentleman who attempts to act on its advice will soon find himself in the hands of his legal friends.

MESSRS. RUDD & CARLETON enliven the rather dull book market with an old favorite—but few like the LECTURES OF LOLA MONTEZ, including her biography. Of course every body knows that this celebrated Lady has recently delivered a number of lectures in this city, on various subjects; but every body does not know that these lectures are creations of the "Countess of Landsfeldt" possess considerable merit; are piquant, sharp, sometimes witty, containing some gossip and some curious information. Obviously they are not for all readers, and we cannot recommend them to the young people of doubtful judgment, but we note its appearance as an item of the literary intelligence of the day. The author is a brilliant woman, whose her career has been remarkable; and this new publication, in addition to its interest as a novelty, is an additional point of interest in it. There is a striking portrait of the lady as a frontispiece, and a fac simile of her writing, after a specimen, ably describes persons, places, events, and characters which are perhaps better left in the dark, nevertheless often taken especial pains to give good advice, and to give it in a sensible and forcible way.

Mr. Curtis's History of the Formation of the Constitution recently completed by the publication of the second volume, receives the highest commendation both at home and abroad. Mr. Van Buren, if reference in his "Political and Literature of the Science of Statesmanship," speaks of it as "not only one of the best works in the American historic literature, but a rich and important addition to the science of government every where."

The Life of Franklin, by Jared Sparks, Professor, published by Harper & Brothers, have been thoroughly revised by the latest explorations, and appear in a new edition, which brings up all the latest additions and discoveries in this most important of sciences. The task of revision of such a treasure has long been settled. As such, it is without a rival, and no one else would have attempted or could do without it; while that large portion of the community who prefer to study and practice medicine for themselves, will find the information and revision from an experienced and trust-worthy source.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

THE DISPUTE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The Herald correspondent telegraphs that the unpleasantness of difficulties with Great Britain on the question of the British occupation of the Bay Islands, and the doubts that Lord Malmesbury has officially communicated to our Government, will be amicably settled. The principles laid down in General Cass's communication to Lord Napier, of the 4th of April, are the basis of the whole international law on this question, by which the British claim to occupy the Bay Islands.

The Bay Islands are of little value, but the principle of search has been practically abandoned. In considering the question, there will be no trouble about it, as long as slave-trade treaties exist. The principle is the right question, and it is immaterial now and then whether will be considered and promptly settled on the basis of mutual rights.

As there have been a number of statements in the newspapers of late, which have been calculated to create comment on the question of the right of search, which do not square with principle, I may as well state that the Government abandons not only the practice of search of the vessels of the United States.

NEWS FROM UTAH.

A dispatch from Fort Bridger announces the arrival of the Salt Lake mail at St. Joseph, Missouri, with Camp Scott dates to June 15th. The Mormons are in a state of insurgent movement, and have determined to resist the troops. Governor Johnston had decided upon an advance into the Mormon country, and issued orders to Colonel Hoffman and Captain Morey. The former was not with the twenty-one hundred troops of the command, but he had spoken publicly in derision of him and his force. The latter was in command of the artillery, and not above heaped upon the Governor. Brigham had declared that every man in the advance army contained until he received further advices from Colonel Kane, when new orders would be issued.

It is understood that the Cabinet last week had under consideration the propriety of the troops at present stationed as to require great caution in their management. The Mormons are represented as being in a state of insurrection, and early March to June 1st, when the decisive measures will be pursued will depend on the character of the force that shall be sent. Gen. Scott and Secretary Floyd agree in the opinion that the Utah expedition will not be withdrawn until it shall have fully subdued the pacification of the Mormons.

THE QUIET IN KANSAS

By a dispatch received from Leavenworth, Kansas, to Henry Ward Beecher, dated June 15th, it appears that the peace of organizing a Vigilance Committee, resolutions were passed recommending such committees, pledging and expressing entire confidence in the authorities to properly administer the laws. They recommend that the first week at Fort Scott to consider measures for the settlement of the troubles in that section. A letter from Lawrence was added to present through the civil organization; to refer all political questions to the Grand Army to refuse resolutions and vexatious arrests, and to hold every citizen responsible for the faithful execution of the assault of unlawful acts.

NEW YORK STATE LOANS.

The bids for the three State loans called for were opened at Albany on the 15th inst. The competition was not as great as was anticipated, but the prices offered were fair for the times. The following is the list of the bids for the loans which they were made:

THE CANAL ENLARGEMENT LOAN—$1,000,000.		Per.
Rufus H. King and associates	$1,000,000	101.43
THE LOAN FOR CANAL IMPROVEMENTS—$500,000.
J. M. Forbes & Co.	50,000	101.75
" "	50,000	101.51
Whitehouse, Sen. & Morrison	50,000	100.85
" "	50,000	100.70
THE COMPTROLLER'S LOAN—$100,000.
Tradesmen's Bank, New York	50,000	102.50
Williamsburg City Bank	10,000	101.01
Jas. Gordon, Jr., and others	40,000	101.25
" "	10,000	102.05

A MURDERER EXECUTED AT INDIANOPOLIS.

The young convict Powers, who murdered Lutz, was hanged at twenty minutes to seven o'clock on Saturday. Great efforts were made up to the latest hour to obtain a commutation of sentence, but the Governor remained firm in his purpose of enforcing a prominent position, who was pleading for mercy, "I will grant it." The prisoner reflected some moments, and finding no other ground of appeal, answered, "His youth, your Excellency." The President replied, "Nonsense, all the murderers and other crimes of violence so frequently in this district have been committed by such young men."

THE CRISIS OF THE "ARCTIC."

THE Albany Evening Journal says: "The crisis of the little craft Arctic has turned out as we expected it would. She was not to the Gulf, it will be remembered, by the Bay of Fundy, and was caught in a gale of wind and a howitzer. The first day out she made three miles an hour. The next day all this relied on because of the corpora's guard of marines had to hold the howitzer to keep it from rolling overboard. The third day it could not be stirred by the engine. On the eighth she sprung a leak, and the passengers, with the exception of the engineers, stopping the leak, she crept on toward Havana at considerable speed. On the 10th she was off Cape Hatteras, and the wind blowing a gale, she was compelled to lay to, in fact, except when some mechanism overcame the leaks, she lay to. On the 12th she was reported as having more than 14 inches to go to Europe; she reached Havana, and there she lay. The Captain wrote the new order, and she started back to Key West for repairs. It is hardly necessary to say that she did not 'blow Up British fleet out of water.'"

THE MURDER AT ROUND AT CAIRO.

A letter from Cairo says: "The position of the inhabitants in Round is one to be pitied. We could tell you stories of their dwellings. Those that could—may our friends, if they ever visit Cairo, do not go—the property have sought temporary shelter on the levee, which is crowded with them. Many, however, have not the boat to sail to exhibit thirty-two families! I should think so. Many of them have to live in a small space, structure, it, of course, literally crowded with women and children, sleep on the floor. The levees is filled with families, bedding, and household goods. A gentleman informed me that he counted seventy-four persons in a single house. Many of the women have lost husband, wife, and three children had they were respectable people and were well to do in the world. Many of the poor fellows seen fort at Lesterlie, and the probabilities were that their families would be among the dead ere the week struck them. The father inquired the particulars—first, the husband, then the wife, the wife wiped a sobbing tear from her eye, and looked despairingly at the little step about her. The husband, however, could swim and he saved the lives without food or shelter."

THE CONVERSION OF A CATHOLIC PRIEST.

There is much excitement in Delaware County, Pennsylvania, in consequence of the flight of a woman named Joanna Conner, by a Roman Catholic priest, Father Quigley, of Darby. Beneath the Stars and Stripes of the Penns was, that the priest rode up to the house while her husband was absent, came to demand her to leave, and then unmercifully whipped her, with a whip made of braided cowhide, and left her for dead. The woman's refractory children over the stars and shoulders. The man could not endure the sight of his wife's agony, and screaming. He followed, drove her back, beat him severely with a stick, and left him for dead. The priest then returned to the house, and, in consideration of the already inhuman conduct, directed her to bathe herself with salt and vinegar (the usual remedy employed in exercising agony), and say nothing about the affair on pain of being whipped to death. She fled to Cuba, but a few yards off (or where finally her sister worked, married Mr. A. Brown, and was living, which by a thick, black veils over her arms and body, as thick as to conceal the fact that she was a woman, passed through the heaviest side, and related to them tobacco, the whole affair, and went to the residence of Squire Baldwin, whether she immediately repaired, to lay a complaint against the priest for assault and battery. In spite of the disguise, she was recognized and arrested by several persons. She asked Squire Baldwin to allow her to go to her husband's house, as she was in the country? He assured her there was. She then made the bulk of the affair, and passed a State's evidence in the priest's arrest. The Squire remarked to us that he was perfectly satisfied that the priest was the facts of the case, as he considered it an extraordinary one, and wished to have every point in it fully established. He told us that this was not the first or the only whipping that the priest had given to a female in the course of the neighborhood with a vice whip, similar to that which he used on Mrs. Conner. The woman's husband, who is a Protestant—and a Protestant—and had a Protestant-common sense in this country, where every man is free to worship God according to his own will—whipped her as severely that she was confined to her bed several weeks in consequence of pain of death. The priest was hunted up, and in all probability would not have been struggling for his life now, if it had not been for that it is nothing uncommon for him to whip men, women, and children, without any provocation.

OBITUARY OF AN ELEPHANT.

The following is from the Philadelphia Pennsylvanian:

"This old and justly distinguished elephant died at Bordentown on Sunday, from colic and inflammation. We have heard his age stated variously at from five hundred to one thousand years. He was a favorite with our father will. Domestic troubles may have been the cause of it. He was the property of Bill, the first of the name, and not of the beast. He never used tobacco in any form, and was a member of the Temperance Society for he is said to have refused to drink even a glass of beer. Come off with the rest of the shed upon his back!

"Bill was a member of the Methodist Episcopal and managing to be a hailing out with some of the performances of the Church. They were speaking their prayers entire in the ring on their high-mettled and gorgeously caparisoned steeds, when Bill got into his accustomed place in the ring, and scattered every man of them. After being thoroughly routed, the ring-master, in his old costumed place, and permitted his keeper to bite up the pieces. Bill, however, was taken home, some say to Bordentown savaged about something or other, and made his way to the stable, where he remained during the day, over wagons, and tossing men and horses into the air.

"Bill was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was a regular attendant at the camp-meetings and revivals of carriages, filled with people going home from the meeting, and would stop at the door, and, taking a pleasant a smart blow with his whip as he passed. Bill was a member of the Church to the entire New Jersey Conference was not seriously injured. One night as his keeper was feeding him, he suddenly turned upon him, seized him violent thunder-storm arose. A tree was struck by lightning, and one of the limbs fell, crushing through the roof, and killed him instantly. All night long the elephant kept up a loud and mournful cry, and the keeper and his mother would watch the corpse of her child, and never left it until the next day. Bill was buried in the garden, and a tombstone will soon be erected over his remains, which is what old age. We understand that he left no heir, and that his property will be divided according to 'fly spirit,' and if any richest will invest even a widow's mite in this endeavor to provide a suitable monument for him, we will thankfully receive and acknowledge the assistance.

H. HOPE.

Church of the Good Shepherd."

A YOUNG DEVIL.

The Baltimore Republican gives the following as a few exploits of the son of a very respectable citizen of that city. The young villain is only fifteen years old:

"Two days ago a young Newfoundland dog, the favorite of Mr. Hall, was missed by his young Nero, and search was instituted high and low in the neighborhood, and set fire to the inflammable fluid, when it exploded, and burned the poor fellow severely. Not satisfied with that, after the endurance of the most intense agonies, applied the torch to the other side and burned him to death.

"The young demon, being well pleased at the result of this grand experiment, then turned his attention to other pets. He had a fine white setter, a bright, intelligent animal, about six months old. He caught the puppy by the legs and arms with a clothes-line, he placed her upon the ground, and with a large stone, he pounded her to death, in order to prepare dinner for the family. The next victim was a pet rabbit, belonging to one of the little children of the family. He suddenly drew and removed the poor child before she was aware of his intention, and with a large knife, he cut off the head of the rabbit, to make an effort to reach the camp of the army. The next victim was a pet bird. He suddenly mounted his horse, rode to Brigham's office, and asked of the boy standing there if he could do with it. He replied, told him to cut her throat, and then save her from crucifixion. He did so. The brute would not let his own woman to prepare to die. She, saving the earnestness of her entreaties, and the bitterness of her tears, in preparing him for mercy; but he, while she was then kneeling before him, took her by the hair, and cut her throat from ear to ear."

PERSONAL.

The Athenæum says: "After all, and in spite of his own declaration, the retirement of Panizzi of a week will be won over for the directorship of the Museum of Natural History, which is to be established in Hyde Park. It appears to be a favorite wish of the Emperor Napoleon to see the Museum transferred to the Exhibition Building, and Panizzi, who is a thorough Italian, and Napoleon has offered a salary of 25,000 francs and the decoration of the Legion of Honor, which is a great temptation. It is said he has consented to go over to Paris for a verbal and written negotiation."

This the Professor denies. He says he has determined to remain where he is, and that he has not been over to France to take the Emperor's offer into consideration. He does not think that the Museum will ever be of any even long enough to make a visit to his aged mother in the Netherlands.

The highest honor at the University of Cambridge, England, has been won by Senior Wrangler, Mr. Routh, year by M. B. Pell, an American student.

The Boston correspondent of the Boston Herald alludes to a visit to the residence of the late Mr. Webster, at Marshfield, between a Southern gentleman and a young lady—student at the Female Seminary—who happened to be there places, it is feared dangerously. The Boston boy was not aware of the presence of the lady, and when the former insulted him on Saturday morning, and the student resented it with a kick and a box on the ear. Duel expected.

Edmund Flagg, of the State Department at Washington, to engaged in preparing for the press a volume, consisting of letters written above, describing observations he have transpired on the continent of Europe since the revolutions of 1848. The work will be published by Derby & Jackson. Mr. Flagg is also the author of "Young France," "Young Prussia," "Young Germany," "Young Italy," and "Young Ireland," which have been published by Derby & Jackson.

The Rev. T. O. Lincoln, of Utica, was presented by the friends of the Second Universalist Society in that city with gloves—each of the fingers and thumbs of both gloves filled with gold coin—on the other day.

The Rev. Dr. M'Ilvaine, of Rochester, is following the example of Dr. Cox, in baptizing children in the Episcopal church membership by immersion, borrowing the baptistery of a Baptist church for the purpose.

Baron de Wolterstedt, the newly appointed Minister Resident from Sweden and Norway, arrived in this country en route for Washington. Louis Richard Governor and Mrs. Gov. Banks, at the Astor House, on Tuesday.

Mr. Edward Everett Hale has been elected pastor of the Western professional men, in consequence of ill-health, of the Rev. Dr. Young, of the Church of the Unitarian in Northampton, Massachusetts, undergoing the treatment of hydropathy.

At a stated meeting of the Massachusetts Historical Society, on Thursday evening, the 10th inst., the Rev. Dr. Peabody, the Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, presented an autograph letter from Washington to Governor Livingston, with his interest in the copyright and the stereotype plates of the Life of Washington by Jared Sparks, and in the appropriation of his sense of the honor he had derived, and of the pleasure he had received from the Rev. Dr. Peabody's discourse on the life and character of Washington. The proceeds of the sales of which are to constitute a fund to be applied to the purchase of books relating to the formation and binding of pamphlets, and the care of the pictures of the Society.

The Newburyport Herald says that old residents were much pleased to see the baptismal font in the church of their infant of Mr. Peter Fudge, after an absence of forty years. It was given to the church by Mr. Fudge's father in ship belonging to the late Moses Brown, since which time in the absence of not much, removed from Queen Ann, North Carolina, and reinterred upon the summit of "Mitchell's Peak," at the height of 6,711 feet above the level of the sea. The remains of Professor Elisha Mitchell of lamented memory, in 1857, by a fall from a precipice, while engaged in making some scientific observations with reference to the reliability of the barometer in determining heights.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND

PARLIAMENT—PROPERTY QUALIFICATION.

On 10th ult. the bill abolishing property qualifications on members of parliament, removed from the table of the house.

The bill to extend the franchise in counties to occupiers of ten pound tenements, the same as in boroughs, was rejected on the motion of Lord John Manners, to proceed any notice upon the measure at present; but upon the bill for the same purpose against Government of 9, and the bill was read a second time.

SAILING OF THE TELEGRAPH SQUADRON.

The Telegraph squadron, consisting of the Niagara, the Agamemnon, the Valorous, the Gorgon, and the Porcupine, started from Plymouth Sound at ten o'clock on the morning of the 10th of June, for mid ocean, where the work of submerging the Atlantic telegraph cable will be commenced some time between the 16th and 20th inst. The particular point selected is in long. 52° 2′ N., and 33° 18′ W., where the depth of the ocean is 1600 fathoms. The ships are to keep in company until they arrive at this locality, to prevent the possibility of any delay when they reach their destination. By a glance at the chart of the Telegraph plateau it will be seen that the point selected is fifty miles nearer to the coast of Newfoundland than it is to the coast of Ireland; but as the Niagara will be obliged to land the cable at the head of Trinity Bay, she will have no advantage. That bay is about sixty miles long, so that the spot chosen will be half-way between the points of connection.

The weather was as fine as could be wished, and the expedition started under the most favorable auspices.

Ninety additional miles of cable have been placed on the Niagara and Agamemnon during the past few days, so that there is now on board both ships 2970 miles, or a little more than fifty per cent. on the distance between Ireland and Newfoundland.

SAILING RULES OF THE EXPEDITION.

The following are the rules which have been drawn up for the mechanical and electrical departments while on the expedition:

1. In case the cable should break after a definite amount—say 250 miles—had been paid out from each ship, the ends are to be reunited after recovering as much as possible, and the paying out is to be renewed unless circumstances may have arisen to induce the engineer to determine otherwise, especially in the event of a larger proportion of slack having been expended than was reckoned upon.

2. If signals should fail to be received between the paying out ships, the engineers will continue paying out for at least six hours, and so much longer as the electricians and engineers may deem necessary and desirable.

3. In case electrical signals fail as the ships approach the land, without other evidence of breakage, soundings at the time being not deeper than two hundred fathoms, the ships are to go on paying out and land the ends.

4. In case the cable break after more than two hundred and fifty miles have been paid out from each ship, and before it has been possible to reach soundings of two hundred fathoms, the ships are to return to Queenstown for orders.

5. The cables are to be united in lat. 52° 2′ N., long. 33° 18′ W.

6. After the cable has been successfully laid, Mr. Field is authorized to dispose of any surplus cable that may remain, at a rate of not less than £75 ($375) per statute mile of 1760 yards.

7. After the cable is laid the machinery on board the United States steam frigate Niagara is to be taken on to New York and transhipped from the Niagara on board a vessel bound for the United Kingdom.

CHARLES DICKENS'S TROUBLES.

The Scotsman says: "As Mr. Dickens's statement is apt to be somewhat unintelligible to those beyond the reach of the gossip of London and the 'literary world,' we may explain that the fact, as we are informed, is, that Mr. Dickens has, by mutual agreement, separated from his wife, on the ground of 'incompatibility.' The name of a young lady on the stage has been mixed up with the matter—most cruelly and untruly, is the opinion, we hear, of those having the best means of observing and judging; indeed, the arrangement itself is to a great extent a refutation of that part of the scandal. Of the family (eight in number) the eldest son remains with his mother, but some at least of the daughters go with Mr. Dickens, and the head of his new home is a lady, a very near relative of Mrs. Dickens. We mention these facts to explain the allusion to which Mr. Dickens has thought proper to give publicity, and also to do so in such a way as to prevent the transaction so dimly referred to being made the subject of inferences too unfavorable."

A CLERICAL HORSEWHIPPING.

The Roman Catholic clergy have adopted a summary mode of checking the "great social evil." A Longford paper says that as a priest was passing through that town the other day he noticed an unfortunate woman on the road. He stepped down off the car, took the whip from the driver, and, without any provocation further than her unfortunate life, commenced lashing and beating her with the whip, the sound of which might be heard one hundred yards off. Having to some extent gratified himself, following and lashing her for thirty or forty yards, he returned to the car and pursued his journey onward. The unfortunate woman made no resistance, but ran and crouched like a spaniel dog, nor was there a person sufficiently near to save her. In the country districts of Ireland the clergy are great adepts at horsewhipping. Latterly, however, the peasantry have shown a disposition to resent this degrading treatment, and public opinion is likely soon to put an end to it.

ROWING BY LADIES.

A correspondent of the Cheltenham Examiner calls attention to the practice, now becoming fashionable at the Pittville Spa, of ladies taking boat-exercise on the lake. He says: "There is no exercise that I know of more calculated to expand the chest and give a healthy tone to the system generally than that of rowing. Followed in moderation, it is an amusement which ladies, and particularly young ladies, would do well to patronize. It calls into healthy action the whole muscular system, without inducing that degree of fatigue which the same amount of exercise in any other way is apt to engender." It is no uncommon thing, we (Cheltenham Examiner) understand, to see parties of ladies thus amusing themselves by the hour in "paddling the light canoe."

The Emperor of France spends a couple of hours every day at Fontainebleau rowing, his Majesty's physicians having recommended that form of taking exercise.

BURIED ALIVE FOR FOUR DAYS.

A Glasgow paper describes an extraordinary accident which befell a laborer named Templeton, in a mine near Garnkirk. A mass of earth fell upon this unfortunate man while he was employed in the mine, and almost suffocated him. The débris surrounded him, but fortunately an aperture was left through which he was enabled to breathe and communicate with his fellow-workmen, a body of whom set to work earnestly to extricate him; but it was not till he had been thus imprisoned for 103½ hours that he was rescued.

PUNNING IN THE PULPIT.

The Bishop of Oxford, preaching in St. Margaret's Church, on the 6th, in aid of the Westminster Hospital, thus questioned the motives of some people's charity: "For instance, contrast the amount you give when the plate is held at the door, and you can slip in your contribution quietly and unseen in passing out, with the sum you would give in the same church, and for the very same object, were the plate handed into each pew, and your respectability put upon its mettle."

FRANCE.

TERRIBLE STATE OF TRADE.

The correspondent of the Times says: "It is generally admitted that there has not been more commercial distress in Paris since the Revolution of 1848 than at the present moment, nor are there very sanguine hopes of an immediate change for the better. The next harvest, which promises to be abundant, must be got in before commercial prosperity can revive. The receipts of the French railway companies were more favorable last week than for several months past."

LIBERTY OF THE CITIZEN.

When Dr. Bernard was in prison in England a countryman and townsman wrote him a friendly letter, offering him pecuniary or other assistance, if required. The letter was given to Mr. Leverson, as solicitor for Bernard, who knew the name of the writer, but not the handwriting, and, in consequence, sent the letter to Paris for information. On Bernard's acquittal, his friend, the writer of the letter, was ordered to quit Paris in ninety-four hours. On asking for explanation, he was told that he had no visible means of living; but it being proved that he possessed a yearly income of £500, he was told that it was solely owing to the influence of a friend that he had not been sent to Cayenne.

HOW MANY SONS HAS THE EMPEROR?

During the present sojourn at Fontainebleau a tall, slim youth, tolerably good-looking, gallops by the side of the Imperial carriage, and talks with remarkable freedom to the royal party. The circumstance has given rise to many on dits, all tending to one view, which the likeness confirms.

A FREAK OF THE EMPEROR.

The Times correspondent says: "On Monday commenced the annual Fair of Fontainebleau. There was a horse and cattle market, booths or all kinds of merchandise, tents for traveling showmen, street music, crowds of country-people and poor peasants dressed in their best, and dust, noise, and confusion, ad libitum. The quiet city of Fontainebleau, ordinarily so peaceable, was suddenly transformed into an extraordinary scene of gayety and animation. The crowds were laughing and dancing, the trombones and the clarionets were perspiring in their efforts to keep up with the heels of the boys and girls, when some rustic, more perspicacious than his comrades, thought he discovered, in two jaunty grisettes and a mason with a blouse on and a plumb-line under his arm, a trio that wonderfully resembled some people at the palace. The hint spread like the wind, and it did not take long to let every body know that the Emperor and Empress were present in disguise. The boys grew more timid and more polite in asking the girls to dance, and the girls more shy in the presence of a middle-aged man with a blouse on. Whether they were the imperial persons in question or not, the two jaunty grisettes and the mason in the blouse soon disappeared after they saw themselves the object of general curiosity. The everyday life of the Court at Fontainebleau is very quiet; each series of invited guests does not number more than sixty persons, and the weather prevents all active exercise. Promenades in carriages, dinners in the forest, and theatrical representations at the Palace in the evening, constitute the principal diversions of the Court."

PUNISHMENT OF ONE MURDERER.

On Saturday, the 5th, Lieutenant de Mercy, the murderer of his comrade, was publicly degraded on the Place Bellecour, at Lyons. Detachments from the different regiments of the garrison formed square. The prisoner being brought into the centre in full uniform, a sergeant stepped forward and tore off his epaulet and the scale on the other shoulder, throwing them at the lieutenant's feet. The sergeant then drew the prisoner's sword, and, breaking it across his knee, cast the fragments at the prisoner's feet. The next step was to tear off the buttons of his uniform, and the military degradation was then complete. Lieutenant de Mercy appeared very calm, except at the moment when the sergeant seized his epaulet when he raised his arm smartly in an attitude of resistance. He was marched off the parade-ground to the prison of St. Joseph, followed by a great crowd.

IMPUNITY OF ANOTHER.

It is very positively stated that the judges of instruction of Versailles have made what is called a decree of "non lieu" in the affair of M. de Pène; the English of which is, that the prosecution against Lieutenant Hyène is burked, and he will be free to pursue his military career, and enjoy the esteem of his comrades, who approve of his conduct.

ESCAPADE OF YOUNG FOULD.

A son of M. Fould, the Minister of State, has contrived to fall in love with Mademoiselle Valérie, an actress of the Théâtre Français, and as he could not accomplish his object on more favorable terms, he determined to marry her. For that purpose he has carried the lady off to London, and it is not yet known whether the parties are married or not. In the mean time the affair has been referred to the Duc de Malakoff, who will no doubt do all in his power to prevent the heir of the Jew Minister from becoming the husband of a Christian actress. As usual under the present régime in France, the papers have been ordered, under the penalty of suppression, not to allude to the mishap which desolates the hearth of the Minister of State. A Paris letter says: "The scandal of M. Fould's youthful son still is much talked of. He has robbed his father of, not 700,000 francs, but 1,600,000! M. Fould, the father, wrote to the Duc de Malakoff, in London, to 'use authority!' But Marshal Pelissier treated the whole thing as a French 'sub-lieutenant' might. He asked young Fould and Mademoiselle Valérie to breakfast; said pleasantly, 'Young people, I give you my blessing!' and wrote to the furious father that 'young men were but young men, after all!'"

SIR JOHN FRANKLIN ON THE STAGE.

On Monday, the 7th ult., a new drama, in five acts, called "The Polar Seas," was produced at the Cirque Olympique, Paris, with the thermometer at a tropical heat. The author is M. Charles Edmond, of the Presse, who accompanied Prince Napoleon on his northern voyage. The Prince, attended by his military household, was present at the performance. In the first act the sister of Lady Franklin comes on the stage, and in the course of a dialogue informs the audience that the English Government has sent a ship to search for Sir John Franklin. The second officer of this ship is the celebrated French lieutenant, Bellot, who is represented as in love with a relative of Lady Franklin, Miss Eva Norton. In the second act we are introduced to Sir John Franklin himself and all his crew, who have been waiting for seven years in a frozen ocean, expecting deliverance from England. As the plot proceeds we find Miss Eva slyly embarking on board the vessel to share the dangers of her loved lieutenant. They touch at Greenland, and there a Protestant clergyman proposes to take care of Miss Eva, to spare her the further perils of the voyage; but she resolutely refuses, and makes it known that she has become Mrs. Bellot on board ship. The narrative of the voyage is resumed, no vestige is found of Sir John Franklin or his companions, Lieutenant Bellot is made to die by the hand of a rival in the affections of Eva, and she remains an unconsolable widow. The piece was not very successful.

LUGGAGE OF A PARISIAN LADY.

A Paris letter says: "The intensely hot weather of the last ten days has scattered the beau monde of Paris in various directions. Some have sought refuge from the heat, dust, and odors of the capital in their noble chateaux; others exchange the crowds of Paris salons for the crowds of Baden-Baden, Spa, and the other innumerable resorts with which France and Germany abound. A French feuilletoniste gives us an amusing description of the flight of these birds of fashion, and particularly of the pleasure and convenience of traveling with a gay lady: 'It is so easy,' he tells us, 'to travel with a woman, her wants are so few, her requirements so easy; after all, what are they?' he exclaims to the grumbling husband. 'Only a dozen of trunks to contain her petticoats, her hoops, her bouquets, her crinoline, her morning gowns, her mid-day robes, her evening toilets, the cloaks, the mantles, the laces, the guipures, the furs, the riding-habits, the hat and plume, the whip; some thirty boxes for her bonnets, her caps, her vails, her ribbons, her flowers; a few cases for the jewels; a few fan-boxes; a dressing box, a work box, a scent box, parasols, chanceliers for the feet, elastic cushions, shawls, plaids, woolen coverings, a few favorite novels, a few amusing journals, the new traveling guide, and the map of the railroad. Verily, one could not be more discreet, or less embarrassing or cumbersome.'"

STORY OF A SHAWL.

Another correspondent writes: "A husband of a reasonable age recently entered a 'magasin de nouveautés' and desired to look at the assortment of shawls, wishing, he said, to make a present to his wife upon her birthday, close at hand. One of the shawls seemed to please him in every thing save the price; the shopkeeper demanded a thousand francs, and he was willing to pay only eight hundred. After some attempt at bargaining he went away without deciding, promising to return again. The cunning merchant ran immediately to the gentleman's residence, saw his wife and related the occurrence to her. Enchanted at the kindness of her spouse, the lady willingly paid the two hundred francs at which he had demurred, and sent away the dry-goods man, having enjoined upon him the strictest silence.

"Eight days passed. The birthday arrived but not the shawl! The lady, uneasy at the non-appearance of the present, after allowing the usual week of grace, sent to demand her money or the shawl. Astonishment of the merchant! The shawl had been delivered to the husband some ten days previous. Figaro asks—What did he do with it?"

HOW RACHEL LOOKED IN HER DEATH AGONY.

Mademoiselle Sarah Felix, the sister of the late Mademoiselle Rachel, lately brought an action before the Civil Tribunal against Madame O'Connell, the well known artist, to obtain damages for having pirated a design belonging to her. Mademoiselle Sarah, it appeared, on the death of her sister at Cannes, on the 3d January last, caused a photographer to take a likeness of her on her death-bed. He obtained one remarkable for its exactitude, but it was, as was said, "horrible to witness," inasmuch as it represented her features as they were contracted in the agony of death. As Mademoiselle Sarah's object in having the photograph taken was to preserve a memorial of the deceased for her family and a few friends, she saw that it would not be possible to offer them any thing so disagreeable to look at, and she accordingly employed a photographer of Paris, named Ghemar, to soften it down. She made both the photographers sign agreements by which they bound themselves to take all possible precautions to prevent either the original photograph or the modification of it from getting into the hands of the public. But Ghemar imprudently allowed Mademoiselle O'Connell to take a copy of it, and she having made some alterations in it, caused MM. Goupil, the well-known print sellers, to offer copies of it for sale. Mademoiselle Sarah protested against this proceeding, and she caused a seizure to be made of the copies unsold. In support of her action, certificates were produced from Count de Nieuweskerke, director-general of the Imperial Museums, and from other artistic authorities, to the effect that Mademoiselle O'Connell's photograph was undoubtedly a piracy, and it was contended that the original photograph was not only the exclusive property of Mademoiselle Sarah, but that in law no person, except the members of Rachel's own family, had the right to represent her on her death-bed, inasmuch as, though she had been a public performer, all that regarded her private life was as sacred as that of any other person. It was added, that Mademoiselle Sarah's intention was to give to the poor any damages the tribunal might award her, her object in bringing the action being to prevent pictures of Rachel on her death-bed from being sold to the public. On the part of Madame O'Connell, it was admitted that she had seen the photograph in the hands of Ghemar, and had to a certain extent been inspired by it; but it was contended that her work was so different from that in many respects that it must be considered original. It was also insisted that Madame O'Connell had the right to produce portraits of Rachel, living or dead, as from Rachel's artistic eminence she was public property. It was accordingly demanded, not only that the action should be dismissed, but that 5000 francs damages should be awarded to her for the wrong done her in bringing it and by the seizure. After hearing the public prosecutor, who declared himself in favor of Mademoiselle Sarah's action, the tribunal postponed judgment for a week.

GERMANY.

FORTUNES OF THE NEW PRUSSIAN PRINCESS.

The Herald correspondent writes: "The indisposition of Princess Frederick William, which prevents her from meeting her father at Coburg, has been occasioned by her spraining her ankle in a game at romps with the young children of her cousin, Prince Frederick Charles—an accident that has alarmed her medical advisers more than it would have done at any other time, from her showing symptoms of being in that condition in which ladies wish to be who love their lords. The little lady really does love her lord more devotedly than is often the case in her rank of life, and there are many anecdotes in circulation illustrating the artless manner in which she displays her attachment. The other day the Prince went over to Potsdam 'on important business,' i. e., drilling and manœuvring his brigade of Guards; but he had scarcely been absent a few hours when he was recalled to Berlin by a telegraphic dispatch from the Princess, begging him to return immediately. He hastened back in the utmost alarm, fancying something dreadful had happened, and was quite relieved by her receiving him in her usual health and spirits, only stating, when questioned why she had sent for him in so violent a hurry, that she "had felt such a longing to see him again;" "and besides," she added, on her husband's remonstrating with her for calling him away from his professional duties, 'Mamma always telegraphs for papa when she wants him.' This reference to what her mamma does the little Princess considers a sufficient justification for any offense she may commit against the starch etiquette of the Prussian court. One day she put on her bonnet and walked across the street to her father-in-law's, without even a footman behind her, to the inexpressible horror of her Oberhofmeisterin, or duenna-in-chief, who exclaimed that no Prussian princess had ever been guilty of such a breach of decorum. 'But mamma does so at Osborne,' returned Vic the Second, 'and if mamma does, why should not I?' Her affability and good-nature have made her generally popular, though she almost raised a rebellion in the kitchen lately by insisting that the female domestics should all wear caps. Now, the German maid-servants are remarkably proud of their hair, and never think of putting on a cap for fear of spoiling their luxuriant tresses. Great was the commotion, therefore, when the Princess issued her orders to that effect, but the little lady was inexorable. 'In mamma's establishment they all wear caps,' she said, 'and so they must in mine.' Since the departure of her mother-in-law, the Princess of Prussia, from Berlin, she has much more of her own way than she used to, the Queen being so entirely taken up with attending to the King that she is not able to interfere with her, and the Prince yielding, like a gallant husband, to all the innocent caprices of his fair young wife."

DEATH WHILE WALTZING.

A young couple of Vienna, married only eleven days, went a few evenings back to the public ball of the Sperl, and took part in a waltz. All at once the young woman slid gently from the arms of her husband, and sank to the floor; he thought she had fainted, but it turned out that she was dead! On a medical examination it appeared that she had died of apoplexy, and that death must have taken place some seconds before she fell.

SPAIN.

THE VIRGIN IN A RAILWAY CAR.

The Tribune correspondent says: "Spanish Queen Isabella went the other day from Aranjuez, to honor with her presence the inauguration of the Alicante Railroad. In the same car with her was placed a richly jeweled and bedizened little image of Notre Dame de l'Oubli—in whom, or in which, the Queen puts great faith, having had the same in her bed-room on the occasion of her last accouchement, the happy issue of which was duly attributed to the Holy Virgin—of wood or other material, much ornamented with jewels. In the same train were the directors and managers of the road—Jews, Protestants, and uncatalogued confessors of other or no faith, mere unsavable representatives of soulless corporations. Is it not queer? Can such mixtures fail to end in the generation of explosive, revolutionary gases? A wooden Notre Dame steaming away at the rate of thirty miles an hour through the nineteenth century! Can she escape explosion when running so madly off her track?

RUSSIA.

THE MOTHER OF SIXTY-NINE CHILDREN.

It is related by Burdock tha the wife of a countryman in the Moscow district had given birth to sixty-nine children at twenty-seven confinements—four times four at one birth, seven times three, and sixteen times twins. In the year 1800 the Vienna newspapers contained the following announcement: "Maria Anna Helen, the wife of a poor linen weaver in Neulerchenfield, twenty years married, bore at eleven confinements thirty-two children—twenty-eight living and four dead; twenty-six were males and six females; all were begotten by one man, and nursed by herself. She had at her last confinement three children, one living and two dead. Her husband was a twin, she herself one of four. Her mother had produced thirty-eight children, and died during a confinement with twins. The greatest number of children ever produced at one birth appears to have been six, all of whom were boys, and all dead. The woman who gave birth to them had been twice married, and had already given birth to forty-four children; during her first marriage, which lasted twenty-two years, she bore twenty-seven boys and three girls; in her second marriage, which lasted but three years, she bore fourteen children—three at the first, five at the second, and six the third confinement."

ITALY.

A MAN MAKING HIS SOUL HIS HEIR.

A singular lawsuit, which has been pending for several years at Ferrara, has just been amicably settled. A nobleman, named Bonaccipli, died some years ago, leaving a will by which he appointed his own soul as universal heir to his estates, representing a value of 5,000,000 of francs. The charitable institutions of Ferrara laid claim to the property, while the brother of the deceased attacked the will on the ground of nullity. After long judicial debates, an arrangement has, at length, been come to, by which the brother abandons his claims in consideration of certain moneys which Cardinal Casoni, the curator of the above establishments, engages to pay to him and to the other relations of the deceased. It appears that this result has been obtained through the interposition of the Pope; in any other country the will would have been declared null and void.

ALGERIA.

A FATAL LION HUNT.

A letter from Philippeville gives the following account of a lion hunt, which ended fatally to the principal actor in it. For some time past the Arabs belonging to a tribe between Stora and St. Charles, saw their flocks every day diminishing from the attacks of a lion of such enormous size and strength that they despaired of being able to destroy it. In that dilemma they applied to a shoemaker, residing in the village of St. Charles, who had acquired a considerable reputation from his skill and courage in hunting savage animals, and he readily consented to accompany a part of the tribe against the lion. A day was fixed, and the shoemaker, after examining the ground, placed himself, with a double barreled gun, in ambush in a hollow tree, where he waited patiently for the approach of the expected prey. A party of the Arabs were stationed at some distance. After waiting some time, the lion made his appearance and advanced toward a flock, which had been purposely driven to graze near the tree. As soon as the animal came near, the shoemaker fired his two barrels, and the lion fell apparently dead. The shoemaker waited for a quarter of an hour, and then, finding that the lion did not move, he went forward, and raised its head with the barrel of his gun. At that moment the dying animal made a last effort, and, lifting up his paw, struck the shoemaker so heavily on the back, that he killed him on the spot. The Arabs, after a time, approached, and found the lion and the man dead side by side.

INDIA.

HORSE-SHOEING IN INDIA.

Russell, the Times' correspondent, draws the following picture in a late letter: "Just before my tent at this moment there is a group which could not be met with in any part of the world beyond this. Sukeram, the syce, is superintending the shoeing of a horse. In order to do so he has complicated himself with that animal's hind legs in a fantastic and traditional manner wonderful to behold. He has seated himself on his haunches as only an Oriental can, between the horse's legs, one of which he has pulled over his shoulder so as to present the hoof to the farrier; while his disengaged arm is passed round the other leg of the animal, which 'accepts the situation' as it has been handed down to him for thousands of years. Sukeram is a very grave, handsome fellow, with a white turban on his head, one end of which floats over his shoulders, and a white piece of cotton wrapped round his loins, leaving his brown body and legs to shine in the blazing sun. He looks as intelligent as most Englishmen, but in reality he has no idea, or will not have one, of any earthly duty beyond the care of that horse whose tail he has just fastened to a strap passed round the fetlock. His wife—for he has a faithful attendant in all his marches—whose arms are covered with brass rings from wrist to elbow, and on whose ankles jingling bands of metal make pleasant music as she walks, is mixing up his rice and curry in a bright brass pot, covered in one long fold of cotton, so that only her arms and feet are visible, and on her hip a small imp is perched, obstreperous for his meal; and see, he gets it so delicately and decently that our ladies at home might envy the process, for a fold of the robe is opened, the tawny body disappears inside and is covered by the robe, and only a pair of legs are left visible, which soon by their easy modulations give tokens of the satisfaction of the youthful proprietor with the treatment he is receiving inside. The smith, a brawny fellow in a short pair of drawers and a yellow turban, whose muscles stand out like those of a bronze Hercules, is using the most extraordinary-looking implements of farriery with great skill, but any motion of the horse's heel must inevitably catch him right on the bridge of the nose. A young man, who may be a perpetual outdoor apprentice of the smith, and whose only business seems to be the abstraction of smoke from a huge pipe, is seated on the ground watching the operation. But as watching is an act on the due performance of which every Oriental operation in a great measure depends, it is not left to the apprentice alone—a tame monkey and a parrot take an intense interest in it, and a great tall Sikh, all black eyes and whiskers, mustaches and beard, and shining white teeth, with a real swash-buckler swagger and stride, is coming over to join them. Judging by his turban, he is one of Wale's Horse. Light limbed, sinewy, and active, the air of those fellows makes us appreciate the valor of those Englishmen who crushed the race in battle.

CHINA.

AMERICANS vs. ENGLISH IN CHINA.

The Herald correspondent says: "I will relate an incident which occurred a few weeks since at Hong Kong, the capital of British power in China. While passing by the factory of a wealthy silversmith, curiosity induced me to step in and see how this trade is carried on by the Chinese, but silence and sour looks met my gaze in all directions. Unabashed, however, and judging correctly of the cause, I proclaimed myself to be an American, and the right hand of friendship was extended immediately, with numerous excuses for their ignorance in mistaking me for an Englishman. The workmen left their work, and took great delight in showing me specimens of their manufacture, which were not as rude as we would suppose. The proprietor seemed lost in wonder when I explained how such things were conducted in the United States. When taking my leave of him, well satisfied with his politeness, my attention was attracted by a massive pitcher, the familiar style of which led me to believe that it was not of Chinese manufacture. On a closer examination it proved to be the work of William Webb, the chief artist of Mr. Forbes, the Spring Street silversmith, and the property of an American merchant. Now if such feelings exist among a class who, of all others, should be favorable to wealthy British residents, what must be the feeling of those less dependent and more removed from the fangs of British power?"

MEXICO.

RUPTURE OF DIPLOMATIC INTERCOURSE.

Our dates from the City of Mexico are to the 19th ult. The forced loan caused great excitement at the capital, and foreigners non-complying with its requirements have been ordered to leave the country. The goods of the American residents had been seized for non-compliance with the terms of the loan, and, in consequence, Minister Forsyth had demanded and received his passports. The liberals (or party favoring Juarez) were every where gaining strength, and President Zuloaga was going to Tampico for refuge.

The condition of the country was as wretched as ever, robbery and rapine being the rule every where. Some radical change impends.

FAC-SIMILE OF THE ORIGINAL DO

DECLARATION OF

In Congress

A Declaration by the Representatives of the UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, in General Congress assembled.

When in the course of human events it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature & of nature's god entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

We hold these truths to be self evident: that all men are created equal & independent: that from that equal creation they derive rights inherent & inalienable, among which are the preservation of life, & liberty, & the pursuit of happiness: that to secure these ends, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed: that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, & to institute new government, laying it's foundation on such principles & organising it's powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety & happiness. prudence indeed will dictate that governments long established should not be changed for light & transient causes: and accordingly all experience hath shewn that mankind are more disposed to suffer while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. but when a long train of abuses & usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government, & to provide new guards for their future security. such has been the patient sufferance of these colonies; & such is now the necessity which constrains them to expunge their former systems of government. the history of the present king of great britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, among which appears no solitary fact to contradict the uniform tenor of the rest, all of which have in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these states. to prove this, let facts be submitted to a candid world. for the truth of which we pledge a faith yet unsullied by falsehood.

he has refused his assent to laws the most wholesome and necessary for the public good.

he has forbidden his governors to pass laws of immediate & pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation till his assent should be obtained: and when so suspended, he has neglected entirely to attend to them.

he has refused to pass other laws for the accomodation of large districts of people, unless those people would relinquish the right of representation, a right inestimable to them & formidable to tyrants only.

he has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, & distant from the depository of their public records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures.

he has dissolved representative houses repeatedly & continually for opposing with manly firmness his invasions on the rights of the people.

he has refused for a long time after such dissolutions to cause others to be elected, whereby the legislative powers, incapable of annihilation, have returned to the people at large for their exercise; the state remaining in the mean time exposed to all the dangers of invasion from without, & convulsions within.

he has endeavoured to prevent the population of these states; for that purpose obstructing the laws for naturalization of foreigners; refusing to pass others to encourage their migrations hither, & raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands.

he has suffered the administration of justice totally to cease in some of the states, refusing his assent to laws for establishing judiciary powers.

he has made our judges dependant on his will alone, for the tenure of their offices, & the amount & payment of their salaries.

he has erected a multitude of new offices, & sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people & eat out their substance.

he has kept among us, in times of peace, standing armies & ships of war.

he has affected to render the military independent of & superior to the civil power.

he has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution, & unacknowledged by our laws; giving his assent to their pretended acts of legislation, for quartering large bodies of armed troops among us:

for protecting them, by a mock trial, from punishment for any murders which they should commit on the inhabitants of these states:

for cutting off our trade with all parts of the world:

for imposing taxes on us without our consent:

for depriving us in many cases of the benefits of trial by jury:

for transporting us beyond seas to be tried for pretended offences for abolishing the free system of english laws in a neighbouring province, establishing therein an arbitrary government, & enlarging its boundaries so as to render it at once an example & fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these colonies:

for taking away our charters, abolishing our most valuable laws, & altering fundamentally the forms of our governments:

for suspending our own legislatures, & declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever.

he has abdicated government here, by declaring us out of his allegiance & protection:

he has plundered our seas, ravaged our coasts, burnt our towns, & destroyed the lives of our people.

he is at this time transporting large armies of foreign mercenaries to compleat the works of death, desolation & tyranny already begun with circumstances of cruelty & perfidy unworthy the head of a civilized nation.

he has constrained our fellow citizens taken captive on the high seas to bear arms against their country, to become the executioners of their friends & brethren, or to fall themselves by their hands.

he has excited domestic insurrections amongst us, & has endeavoured to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers the merciless indian savages, whose known rule of warfare is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes & conditions of existence.

he has incited treasonable insurrections of our fellow citizens, with the allurement of forfeiture & confiscation of our property.

he has waged cruel war against human nature itself, violating it's most sacred rights of life & liberty in the persons of a distant people who never offended him, captivating & carrying them into slavery in another hemisphere, or to incur miserable death in their transportation thither. this piratical warfare, the opprobrium of infidel powers, is the warfare of the Christian king of great britain. determined to keep open a market where MEN should be bought & sold,

INDEPENDENCE

July, 1776.

e of annihilation, have returned to he state remaining in the mean time from without, & convulsions within:
tion of these states; for that purpose of foreigners; refusing to pass others & raising the conditions of new ap-stice [totally to cease in some of these for establishing judiciary powers:

will alone, for the tenure of their offices,

s [by a self-assumed power,] & sent hi-ople & eat out their substance:
without the consent of our legislatures standing armies [& ships of war:]
endent of & superior to the civil power:
a jurisdiction foreign to our constituing his assent to their acts of pretended ~~acts~~ dies of armed troops among us, from punishment for any murders ab-tants of these states;
the world;
nsent;
jury;
for pretended offences:
ing province, establishing therein an arbitrary government example & fit instrument for introducing the same absolute aws
ndamentally the forms of our governments, ring themselves invested with power to tsoever:
ing us out of his protection & waging war against us. ing his governors & declaring us out coasts, burnt our towns & destroyed the Scotch and other
mies of foreign mercenaries to compleat already begun with circumstances s and totally of a civilized nation.
nts of our frontiers the merciless Indian is an undistinguished destruction of e:]
ns of our fellow-citizens with the on of our property has to bear arms against their country & to become the executioners of their friends & brethren n nature itself, violating it's most sa ns of a distant people who never of hem into slavery in another hemisn their transportation thither. this infidel powers, is the warfare of the termined to keep open a market
and ld he has prostituted his negative for suppressing every legislative attempt to prohibit or to restrain this ~~determining to keep open a market where MEN should be bought & sold~~:

execrable commerce: and that this assemblage of horrors might want no fact of distinguished die, he is now exciting those very people to rise in arms among us, and to purchase that liberty of which he has deprived them by murdering the people upon whom he also obtruded them: thus paying off former crimes committed against the liberties of one people, with crimes which he urges them to commit against the lives of another.]
in every stage of these oppressions we have petitioned for redress in the most humble terms: our repeated petitions have been answered only by repeated injuries. a prince whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a free people [who mean to be free. future ages will scarce believe that the ~~hardiness~~ of one man adventured within the short compass of twelve years only to build a foundation so broad & undisguised for tyranny ~~...~~ over a people fostered & fixed in principles of ~~liberty~~ freedom.]

Nor have we been wanting in attentions to our British brethren. we have warned them from time to time of attempts by their legislature to extend an unwarrantable jurisdiction over [these our states] us. we have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration & settlement here, [no one of which could warrant so strange a pretension: that these were effected at the expence of our own blood & treasure unassisted by the wealth or the strength of Great Britain: that in constituting indeed our several forms of government, we had adopted one common king, thereby laying a foundation for perpetual league & amity with them: but that submission to their parliament was no part of our constitution, nor ever in idea, if history may be credited: and] we have appealed to their native justice & magnanimity [as well as to] the ties of our common kindred to disavow these usurpations which [were likely to] would inevitably interrupt our connection & correspondence ~~& connection~~. they too have been deaf to the voice of justice & of consanguinity, [& when occasions have been given them by the regular course of their laws, of removing from their councils the disturbers of our harmony, they have by their free election re-established them in power. at this very time too they are permitting their chief magistrate to send over not only soldiers of our common blood, but Scotch & foreign mercenaries to invade & destroy us ~~deluge us in blood~~. these facts have given the last stab to agonizing affection and manly spirit bids us to renounce for ever these unfeeling brethren. we must endeavor to forget our former love for them, and to hold them as we hold the rest of mankind enemies in war, in peace friends. we might have been a free & a great people together; but a communication of grandeur & of freedom it seems is below their dignity. be it so, since they will have it: the road to ~~glory~~ & to glory happiness, is open to us too; we will ~~climb~~ tread it in apart from them, ~~a separate state~~ and] we must therefore acquiesce in the necessity which denounces our ~~eternal~~ ~~separation~~ [eternal] separation! and hold them as we hold the rest of mankind enemies in war, in peace friends

We therefore the representatives of the United States of America in General Congress assembled, appealing to the supreme judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do in the name & by authority of the good people of these [states] colonies
[reject and renounce all allegiance & subjection to the kings of Great Britain
& all others who may hereafter claim by, through, or under them; we utterly dissolve ~~& break off~~ all political connection which may ~~have~~ heretofore have subsisted between us & the people or parliament of Great Britain; and finally we do assert and declare these colonies to be free and independant states and that as free & independant states they ~~shall hereafter have~~ full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, & to do all other acts and things which independant states may of right do. And for the support of this declaration] we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, & our sacred honour.

tfoot Lee
xton Arthur Middleton Step. Hopkins Th. Jefferson dney George Wythe Benja Harrison Thos Nelson jr.
ead Richard Henry Lee
Read Josiah Bartlett Matthew Thornton John Adams
Roger Sherman
Rutledge Saml Huntington William Ellery Charles Carroll of Carrollton
yward Junr Geo Clymer
ch Junr Wm Whipple William Robt Treat Paine
Lewis Morris Jas Smith Elbridge Gerry
Saml Adams Oliver Wolcott

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

We have devoted the two preceding pages to a fac-simile of the original draft of the Declaration of Independence, in the handwriting of Thomas Jefferson, with the alterations of Adams and Franklin. It is well to place so notable a paper on record. Time is fast obliterating the memorials of the Revolution. At the present time the Declaration (of which only a few detached copies had been printed) is very difficult to read, even by the aid of a magnifier; injuries originally done to it by an unskilful artist in an attempt to "transfer" it have been aggravated by natural decay; the paper is very loose, in all probability, the copy on the foregoing pages will be the only one in existence.

A few historical memoranda may serve appropriately to introduce the document.

Nearly two months had elapsed since the first blood had been shed in the Revolutionary struggle, and yet the colonies were merely in a state of rebellion. No act of theirs had severed the colonial tie, or raised them to an equality, in an international point of view, with their parent and superior. Early in 1776, the propriety of cutting themselves short altogether from Great Britain had occurred to many leading and daring minds. Patrick Henry, Lee, Adams, and even Franklin, had substituted instant for future as the period of separation from the mother country. Still, the idea was not in the masses. Several influential leaders—the mercantile communities of the chief sea-ports, the Quakers of Philadelphia, the Episcopal clergy, a large section of the Southern planters—were irrevocably hostile to a severance of the colonial tie. It was, therefore, with caution and with prudence that the advocates of political independence ventured to express their views. Happily, the accession of the new and popular Assembly of Virginia to the ranks of the British troops brought conviction to minds previously hopeless of success.

In April, 1776, North Carolina, the pioneer in the idea of a formal declaration, had instructed, about a year before at Mecklenburg, and, by the voice of her Legislature, directed her delegates to the general Congress "to concur with those in the other colonies in declaring independence." Virginia and Rhode Island instructed their delegates "to propose independence." Connecticut and New Hampshire authorized their delegates to assent to a Declaration of Independence. But New York and Massachusetts submitted the question to the people, who did not give votes to express their sentiment in season. The delegates of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Georgia, South Carolina, and Delaware were left to act as they pleased in reference to the great question. Maryland alone forbade her delegates to vote for independence.

These latter matters when, on 7th June, in the Continental Congress at Philadelphia, Richard Henry Lee, of Virginia, rose and moved the resolution:

"That these United Colonies are and of right ought to be free and independent States, and that all political connection between us and the State of Great Britain is and ought to be totally dissolved."

So perilous was the business, that Congress required to make no mention on the records of the names of the mover and of the seconder of the resolution (Mr. Adams). Consideration of the subject was postponed to the next day; and on the 11th June it was referred to a Committee consisting of Messrs. Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia, John Adams, of Massachusetts, Benjamin Franklin, of Pennsylvania, Roger Sherman, of Connecticut, and Robert R. Livingston, of New York. It would have been on the Committee, but having received intelligence of the sickness of his lady, he was compelled to leave Philadelphia the day before the subject was referred. Jefferson filled his place worthily, and, "having the reputation of a ready writer," was appointed chairman of the Committee, and instructed by his colleagues to draw up a draft of preparing a draft of a preamble to Mr. Lee's resolution—namely, a formal Declaration of Independence.

Mr. Adams tells the story of the labors of the Committee:

"The Committee had several meetings, in which were proposed the articles of which the Declaration was to consist, and minutes made of them. The Committee then appointed Mr. Jefferson and me to draw them up in form, and clothe them in proper dress. The sub-Committee met and considered the minutes, making such observations on them as then occurred, when Mr. Jefferson desired me to take them to my lodgings and make the draft. I did so accordingly, and gave reasons for so doing:

"1. That he was a Virginian and I a Massachusetts man. 2. That he was a Southern man and I a Northern one. 3. That I had been so obnoxious for so early and constant avowal of promoting the measure, that every draft of mine would undergo a more severe scrutiny and criticism in Congress than one of his composition. 4. And lastly, and that would be reason enough if there were no other, I had a great aversion to the business, and he was, and none at all of my own. I therefore insisted that no decision should be made on his part. He accordingly took the minutes, and in a day or two produced to me his draft.

It is that draft, with the corrections made by John Adams and Benjamin Franklin, which we engrave on the preceding pages.

On 1st July this declaration was reported to the House, in Committee of the Whole, Mr. Benjamin Harrison, of Virginia, being in the chair. On 2nd and the two succeeding days each paragraph was debated seriatim, and many alterations made. The reader will find below a copy of the Declaration of Independence, as finally adopted by the Congress. By comparing it with the draft, he may discover the alterations made. They were mostly immaterial. Several redundant phrases of Jefferson's were struck out. Several sentences reflecting on the king in very harsh terms were modified so as to be less severe. Mr. Jefferson's draft had in it a bad "excised reasonable insurrections of our fellow-citizens," and that he had forced slavery and the slave-trade on the colonies, were omitted, as not strictly true in fact. And two or three sentences were severed of declamation were likewise expunged, as beneath the dignity of so grave a document. Thus altered, the Declaration was adopted.

At first it was very doubtful whether it would obtain the unanimous approval of the States. The famous John Dickenson, of Pennsylvania, took the lead in opposing the Declaration. He moved, and directed her delegates to oppose it; the votes of Pennsylvania were therefore withheld. Dickenson exertion and good fortune these obstacles were at length overcome. Dickenson absented himself from the field, and the majority of the Pennsylvania delegation were in favor of the Declaration. Two out of the three Delaware delegates voted Aye. Carroll, of Maryland, exerted himself with energy to obtain a reconsideration of the vote of the Lower House, and, on the 4th, again rescinded; so that the delegates, who were unanimous in favor of the measure, were enabled to vote unanimously. Thus it came about that when, on 4th July, 1776, the vote was taken by States on the question, "Shall the Declaration be adopted?" it was given that the Declaration should be adopted.

The following was the form in which this most important of all political documents was finally agreed to. To borrow the language of Jefferson himself, the question was, "whether it is the better or the worse for the critics."

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

A Declaration by the representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled.

When, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume, among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature, and of nature's God, entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires, that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator, with certain unalienable rights: that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That, to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that, whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness. Prudence, indeed, will dictate that governments long established, should not be changed for light and transient causes; and, accordingly, all experience hath shewn, that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But, when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evidence a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government, and to provide new guards for their future security. Such has been the patient sufferance of these colonies; and such is now the necessity which constrains them to alter their former systems of government. The history of the present King of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these states. To prove this, let facts be submitted to a candid world.

He has refused his assent to laws the most wholesome and necessary for the public good.

He has forbidden his governors to pass laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation till his assent should be obtained; and, when so suspended, he has utterly neglected to attend to them.

He has refused to pass other laws for the accommodation of large districts of people, unless those people would relinquish the right of representation in the legislature; a right inestimable to them, and formidable to tyrants only.

He has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the depository of their public records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures.

He has dissolved representative houses repeatedly, for opposing, with manly firmness, his invasions on the rights of the people.

He has refused, for a long time, after such dissolutions, to cause others to be elected; whereby the legislative powers, incapable of annihilation, have returned to the people at large for their exercise; the state remaining, in the mean time, exposed to all the dangers of invasion from without, and convulsions within.

He has endeavored to prevent the population of these states; for that purpose obstructing the laws for naturalization of foreigners; refusing to pass others to encourage their migrations hither, and raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands.

He has obstructed the administration of justice, by refusing his assent to laws for establishing judiciary powers.

He has made judges dependent on his will alone, for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries.

He has erected a multitude of new offices, and sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people, and eat out their substance.

He has kept among us, in time of peace, standing armies, without the consent of our legislatures.

He has affected to render the military independent of, and superior to, the civil power.

He has combined, with others, to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution, and unacknowledged by our laws; giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation:

For quartering large bodies of armed troops among us:

For protecting them, by a mock trial, from punishment for any murders which they should commit on the inhabitants of these states:

For cutting off our trade with all parts of the world:

For imposing taxes on us, without our consent:

For depriving us, in many cases, of the benefits of trial by jury:

For transporting us beyond seas, to be tried for pretended offenses:

For abolishing the free system of English laws in a neighboring province, establishing therein an arbitrary government, and enlarging its boundaries, so as to render it, at once, an example and fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these Colonies:

For taking away our charters, abolishing our most valuable laws, and altering, fundamentally, the forms of our governments:

For suspending our own legislatures, and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us, in all cases whatsoever.

He has abdicated government here, by declaring us out of his protection, and waging war against us.

He has plundered our seas, ravaged our coasts, burnt our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people.

He is, at this time, transporting large colonies of foreign mercenaries, to compleat the works of death, desolation, and tyranny, already begun with circumstances of cruelty and perfidy, scarcely parallelled in the most barbarous ages, and totally unworthy the head of a civilized nation.

He has constrained our fellow-citizens, taken captive on the high seas, to bear arms against their country, to become the executioners of their friends and brethren, or to fall themselves by their hands.

He has excited domestic insurrections amongst us, and has endeavored to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers, the merciless Indian savages, whose known rule of warfare is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes, and conditions.

In every stage of these oppressions, we have petitioned for redress, in the most humble terms: Our repeated petitions have been answered only by repeated injury. A prince, whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a free people.

Nor have we been wanting in attentions to our British brethren. We have warned them, from time to time, of attempts, by their legislature, to extend an unwarrantable jurisdiction over us. We have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration and settlement here. We have appealed to their native justice and magnanimity, and we have conjured them, by the ties of our common kindred, to disavow these usurpations, which would inevitably interrupt our connections and correspondence. They too have been deaf to the voice of justice and of consanguinity. We must, therefore, acquiesce in the necessity, which denounces our separation, and hold them, as we hold the rest of mankind, enemies in war, in peace, friends.

We, therefore, the representatives of the United States of America, in General Congress assembled, appealing to the supreme judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name, and by authority of the good People of these Colonies, solemnly publish and declare, That these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, Free and Independent States; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political connection between them and the state of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved; and that as Free and Independent States, they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things, which Independent States may of right do. And, for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other, our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor.

On the day that it was adopted it was signed by John Hancock, the President of Congress. We wish his name boldly and plainly, in order, as he said, that a king might find no difficulty in reading it. In case the Revolutionary struggle failed and the British wanted a victim. No other member of the Congress signed it but in private. That deed was handed to a clerk (a very incompetent person, as we have observed, but Philadelphia could furnish no one who was fit to take his place) to be engrossed on parchment. It was not till the 2d August that the parchment was ready for signature. On that day the engrossed copy was produced in Congress, and fifty-four members present signed it. Mr. Read and Thornton, who were absent at the time, affixed their names subsequently. At the end of the 2d August, the date of which is the 4th preceding pages, we have added a fac-simile of the signatures, which we will in subsequ

The scene of the adoption of the Declaration is described in another part of this paper. We shall add nothing to what is above here recited. But the single remark that, considering the age of the colonies, the number of their people, the diversity of interests existing between them, and the tendency of intellectual and ambitious men to contend for leadership, there appears to be nothing so remarkable in history as the adoption of the Declaration of Independence by the fifty-six sturdy delegates. There was less hyperbole than may be supposed in Napoleon's assertion that he saw in the act "the finger of God."

TOWN AND COUNTRY.

AN ECLOGUE.

[ABOUT SIXTEEN CENTURIES—ED.

CLOVERTOP.

Hey, what's the news, Chalon? I've thought, my Cousin, it's extremely queer That you, who love to spend your August here, Don't hang, at once, your wife and children down, And quit, for good, the noisy, dusty town.

SHILLINGSIDE.

Ah! simple swain, the rich sort of life may do For such a verdant Clovertop as you, Content to vegetate in summer air, And hibernate in winter like a bear!

CLOVERTOP.

Here we have butter pure as virgin gold, And milk from cows that "can a tail wield!" With bovine pride; and new-laid eggs, whose praise Is sung by pullets with their morning lays: From from the brook; good water from the well; And other blessings more than I can tell!

SHILLINGSIDE.

There, simple rustic, we have nightly plays, And operatic music—charming ways Of spending time and money—lots of fun; The Cousin Lawyer—whom they get it done; Barnum's Museum, full of things erratic, Terrene, amphibious, airy, and aquatic!

CLOVERTOP.

Here we have rosy, radiant, romping girls, With lips of rubies, and with teeth of pearls; I dare not mention half their witching charms, But, ah! the soundness of their milky arms! And oh, what polished shoulders they display, Bending o'er tubs upon a washing-day!

SHILLINGSIDE.

There we have ladies in most superbly made (By fine artistes, who understand their trade),

Who dance the German, flirt a graceful fan, And speak such French as no Parisian can; They're much much fonder than your country thrushes, And wear (thank Phalon!) far more brilliant blushes!

CLOVERTOP.

Here, boastful Shilling, we have flowery walks, Where you may stroll, and hold delightful talks With many placard frowning as you pass, "Ten dollars' fine for walking on the grass!"); Where lighted groves, where love's delicious words Are breathed to music of melodious birds.

SHILLINGSIDE.

There, silly Clover, dashing belles we meet, Sweeping with silken robes the dusty street; May gaze into their faces as they pass Beneath the shade of their Parisian sun, Or, standing at a crossing when it rains, May see some pretty ankles for our pains.

CLOVERTOP.

Here you may angle for the speckled trout, Play him, a while, with gentle hand, shout, Then, like a sportsman, pull the fellow out!

SHILLINGSIDE.

There, too, is fishing quite as good, I ween, Where cutlets, grilling delicate as e'er was seen, Rich as you pasture, and almost as green!

CLOVERTOP.

Here you may see the meadow's grassy plain, Ripe, luscious fruits, and shocks of golden grain,

And view, luxuriant in a hundred fields, The prodigious wealth that bounteous Nature yields!

SHILLINGSIDE.

There you may see Trade's wondrous strength and pride,

Where merchant-navies throng on every side, And view, collected in Columbia's mart, Alike the wealth of Europe and of Art!

CLOVERTOP.

Cease, clamorous cit! I love these quiet nooks,

Where one may sleep, or dawdle over books, Or, if he wish of gentle love to dream, May sit and muse by yonder babbling stream—

SHILLINGSIDE.

Dry up your babbling streams, my Clovertop—
You're getting garrulous; it's time to stop.
I love the city, and the city's smoke;
I love the gay; the dust of feet and coke;
The sound of bells; the tramp of hurrying feet;
The light of pigs and Paphians in the street;
The jostling crowd; the never-ceasing noise
Of rattling coaches, and vociferous boys;
The cry of "Fine Pine-Apples!" and the scene
Of heroes running with their mouths all green—
Where, Clover?

Nay, now I think that I could even stand
The direful din of Barnum's brazen hand,
So sweet I long to see the town again!
Good-by! I'm going by the evening train!
Don't fail to call when'er you come to town,
We'll do the city, boy, and do it brown!
I've really had a pleasant time with you,
And mean to come again another year.

MY ELOPEMENT;

OR, HOW LIFE IN A COUNTRY TOWN WAS WISHED TO GET MARRIED ON A THOUSAND A YEAR.

CHAPTER I.

I SHALL not mention my name. You may call me what you like. Augustus, Reginald, Almanzor —any thing will do. What I am going to tell happened about seven years ago; and I should not publish it at all were it not for the fact that I was put to certain little expenses in the affair.

Not only that, but I mention the circumstance my own name, but I shall also carefully avoid giving any, even the slightest, clue to the identity of the young lady, who, by-the-by, must be now a middle-aged lady. This reminds me that I also am not so young as I was: but no matter.

We were talking the other night about getting married on a thousand a year. The most absurd nonsense was uttered. One fellow was for one to live without wine; another, that dinner parties were not necessary to happiness; a third, that they'll take precious good care not to get married themselves, for all that. Hinc's opinion whether a man can get married on a thousand a year, for any man with a tongue in his head, and five dollars in his pocket, can generally get one or other to have him, and, what's more, can pay the parson's fees. But the question is whether you can be as happy on a thousand a year, married, as you may sometimes contrive to be with that amount of income when you are single. If you can manage for, after all, a thousand a year is not much, and very few fellows who are unmarried to live upon it can succeed in making both ends meet).

Well, my answer to the question is this, that if a single man can only just live upon a thousand a year, a married man can't do it at all; that is to say, not if he means to give any thing to his wife and children. Women don't eat much, and, fortunately, don't drink at all; but they wear a lot of clothes, and don't object to jewelry. Then wives have an inveterate, and I suppose invincible, habit of having children, and these want nurses, and boots, and drums, and all sorts of things.

There is one kind of marriage, however, which suits a man of a thousand a year admirably. I mean marriage with a rich heiress. A man with only a thousand a year may safely marry a woman who has ten thousand. This is just what I tried to do, and it wasn't quite so easy as you may imagine, though I was thirty-two at the time, and the girl only sixteen. She was so infernally romantic, you see, and I'm not romantic at all. I can make love and all that sort of thing, and know when to squeeze a woman's hand—and never get a slap—and too soon or too late (except with the one I am going to tell you about, and she wouldn't stand it at any time), but I can't manufacture sentiment every fest, having never been accustomed to the society of school girls; and that's just what I found the whole business was. Still, I do think that if a young girl gets into a post-chaise with you, the least she can do is to behave herself until the end of the journey. I've been thinking about it ever since, and still I can't see what I didn't make a confounded row about it at the time.

As I said before, I don't mention her name, because I promised I wouldn't, and for other reasons besides. However, her father was a rich manufacturer—say at Lowell; and her mother died when she was only a baby, and I never had seen her before—but say at Greenwood. As for the daughter, I think she was a pretty girl, but I know she was immensely rich. The money that girl had in bank-stock was something enormous, and besides this only child she got from her mother. Her father was sure to leave her a lot of money besides; but, of course, I knew there would be a squall when he made a clear sweep of the elopement. However, she could not help having a clear two hundred and fifty thousand, and although it was all settled on herself, we could have lived dooced well on the interest.

As we are all out here something (I suppose, Mr. Editor, you would not admit a heroine without an name and all), we will call her Julia. That's the first of her when I was in Europe from my sister, who was at school with her at Paris, at Madame Favre's in the Champs Elysées. It was there I called it "finishing" school, and I think it deserved the name, for it turned out one of the most finished coquettes I ever saw. Julia, however, had not yet reached coquettishness. The coquettes were all in the sixth class—that class which contains the "philosophers" in the French college system. Julia was only in the "correspondents" or "rhetorics" in the colleges—and had not yet gone beyond sentiment and romance. It must be remembered that she was not more than sixteen.

The course of studies pursued at Madame Favre's—at least in the upper classes—was, in fact, nothing more than a course of love. Was it not the course of true love? asks the reader. I am inclined to think it was not, if only from the fact that, as a general rule, it did "run smooth." In the fourth class, the little girls of fifteen have a tendresse for "Paul and Virginia," or other tales of comparatively innocent nature; in the fifth, they studied in the works of Richardson and Rousseau; but, in the sixth, they affected to have lived through "such childishness," and to think of nothing but their chances of establishing themselves in large houses, with rich husbands ready to pay the largest bills.

Where the novels came from I don't know—probably through some, through the "old girls" who were called Ernest de Waldemar—the hero of one of the books—that Julia (as we have now agreed to call her) ultimately consented to elope with me.

The first time I saw her was at a distribution of prizes in the summer of [illegible]. I knew she was American by two things. First of all, she had beautiful light-brown hair, such as French girls seldom have; secondly, she got what gave the prizes away did not kiss her on the forehead. Whenever one of the French girls received a prize, Father Some-one-or-other, who presided at the distribution, crowned her with a wreath, gave her a very small book and a very large bouquet of good conduct, and then imprinted a cold, chaste kiss on her brow as the young lady knelt at his feet with much meekness to receive it. The Protestant girls, however, did not see the fun, as they expressed it, of being kissed by an old Catholic confessor, and it was quite understood that they were not to receive the customary salute.

My sister, who had no prize to take (our family was never remarkable for brilliant acquisitions, unless I mention my uncle; and a silver cup I gained before us, with her little book and wreath of certificates, she smiled and stopped to receive her congratulations.

As a compatriot, and the brother of one of her fellow-pupils, I took upon myself to congratulate Miss Julia also. She started, blushed, and, after I had spoken a few words, knew that I was the very image of Ernest de Waldemar.

"And who is this Ernest?" I inquired.

"How foolish you are!" was the reply. "Ernest de Waldemar is her hero. Laure de Marsan and Julia are both in love with him, and, as for Julia, she scarcely ever talks of any thing else."

"And what will she do to me for being like him? Is she very savage?"

"Why, how stupid you must be! She likes you for it. She thinks you are so like him that you must have all his noble qualities."

"Poor girl!" I remarked.

"She is so poor as you imagine," replied my sister, making, almost unconsciously, one of those puns in which some young ladies delight. "How much do you suppose she has a year?"

"I'm sure I can't say."

"Well, I don't know exactly myself, but I know she has hundreds and thousands of dollars in bank-stock."

"If she has only a few thousand dollars, she will not get much a year out of that."

"Well, I'll ask her. I know she's a great deal."

"Do," I replied. "I should very much like to know."

CHAPTER II.

WHEN I saw my sister again she brought me an invitation to a ball which was to take place at Madame Favre's.

"Julia will be so glad if you come," she added.

I had almost forgotten Julia's existence, but now that I was reminded of it, I asked about the small mass of money in connection.

"Small sum, indeed!" exclaimed my sister. "She's two hundred and fifty thousand dollars left her by her mother. Madame can prevent her having it when she is of age, or before, if she marries to her father's approval."

"Oh, he'll never give his consent," I observed, half to myself.

"Why give his consent! And why not?" asked my sister.

"Because he's not what I meant," I replied. But I omitted to add that I had been thinking of proposing to her myself, and had just imagined the probable amount I would be expected to ask.

Then I went on to reflect that a girl with two hundred and fifty thousand dollars was sure to be met with every day, and that I should be a fool to miss such a chance. As for proposing to her in a formal manner, such as all romances direct, I knew would say she was too young, and then marry her to some one else. I had been served that way once before.

As I knew that my sister would, as a matter of course, disapprove of my plan, and would set up an interesting young school-fellow, I thought it best to keep all my plans to myself. The first thing to be done was to make love to Julia—a task that appeared to me, though I discovered when I saw her that she was not at all like me, a very easy one. All she could possibly be. It was impossible to produce a better impression upon her than she had already received, and as to not pushing it, I had the impression might be injured if I conversed with her too much on the first night. I would leave her a good talker. It always appeared to me that lovemaking was a good deal like fishing. If the young lady is not thoroughly hooked, you may as well cut your art until you have her fast; but if you are certain you have taken the bait, you may pull her ashore at once. At all events, don't begin playing with her, for, after all, you can but catch her, and you might break the line.

Therefore, all things considered, I determined to wait until the night of the ball, when I would let all that sort of thing to her own imagination and the good offices of Mademoiselle Laure de Marsan to work. I found a most excellent friend in Laure, as we have seen, had herself been in love with Ernest de Waldemar, and was delighted to find that Julia loved him—that is to say, loved nobody better than she did: and, like a good, affectionate girl, she was ready to help her friend on to the dear friend and school-fellow. But having done so, as she took a romantic interest in everything social, interest in the progress of our loves. She was forever talking to Julia about me, and asked me what I thought about her friend, and how I liked her Julia.

When I said I did not make love to Julia, I forgot the letters. But I saw that it was expected I should send a few. In fact, Laure hinted as much, and I, of course, was not the man to neglect so the suggestion of so accomplished a confidante. Besides, I wanted to be very good to Julia, for the sake of Ernest de Waldemar; and, as they happened to have been copied literally from certain romances which I have read in my time, and which obtainable here figures, I have no doubt that this resemblance will be found.

At last I entreated Julia to "fly with me." This was exactly five months after my first interview with Julia, and the night of the graduating class in honor of the new year. (Since my elopement with Julia, Madame Favre has changed the annual distribution once a year: and, for some years afterward, it was a rule that at least one teacher should stand in the same position as I did on the occasion of which I am speaking.)

CHAPTER III.

THIS was how we managed it—thanks to the skilful machinations of the romantic, but ingenious, Laure de Marsan.

On a certain day in February, Julia was to start for Italy with her aunt, a New Orleans lady who resided in Rome, and who had written for Julia, during her niece absent once in three months. Julia's father was anxious his daughter should make this journey, but as the aunt had not seen very many devotees that her niece should accompany her. So, as Julia's father was afraid of the fashionable air, and I believe I was pretty well served by them.

Julia, by my directions, at rather the close of Madame Favre's dinner, to which I always appeared, expressed her readiness, in the first instance, to accompany me to Italy. All my letters were packed up to March, and every thing was prepared for the young lady's departure. Then, a few days before the time fixed for our escape, I left Paris (which was no joke then, let me tell you), Julia because suddenly afraid of the fashionable air, because but one which we knew the aunt would willingly accept.

This was the post-stopping at the Hôtel des Princes, in the Rue Richelieu. On the eve of the departure Julia went to bed, and sent word she was not to go to Italy at all, that she would much rather go back to the United States, and that she would write to her aunt to that effect in the morning.

"Well, my love," said the aunt, as she embraced her; "you know your own mind, and are not a child, and so just as you like, so, as you wish it, you must go back to the United States."

Julia returned that night to the school, and the next morning at seven o'clock met me at the very spot which I myself had left at six. If Madame Favre questioned her coachman, all he could reply was, that he had been told to drive the young lady to the Rue Richelieu, and there she had met the Princes he had driven her.

The post-chaise was waiting for me in the court-yard, and at half past seven we had passed the barrier, and were galloping along the high road to Italy.

CHAPTER IV.

JULIA cried a little at first, but I persuaded her that it was useless to do so, bringing forward several excellent reasons in support of my argument, and at length she became pacified.

"How is Laure?" I inquired.

"Very well," said Julia, wiping her eyes. "She sent her love to you."

"Have you her cousin's address at Lyons?"

"Yes; here it is," she replied, giving me at the same time an envelope on which was written the address of one of Laure's cousins, at whose house we were to be received, and where we intended to have our wedding breakfast.

This was the first day of my campaign: We were to go on without stopping as far as Lyons. Travelling in this manner it would be impossible to overtake us, even if the alarm were given, which would by no means certain; and once at Lyons, all we had to do was to go to the German church and get married forthwith. Then Julia was to write to her father, and the marriage could afterward be solemnized with his consent. To apply at the consulate for permission to marry a girl of sixteen, with the consent of one in the town would have soon after the arrival of the post-chaise that I had left Paris, have appeared to me, would be impprudent and something more.

"What will my poor aunt say?" exclaimed Julia, thoughtfully, after we had proceeded for some time in silence.

I made no reply, for I didn't know what her poor aunt was likely to say, not enjoying the honor of that lady's acquaintance.

"I wish I could write to her, and explain that I am not going to Italy, because she will consider me pretending up to the last moment that I wanted to accompany her, and even writing to take the rooms at the hôtel, and all?"

"What hotel?" I inquired.

"At Nice, where I and my aunt and myself meant to stop to-night."

"Oh, that won't matter," I continued. "But there is Sens?"

"Sens? I'm sure I forget. I didn't address the envelope."

"Pontillon," I exclaimed, "where is Sens?"

"Sens, you know, is my home, Sir, where I was born?" It's the last station you'll come to to-night that is say, if you travel as you're doing now."

"And how long shall we stop there?"

"I am afraid, then, you're going there very fast, Sir.... But now you know better."

We had now reached the first post-town. We gave the postilion two five-franc pieces for the post-and-a-half which we discovered to be on the point of being the horses harnessed.

"Is there any chance, supposing off a bonbon's daughter," said the retiring post-boy, to the one who took his place, at the same time exhibiting the two pieces which he had received.

"I forget to ask about Sens," I remarked to Julia, and then, turning out to the postilion, I inquired as to its locality.

"Road to Lyons, Sir," was the answer. "With patience we shall be there—we will get there before morrow morning."

"Road to your aunt was going to Italy?" I observed to Julia.

"So she is. But may she not go to Italy through Lyons?"

"Well, I shouldn't think so; but I don't know." "Then, if she is not, I suppose Sens was below that before," suggested Julia, with a gentle pout.

"Postillion, postillion! which is the way to Italy?" I called.

"This is the way, Sir. All in good time," was the answer. "Sens was another road, Sir, and then, Sir, you know that every road leads to Rome. But they mostly go through Lyons, Sir."

"Through Lyons!" I muttered. "And to we shall be passing through the very place where your aunt is! Where did you write to take the rooms?"

"Hôtel de l'Europe."

"We shall know what to avoid, then. A pity you didn't tell me where Sens was before, Julia."

Sens! As for me, I never heard of it."

"Well, dearest, I was under your protection, and that you would take the trouble to ascertain where we were going before you started."

"Well, I'm sorry, my beloved Julia, or I shall think you no longer love me."

"My presence is a sufficient proof of my affections. Oh! what a lovely landscape!" she then exclaimed, pointing to a valley with a river running through it, and a few very grand groups here and there.

"Yes, a very fine landscape," I replied; "but not enough cows."

She looked at me, and stared. The fact was, I was annoyed at the idea of proceeding without, because it's not my line, and I don't shine in it; and I therefore thought I had better check this outburst of romantic landscape as soon as possible.

"Does that scene say nothing to your heart?" she continued. "Do you see no poetry in that placid valley—in that calm, rippling stream?"

I now stopped her another reason, for I began to think she might take me for an unfeeling brute.

"Yes, it's very beautiful," I replied. "Indeed, it reminds me of something I saw at the Diorama, or at the Water-Color Exhibition. It's such a large, flat landscape, that it's very fine, whichever way."

After this, Julia remained silent for some minutes.

"Do you read much poetry?" she asked, when we had again changed horses.

"Not very much," I answered. "I used to read a little at school, and wrote it out, too, a hundred lines at a time, when I had been doing any thing wrong."

"But I should have thought the study of poetry formed part of your daily life."

"Do. In Rule I used to get up as late as I did in New York; and then, what with breakfasting at a café, riding in the Bois de Boulogne, calling on a few friends, dining, and then going to the Opera, or one or two balls, I'd enough to do, without reading poetry."

"But surely you like poetry. I always thought you adored it," she continued.

"I should like it very well if it weren't for the rhyme and the trouble of inventing. I only adore you."

The latter remark was made by way of conciliating the fair Julia, who, I saw, appeared to think I should like exactly what she liked—and that I thought I might as well destroy as soon as possible. Besides, I didn't like poetry myself. I was very fond of prose; but as for poetry, I can't read it."

"You, the image of Ernest de Waldemar, not to like poetry! I thought you loved it."

"I love you," I continued, by way of observe.

"This is the second time you have paid me that compliment," said Julia, impatiently. "Can we we talk of something else?"

"Well, what shall we talk of? Oh, here we change horses. Where to, my man? I must want breakfast. It's eleven o'clock?"

"I could not eat a thing."

"Couldn't you? Well, I feel exceedingly hungry. When do you generally breakfast?"

"At seven; but to-day I am so nervous, so agitated, I can not think of such things."

"Well, so I feel this day. I feel rather peckish," said I, and, indeed, I did. "I am accustomed to take my meals regularly; and I think I shall breakfast here."

"And if we are being pursued?"

"Why, then I'll pursue me! After you've been with me three hours in a post-chaise, after running away from school, it is not very likely any one will suppose you are running away; is it, love me?"

"That may be; but it's not the way to look at it."

"Will you breakfast at the post-house, Sir, or at the hotel?" said the postillion, as he came to the door.

"At the hotel, and the best in the place," was my prompt reply.

"You mean to breakfast?" expostulated Julia, when you know we may be overtaken at any moment. Have you no fear that I may be ruined? The disgrace would kill me."

"But, my dearest love," I replied, "I always breakfast at eleven; and I have been up to-day since five."

"Were we not to hurry to Lyons, and be married there instantly on our arrival? Pray think of us, and our speedy union, and do not let us have any needless delay."

The notion of calling breakfast a "needless delay" I knew could not rather good. Julia, I imagined, to cry once more, I bought some bread and cheese and a bottle of wine, and, when I had before starting, swallowed a large cup of coffee.

I had determined, from the beginning, not to give in to Julia's good-natured fears. I had resolved, in a silly, sentimental girl, who wanted her romantic mind hooked and landed as quickly as was possible. However, she did not appreciate my firmness and decision of character, but remained during the whole of the first stage in tears from the whole of the next stage.

Postillions were known to be scoundrels; but I think, on this unfortunate journey of mine, I met with the most extortionate, and, at the same time, one of the most obliging, experience, that ever was known. At one of the stations I had given the postillion about twenty-five francs more than the or three francs, more than he was entitled to claim from me.

"They are not so loving as they were when they started," said the low brute to one of his companions. "He's actually only given me twenty-six sous."

"Oh, said the other, what can you expect? some romantic young traveler always is a fool, I guess."

"There! there!" exclaimed Julia, who heard this last remark. "That's what I meet with through you. Nothing but insults."

"I'll give him a piece of my mind," I muttered, "I would break the scoundrel's head."

"Remember you would not improve the matter," remarked Julia.

"No; but paying the fellows properly might. I think I'll get out and give the fellow a piece of my thing more."

"Stop!" at the very next station I had a row with the scoundrels. I paid them by the legal scale, and you should have seen their looks. As for me, I was in a towering rage. I, who, as an American, only had just passed with three travelling carriages for myself and her lady-bird-maid, another for her other servants, and a third for lap-dogs.

"Pay!" whispered Julia, quite pale from fear.

"Well, my love," I replied, almost tired of her nonsense, "she's not running after us, we're running after her; and, as the laws of the road will not allow these post-carriages to pass another, there is no fear of our overtaking her."

"But she might get on."

"Well, Sens is not a village. It appears to be a large town. She puts up at the Hôtel de l'Europe, and there we can find and dine at our leisure. It happens not to be the Hôtel de l'Europe."

"Dine!" exclaimed Julia, quite passionately, as she threw herself back in the corner of the carriage.

However, I was not going to remain treated in this manner, and I began a regular row for the sake of a romantic young school-girl. Of course I should be able to teach her a little reason after our marriage, but, in the mean while, she was certainly somewhat exacting. Nothing could stop the row. Dogs now, not even for myself, but a carriage should break down, or any other accident should bring me to a standstill. But after passing we should not even have to fear this. Her aunt was to stop there. We were only going to stop there on the way to do—for I was determined to have my dinner—and the next morning, when the old woman started, we should be eighty or eighty miles ahead.

As Julia seemed seriously grieved, I thought I would try to console her. I began by putting my arm round her waist, or rather by attempting to do so, for she threw herself up quite furiously, and said, with a look of something very like scorn,

"Remember your promise, Sir; and be good enough not to approach me so closely."

I tried to reason with her, but it was no use. Then I became sulky too, but only for a few minutes, after which I assumed submission, thinking what I should do with the interest of the bank-stock.

"I shall live on the Hudson, somewhere near Washington Irving's place," I decided. I shall only want three servants besides my own. A cook you—there's the cook, and we must have a good one, too, for I shall give a dinner-party once a fortnight at least. Wife economy, no man's fortune enough for a foreign trip every year. And I don't see why I shouldn't go to Saratoga, or to the Springs, for a week, if I could manage to get a favorite place, I could receive the salary just as well as any one else."

These agreeable reflections were put an end to by the jerk of the carriage, which suddenly stopped before the post-house of Sens.

"Here we are," said I to Julia.

"Here we are," I repeated, as I had received no reply.

"Oh, my heaven! What is to become of me?" sighed Julia, who had been sleeping, and was not yet scarcely awake.

I was determined to put a stop to all this sort of thing, and said, rather abruptly perhaps:

"Have the kindness to get out. And remember we dine here."

She got out without a word, and entered the hotel. It was the Hotel de France, Hotel de l'Europe being, as I had ascertained, at the other end of the town.

Julia's eyes looked hollow, and had large black circles round them. She had evidently been crying much, and was quite exhausted.

I really pitied her, and went toward her to speak to her, when she turned away from me, took a pocket-handkerch, and asked one of the servants to show her a room where she could arrange her toilet.

Some one ordered her to come and dine at a pea and ink.

"A pen and ink! what for?" I inquired.

"For madam," she replied.

I thought this rather odd, but ordered the dinner without troubling myself about it.

CHAPTER V.

THE soup was getting cold, and still Julia had not returned.

"This shall not take place after we are married," said I to myself, and began eating.

"There you are at last!" I exclaimed, as the door opened.

But, instead of Julia, an old lady entered.

"You are Mr. ——?" she began, mentioning my name.

"Yes, madam."

"I am the aunt of the young lady who accompanied you here in a post-chaise," she continued. "Julia intends to stay with me, and it was very kind of you to offer her a place in your carriage. But, as people might misinterpret the affair, I beg you will excuse her, and I am sure you will agree you we shall be equally discreet on our side."

"Madam, I do not understand you," I said.

"Read this letter, then," replied she, giving me a letter which Julia had just sent her by one of the waiters.

The letter was as follows:

"My DEAR AUNT,—I have behaved very shamefully but you must pardon me. I left my father this morning with a man whom I thought I loved, but now that I have been left by him entirely, I detest him. They may me before it is too late. Your heart-broken niece,

"JULIA."

I could not say a word—I was thunder-struck.

"You will not mention this," said the aunt, with a bow.

"I mention it, madam? I should think not, indeed. A nice fool I should be considered," I exclaimed.

"Because I have two sons—one a merchant, one a planter," added the old lady, "and who are very fond of Julia, and I should not like them to hear of it."

"No threats are necessary, madam—I shall not speak of the affair."

"Excuse my having interrupted you," said the old woman; and, with a very polite bow, she left me.

Thus ended my elopement, and my first and only attempt to get married on a thousand a year.

STEPHEN GIRARD, THE MONEY-MAKER.

ABOUT the year seventeen hundred and fifty, in the environs of Bordeaux, in France, there lived an old sea-captain, named Pierre Girard, with his dame Larfargue, his wife. They had already four children—no matter whether male or female as yet they lived and died in the obscurity in which they were born. But, in the year seventeen hundred and fifty, on the twenty-first of May, another child came into the world—a boy, named Stephen Girard.

Up to the age of ten or twelve there is no record of the life and progress of this boy. At that time he was found, with one eye, embarked as a cabin-boy, with no other acquirements than an imperfect knowledge of the elements of reading and writing, on board a vessel bound for the West Indies. His one eye was one of the subjects of ridicule on his companions, and his temper was thus early soured for life. With this physical deformity, without friends, patronage, or money, he was thrown upon the world.

He did not long live in the West Indies, but bound himself apprentice to a shipmaster, in whose service he first set foot in the port of New York, about the year seventeen hundred and sixty-four. Moreau de Stephen Girard was, he gained the confidence of his employer, and he was made mate of the vessel in which he sailed, and afterward captain when his master left the sea. He voyaged several times successfully to and from New Orleans. In this position he first began to accumulate money, and to trade on his own account, and it is soon became part owner of the ship and cargoes which he commanded. A large part of his subsequent progress of his history now occurs, but in seventeen hundred and sixty-one we find him an obscure peddling, quiet, thrifty trader in Water Street, Philadelphia.

At this period he took a liking to one Mary, or Polly Lum, the daughter of an old ship-caulker, who lived in a wretched hovel on the wharf, having the woods that trailed that city. The girl was plain, but comely, and employed as a domestic servant in a neighboring family. Stephen Girard does not appear to have been looked upon with favor by the parents of Polly. The old caulker hated him the house for some time. They were eventually married, but the union was not a happy one. She was regarded of her days as a shrew morose and austere. One child was born, which died. At length, during the Legislature of Pennsylvania for a divorce, and obtained it.

He still continued to rent the small house in Water Street, to which he had taken his wife when they were married, and he industriously pursued his commercial occupations of sea-captain, supercargo, and merchant. About this time he entered into partnership with one Isaac Hazlehurst, of Philadelphia, in a mercantile business, in which to trade to the island of Saint Domingo. The ships were captured by British cruisers, and sent to Jamaica: a misfortune which dissolved the short partnership. There is another gap in the story of Stephen Girard's life, during seventeen hundred and seventy-five to seventeen hundred and seventy-six. In the latter year he appears to have resumed and enlarged his old business, trading as ship-master and merchant to New Orleans and Saint Domingo.

The war put an end to the sea enterprises of Stephen Girard, and he was compelled to turn his attention to the land.

He opened a small grocery store in Water Street, joined with a brother, Stephen Girard, whom he worked hard with his own hands at the occupation of bottling claret and cider. About the year seventeen hundred and seventy-eight, the obliging approach of the British to Philadelphia, he purchased a small tract of land from a Quaker, named Mr. Hazlehurst, on which there was a house, to which he removed his business; employing his time, early and late, in preparing claret and cider for the market, and selling them at a large profit to the American army encamped near Philadelphia. Here he remained until seventeen hundred and seventy-nine, sometimes making a voyage in a boat on a water-course which flowed on the slopes of his wares. His appearance was not much in his favor. He was dark and dirty-looking, his face was short and thick; he was coarse, rough, vulgar, and ungainly; and his one eye glared about in a most unpleasant manner. He dealt with jews and tunats from every side, which he bore with a surly indifference to everything but the gain that was object in view, which he followed with all the steady energy of an iron will. That object was to make money.

When Philadelphia was evacuated by the British in seventeen hundred and seventy-eight, Stephen Girard was again found in Water Street, this time occupying a range of frame stores upon the east side. He was by this time about forty years of age, but in plain, grave, and repulsive appearance he looked at least ten years older. His business could not have been very prosperous at this period, considering the disturbed and depressed state of the country. He was still toiling his time. His store was well filled with old casks, bottles, and all sorts of cordage, and other materials useful for ship-building.

In seventeen hundred and eighty Stephen Girard again commenced trade to New Orleans and to Saint Domingo trade. In two years he had progressed, by the aid of his own industry, and the use of credit, with renewal, of a range of brick and frame stores, one of which he occupied himself. The rents were at the time high.

Up to the time of the peace of eighty-three Stephen Girard, from whom he had been divorced, was admitted an inmate patient into the Pennsylvania Hospital. She had returned to New Orleans about a year and one month, while her husband was busily pursuing his commercial avocations in that city, and died, in the year eighteen hundred and fifteen. On being told of her death, Stephen Girard selected her handkerchief, and requested that the same might be called as soon as all the arrangements for her funeral were completed. She was buried in the cemetery of the Friends. Her husband was there, gloating with his one tearless eye, silent and unmoved. After laying one month and a half in the ground, he married, saying, "All it will." He returned home, and was soon ready to let out his stores, factories and hospitals from this day.

A circumstance occurred at this period which materially assisted Stephen Girard in his cherished determination. He was engaged in the West India trade—principally in the line of supplying the islands—and at the moment of the well-known outbreak of the slaves he had two vessels lying off the port. The affrighted planters rushed to the docks, and deposited their most valuable treasures in these ships for safety, returning to secure more. They were nearly all, with their families, massacred. Stephen Girard advertised liberally for the owners of the property, but not a soul appeared to claim it, and it was transported to Philadelphia, to swell the store-houses of the merchant to the principal capitalist, who commenced the building of those large ships engaged in the trade with China and Calcutta, which were, at that time, the pride of America.

In seventeen hundred and ninety-three a fearful pestilence broke out in the City of Philadelphia. The yellow fever left white streets tenantless; the hearse was the vehicle most frequently seen in the streets; those who wore the badge of mourning on their arms were avoided even by their friends; and the funeral bell tolled and camphor filled every house in the city. While the pestilence was at its height a square, requisitive was boldly entered one of the most crowded hospitals, and bore out in his arms a victim in the last, saffron-colored stage of the disease. Day and weeks this man continued to perform the same terrible office of attending upon the sick and dying, disinfecting the most putrid and dangerous duties of the lowest servant in the place. This repulsive-looking Samaritan was Stephen Girard, with his strong will, his hardy energy, his stout heart, and his one eye. The hard, gripping trader was not so selfish, after all. When all the inhabitants, all the workers of the poor, were either dead, dying, or had fled; when no offers of money would purchase that labor which was required for the reorganization of the pest-house hospital at Bush Hill, two men nobly volunteered for the service—Mr. Stephen Girard and Peter Helm. On the afternoon of the same day on which he offered his services, Stephen Girard was appointed of growing wealth and influence—a foreigner, with no ties of country between him and the afflicted city of his adoption, but his dangerous task with all the perseverance and decision of his character. He was entrusted with order and cleanliness; provided accommodations and procured supplies; and for sixty days continued to discharge his duties at the hospital.

In eighteen hundred and twelve, Stephen Girard, the one-eyed caulker of Bordeaux, purchased the banking premises of the old Bank of the United States (whose charter was not renewed), and founded the Girard Bank—a large private establishment, which not only conferred advantages upon the community greater than the State institution upon which it was founded, but, while the public credit was shaken, and the Government finances were exhausted by war, the Girard Bank could command large subscriptions of loans, and put itself at the disposal of the principal creditor of the country. In eighteen hundred and fourteen Girard subscribed the whole of a large Government loan from private capitalists; and in eighteen hundred and seventeen he contributed, by his unbacked credit and unlimited funds, to save the country the resumption of specie payments. In eighteen hundred and thirty-one his operations were so extensive, that when Girard's money was placed in extreme embarrassment from the scarcity of money, by reason of the United States Bank refusing to do it, he was enabled, by a single transaction with an eminent English firm, to turn the exchanges, and cause specie to flow into the United States.

Stephen Girard began his remarkable trading career in Water Street, which he mainly kept in view all his long life—the making of money for the power it conferred. He was content, at starting, to be the proprietor of the retail trader, willing to labor in any capacity to make those profits of which he was capable, and which he received. He took every advantage which the law allowed him in rendering it, he used upon just the same principle they would accomplish his purpose; he paid his servants no more than the market price; when a ship which he owned was ordered the utmost economy, making no provision for his family, and living in the commonest style. He was, in fact, a hard jiggle for a penny with a huckster in the streets; he would deny the watchman at his bank door a glass of water in payment of a gratuity. He sold to his singular and delicious character, he was a most penurious, cold and calculating man. His principal conversations were heterodox in the extreme, and he loved to name his splendid vessels after Voltaire and Rousseau. He was devoted to the improvement of his adopted city and country; he was a determined friend to the Republican theories of the day; never applied to him for a large public grant in vain, while the starving beggar was invariably sent away with his gate. He usually rose every morning before the lark, and unceasing labor was the daily worship of his life.

He died in his eighty-second year. In eighteen hundred and thirty he had nearly lost the sight of his one eye, and used to be seen groping about his bank, disregarding every offer of assistance. Crossing one of the Philadelphian roads, he was knocked down by a passing wagon; his face was bruised, and his right ear was nearly cut off. His ear was sewed on by a surgeon, but it was now entirely closed. He gradually wasted away, and his health declined. On the twenty-sixth of December Stephen Girard expired in a back room on the third floor of his house in Water Street, Philadelphia, leaving the bulk of his vast fortune—upward of a million sterling—to found charities, and to benefit the city and the country in which he had acquired it.

He left his monument in the "Girard College" —that magnificent palace for the education and protection of the orphan children of the poor, which stands, the most splendid work of architecture in the New World, high above the buildings of Philadelphia, visible from every eminence of the surrounding country. The history of the foundation and internal arrangement of this Orphan College was not fairly dealt, and carefully to his will, showing that the design upon which he had lavished the mass of his wealth was not the hastily-developed fancy of a few hours or days, but was the heart-cherished, ripest project of his whole life.

BROADWAY.

[A fair correspondent, whose name does not begin with a capital, sends us the following. We think it is transparent that THOMPSON stole his famous ode on the Charge of the Light Brigade. Such acts are a disgrace to the age.—Ed. H. W.]

Oh they go, on they go,
The crowd rushes onward
All down Broadway they go,
Ladies by hundreds.
"What shall we do?" they said—
The sky is blue o'er head.
All down Broadway they go,
Ladies by hundreds.

Forward, the Hooped Brigade—
Forward, as flags displayed—
Ribbons as pennons too—
Till some one wondered
How they could stand at all—
Silks, and the lace, and all,
Hoops and the Crinoline Shawl,
Many a hundred.

Dandies to right of them,
Dandies to left of them,
Stepped on their dresses' hem,
"Excuse me," blundered.
Gazed at the haughty belle,
Stared at the school-girls well,
As they were going to sell,
Five or six hundred.

Flashed all their eyes so bright,
Flashed all their diamonds' light,
Flashed all their teeth so white,
As they swept onward.
Ah me! what words are said,
How many a conquest made,
By this Fair Hooped Brigade—
Full twenty hundred!

THE GREATEST GOLD NUGGET EVER FOUND.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly.

"DAY OF JUBILEE, NEW ZEALAND, March 4, 1858.

"I have only recently arrived in this delightful country, and as yet seen but very little of it, but shall explore after a while and shall furnish you with sketches.

"Before leaving Melbourne, I had the pleasure of seeing the greatest natural curiosity extant, except perhaps the Falls of Niagara and Niagara Falls. I allude to a nugget of gold weighing a prodigious number of pounds. I have thrown considerable light on the dimensions of California. What is most strange is, that this immense jewel was taken out of an old and exhausted digging. It weighs 146 pounds avoirdupois, 23 carats in quality, and has only about 4 or 5 ounces of waste. The intrinsic value of the nugget is about £4,100 sterling. £10,000 was offered for it, but there being no purchaser at the moment for such a large investment, it has not changed the original proprietors' hands. James and Robert Andrews (Englishmen), and Duncan and Peter Napier (Americans), are the names of the happy individuals who found it at the Kingower digging, about 120 miles from Melbourne. They conceded the treasure from the knowledge of their brother diggers and others at the time they found it was exhibited in a Bank in Melbourne. The digging of it up and conveyance to Melbourne was managed with great secrecy.

"The Sydney papers record a good joke. One of the proprietors laughingly said to a party of ladies who visited the nugget's exhibition, 'Ladies, in the room who will lift the nugget shall have it.' The words were no sooner uttered than one of the ladies took it up, and carried it to the door, walking away with it with all possible speed. She was arrested at the door by the police, and obliged to give it over. Should the lady prosecute or sue for the gem thus lifted, it is supposed that a decision in a court of law would be involved. The matter would probably have turned upon the point of whether the nugget was a fixture. The astonishing exhibit was taken from it as it lay in the exhibition-room in Melbourne. YOUR CORRESPONDENT."

THE BOSTON REGATTA.

THE accompanying illustrations represents the Harvard, the winner of the six-oared-boat race on the Charles River, Boston, on the 24th ult. Take the following account of the race from the Boston Journal:

"The regatta on Charles River was admitted by all to be the best that ever transpired in this city. The day was a perfect one, the sun being the occasional appearance, covered as it was by boats of all descriptions, manned by every sort of craftsmen who had on getting the best of the sight; while the shore was lined by thousands of people, and the bridges were densely filled with men and Charles streets, and Beacon's Baths, were covered with interested spectators; paving how deeply exhibitions of this kind affect the popular mind. Among other boats very conspicuous were those from the British steamer Europa, in one of which we noticed Captain Leach and a number of ladies and gentlemen from the British American navigator, and formed a very pleasant feature of the display. The various boats, as they were distinguished by their uniforms, were decked with streets by their partisan friends, and the scene was rendered exceedingly lively by three enthusiastic demonstrations. The first race was for shorters, for a purse of twenty-five dollars. At a few minutes before half past five o'clock a gun was fired from the judges' stand to call the boats to line. But four presented themselves—the fifth which had entered (the Sword-fish) having been withdrawn on account of the illness of A. Webster, Jun., the one who was to man her. The boats then placed themselves in the following order: Boston, 36 feet, rowed by J. Stevens; Eustern, 30 feet, rowed by T. Harrington; Black-Bird, 29 feet, rowed by Robert F. Clark; D. E. Poland, 28 feet, rowed by Thomas Doyle.

"At 5.31 the signal was given to start, and the Black-Bird shot ahead of the rest at the first stroke, lapped at first by the D. E. Poland, pulled by a man who had won at several races, but soon passed ahead, and maintained the lead around the upper stake and back, winning by several lengths ever the Poland. The Black-Bird came in amidst immense cheering, and Doyle was the first to shake hands with and congratulate his victor, which was witnessed with great satisfaction. The following time was made by the boats:

1. Black-Bird	14.54	3. Boston	16.35
2. D. E. Poland	15.17	4. Eustern	16.38

"The time made by the Black-Bird is the quickest ever made in our waters.

"The signal was given to call the six-oared boats into line, and seven, of eight that had been entered, presented themselves, the eighth (the Exile) having been withdrawn. We give the names of the boats, their length, and the names of their crews in the order which they occupied at the start.

"1. Harvard—40 feet. (This boat was decided by the best model, and was beautifully handled, and the crew well matched.) Their names were as follows: Stroke-oar—B. W. Crowninshield; weight, 156. C. Crowninshield, 154. C. W. Eliot, 138. J. H. Ellison, 144. R. B. Gilston, 144. A. Agassiz, 138—Bow-oar.

"B. W. Crowninshield had been sick, but, notwithstanding this, he gallantly took his position at the oar.

"2. Bunker Hill—47 feet 6 inches. Saverty, Shocker, G. Faulkner, G. Lewis, M. Quan. Corcoran, John Reed.

"3. Port-Hill Boy—47 feet 6 inches. J. Murray, C. Shea, M. Driscoll, E. O'Neil, J. Murray, A. Murray.

"4. Shawsock—44 feet. J. Wood, J. Bailey, P. Shaughnessy, P. Gallagher, T. O'Herran, G. Finemore.

"5. Robert Emmet—43 feet. H. Monahan, J. Monahan, H. M'Kenna, W. Maloy, J. Fitzgerald, W. Morey.

"6. Stirling—41 feet 6 inches. H. Sullivan, T. Leary, J. Martin, P. Quin, J. O'Brien, J. Crowley.

"7. James Buchanan—40 feet. M. P. Wall, J. Harrington, D. Shea, M. Harrington, T. Quin, M. Quin.

"The excitement at this moment was intense, and at 57 minutes and 25 seconds past five the signal to start was sounded, and every one was on the qui vive to detect, from the start, the vantage that might seem to rest with either. The Harvard lagged a little at the start, and an enthusiastic youth shouted, 'Twenty-five dollars that the Harvard comes in last!' We could not see that it was taken. But nobly the college boys applied themselves. We never saw handsomer rowing; and as they disappeared in the hazy distance there were indications that they would beat, which were verified by those on the outer walls; and as it became an ascertained fact the shouts were tremendous, and shaking of hands and congratulatory words about the success of Old Harvard revealed the intensity of interest felt in the result. At the start, the James Buchanan, a very fine boat, came in contact with the Stirling, and did not go round. The following time was made by the respective boats:

1. Harvard	19.23	4. Shawsock	21.33
2. Port-Hill Boy	21.10	5. Stirling	22.56
3. Robert Emmet	21.21	6. Bunker Hill	23.09

The cheers that greeted the winning boat were joined in by those on board the British boats, and even those who had been unsuccessful manifested a generous approbation of their skill. The winning boats then drew up to the judges' stand, where the prizes were delivered by Charles F. Shimmin, Esq., one of the judges, in the following neat speech:

"It is with feelings of more than ordinary pleasure that I present to you the prizes awarded for the Second Beacon Regatta. It should be a subject of congratulation to every thinking man to witness the revival of manly sports among us, and to know that eloquent pens are enlisted in the cause. Every hour upon the water is a deposit in Life's Savings' Bank for prospective use, whose dividends are not affected by times of panic. May the spirit, energy, and skill you have manifested to-day follow you into wider fields of action, and attend you amidst more important issues! Let me, however, counsel you at parting, not to pull through life at your recent pace, or you will arrive at the goal with little heart left to enjoy the prize; a long pull, a steady and strong pull, with a quick recover, with occasional and transient efforts—like that of to-day—demanding the exercise of every vital energy, is, I fancy, the best rule in every thing.

"On behalf of the subscribers to the Beacon Prize, and of us, the judges, I have to thank the Press, and all who have aided and taken part in this regatta, for their uniform courtesy and cordial co-operation; and we trust that many a coming year may see us, and there to come after us, assembled here to witness and to participate in contests for the Beacon Prizes. Rejoicing with you all that we have given a holiday and pleasure to thousands, and, moreover, that the prizes have been as gallantly lost, as fairly and bravely won, with not a speck upon the fair character of our noble sport, I bid you all heartily farewell. Go on and prosper!"

The prizes were received with a few earnest words of thanks, and then the visitors withdrew. As the Harvard passed the British boats, the latter threw bouquets on board in testimony of their appreciation; after which Captain Leach ordered his boat rowed to a position where he could intercept the Harvard on her return to the Union boat-house, and gave her the day ended cheerfully, and all concerned had reason to be pleased with its favorable termination, without accident and with no many happy circumstances connected with it. The judges were Charles F. Shimmin, Daniel W. Rogers, William C. Otis, Alfred Whitman, Jun., Thomas G. Stevenson, and Robert H. Stevenson.

THE LARGEST GOLD NUGGET EVER FOUND.—[SEE PRECEDING PAGE.]

THE "HARVARD," WINNER OF THE RACE FOR SIX-OARED BOATS, ON THE CHARLES RIVER, BOSTON, JUNE 19, 1858.

Miscellany.

Par Value of Musical Notes.

An eminent statistician has just prepared a very elaborate report on the subject of vocalists and lyrics, in which he calculates the value of every note they sing, and gives a table showing the cost price to the manager (vocalese and baritone apart) of the best known phrases in the tenor and soprano parts of the most popular operas of the day. The tenor's salary is put down at $20,000 a year, or in that ratio, and it is supposed that he sings seven times a month, or, on an average, nearly twice a week. His figures, then, in eighty-four representations in the course of the year, and receives nearly $500 for each performance. Now, according to M. Berlioz, who invented this system of computation, a good tenor's part, such as that of Arnold, Elvino, or Maurice, consists, on an average, of some 1000 notes or syllables; but as two or more notes are sometimes sung to one syllable, the author of the report will take the number of syllables. For each syllable, then, the tenor will receive the sum of twenty-five cents, and at the close of the evening's performance his bill might be made out after the following fashion. We will suppose the Opera to be "La Sonnambula:"

"Still"	$0 25
"So"	0 25
"Gently o'er me"	1 00
"Stealing"	0 50
"Memory will bring back the feeling"	2 00
Total	$4 00

As a fair soprano may be found for $15,000 a year, Amina's notes will come somewhat cheaper, and in fact will not be found to cost more than 18¾ cents apiece. Still that, as times go, is not bad.

The prima donna's bill, then, would be somewhat as follows:

"Do"	$0 18¾
"Not"	0 18¾
"Mingle"	0 37½
"One human"	0 56¼
"Feeling"	0 37½
Total	$1 68¾

If we take into consideration the number of seconds necessary for singing these notes, the result appears still more wonderful. As the tempo of the soprano's air is much more rapid than that of the tenor's, she gains her $1 68¾ in less time than it takes him to earn $1 25; but taking one air with another, and allowing for the increased velocity with which the conductors every year take the quick movements, it may be said that the tenor gains at least $150 an hour, or $2 50 a minute, counting the time that he is actually engaged in the emission of sound.

The poor prima donna is not so well paid, but she can, nevertheless, gain her $5 every three minutes very comfortably.

—PUNCH has this pathetic ditty on

The Love of the Turtle.

Ah! Know ye what is Woman's Love,
That spurns command—that scorns advice?
It, like the martyr's, looks above,
And burns to yield a sacrifice.
The passion of her gentle breast
Seeks but in blessing to be bless'd;
The one great longing of her heart
Is only rapture to impart,
What words that mystery shall reveal?
If a faint image feebly can,
It is as though, could turtles feel,
The Turtle loved the Alderman.
And sighed to constitute the soup
Whereon he might as vulture swoop,
And pined to be cut up for him,
And in his plate to lie, or swim,
Sufficiently repaid, to be
His callpash and callpee.

—THE ancient Romans were adepts in Taming Wild Beasts.

In an astrological poem of the early imperial date, where the constellations which predestine men to their several callings are given, there is found the horoscope of those who "tame the tiger, soften the rage of the lion, converse with elephants, and render these unwieldy masses fit for human arts and duties." In another poem of the fourth century of our era, the horoscope is represented of those who "make bears, bulls, and lions fit for intercourse with men." Pliny relates that "in a play given by Germanicus, the elephants brought their clumsy evolutions into the shape of a dance. Sometimes they used to brandish their weapons in the air, to fight one another like gladiators, and to riot in a wanton dance. Later, they practiced on the rope, on which four of them carried another in a litter, which was supposed to represent a woman in childbed, and whom they let down so gently upon the sofas of a guest-table, that they disturbed none of its occupants. It is told of an elephant that was slow at learning, and which had often been beaten on that account, that it was watched in the night, and found practicing its lesson by itself. These huge animals mounted the tight-ropes with the greatest agility, and, what is even more remarkable, descended them with equal ease. Mucianus mentions an elephant that had learned to write Greek, and to its performances used to add: 'I have written this with my own hand.'" also were tamed. The Carthaginian Hanno is said to have been the first who went about attended by a tamed lion. Berenice, the Egyptian queen, had a favorite lion that ate at her table and used to lick her cheeks. Marc Antony rode about Rome in a chariot in which two lions were yoked. Domitian had a lion that was taught to carry the game in hunting, who let himself be chased by hares, and into whose throat one might thrust his hand with impunity. This prodigy was the subject of several poems. Martial counsels the hare to take refuge from the pursuit of the hounds in the jaws of the lion, and asks which was the greatest miracle, that the eagle of Jupiter had not hurt Ganymede, or that the Emperor's lion had not injured the imprisoned hare? This wonderful lion, however, was torn in pieces by another beast that broke out from its cage in the arena; but he had the consolation, as Statius says, of being mourned by both the people and the Senate, and that the Emperor took his loss worse than that of ever so many Egyptian, African, or German beasts. Heliogabalus used sometimes, for a joke, to terrify his guests by bringing his tame lions suddenly into the dining-room. Even tigers were sometimes so far subdued as to lick their keepers' hands and faces. Leopards were easily reduced to submit to the rein of the charioteer. Oxen in general were very tractable; they learned to stand upon their hind-feet, and would allow jongleurs to perform their tricks on their backs, and were even skilled in playing the part of drivers in chariots at full speed.

Lions

Dogs and Apes

became distinguished actors. We have the description of a play in which a dog acted the chief part, which was performed with great applause in the presence of the Emperor Vespasian, in the theatre of Marcellus at Rome. The four-footed actor showed the greatest self-possession, when, in the course of the representation, some drink was given to him which purported to be poison, but which was really only a sleeping-draught. "After he had swallowed the draught," says the narrator, "he began to tremble, to reel, and to become unconscious; at length he stretched himself out, as if dying, lay as really dead, and allowed himself to be pulled and dragged about as the plot of the drama required. But as soon as the signal was given, he began to move gently, as though awaking out of a deep sleep, lifted his head, and looked round him; and while the spectators were expressing their admiration, he went up to the person to whom, according to the fiction of the play, he belonged, and showed so much delight and fondness by wagging his tail, as to excite universal astonishment.

Birds

also were trained. The Empress Agrippina, who was a great fancier of birds, had a thrush which could imitate the human voice—the first instance of the kind, according to Pliny. Pliny adds, that at the time of his writing, the imperial princes had a starling which could speak Greek and Latin words; nightingales also which had learned the same, added daily to their knowledge, and could even speak good long sentences. These were taught in a separate room, where they heard no other sound than the voice of the trainer, who was constantly repeating the same words to them, and rewarded their proficiency with some favorite delicacy. A story of a remarkable magpie is told in Plutarch's treatise on the cleverness of animals. A barber in Rome had a bird which not only imitated human speech, but also the noises of beasts and the tones of instruments, all spontaneously. One day a great funeral procession happened to pass the barber's shop, and stopped immediately against it, upon which the accompanying trumpeters blew a long tune on their instruments. From this moment the magpie became dumb, and uttered no cry even to make its wants known. The whole neighborhood became excited, and various surmises were circulated on the occurrence; some said the bird had been robbed of his voice by witchcraft, while the more knowing ascribed the calamity to a sudden deafness produced by the blowing of the trumpets. After a time, however, he recovered his voice, but did not exercise it in his former tricks, but sang the whole trumpet-piece from beginning to end. From this it was evident that his former silence arose from the pains he took to learn the melody.

Fishes in basins used, at the sound of a bell or rattle, to come to the edge to receive food from their owners' hands, a sight very often seen at the mansions of distinguished Romans. It is even maintained that some fishes recognized the names that were given them.

—"To cut a figure in the world" is the ambition of so many, that it has set a morbid mathematician upon the idea of defining some of the which men and women are most apt to cut. He says:

Figures

A line is length without breadth; for example, a line of railway, a line of conduct, a line of duty, and a line of business.

The line of railway is a projection of knaves for the peculation of fools. It issues from a board of directors at one end, and terminates in mines, manufactories, or sea-ports on the other. It adheres to its destructive principle of narrowness in all particulars, especially those of civility and liberality. A line of conduct is what a man's idea of self-interest points out to him, which he calls his conscience; if any gain can be obtained by nefariousness, his line is clear; if self-denial or any virtue is necessary, the line is too rugged for many to travel on it. The line of duty is a remarkably hard line; it generally crosses the line of appetite at right angles.

The line of business is multifarious and complicated. Most lines of business depend for their respectability upon the money made by them.

Moreover, a line is length (of head) without breadth (of heart), and since all lines terminate in points, talent is the power which detects the shortest road between your own point (pocket) and that of your neighbor.

A figure is of two kinds, respectable, i. e., of $10,000; or low, i. e., of ten cents a year. Figures in life are reckoned by the ad valorem estimate in money; the value of a man of poor figure, spoken independently of locality, is that of mock auction jewelry, viz., 0.

A circle is the world, or a plane figure, contained by one line, self-interest, which is called the circumference, and is such, that all lines drawn from a certain point within the figure, to the circumference (i. e., all motives, from the highest to the lowest men), are equal to one another. The important point called the centre of the circle, is, in every instance, Number 1.

An acute angle is the keenest and sharpest of all characters, and has very little affinity with the right angle. It is the most frequent angle now found, owing to its cutting propensity being invaluable for making its way.

An obtuse angle or character is one who can not see on which side his bread is buttered, and if he has no butter at all, he can not tell how to get any. The term, "butter," is equivocal, sometimes standing for flattery, sometimes for money.

An isosceles triangle, or character, has only two sides, equal; that is, it is one which only knows how to get like a horse and spend like an ass; the ratio of labor and extravagance being equal. For example, the sailor.

A scalene triangle, or Irishman, has three unequal sides, so that he can not stand alone, and no government has ever yet discovered which way to fix him.

An oblong is that which has all its angles right angles; as an affectionate father loves all his children; but has not the sides equal, as he has his weakest side turned generally toward the scapegrace of the lot.

A rhombus, or flirt, has all sides equal toward the admiration of the men, and would accept a compliment from a duke or a dustman; but her angles are not right angles, whatever Madame Celestine, her milliner, may say, for her conduct is highly improper.

A rhomboid is a coxcomb, who has his opposite sides equal; that is, his outside and inside are ridiculous alike, but all his sides are not equal, for the side toward the girl he has ruined is hard, and that toward himself, or his neighbor's wife, soft. We need not observe that the angles of conduct, honor, and fine feeling, as fashionably understood, are any thing but right angles.

Quadrilateral figures are such as always act on the square, and are contained by four straight lines, piety, justice, generosity, and truth. They correspond to what Aristotle calls "four-sided figures without flaw;" or, as the Oxonian designated them, "thorough bricks." They are, we need hardly add, very rare.

A Philological Marvel.

Who, though possessed of the wildest imagination, could have dreamed that the language of our country was destined to receive a brilliant elucidation from that of India? Who could have conceived that before the Englishman could sound the depths of his own vocabulary, he should leave the banks of the Thames to study on those of the Ganges? His mother-tongue was spoken by a fair race; he was to obtain a profound insight into its powers from a people bronzed by an eastern sun—a people forming a long-lost member of his family, which, without the lamp of philology, he never could have identified. Here are some examples of the close connection between Sanscrit and English.

Of the domestic animals, the Bull and the Steer (Sansc., "Bûl," and St'haura; the latter the Lat. Taur-us) were so denominated from their strength, from the root "Bûla" and "St'haur," to be strong. Hence it is that "St'haura" signifies also "a man," as the strong or brave being; just as the Lat. Vir (a man) is from the Sansc. Vira, to be brave, powerful. Our old English ballads have still the phrase "stiff and stour," applied to a brave man, resolute, vigorous, and persevering in the fight. Among the "Runners" we have the Ass, the Latin Asinus, from the Sansc. "As," to go; whence also the Indian "Asva," the Persian "Asp," and the Greek "Hippos," a horse. We have but one "thinker," and that is "Man," the Indian "Man-u;" from "Man," to think, to know; the root of the Sansc. Manas, the Latin Mens, "the mind," that which thinks, knows; hence "mon"-eo, I put another in mind of a thing. As the strong, brave, or heroic being, he was "Virâ," the Latin "Vir," a term that gave rise to "virtus," bravery, manhood; from the root "vîra," to be powerful. Among the Greeks, "Veera" appeared as "Hêros," and in a very early compound form, "Hêrâ," as in "Hêracles," or the "Glorious Hero." Then, too, Rulers appeared as "powerful," "potens;" the Sansc. "Pati," powerful, or "a lord;" or as slave-owners or slave-lords; "Dâsa-pati," the "des-potes" of the Greeks, and the "despot" of the English. Or they were "subduers" or "tamers," the Lat. "Dominus," and the Indian "Domina," from the root "dam," to tame: or, they were "splendid;" "raja," the rex, regis, of the Romans, from the root "raj," which signifies both to shine and to rule.

—STILL more singular is the derivation of some of the terms used in speaking of the Marriage Relation.

The obligations of oaths, of laws, of justice, of wedlock, of religion, are found, from the earliest documents of Japhetic language, to have been considered as bonds. Hence the Latin jus, juris, law, and juro, I swear, are both identical. The law (jur) binds, and the oath (jur) binds. hence the Hindostan "joru," a wife, as joined or bound. Among the Romans, the parties betrothed were "Sponsus" and "Sponsa" respectively, or bound; "Sbanda," a strengthened form of the Sansc. "bandha," just as we have "smikros" (σμικρος) for mikros, and numerous formatives of the same nature. As a wife, she was said to be joined (uxor, uksor), i. e., "yuksor," from "yuks," to yoke; "uksor," thus signifying yoke-fellow—a term erroneously supposed to be derived from ungo, unxor, as anointing the door-posts of the house. As the Arian had his bandhu, i. e. relation or kinsman, from the root "bandh," to tie, or bind; so, from the same root, was the term propagated among the Hellenes. Penther (Bandhar) expressed the man who was tied or allied (al-lié), i. e., the son-in-law; while the wife was denoted from a root of the same signification, "Damar," "she who was tied;" the Sansc. Dama, a wife (our Dame), as seen in Dâma, a tie, cord.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

IT was hard to catch "Old Jack Jones" in a place too tight for him to slip out. The following occurred last week at Cedartown Court. There had been a heavy frost the night before, and some of the knowing ones prophesied an entire failure of the wheat crop.

"I have got 100 acres," says Old Jack, "that I'll take $100 for."

"Done! I'll give it, and hand you the money in an hour," said Mitchell.

Before the expiration of the hour a negro from the plantation reported the wheat uninjured, and Mitchell advanced, money in hand.

"Thank you," says Jones. "When will you take your wheat away?"

"Take it away? Why, as soon as it's ripe."

"No you don't! You must cut it this week. I want to plow up that field and put it in corn."

When yet was ever found a mother
Would give her booby for another.

"John, spell effects." "F-x." "Right. "Next spell seedy." "C-d." "Right again. Now spell cakes." "K-a-x." "There's a good boy!" said his mother, handing Johnny some of the latter.

A CAPITAL WAY TO PREVENT THE SMELL OF COOKING IN A HOUSE.—Have nothing for breakfast, and warm it over for dinner and supper.

It was the custom in Massachusetts, in early times, as we learn from Lewis's History of Lynn, for a person to go about the meeting-houses during divine service, and wake the sleepers. "He bore a long wand, on one end of which was a ball, and on the other a fox-tail. When he observed the men asleep, he rapped them on the head with a knob; and roused the slumbering sensibility of the ladies by drawing the brush lightly across their faces."

By taking revenge, a man is but even with his enemy; but in passing it over, he is superior.

If you are disquieted at any thing, you should consider with yourself, is the thing of that worth, that for it I should so disturb myself, and lose my peace and tranquillity?

A lady wrote upon a window some verses, intimating her design of never marrying. A gentleman wrote the following lines underneath:

The lady whose resolve these words betoken,
Wrote them on glass, to show it may be broken.

Upon the 19th of May, 1780, the memorable dark day, a lady wrote to Dr. Byles, of Boston, as follows: "Dear Doctor, how do you account for this darkness?" He replied, "Dear Madam, I am as much in the dark as you are."

A gentleman, having written a letter, concluded it as follows: "Give Everybody's love to Everybody, so that Nobody may be aggrieved by Anybody being forgotten by Somebody."

A gentleman was asked to give a definition of nonsense. "Sir," he replied, "to bolt a door with a boiled carrot is nonsense."

Why is first love like a potato? Because it shoots from the eyes, and becomes less by paring.

In the "Talmud" there is a forcible figure descriptive of the depth of the sea. "Step not in there," runs the passage, "for, seven years ago, a carpenter dropped his axe, and it hath not yet reached the bottom."

SLANDER.—The expansive nature of scandal is told by the poet thus:

The flying rumors gathered as they rolled;
Scarce any tale was sooner heard than told,
And all who told it added something new,
And all who heard it made enlargement, too;
On every ear it spread—on every tongue it grew.

AN ERUDITE MAYOR.—The Worcester Chronicle gives the following as a verbatim copy of a letter from a chief magistrate of a certain corporation: "Dear sur,—On Monday next I am to be made a Mare, and shall be much obliged to you if so be as you will send me down by the Coatch some provisions fetting for the occasion, and I am to ax my brother, the old Mare, and the rest of the Bentch. I am, sur," etc. The above was answered by a wag, into whose hands it fell, as follows: "Sir,—In obedience to your orders, I have sent per coach two bushels of the best oats; and as you are to treat the old Mare, have added some bran to make a mash."

When Barney told Bill
He was looking quite ill,
Bill stuck to his habit of impudent joking;
"That's the diff'rence," quoth he,
"Betwixt you and me—
That I'm looking ill, and that you are ill-looking."

"Good news, Belhoul," said a wag at Balsora; "the caliph has appointed you governor of all the apes and hogs in the kingdom."

"Prepare, then," replied Belhoul, "to obey my commands."

CURIOUS FACT.—You must go through three springs before you get to a leap year.

A Cantab asked a Cambridge clown,
If he could conjugate—knew verb or noun—
Or etymologize what a duel meant?
Sure "from do-ill—a life misspent."

There was a fellow in a certain neighborhood in Arkansas, who was suspected of sheep-stealing. At last a planter riding through the woods, perceived the suspected individual emerge from the woods, and after looking round to see that no one was near, walked up to a flock of sheep and knocked over the largest and fattest. At this moment the planter rode up, and confronting the thief, exclaimed:

"Now, Sir, I have got you. You can not get off; you are caught in the act."

"What act?" indignantly inquired the thief.

"Why, sheep-stealing," was the prompt reply.

"Sir," you had better mind how you charge a respectable American citizen with such a crime as sheep-stealing," replied the gentleman with the penchant for mutton.

"Now, will you deny that I saw you kill that sheep?" asked the planter.

"No, Sir," was the answer; "I did kill it, and I'd do it again under the same circumstances. I'll kill any body's sheep that bites me as I'm going peaceably along the road."

In an old church in Westchester County, the following consonants are written beside the altar, under the Ten Commandments. What vowel is to be placed between them, to make poetry and rhyme of the couplet?

P. R. S. V. R. Y. P. R. F. C. T. M. N.
V. R. K. P. T. H. S. P. R. C. P. T. S. T. N.

"Six feet in his boots?" exclaimed old Mrs. Beeswax. "What will the impudence of this world come to, I wonder? Why, they might just as reasonably tell me that a man had six heads in his hat."

When the Princess Helena was born, it was told the Princess Royal that she had got a little sister. "Oh! that is delightful," cried innocent little royalty; "do let me go and tell mamma!"

"I thought you were born on the first of April," said a Benedict to his lovely wife, who had mentioned the twenty-first as her birthday.

"Most people would think so from my choice of a husband!" she replied.

There is a man out West who thinks that "Hon." placed before a man's name stands for honest.

A Greek maid being asked what fortune she would bring her husband, answered, "I will bring him what is more valuable than any treasure—a heart unspotted and virtue without a stain, which is all that descended to me from my parents."

An inscription, it is said, may be found in an Italian grave-yard: "Here lies Etella, who transported a large fortune to heaven in acts of charity, and has gone thither to enjoy it."

T I M E
I T E M
M E T I
E M I T

This word, Time, is the only word in the English language which can be thus arranged, and the different transpositions thereof are all at the same time Latin words. These words, in English as well as in Latin, may be read either upward or downward. The English words time, item, meti, and emit (to send forth), are mentioned above: and of the Latin ones (1) Time, signifies fear thou; (2) Item—likewise; (3) Meti—to be measured; (4) Emit—he buys.

BE ON THE WATCH.

He that a watch will wear this must he do—
Pocket his watch, and watch his pocket too.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, June 28, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets fluctuated slightly during the week for the leading kinds of Breadstuffs, closing with a good inquiry, chiefly from the home trade, for really desirable lots of Flour, Wheat, Corn, and Oats, at strengthening prices. Rye has been sparingly offered, and it has advanced....Cotton has been moderately dealt in, and it has improved a shade....Pork has been more abundant, and prices have declined, closing with a fair demand at the reduced rates. Other kinds of Provisions have not varied much....There has been a good business transacted in Rio and Java Coffee, Oolong Teas, as well as in Cuba Sugar and Molasses, and Rice, at full quotations....Large purchases, on speculation, of Adamantine Candles, have been reported. Nearly all the manufacturers have suspended work....Hay and Hops have been pretty active and firm....Tobacco has been more sought after at former rates.

The Live Stock Market last Wednesday was very freely supplied with Beeves, which declined considerably in the absence of an active inquiry....Milch Cows were plentier, and in rather better request....Veal Calves were also abundant and depressed....Sheep and Lambs were more freely offered at reduced prices. The demand was moderate....Swine continued dull and heavy, with more sellers than buyers.

The range of prices according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday was as follows:

Poor to premium Beeves, per pound	$ 7	@	$ 9¼
Common to ex. Milch Cows, per head	25 00	@	60 00
Veal Calves, per pound	5	@	6
Sheep and Lambs, per head	2 50	@	10 00
" " per pound	4	@	8
Live Swine, per pound	4	@	4¼
Dressed " "	5	@	6
Roasting Pigs, each	1 00	@	2 00

WHOLESALE PRICES OBTAINED BY PRODUCERS AT WASHINGTON MARKET.

Strawberries, per 100 baskets	$1 50	@	$3 50
Strawberries, per basket	2	@	4
Gooseberries, per bushel	1 37	@	1 62
Cherries, per pound	4	@	12
Currants, per pound	3	@	5
Beans, per bushel	1 00	@	1 75
Potatoes, old, per barrel	1 25	@	2 75
" new, per barrel	3 75	@	5 00
Onions, new, per barrel	3 50	@	4 50
Turnips, new, per 100 bunches	1 00	@	2 00
Beets, new, per 100 bunches	5 00	@	6 00
New Carrots, per 100 bunches	3 00	@	5 00
Cabbage, new, per 100	3 00	@	5 00
Squashes, per barrel	2 50	@	3 50
Watermelons, per 100	25 00	@	30 00
Asparagus, per dozen bunches	1 00	@	1 75
Cauliflowers, per dozen	75	@	1 75
Radishes, per 100 bunches	37	@	50
Green Peas, per bushel	37	@	50
Tomatoes, per box	3 00	@	3 50
Cucumbers, per barrel	5 00	@	7 50
Cucumbers, per 100	2 50	@	3 00
Eggs, per dozen	9	@	13
Chickens, per pair	62½	@	1 25
Fowls, per pound	11	@	14
Fowls, per pair	75	@	1 25
Ducks, per pair	62	@	1 25
Spring Geese, each	1 00	@	1 50
Turkeys, per pound	12	@	16
Pigeons, per dozen	62	@	2 25

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FAMILY SEWING MACHINE DEPOT.
FIFTEEN and FIFTY dollars
SEWING MACHINES.
The FIFTEEN DOLLAR Sewing Machine is the best cheap machine ever offered to the Public. Fifteen minutes only required to learn to operate upon it. The Fifty Dollar Machine is warranted to excel all other family sewing machines. We challenge the world to produce its equal! C. W. THOMAS & CO., 480 Broadway, N. Y.
☞ Agents wanted.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.
For all manufacturing purposes SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES are deemed indispensable. The public insist upon having their clothing, &c., made by them. SINGER'S FAMILY SEWING MACHINE is the latest presented for competition, and being arranged with full knowledge of the defects of other machines for similar uses, has avoided or remedied them all. It is the handsomest Sewing Machine ever made, and the easiest to learn to operate. Using one of these machines is an elegant amusement. Price $100, with iron table complete.
I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway, New York.

A LADY'S DIARY OF THE SIEGE OF LUCKNOW.
In the best sense, and in every sense, this is a woman's account of the siege of Lucknow.—London Examiner.
It is strictly and simply a diary, and the shadow of death is on almost every page. The lady who writes, enters, morning and evening, in her journal, the incidents of the last few hours, and in her broken narrative, blotted with tears, the tragedy stands forth more terrible, the heroism more majestic, than any epigrams that tell of victory.—London Athenæum.
Published by H. LYON & CO.,
No. 548 Broadway, New York.

DYSPEPSIA AND FITS.
DR. O. PHELPS BROWN,
THE GREAT CURER OF CONSUMPTION, was for several years so badly afflicted by Dyspepsia, that for a part of the time he was confined to his bed. He was eventually cured by a prescription furnished him by a young clairvoyant girl. This prescription, given him by a mere child, while in a state of trance, has cured every body who has taken it, never having failed once. It is equally as sure in cases of FITS as of DYSPEPSIA. The ingredients may be found in any drug store. I will send this valuable prescription to any person on the receipt of one stamp to pay postage.
Address DR. O. PHELPS BROWN,
No. 21 Grand Street, Jersey City, N. J.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.—No remedial agent was ever introduced that has proved so uniformly successful as this for purifying the blood, and for the cure of scrofula. It will speedily remove the worst symptoms of this distressing complaint, and in a brief period complete a radical cure.
Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, No. 100 Fulton Street, cor. William, New York.

"KNOWLEDGE IS POWER."—To know that when a pleurisy, or any sudden great pain or sickness assails us, no physician can benefit us half so much as a dose of four, six, or eight of Brandreth's vegetable universal pills, because they at once commence the equalization of the circulation, and soon the natural outlets are opened, the disease passes off, the blood is purified, and health is restored. One or two day's use of these pills will save months of sickness and long doctor's bills. A knowledge of them is indeed power, and wealth and health. Principal office 294 Canal Street, BRANDRETH Building; sold also at 296 Bowery and 281 Hudson Street; 175 Fulton Street, Brooklyn; 124 South Sixth Street, Williamsburg. Price 25 cents; sugar coated 13 cents per box.

Sent by Mail, postage paid, on receipt of price.

G. P. R. JAMES'S NOVELS.
Mr. James is the only conspicuous representative of the school of fiction so signally illustrated by Sir Walter Scott. His prolific genius has given birth to a whole library of novels, on which the verdict of public opinion has set its seal of approval. In splendor of diction, ease and copiousness of description, and felicity of character-drawing, James has few rivals, and, with these merits, his popularity with the million will sustain the test of time. The historical character of many of his novels makes them agreeable sources of information. They refresh the memory of past scenes, and give a glowing illustration to the incidents of a by-gone age.

LEONORA D'ORCO. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
THE OLD DOMINION. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
A LIFE OF VICISSITUDES. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
AGNES SOREL. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
PEQUINILLO. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
AIMS AND OBSTACLES. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
THE FATE. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
THE COMMISSIONER. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
HENRY SMEATON. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
THE OLD OAK CHEST. 8vo, Paper, 37½ cents.
THE WOODMAN. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
THE FORGERY. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
THIRTY YEARS SINCE. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
A WHIM AND ITS CONSEQUENCES. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
GOWRIE; or, the King's Plot. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
SIR THEODORE BROUGHTON. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
THE LAST OF THE FAIRIES 8vo, Paper, 12½ cents.
THE CONVICT. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
MARGARET GRAHAM. 8vo, Paper, 12½ cents.
RUSSELL. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
THE CASTLE OF EHRENSTEIN. 8vo, Paper, 25 cts.
BEAUCHAMP. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
HEIDELBERG. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
THE STEP-MOTHER. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
THE SMUGGLER. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
AGINCOURT. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
ARRAH NEIL. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
ROSE D'ALBRET. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
ARABELLA STUART. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
THE FALSE HEIR. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
FOREST DAYS. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.
DARNLEY. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Half Calf, $1 60.
THE CLUB BOOK. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Half Calf, $1 60.
DE L'ORME. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cts.; Half Calf, $1 60.
THE DESULTORY MAN. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cts.; Half Calf, $1 60.
THE GENTLEMAN OF THE OLD SCHOOL. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Half Calf, $1 60.
THE GIPSY. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cts.; Half Calf, $1 60.
HENRY OF GUISE. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Half Calf, $1 60.
HENRY MASTERTON. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cts.; Half Calf, $1 60.
THE JACQUERIE. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents: Half Calf, $1 60.
JOHN MARSTON HALL. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cts.; Half Calf, $1 60.
MORLEY ERNSTEIN. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cts.; Half Calf, $1 60.
ONE IN A THOUSAND. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cts.; Half Calf, $1 60.
PHILIP AUGUSTUS. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Half Calf, $1 60.
ATTILA. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Half Calf, $1 60.
CORSE DE LEON. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Half Calf, $1 60.
THE ANCIENT REGIME. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cts.; Half Calf, $1 60.
THE MAN AT ARMS. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Half Calf, $1 60.
CHARLES TYRRELL. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Half Calf, $1 60.
THE ROBBER. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cts.; Half Calf, $1 60.
RICHELIEU. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cts.: Half Calf, $1 60.
THE HUGUENOT. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Half Calf, $1 60.
THE KING'S HIGHWAY. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cts.; Half Calf, $1 60.
THE STRING OF PEARLS. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cts.; Half Calf, $1 60.
MARY OF BURGUNDY. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cts.; Half Calf, $1 60.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

THE ETERNAL PERFUME,
FROM THE HOLY CITY.
"Oh! could I but catch that fragrance,
I would ask no other fame,
Than that those sweet-scented flowers
Should be coupled with my name!"
Beware of Imitations.
Frangipanni, the Perfume, Frangipanni, the Sachet,
Frangipanni Soap, Frangipanni Oil.
Sole Agent for the United States,
EUGENE DUPUY,
Importer,
609 Broadway.
Sold every where.

JUST RECEIVED,
PER "PERSIA," JUST RECEIVED,
PIESSE & LUBIN,
HUNGARY WATER.
The specific virtues of Eau de la Reine de Congrie has rendered it justly celebrated in all parts of the world. It was originally distilled, A.D. 1550, by Paracelsus Piesse, the Alchymist and Physician of Transylvania. For two centuries its reputation has steadily advanced, till, at the present time, it has fairly eclipsed all other odorant waters, and that simply from the fact that Hungary Water contains a small portion of Rosemarinus, of which its fragrant competitors are destitute. Now, as it is certain that Rosemary has the power to increase the Memory and invigorate the Brain, as noted by the Bard of Avon,
"There's Rosemary, that's for Remembrance,"
we can not be surprised to learn that Orators, Clergymen, Lecturers, Authors, Poets, give it the preference.
EUGENE DUPUY, Agent, 609 Broadway.

GODFREY'S EXTRACT OF ELDER FLOWERS.
The sweetest and really the most perfect
BEAUTIFIER IN NATURE.
This admirable preparation of Elder Flowers is very fragrant as a perfume. Elder Flowers have, from the earliest ages, been esteemed as a mild and harmless, yet most perfect beautifier of the Skin. Tan, Sun-burns, Freckles, Redness, &c., it will speedily and completely remove.
CHILDREN.—It is singularly beneficial and perfectly innocuous even to the youngest infant.
SHAVING.—It is valuable beyond any thing, annihilating every pimple and all roughness, rendering the skin soft and firm, preparing it so completely for the razor.
FAMILY LOTION.—Godfrey's Extract of Elder Flowers will be found beyond all praise, and needs only a trial to be approved.
EUGENE DUPUY, Family Chemist,
609 Broadway, N. Y.

"QUERU'S" COD LIVER OIL JELLY.
Approved by the New York Academy of Medicine, June 3d, 1857, containing 85 per cent. pure Oil.
A delicious preparation, having all the soothing and healing properties of the Oil, without any disagreeable taste.
PENFOLD, CLAY & CO., Wholesale Agents,
No. 4 Fletcher Street, New York.
(From Pereira's Materia Medica, Vol. 2, Part 2, page 2243.)
"The experience of the profession at large appears now quite to have established the fact, that Cod Liver Oil is one of the most efficacious of all remedies in arresting the progress of Pulmonary Phthisis; that it enables patients to struggle on longer against the inroads of disease, and thus enables them sometimes to obtain cicatrization and contraction of cavities, which otherwise must have produced speedy death."

NAHANT.

Its Merits as a Fashionable Summer Resort.

Among the places of fashionable Summer Resort there is none more worthy of the attention of parties projecting summer tours than Nahant, the primitive pasture ground of the Pilgrim cows, but now an Eden of hot weather comfort and luxury.

It is about ten miles from Boston, as the bird flies, on a promontory that defends one side of its harbor from the winter North-easters, and would be an island if it were not for the narrow beach (just wide enough for a fine road way), five miles long, which connects it with Linn.

It comprises five or six hundred acres, long ago, as intimated, a colonial pasture, but now the site of thirty or forty villas and cottages, all dreary and bleak enough in winter, but in the heated time a Paradise of coolness and sea-breezes. Twenty years ago Nahant was one of the places that we read of. Then its great stone hotel was in its glory, and the tide of Summer travel ebbed and flowed in that direction before Newport was heard of. But the hotel declined, and, of course, Belledom deserted it. Old Ocean surged, and stormed, and sighed among the rocky caves, but only a transient visitor came down to admire, to regret, and to leave before sunset. Progress, however, came along, and its enterprise has converted the stone fortress of the last generation into the nucleus or centre of a great establishment, from which you may toss a biscuit into the Atlantic on three sides.

"THE NAHANT HOUSE,"

This popular establishment, containing accommodations for nearly 1000 guests, is conducted upon a liberal scale in all respects, combining the luxury of sumptuous entertainment with the genuine comforts of a quiet home.

NAHANT is conceded to be the most delightful and on the New England Coast, being constantly fanned by a pure ocean breeze, and families desiring a cool retreat during the hot season, will here find every desirable attraction for a pleasant summer home.

HEALTHY SEA SIDE RESORT

N. B.—Gentlemen having business in Boston can take a morning boat to the City, and return to enjoy their evenings on the cool beach without fear of Mosquitoes or blue devils.

Ample facilities provided for sailing, fishing, bathing and every other desirable recreation and amusement.

Orders by mail or telegraph will receive prompt attention.

J. E. P. STEVENS, Proprietor.

☞ A New York Correspondent, referring to "Nahant," says: "There is no spot along our coast, between the Cape Sables of Nova Scotia and Florida, that will compare with 'Nahant' as a summer retreat. 'Nahant,' as our fashionables all know, is a delightful promontory in Massachusetts Bay, within a short sail of Boston, and is consequently fanned by a pure sea breeze. Here, within a biscuit toss of the foaming Ocean, is located the celebrated 'Nahant House,' a spacious and elegant hotel, which, under the popular management of that princely CATERER, Mr. J. E. P. Stevens, has received the endorsement of the ELITE of the land. In brief, the 'Nahant' is THE summer hotel, PAR EXCELLENCE, of the western continent, and therefore pleasure as well as comfort seekers should not fail to make a mem. of it in their summer note-books."

COLUMBIAN HOTEL,

SARATOGA SPRINGS, N. Y.

The above Hotel is now in order for the reception of guests. The undersigned being very grateful for past favors, respectfully solicit a continuance of the same the present season. The establishment will be conducted on the same principle that it has been for the last 17 years, and our friends and patrons may be assured that every thing will be done on our part to make the COLUMBIAN every way a pleasant and desirable place of sojourn for the transient or more permanent guest.

An Omnibus and trusty Porters will be in attendance at the Depot on arrival of cars daily (Sundays excepted) to convey visitors and their baggage to the house, free of charge.

SARATOGA SPRINGS, N. Y., June 18th, 1858. BALCH & HALL, Proprietors.

COLUMBIAN HOTEL, SARATOGA SPRINGS.—This splendid establishment is worthy the special support of all who may wish to avoid the drinking and kindred fashionable follies of other houses. It is central, near the depot and the springs, and furnishes board on the lowest terms. It is kept by two Christian gentlemen, Messrs. Balch and Hall, who will spare no pains to merit the support of visitors to the Springs.—Christian Advocate and Journ.

TO ADVERTISERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A MAGNIFICENTLY ILLUSTRATED PAPER,
CIRCULATING IN EVERY SECTION OF THE UNION,
Offers unusual inducements to those who desire to bring their business prominently before the community.

1. Only a limited space is devoted to Advertisements.
2. The character and diffusion of the circulation are unequaled.
3. The Paper is generally preserved for Binding.
4. The Advertising Pages are rendered attractive, and can not escape the attention of the reader.
5. None but the most respectable class of Advertisements are admitted.
6. The charges are not as large, proportionally, as those of any other Weekly or Daily Paper.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for Three Months or more.

TERMS.—Fifty Cents a Line.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

KISS-ME-QUICK,
THE FAVORITE PERFUME,
Distilled from Fragrant
—TULIPS—
Kiss-me-quick, the Perfume,
Kiss-me-quick, the Sachet,
Kiss-me-quick Soap.
EUGENE DUPUY, Chemist and Family Druggist,
609 Broadway.

CURTIS'S HISTORY OF THE CONSTITUTION. History of the Origin, Formation, and Adoption of the Constitution of the United States. By GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS. Complete in two large and handsome Octavo Volumes, Muslin, $4 00; Law Sheep, $5 50; Half Calf, $6 00.

This new Constitutional History of the American Revolution may most justly be regarded not only as one of the principal works in transatlantic literature, but as a rich and important addition to the science of government every where.—MOHL, Staatswissenschaften, I., 540.
It will take its place in all general libraries as one of the standard works of political history.—Boston Adv.
We hope that Mr. Curtis's work, now that it is completed, will be generally read, by young and old, by men and women, and not merely by students of political and constitutional history. It is an interesting as well as a valuable work; the style is uniformly clear and accurate. —Boston Courier.
The great value of this work will be appreciated by the most intelligent and thoughtful minds.—N. Y. Observer.
It will become classical in the political literature of the country.—Worcester Palladium.
Mr. Curtis presents the whole story in a calm, dispassionate, and lucid manner. While the work is thus thorough, and will command the attention of statesmen and all students of American history, its patriotic spirit and animated style will deservedly render it popular.—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.
A work of the highest value, and merits to become the hand-book and guide of every intelligent and patriotic American citizen.—Buffalo Courier.
This great and desirable undertaking.—N. O. Delta.
Every American should ponder this lucid and frank, as well as authentic history.—Boston Transcript.
There never has been made a nobler contribution to our national literature. * * The country owes the author a debt of gratitude for his work.—Baltimore Observer.
Mr. Curtis deserves the thanks of his countrymen for placing before them so complete a history.—Providence Journal.
Comprehensive and exact, moderate and fair.—N. Y. Examiner.
Worthy of the subject, and an honor to the nation.—Cincinnati Journal and Messenger.
Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

MR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL, "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous Illustrations by the Author, was commenced in the DECEMBER Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. It is printed from early sheets—received from the Author in advance of publication in England—for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.

BULWER'S BRILLIANT ROMANCE, entitled "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?" pronounced to be the masterpiece of this polished, witty, and learned novelist, by special arrangement with the Author, appears in HARPER'S WEEKLY simultaneously with its publication in England.

TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

One Copy for One Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 50
One Copy for Two Years	4 00
Five Copies for One Year	9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

Volume I. of "HARPER'S WEEKLY," handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $3 50, is now ready.

Muslin Covers are furnished to those who wish their Numbers bound, at Fifty Cents each. TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT. DISCOUNT allowed to Bookbinders and the Trade.

"HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY," when taken together, are supplied at FOUR DOLLARS a year.

Numbers from the commencement of both the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY can still be supplied. Specimen copies furnished gratuitously. Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest Club rates.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" must be paid at the Office where they are received. When prepaid quarterly in advance, the Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty-six Cents a year on the WEEKLY.

Persons residing in the British Provinces will remit, in addition to their Subscription, Thirty-six Cents on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty-six Cents on the WEEKLY, for the American postage.

 Persons living in the City of New York wishing "Harper's Weekly" left at their houses, will please send their names and residences, with the subscription money, to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

WESTERN SKETCHES.

MR. PERKINS, of New York, having secured a splendid tract of land cheap from a Western Contractor, in lieu of last year's account, instructs Surveyor to lay it out correctly in small farms and building lots; Surveyor does so, but finds great difficulty in diving for Stones to anchor stakes. Extract from Report of Surveyor to Mr. P——: "Land well timbered—very rich soil—well watered. No danger of drouth affecting it, &c., &c."

DISGUSTED TRAVELER. "If this mud keeps on, I shall have either to leave my boots, or take the whole State of Indiana along with me."

BOATMAN. "Yes m'm. This here is your boat. You needn't be afraid; we can carry seven easy."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

BROADWAY MANTILLA STORE,
479 BROADWAY.
The balance of our stock of handsome
SILK MANTILLAS,
SILK AND LACE MANTILLAS,
FRENCH LACE MANTILLAS,
CLOTH RAGLANS,
&c., &c.,
is now REDUCED to PRICE full
25 PER CENT
An inspection respectfully solicited.
SEE THE REVOLVING FIGURES IN THE WINDOWS.
GEORGE BRODIE,
PROPRIETOR.

HEALTH! GRACE!! and BEAUTY!!!
Conferred upon the Ladies by wearing
DOUGLAS & SHERWOOD'S
CELEBRATED SKIRTS,
THE UNPARALLED SUCCESS OF THE
NEW EXPANSION SKIRT
(120,000 of which have been sold during the last 4 months) has induced the manufacturers to make arrangements that will enable them to produce 500 dozen (5400 Skirts) per day during the months of June, July, and August.
They also call attention to their
NEW LINEN SUPERIOR SKIRT,
FOR TRAVELING,
which is receiving universal commendation from the ladies.
They are the sole proprietors of the only
"PATENT ADJUSTABLE BUSTLE"
in use. Beware of the many imitations offered in the market, as they are all either infringements or worthless.
They also manufacture over
70 OTHER DIFFERENT STYLES
with and without the "Patent Adjustable Bustle."
These SKIRTS have been recommended by the HIGHEST MEDICAL AUTHORITY as being the best article for Ladies' use that has ever been offered to the public. None genuine unless stamped
"DOUGLAS & SHERWOOD"
"MANUFACTURERS, NEW YORK."
For sale throughout the United States and Canadas.

PATENT ARTIFICIAL ANGLESEY LEG AND HAND.
These great improvements in Artificial Limbs are supplied only by WILLIAM SELPHO, 516 Broadway, New York. Send for a Circular.

WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES,
343 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Received the highest Premiums awarded, 1857, by the American Institute, N. Y.; Maryland Institute, Baltimore; and at the Maine, Connecticut, Illinois, and Michigan State Fairs.
Send for a Circular, containing Editorial and Scientific opinions, Testimonials from persons of the highest social positions, &c.

OCEAN HOUSE, PORTSMOUTH, VIRGINIA—A new, airy, first-class house, affording sea-shore luxuries of every kind, constructed by the crowd and heat of fashionable watering-places. Regular and Excursion Steamers ply almost hourly to Old Point and the Capes of Virginia. There trips, with sea-bathing, constitute a great source of health and amusement to invalids and pleasure seekers. Dinners, suites, or single rooms can now be obtained. Address
R. J. WHITE, Proprietor.
Circulars to be had at 104 Murray Street, New York City.

"THE PEOPLE'S"
SEWING MACHINES.
BURNHAM'S PATENT.
MANUFACTURED AND SOLD EXCLUSIVELY BY GEORGE W. GILBERT,
665 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK.
Agents wanted.

DR. MUNDE'S WATER-CURE AT FLORENCE, MASS. (Three miles from the Northampton Depot). Price for Patients $12 per week.

MISS MULOCH'S NOVELS.
These Novels, of which a reprint is now presented to the public, form one of the most admirable series of popular fiction that has recently been issued from the London press. They are marked by their delightful combination of romantic interest and purity of sentiment, the dramatic interest of their plots, their beauty and force of expression, and their elevated moral tone. No current Novels can be more highly recommended for the family library, while their brilliance and vivacity will make them welcome to every reader of cultivated taste.
NOTHING NEW. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
JOHN HALIFAX, Gentleman. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
OLIVE. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
AVILLION, and other Tales. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
THE OGILVIES. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
THE HEAD OF THE FAMILY. 8vo, Paper, 371 cents.
AGATHA'S HUSBAND. 8vo, Paper, 371 cents.
A HERO, and other Tales. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

EUROPEAN ACQUAINTANCE; Being Sketches of People in Switzerland and Italy. By J. W. De Forest. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.
Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.
 HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the MONEY.

THE "OLD DOMINION" COFFEE POT.
Thousands of this new Coffee Pot have already been sold, and the demand from all parts of the United States is rapidly on the increase. Wherever introduced, it has given the most complete satisfaction.
THE OLD DOMINION COFFEE POT
Makes better coffee than it is possible to obtain in any other way, because, by an ingenious but simple contrivance most, the housekeeper may boil her coffee for any length of time without loss of aroma, thus securing all the elements of the coffee in their natural and proportional combinations.
THE OLD DOMINION COFFEE POT
Is manufactured under the patent for the United States by
ARTHUR, BURNHAM & GILROY,
117 & 119 South Second Street, Philadelphia.
☞ Also, manufacturers for the United States of ARTHUR'S CELEBRATED PATENT AIR-TIGHT SEALING CANS AND JARS.
For sale by Dealers in Housekeeping Articles, and Storekeepers generally.

ATWATER'S $15 AND $25 SEWING MACHINE was awarded first three premiums over all the New York State Fair in competition with 20 (or's and Wheeler & Wilson's high priced machines, and was awarded THE FIRST PREMIUM over them both. Send for CIRCULARS describing this most wonderful invention of the 19th Century.
Address H. L. DURFMAN & CO.,
665 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. II.—No. 80.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 10, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

CONTENTS.

I. JAMES GORDON BENNETT, ESQ., WITH A PORTRAIT.
II. EDITORIALS.
III. THE LOUNGER.
IV. TRAVEL. NOTES IN HOLY LAND, WITH TWO ILLUSTRATIONS.
V. PRAIRIE FANCIES, WITH THREE ILLUSTRATIONS.
VI. LITERARY.
VII. DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.
VIII. FOREIGN NEWS.
IX. ON THE ROAD AND BY THE BEACH, WITH TWO SPLENDID ILLUSTRATIONS.
X. WHAT HAPPENED THE OTHER DAY IN OUR VILLAGE.
XI. MR. JARDLEY'S COLLEGE FOR YOUNG BEAUS.
XII. COMMON SENSE.
XIII. PAUL DEATON'S CHARM.
XIV. HOW GOOD CHEER AND RE-WARMED IN FRANCE, WITH A BEAUTIFUL ILLUSTRATION.
XV. MISCELLANY.
XVI. THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.
XVII. MARKET AND FINANCIAL REPORTS.
XVIII. COMICALITIES.

JAMES GORDON BENNETT, ESQ.

THE portrait laid before the readers of this journal this week is that of James Gordon Bennett, editor and proprietor of the New York Herald. He is probably generally considered the foremost editor in the United States, and occupies a prominent place in the list of distinguished men whose portraits it is the business of this paper to give.

Mr. Bennett is a Scotchman by birth, but his biographers do not agree as to the place where he first saw the light nor the time at which he was born. It has been understood that he is preparing a volume of personal memoirs, which will, doubtless, contain full information on these points; till it appears, the public must be satisfied with general report. That authority asserts that he was born near the town of Keith, in Banffshire, Scotland, about the year 1800; that his father was a farmer of the better class, a devout Catholic, whose wish it was to educate his two sons, James and Conno, for the priesthood; that the latter did, accordingly, study for the Church, and discharged ecclesiastical duties till his death; that the former, after receiving a handsome education at the local schools, and subsequently at a clerical institution at Aberdeen, felt himself unsuited to a priestly calling, and sought independence in another continent. It is believed that it was in the year 1819 that Mr. Bennett sailed from Scotland for Halifax, Nova Scotia.

His means were very limited, and he was glad to accept a position as usher in a Nova Scotian school, to supply his immediate wants, on landing in America. It does not appear that he liked the business, however, for, within a few months, he is heard of as reading proof in the largest publishing house in Boston, Massachusetts. It is said that he was remarked, during his stay in Boston, for his studious habits and his love of reading. Wearying, however, of the monotonous life of a proof-reader, he soon left Boston, and found his way to New York, where he became connected with the press. Some time after his arrival here Mr. Willington, of the Charleston Courier, came to New York in search of an assistant. He made the acquaintance of Mr. Bennett, and perfected an arrangement with him. For the following year or two Charleston was Mr. Bennett's home. It occupied at that time a higher position relatively to the other cities of the United States than it fills now. It then fairly contended for supremacy with New York, Philadelphia, and Boston. Its papers were influential and enterprising. Mr. Bennett served a useful apprenticeship on the Courier, and obtained a practical knowledge of the duties of journalism. The debt is already being repaid; and the time may come when the Charleston Courier will boast, as not the least among its glories, that Mr. Bennett was at one time connected with it.

On his return to New York, it appears that Mr. Bennett opened a commercial school in this city. How it prospered the public have now no means of ascertaining; it is certain, however, that its proprietor soon relinquished the ungrateful duties of a teacher for the more congenial sphere of journalism. Very shortly after his return from Charleston he was known as a writer for the National Advocate, and subsequently for the New York Courier. Of this latter journal he subsequently became proprietor; on its failure, he resumed his connection with the National Advocate, and won considerable professional reputation by his accurate reports of the famous trials for fraud which followed the commercial crisis of 1825–'6. It seems that the idea of full and fair reports of legal proceedings was so foreign to the customs of that day, that much objection was made to Mr. Bennett's labors on behalf of the public; he persevered, however, and hence the future historian will not lack materials to describe the memorable events of that day.

Within a short period he transferred his services from the National Advocate to the Enquirer, an influential paper of the time. He was, during the session of Congress, its Washington correspondent, and seems indeed to have borne the best and burden of its editorials. In the year 1829 he suggested to Mr. James Watson Webb, editor and part-proprietor of a paper called the Courier, that a union of the two journals would be mutually advantageous; the suggestion was adopted, and the New York Courier and Enquirer accordingly appeared. For three years he was a prominent and active editor and correspondent of that journal; spending his winters at Washington, and contributing largely to the editorial department of the paper during the summer. In the course of the year 1832 a difference of opinion between Mr. Webb and Mr. Bennett led to the retirement of the latter from the Courier and Enquirer. Mr. Bennett was a staunch supporter of Jackson and Van Buren; Mr. Webb thought fit to oppose them, and his associate conscientiously withdrew from the paper.

The idea of a paper of his own naturally occurred to him. It is instructive to note that his first project was a journal which he "offered to conduct under control of the party." A wholesome experience that! He started his journal, the Globe, accordingly, in 1833, and saw it die soon after, apparently without regret. His trial of "the control of the party" had taught him a useful lesson. When afterwards he went to Philadelphia, and became part-proprietor of the Pennsylvanian, "the party" found him rather indocile; the "control," seemingly, was not as perfect as "the party" desired. The newspaper tool actually ventured occasionally to think for itself, an unparalleled instance of monstrous audacity, demanding instant rebuke and exemplary punishment. The independent editor was assailed by the Washington Globe, and resolutely rebuffed by his political associates when he sought such assistance as was invariably granted to party editors of that day.

The pressure developed independent journalism. In May, 1835, in company with two printers, Mr. Bennett published the first number of a new daily journal—The New York Herald—which was not "under control of the party." It was destined to be a newspaper in the true sense of the term, and its peculiar merits instantly won for it a measure of public support. A series of accidents—the conflagration of the printing-office, and the death of his partners—for a time interrupted the progress of the undertaking; but, after a brief delay, the Herald reappeared, the sole property of its editor, Mr. Bennett. It is believed that he had no more than five hundred dollars in money when he undertook to publish a daily paper in New York.

Twenty-three years have elapsed since then. During this period the Herald has fought its way to the head of newspaper literature in the United States. No American journal at the present time can compare with it in point of circulation, advertising, or influence. Its most bitter assailants concede to it unrivaled sagacity, and enterprise in the collection of news. Its friends regard it as a universal guide. It has, naturally, been much abused. Abuse is the necessary price of success in any business; and it must be admitted that Mr. Bennett has not given himself much pains to conciliate his rivals. His plan has ever been rather to court than to avoid controversy; his lance is always in rest, and his powder invariably dry. But whatever rival journals may have said in their wrath, no one can seriously deny the merit of the Herald without impugning the judgment or the morals of the community of which for twenty years has given it a generous and undivided support.

To enter into an examination of the views at various times advanced in the Herald would be beyond the limits of this sketch. But it is due to Mr. Bennett to mention two great reforms which he introduced into the business of journalism, and which have proved the secret of the great success of the metropolitan press. He was the first newspaper proprietor in the United States who had the courage to refuse to adver-

JAMES GORDON BENNETT, ESQ.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

ties or surply his paper on credit. No one who is unacquainted with the business can realize the mischief which the credit system did to the press of olden time. Newspapers were uniformly crippled by the dishonesty of their patrons. No man thought it wrong to credit a newspaper. As an instance of the fatal consequences of the credit system we may mention that, at this moment, the outstanding debts on the books of the National Intelligencer, for papers supplied and advertisements published on credit, amount to nearly half a million of dollars. Mr. Bennett broke up this ruinous system by his refusal to sell paper or to advertise save for cash; and all his competitors hastened to follow the example he had had the boldness to set. In the second place, he set the example of a newspaper independent of politicians. How he acquired his distrust of "the control of party," he already been mentioned; but it is not generally known now—it is so long since—that at the time the Herald was started, the support of every influential politician was considered essential to the success of a newspaper. It was deemed impossible for a journal to hope to thrive without at least a Governor, a Senator, or a handful of Congressmen to favor it. Mr. Bennett threw himself upon public mind on this head. He had learned that political patronage, like protective duties, is really more injurious than beneficial to the paper patronized; and he had sickened of the base subservience which prompts ambitious men in every sphere of life to task to the press, and to turn round abuse and repudiate the obligation. Mr. Bennett was the first editor who taught the press of this country the duty of self-dependence; who set the fashion of looking to the public alone for patronage, and of treating all individuals, whether politicians, financiers, or social leaders, as subordinates and not as masters. For this great reform he deserves to be remembered as long as the United States can boast of an independent press.

When the Herald was first started, Mr. Bennett may be said to have written it all himself, and to have managed the business department besides. His scanty resources did not permit him the luxury of a single refusal of assistance. He therefore drawn upon his increased his force, until, at the present time, the staff of editors, reporters, and correspondents engaged on the Herald is considerably larger than any other paper can boast of, save the direction of the paper remains in the editor's hands. His spirit induces every article and every paragraph. Whatever is meant and is not just hence would justify him in the enjoyment of leisure and relaxation, it is understood that when he is in the country he is as attentive to his editorial duties as if he were working for a livelihood. Every morning, it is said, he has placed in his study at seven, and he is often there at a late hour in the afternoon. He reads all the papers or carefully to see what is new in the world, and his assistants need the closest attention not to be surprised by him. Nothing escapes his quick and keen observation. He will evidently die in the harness.

The New York Times lately said of him that, when he was dead, people would honor his memory as a great editor and a great statesman. The reason does credit to the sagacity of the Times. If, in summing up Mr. Bennett's character, he has disregarded all think of his claim to be out any particular characteristics as predominant, he will probably allude to his courage and his fertility in resources. No man ever possessed a higher degree of moral courage than James Gordon Bennett. He has proved a hundred times in his career that, as he said himself, he was not afraid of man, devil, or newspaper. Nor is his fertility his rare. He is said by those who have known him to be overflow with topics of conversation, subjects for articles, new and original ideas, and originality—the tact with which he seizes the striking point in debate, and the resources with which he defends himself when assailed—is frequently been the subject of comment.

Mr. Bennett married, some eighteen years since, an amiable and accomplished lady—Miss Crean, of New York, a native of Ireland. He has several children, the eldest of whom—a son—is named after his father—is the owner of the yacht Rebecca, which led the New York yachts in the great race the other day.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 10, 1858.

THE HOT WEATHER AND THE HOLIDAYS.

LORD ROSSE would have won repute as a prophet if he had not denied the prediction which was lately ascribed to him; for we have already had weather hotter than we ever experienced since 1853, and we have not got fairly into the dog-days. From the forecasts we have enjoyed, it is fair to conclude that we are going to have a very severe summer. The mercury has ranged from 96° to 104° throughout the North and West—from New York to Illinois, Lawrence; from Springfield, Massachusetts, to St. Louis; and from Washington to Milwaukie, Wisconsin. And, contrary to the usual rule, the "heated term" lasted over four days.

It has driven people headlong from the city. For heat, which, on certain brains, produces that form of insanity which is treated with ice to the head and strait-waistcoats in cells, creates, among the fashionable masses, a milder form of lunacy, developing itself in erratic locomotion. No general method of treatment had yet been devised by the faculty for this peculiar disease. The doctors, seeing it practically harmless, have concluded to let it alone. It is a curious malady, however, and worth studying. In chief diagnostic, as we said, is the tendency to flight from the city—a feature not unlike the drapetomania which physicians have remarked among the Southern negroes. Every person of common sense can perceive that our city dwellings-houses are far cooler and more comfortable than the wretched barns called hotels at fashionable watering-places; yet the persons who are attacked by this disease, while pretending to complain of the heat, rush headlong out of their cool and roomy houses in the city to hot, cramped cells in these hotel-purgatories. Another mark of the disease is the tendency to aggravate its cause by unwholesome practices. Young women who are attacked will be seen in dress in the most uncomfortable fashion, with tight-fitting exercising waists, and to dance madly with the thermometer at 90°. Young men have been remarked to risk quantities of heating liquors, to play heating games, and gradually to aggravate the heat of their rooms as much as possible. The student of physiology and material nature will ignite instruction and amusement from perusal of this singular and hitherto undescribed malady.

Some of the papers tell us that the watering-places will do a great business this year. The prediction is not likely to be fulfilled. There are aged persons among us who assert positively that there was a revulsion in 1815 and that much money was lost by many. This is not the belief of "Young America." That personage has no recollection of any radical prudence having occurred during the period of his social career. He does certainly remember that last fall folks did not seem to have much cash to collect; but he has since recovered his spirits, and should "Young America" now run the risk of depositing his all again in private investments? By no means. He is too dutiful a child for that. So he will go to Saratoga and Newport as usual; will talk his horses down to their fastest there; will drive Flora on the beach or to the lake; will play his bluff for the old stakes, take his old luck, and, if he wins or loses, pay, and also in the old way, send the bill to the old man to be footed. For "Young America's" spirit is not to be subdued by commercial revulsions. To mere financial revulsions he rises superior; and though in the expense of the entertainment of many a honeyed belle at Saratoga or Newport this year would largely help their father to surmount the difficulties in which all shared last fall, he is not to be stinted. So, if you go to Newport or Saratoga, you will find him at the old spot, as numerous, as boisterous, as extravagant as ever. Banks may break; merchants may fail; the peace and prosperity of the country may be disturbed by commercial panics; but Young America will evidently die in the harness.

The New York Times lately said of him that, when he was dead, people would honor his memory as a great editor and a great statesman. The reason does credit to the sagacity of the Times. If, in summing up Mr. Bennett's character, he has disregarded all think of his claim to be out any particular characteristics as predominant, he will probably allude to his courage and his fertility in resources. No man ever possessed a higher degree of moral courage than James Gordon Bennett. He has proved a hundred times in his career that, as he said himself, he was not afraid of man, devil, or newspaper. Nor is his fertility his rare. He is said by those who have known him to be overflow with topics of conversation, subjects for articles, new and original ideas, and originality—the tact with which he seizes the striking point in debate, and the resources with which he defends himself when assailed—is frequently been the subject of comment.

Mr. Bennett married, some eighteen years since, an amiable and accomplished lady—Miss Crean, of New York, a native of Ireland. He has several children, the eldest of whom—a son—is named after his father—is the owner of the yacht Rebecca, which led the New York yachts in the great race the other day.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 10, 1858.

THE HOT WEATHER AND THE HOLIDAYS.

LORD ROSSE would have won repute as a prophet if he had not denied the prediction which was lately ascribed to him; for we have already had weather hotter than we ever experienced since 1853, and we have not got fairly into the dog-days. From the forecasts we have enjoyed, it is fair to conclude that we are going to have a very severe summer. The mercury has ranged from 96° to 104° throughout the North and West—from New York to Illinois, Lawrence; from Springfield, Massachusetts, to St. Louis; and from Washington to Milwaukie, Wisconsin. And, contrary to the usual rule, the "heated term" lasted over four days.

It has driven people headlong from the city. For heat, which, on certain brains, produces that form of insanity which is treated with ice to the head and strait-waistcoats in cells, creates, among the fashionable masses, a milder form of lunacy, developing itself in erratic locomotion. No general method of treatment had yet been devised by the faculty for this peculiar disease. The doctors, seeing it practically harmless, have concluded to let it alone. It is a curious malady, however, and worth studying. In chief diagnostic, as we said, is the tendency

COTTON AND FORK RESPECTABILITY.

The following letter will explain itself:

"To the Editor of Harper's Weekly.

"Conversing yesterday with a mercantile acquaintance on the unmerited treatment of our economic benefactor and friend, Charles Dickens, he observed that 'it was all his own fault;' that 'he should have known how to go wrong.' On my inquiring what 'clean of goods' implied, he said, 'Why, don't you know? It is a point of gesture, and that sort of thing. They,' he added, 'even went to pay respects.'

"The disgraceful scene which occurred at the last election in Maryland between the natives and the Irish will be Do with IT and Lady Bulwer Lytton induces me to inquire whether, in your opinion, this phrase is correct, and whether, in your opinion, 'this class of people' always do go wrong?

YOURS,

"BEEWAX."

If "Beewax" and his mercantile friend were exceptions to the general rule of shopping merchants, we should have hesitated about granting them the space which the above letter occupies. For the reason to which Beewax refers, that they are fair types of a class which represents much of the wealth, intelligence, and influence of the people of this country. Since it is presumed, the rule rather than the exception among merchants. And that merchants, in the United States, are the ruling class, and that this rule society, morals, public opinion, and politics —must be evident to every one who reads the papers or meets with his fellows.

It is therefore worth while to assure "Beewax" that, despite the illustrious examples which he quotes, there is nothing in literature nor art which casually predisposes a man to "go wrong." The great part of both are generally even considered rather elevating than degrading. Nor can that time-honored opinion be controverted, that, in general, it is impossible to suppose that the cultivation of the intellect, or the development and discipline of the moral sentiments, can be detrimental to the heart or morals. On the contrary, whatever tends to enlarge the mind naturally improves it, and enables it the better to perform its moral obligations. The more thoroughly a man develops the high intelligence which he received from his Creator the better he fulfils that Creator's design, and the more useful he becomes to society. Authors are, and always have been, the world's teachers. There have been failliers teachers among them; but to deny that say, or the majority, have been useful in their day and generation, is to assert that the world had been better without them, and that civilization is a mistake, and barbarism the supreme good. And to pretend that a man whose life is impure or "wrong" can teach wisely is manifestly fallacious. Out of the fullness of the heart the mouth speaketh: bad men will write bad books; the books which teach mankind are the fruit of sound, right minds.

We do not pretend to deny the elevating tendencies of a trade in cotton or pork. Assuredly a little, lovelaborn reader! with the blessed elect who deal in these and similar commodities. But we do maintain that they are wholly engrossed by the contingencies which may give or take away from their means a few dollars and cents. Their conversation is a topic of entrance from a keiper or day-book. Their stories turn on the successful manner in which A cheated B, and mannered at the counter. Their talk is not even the abroitness with which C collected a debt from D, who was a cheat of an inferior caliber. As to their reading, it will tell you that it per in twenty thousand for discount, was refused, and broke, whereupon the bank president met him and asked did he want any more accommodation that morning? Ha! ha! ha! Or they will relate the standard joke of the floor merchant who lost fifty thousand pounds on ten days' credit, and sent round next morning to offer the sellers fifty cents on the dollar as the best he was warranted. Ha! ha! ha! Whatever may be said of the merchants, they have a refined and neat sense of humor. They are a liberal, knowledge class of men, too. You won't find them cutting a man for a mere Penitentiary offense. On the contrary, you shall meet Colton Dean, Esq., and Molasses Hogshead, Esq., and Sugar Hoss, Esq., and our friend Beeswax, and all the other leading merchants of New York, in the business of men who don't pay their debts, who cheat poor mechanics, who don't tell the truth, who refuse to have been long ago, and will perhaps be some day, in the State Prison.

Evidently, a life spent in the practice of virtue like these is well calculated to develop the domestic instincts. A man who habitually thinks of nothing but dollars, talks about dollars, jokes about dollars, whose main object in life is successful fraud, and whose sense of humor is dull to every thing but ingenious swindling: who will not allow his son to enter the profession of a competitor in trade, and who will tell a falsehood to do so; who systematically cats the bread and butter of the poor, and is the most notorious swindlers of the day; such a man is necessarily superintoned by his calling and habits to be a faithful husband, and a judicious father. No doubt of it whatever.

Perhaps it had been better for Dickens and Bulwer to have left pork or cotton, instead of writing the Caxtons and Copperfield. Perhaps it is not too late for them yet to redeem the error of their youth. We know but a few shipments of lard or purchases of beef might soften their hearts, and make them kind to the world and the husband of the Pork and Run families! It tends, as Beeswax and his friend intimate, is not only salutation, should we not all fall to cheating each other at once?

But for us, who feel that these noble hearts have misdirected their wing-nuts, and that the exalting influence of literature could not shield them from the failings of humanity, we shall reason over their deficiencies as regards which we all share, and shall pray that God, who has mercy for great and small alike, will grant to them the consolations of repentance. He does not always deny even to the meanest of the merchants.

THE WAR OF THE RAILROADS.

A CONVENTION of railroad officers was held on Wednesday, 30th June, at Buffalo, for the purpose, as the call stated, of taking in consideration the reason to the cause of the West, that they are fair types of a class which represents much of the wealth, intelligence, and influence of the people of this country. Since it is presumed, the rule rather than the exception among merchants. And that merchants, in the United States, are the ruling class, and that this rule society, morals, public opinion, and politics —must be evident to every one who reads the papers or meets with his fellows.

It is therefore worth while to assure "Beeswax" that, despite the illustrious examples which he quotes, there is nothing in literature nor art which casually predisposes a man to "go wrong." The great part of both are generally even considered rather elevating than degrading. Nor can that time-honored opinion be controverted, that, in general, it is impossible to suppose that the cultivation of the intellect, or the development and discipline of the moral sentiments, can be detrimental to the heart or morals. On the contrary, whatever tends to enlarge the mind naturally improves it, and enables it the better to perform its moral obligations. The more thoroughly a man develops the high intelligence which he received from his Creator the better he fulfils that Creator's design, and the more useful he becomes to society. Authors are, and always have been, the world's teachers. There have been failliers teachers among them; but to deny that say, or the majority, have been useful in their day and generation, is to assert that the world had been better without them, and that civilization is a mistake, and barbarism the supreme gain was made, which was likewise broken by the Central directly afterward. Then followed fresh complaints by the Erie, fresh bargains, and fresh breaches of faith by the Central. At last, after nine compromises had been made, and nine times the Central had broken faith, the Erie Directors refused to entertain any new project of adjustment, and summoned Buffalo by reducing the fare below the paying point.

The Central replied to this attack by calling the convention at Buffalo. There, in congress itself with notifying the convention that it can no more interfere with the Erie Railroad than with the State policies of South Carolina. The Erie will manage its own affairs as it deems fit.

Thus stands the fight at present. It may be viewed from two general points of view. Shareholders will come to one conclusion; the public, as travelers, will have their opinion; and the public, as a people interested in the development of the country by means of railroads, will have theirs. With the stockholders view of the case we have nothing to do. They have a private body; they have the power of administering their property as they think fit; and it is no more the business of a public writer or an inference to protect them against what may seem to be suicidal policy on the part of their delegated Agents, than it would be for Mr. Smith or Mr. Jones against the habits of his book-keeper.

But the public have a right to expect the power of merchandise traveling by railway, are benefited by cheap rates of fare and freight is obvious. It is not necessary to use argument to prove that the country at large is a direct gainer by the cheapening of any so universal commodity as the transport. If the Erie Canal and his associates were to carry passengers to Europe for ten dollars a head, it would undoubtedly be a public gain, however great the expense on the carriers. Just so the war of the Erie and Central, which enables us to go to Buffalo before dollar and cents, and which has proved freight at an equally reduced rate, promotes travel, cheapens produce to the sea-board and merchandise in the interior. It is therefore, for the time being, an undoubted benefit.

The question assumes a different aspect when it is viewed from the general point of national progress as ridded by railways. That our 25,000 miles of railroad have been, under Divine Providence, the means of a great part of the advancement which the United States have made in the last six or eight years, must be apparent to all. Commerce, industry, and civilization have been the first commodities that have traveled over the rail to the wilds of the West; they have taken up their companies. States which have railways in abundance are rich, populous, prosperous, and enlightened. States which have few railways are poor, thinly peopled, laggard, and uninproving. The rule is invariable. By the same rule, in principle, then, let us see what effect the pending cut-throat contest will have on this great agent of progress—the railroad.

According to the published official statement of the Erie Railroad, it was losing before the war began at the rate of two per cent. At the reduced rate of fare, the loss will of course be greater. At the present time the Company has been on the eve of bankruptcy. The Central is not in so desperate a condition. It has never missed its dividends; though sometimes it has been more than once close to market for a loan at the time it was going to pay a dividend. Now, any mercantile man can tell what would be the result of a policy pursued by these two roads, which tends to reduce, very seriously, the receipts of both. Such a policy would be the case of the Erie in the course of time, lead to absolute bankruptcy. There must come a day when it will be impossible to borrow the interest for the bond coupons, and the mortgage creditors will sell out the road. Nor can this day be far distant, if the road is worked in the direction we have outlined. It is possible that the Central may withstand the shock better; but even it must feel very seriously a loss of revenue.

What would be the consequence of the cessation of hostilities on the Central and the bankruptcy of the Erie? Simply this; that no more railroads would be built for ten years to come. Capital would very naturally argue that, if railroads could not support themselves in the great and populous State of New York, they could not be able so to in the thinly peopled States of the West and South; and no prudent man would invest his money in them.

This, then, is the practical view of the present railroad war. If it continues, people may travel cheaply for a time; but no more new land will be opened to the world's commerce. If it be brought to a close, the evil day—when railroad enterprise will be quenched—may be postponed for some time to come.

THE LOUNGER.

SECOND AND LAST.

[The Lounger yields again this week to the arguments and letter of his correspondent. It is so pleasant to have a reminder do your work for you, especially in the torrid days!]

CRICKMAN, June, 1858.

MY DEAR LOUNGER,—Think what I have done since I wrote you last, and in a boat such as I have never before experienced. It is a melancholy truth that there is no season for travel. The summer is too hot, and the winter is too cold; there is no spring, and the autumn is red and yellow with decay; so that the mind insensibly falls into sadness, which is not the traveler's proper mood.

The day after I wrote you from the Clifton House, at Niagara, I took the cars of the Great Western Railway, and rattled across the edge of Canada to Detroit. The day was beautiful, but very warm, and the dust was dreadful. Canada, seen in that little part and in that rapid way, has a lonely aspect, relieved by occasional noble groves and uplands rolling away. But beyond Hamilton it becomes a dead level, and is, in fact, a wet prairie as you approach the shore of Lake St. Clair. The Great Western road has the broad gauge rail, and is finely built; but I found the railroad dinner to be the same in Canada that it is every where else. A swarm of filthy, grimy people pour into a room, pell-mell, and choke and guzzle for five minutes over muddy coffee, greasy beef-steaks, and lead pies; then stream back into the car, and rattle on. And the worst of it is, that if you unhappily fall hungry you have no other resource. If you can't possibly eat grease, dirt, and lumps of sweetened dough, you may starve for your squeamishness as much as you please. I recommend to every traveler a few pounds of crackers or hard biscuit, some dates, and a flask of what he prefers, in his traveling-bag. He can then dine at his leisure, and decently.

It was hot in little Detroit with the broad streets. Those streets, of an admirable metropolitan width, seem secretly to anticipate a great city; as if little Detroit sang to itself for comfort, as it keeps its outpost guard upon the lakes, "I bide my time; I was nothing forty-six years ago, when poor old General Hull surrendered me. Look at me now!—especially look at my Central Michigan Dépôt—and say if I am not a promising little Detroit?" There is an air of reality and sincerity in this town which is unusual and agreeable in Western cities. I went to the Biddle House, which used to be the best. But our hotels never last more than three years. The moment I entered I knew it was not the best, or else there was no best in Detroit. It had the undeniable second-hand air—an indescribable slackness and shabbiness—and I learned too late that the Russell House is now the true place, and one of the best any where to be found.

A man traveling rapidly in the summer heat and dust is nervously sensible of discomforts. A good English inn, at which you alight after a day's hard travel, and where, in quiet, a clean maid brings you a clean chop upon a clean table-cloth, and where you presently retire to a clean bed, is even more delightful than the gorgeous American palace in which, by every train and steamer, fifty of our cherished fellow-citizens arrive, and wipe their free-and-enlightened boots upon satin damask sofas, and consult the condition of their independent teeth in huge mirrors framed in gilded elephantiasis. It was always the sneer of the European gentleman that dirt and democracy were inseparable. It ought to be the duty of the American gentleman to show that they are not so.

I can not say I helped the matter by going to Chicago. The Michigan Central road, like the Great Western, is a noble work. On both, I am glad to say, the rate of speed is less by a quarter than it was last year. But the latter is the more interesting route. Swamp and scrub-oak lands are the chief scenery of the Michigan Central, until, at Michigan city, you come suddenly out upon the very end of Lake Michigan—the shore tossed up into a few light yellow sand-hills, such as you may often see upon the desert. From this, striking away from the lake, and over much wet prairie, you come to Chicago; and, had you been with me, you would never have seen a more perfect summer night—the full moon hanging in a windless heaven over the misty silver-gray wilderness of calm water.

I had really forgotten the West—forgotten how the magic of progress is unchanged, and that last year is no rule for this. Consequently I went to the Tremont, where I found great courtesy and kindness; but there is the Richmond House, which is much nearer, and therefore undeniably much better. It is no matter, of course, whether strangers like Chicago or not, because the Chicagoers do. In fact, I do not remember ever to have heard one of them speak ill of their city—and why should they? Rents are, or have been, as high as in New York—a state of things which I was assured in Detroit is factitious and unhealthy. But I was assured the same thing about Chicago five years ago in St. Louis. So I must suppose it is true, for I am sure these Western brethren dwell together in amity.

Chicago is an astonishing illustration of the rapid growth of a town under every favoring circumstance. It is the great commercial centre of the Northwest. It has, I believe, fifteen or twenty railroads diverging from it. It gathers the commerce of the lakes with one hand—of the Mississippi and the prairies with the other. Many men have realized great fortunes from skillful investments in Chicago real estate. It is thoroughly alive, active, and successful. It is a kind of proverb of commercial good luck, as old Athens was of art and education.

But for all that, I hope to be pardoned if I think I have seen pleasanter places. I do not particularly fancy a town improvised upon the meeting edges of a prairie of land and a prairie of water, with wooden houses, and wooden sidewalks, and wooden pavements; crammed and crowded with a bustling throng of eager people, every one trying to get the better of his neighbor. Chicago is a great wooden and brick shop. Its whole interest is traffic. Its great problem is how to get twenty per cent. for your money. Its heroes are men who make fortunes most rapidly, and they are as generous and lavish as they are opulent. Their hearts are as large as their pockets. Certainly meanness is not a vice of Chicago. Why, at this very moment, they are lifting up the town bodily, six or seven feet, so as to make some kind of drainage possible. You go down steps from the streets to the front doors of the houses. Even the Tremont House is to be raised.

But we do not live by dividends only. If the final end of man, or even his chief enjoyment, were the getting twenty per cent., Chicago would be a kind of Paradise—to those who got it. But a great city is not a stock-exchange, nor a shop; and although many a man in Chicago would freely grant it, he would also undoubtedly insist that money was the means by which cities became great. But even if, indirectly, this were so, how could the young citizen of Chicago ever learn, while he staid at home, that money is not an end but a means? And if he could not, what influence is to make the impromptu city any thing but a mart, a fair, and an exchange?

Through the wooden streets and the dismal outer part of the town I was driven the next morning to an open place on which stood the cars of the Alton and St. Louis Railroad. In a neighboring shanty tickets were sold, and at nine o'clock we rolled out upon the prairie, following a canal. The rate of our speed was harmonious with the boundless reaches of spacious and splendid prairie. All day long we raced among them with the rejoicing exultation of wild horses. The airy, luxuriant perspectives gathered themselves at intervals into richly-tufted uplands, with foliage rounded and massive, and benignantly sweeping the ground with the tender grace of the most consummate park cultivation, then unrolled and expanded themselves to the remotest horizon, the eye gliding after, entirely satisfied and delighted. In the foreground tangled masses of blue and yellow flowers, and acres of profusely blossoming prairie roses, fringed the statelier and more marshaled wheat, that took the wind in long yellow yielding waves, apparently laving the celestial shores with gold. The day was very hot, but the wind blew sweet and fresh as if from over a sea, and still we shrieked with wild delight, and still ran forward over the prairie.

The prairies are the great justification of the modern English style of landscape gardening, as contrasted with the old French and artificial schools. They give it the authority and example of Nature. All the crudity of Western civilization is instantly lost in their calm elegance; and no lawn of the richest duke in the most Arcadian county of England could ever hope to rival the thoughtful variety and care of many parts of this untouched landscape. Indeed as we darted on, confined to the car, the whole scene glimmered like a series of lovely pictures on the June air—the garden abodes and sweet summer pavilions of a superior race, secluded since the creation behind the rough climate and stern forests of the shore, and now withdrawn with mystic dignity, while we, little invading manikins, shrieked and rattled through their august domains.

The sun shone unclouded, except by the tufted, fleecy vapors that always decorate the June sky, and as he sank the moon rose over the prairies as tranquil as they. Suddenly we stopped. It was half past ten, and we should have reached Alton in less than an hour. A fellow-passenger, with a benign face, who had been sitting all day with his collar turned down and his shirt-sleeves rolled up, as if this day were a little too much for Job, and he was now quite willing to fight it out, stepped from the car, and presently re-entered with an air of profound but forced resignation. His neighbor, a young mother with a young baby, inquired what was the occasion of the delay.

"Oh! nothing at all, mum! only we shall stay here till morning, mum," replied Job; and then, after an interval of inward agony, as if conscious he had not answered the young woman's question, he said, more tenderly, "We have jest busted a floo, mum!"

Then we sat as passengers under such circumstances always do sit—in a kind of imbecile indifference. A few turned over to sleep. Some put up their windows. Some put them down. Some stepped out of the car. The children, awakened by the silence, began to cry. At length a very tall young man, who had not moved during the journey, rose and went out, slamming the door. In a few minutes he returned, banging the door again; and as he seated himself, as if for a century, he said in a loud voice, but to nobody in particular, "Stuck!"

A red lantern was put in the rear of the train to protect us from collision, and the passengers who were not sleepy walked about in the pleasant air. At the station there was a telegraph office, but the operator could not be found. When he was found he could not find the operator in Alton. So the conductor sent some men to walk four miles to a hand-car, and then run themselves down to Alton and send up a locomotive. After lying for four hours we were taken by the fresh engine and brought to that dreary little Illinois town, Alton, which has but one fact in its history—the martyrdom of Lovejoy.

Bright lay the moonlight upon the broad Mississippi, and a weary company stepped upon the steamer, which immediately took the stream with those mysterious subterranean puffs of the high-pressure Western boats.

Three miles below Alton the Missouri joins the Mississippi. My imagination sailed up the dim, broad stream, issuing out of night, to classic Kansas; but before it arrived there I fell asleep, with my head upon a table; nor did I awake until, in the early gray of dawn, we were near St. Louis.

The water was high upon the levee, and many of the stores must have suffered. But the river was already rapidly falling, leaving the mud behind, which is less agreeable to the nostrils in its pure state upon the levee than it is to the palate as a constituent part of the drinking water. That water is a very pleasant, but not very sightly beverage. It is sweet and smooth—too smooth, perhaps—being, like General Foley's letter, dreadfully "mucillated."

It was sunrise by the time we reached the Planters' Hotel, and we had time only to bathe, shave, shirt, shampoo, and breakfast, before we were off again for Cincinnati. It was still fearfully warm—the thermometer already at 90° by eight o'clock in the morning. We crossed the river in a ferry-boat, and then walked through the remains of Illinois Town, mostly submerged in the flood; and stepping into yawls, we were rowed among the ruins of the western terminus of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad. Broken cars and trucks and wheels were all about us, half covered by the water; the embankment of the railroad being indicated by stakes. We reached the train standing upon the end of the track that had not been swept away, and in a few moments we dashed, whistling and roaring, across Southern Illinois.

Here we came again upon the lawny, park-like prairies. They seemed even lovelier and more elegant than in the northern part of the State. But still, as we rang and flashed along, I wondered where the inhabitants were, and the boundless, beautiful solitudes suggested more than ever the race withdrawn. At intervals of about ten miles we stopped at little clusters of eight or ten houses of the poorest kind, which had names in the guide-book, and which seemed to have been badly put up in a hurry against the arrival of the train. At one of these shanties there was something called dinner, which we happily left behind at a furious speed, and tore on to other shanties and another something called tea. The wheat was finer here than I had seen it any where since leaving New York, and there was even some promising-looking corn. The soft surface of the tender grain stole away, unfenced, over myriad acres, sinking, with delicate lights and shadows, into the obscurity of distance. It seemed the granary of the world before us, and with one sweep of the eye over this opulent land, Sicily and the Campagna were out-measured.

This part of the Ohio and Mississippi road is the worst railroad I remember ever to have traveled in any country. We jerked and bounced along at an appalling speed. Every man held to his seat; and when the locomotive whistled to "break up," and we paused for a moment at some houses, by a curious infelicity called "town," all the passengers looked at each other relieved. Another moment and all were braced up again. Sudden, sharp cries from the engine, warning off cattle from the track, were heard amidst the deafening clatter of the train. The connecting bolts of the cars creaked and jarred, and in the midst of one of the most ungovernable spasms of speed, a dull clink and snap apprised us that something had happened. Every man was up in a moment; and, looking behind, we saw that the rear car had broken away by the parting of the iron bolt between us, and was coming on behind, alone, and with only the control of the brakeman. We pulled at the bell-cord, and the locomotive stopped. The car came on and was caught to the rest of the train, and with a wild whoop we rushed along at a madder speed than before.

At length we reached the Wabash bottom, of whose overflow you had a picture in the Weekly of a fortnight since. The water had subsided a little, and we moved on more carefully over impromptu tressel-work among the ruins of fences, twisted rails, trunks of trees, and the sandy wash smeared over the grass. Not far from the Wabash itself the whole track was gone, and we left the cars and took to boats again; and so across the drowned prairie until, on the edge of a woodland, a fresh train awaited us. Then away once more, and, crossing the Wabash by a fine bridge, we stopped, at sunset, in Indiana, at the little quaint old town of Vincennes, which invited us, by one fat meeting-house with a pudgy steeple, to pause and pass the Sunday. How often, as a school-boy, I had read of the French settlement here in 1735! And as I looked at it now with more interest and curiosity than upon any Western town, I wondered if those old Frenchmen sprung, haply, of courtly ancestors, and, bringing educated Europe into the wild woods, had not maintained relations with that lofty and unknown society of the prairies. We did not stay; but, unlike many a fairer place of fame, which to see is to lose forever, Vincennes, although my eyes have seen it, still stands unimpaired in my imagination, and will forever stand, lovely in the June twilight, upon the Wabash, with its one pudgy spire nestling friendly among its modest roofs.

All night we rode on through the black, primeval woods of Southern Indiana.

"Lagum beer!" cried a voice at midnight, as we stopped.

"What is Lagum beer?" shouted a dozen laughing voices, in reply.

But, undaunted, the boy, with a ragged shirt and one suspender, quite enough to sustain his dilapidated trowsers, passed out of a watering-pot into tin tumblers his Lagum beer, and we all donned that mysterious night-cap in the primeval woods of Indiana. He passed into the next car—we heard his rallying cry—but, simultaneously, the whistle, and could only shout, "Good-night, Lagum beer!" and departed into darkness.

The full moon watched us from behind the black trees, but could not light our way. Sometimes, in a little clearing upon a hill-side, I could see a log-cabin. Sometimes we thundered over a bridge, with a stream gleaming below. Toward morning we stopped at a junction; and the inevitable group of German emigrants, with boxes, small trunks, bundles, crying babies, and loud-talking, beer-and-stale-bread-and-tobacco-smelling men and women, whom you always encounter near Cincinnati, however you approach it, bustled in, and destroyed all the pleasing silence and comfort of the car. I intend no disrespect to my German fellow-citizens, whom I greatly esteem. I am recording a fact in the natural history of Western American travel, in remarking that the most unpleasant passenger, and one of the most frequently met, is the German or Norwegian emigrant, who seems to be a traveling epitome of the celebrated city of Cologne, with its thirty thousand different smells, each worse than the other.

Dawn brought us to the Ohio, sunrise to Cincinnati, and an omnibus to the Spencer House, which stands upon the levee, so that, as I write to you, my eyes wander over the fifty-two tops of the smoke-stacks of twenty-six packet-steamers lying side by side with their noses against the levee—steamers which resemble two-storied scows with an extreme ornamentation of scallop work about the eaves—to the homes and haunts of the hunters of Kentucky. The hills are beautiful all around the city, but the heat is fabulous. Not in Nubia nor Venice, in August, have I known such suffocating, sultry days. The city lies against the heights upon the northern shore of the river, and the sun glares at it with the insane fury of Torquemada gloating over a juicy infidel. A little of the juice of this infidel,—call it Catawba—still remains to console the wayfarer, while he gradually turns to coal.

I am going on to Zanesville and Wheeling, and so homeward by the Baltimore and Ohio road, over which the artists had recently so jovial a trip. I shall have had a most rapid, but altogether a most satisfactory journey. I shall have seen Niagara, the Mississippi, and the prairies in flower, and am quite ready for a breath of sea-air.

But—my poor Lounger—you must now do your own work. However, I suppose you have been hidden somewhere, near the sea, tranquilly idling away the delicious hours, so that you will be willing to change places. Do you know I rather suspect you of agreeing with Emerson that "Traveling is a fool's Paradise?" and I, for my part, willingly confess that I have observed wise men stay very much at home. But I have also noticed that those who have traveled most, stay at home with the best grace. A rolling stone may gather no moss, but a stationary one gets choked with it. Farewell—my Lounger.

Yours, dear Chang, Eng.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

"My Dear Lounger,—How did you spend your Fourth of July? Were you patriotic, old fellow? Did you go into the celebration with your accustomed vim? Did you make a speech; and smoke plenty of cigars; and go into the Champagne (perhaps you prefer lager—you literary fellows have such horrid taste); and fire off crackers and rockets, flying Dutchmen, and other pyrotechnics?

"Perhaps you live in the country. Do you? If so, I pity you. A green fellow persuaded me last Fourth to go down into Jersey; to a 'quiet village,' you know, rural felicity, cool air, and all that. But, by George! when we got down there it was the most namby-pamby affair you ever saw. Just think of an old goose ringing the church-bell at half past four in the morning, waking a fellow up out of his sleep and spoiling his temper for the day. Then a few wretched fire-crackers popped off; and next the town was evacuated, the inhabitants thereof, baskets on their arms, going into the woods, where a young fellow read the Declaration of Independence (I believe from Harper's Weekly, which every body seemed to have), and a parcel of children sung songs; after which those horrid country fellows ate their bread and butter, and presently returned home. Of course I was tremendously bored. Every thing was so quiet—there wasn't actually a drink of brandy to be got on the ground, though I suspect some of the shrewd old codgers were duly armed and equipped with pocket-pistols. And as for a muss—any little excitement, you know, to make things lively—there was no chance. In fact, I was considerably set down by some old fogies for throwing half a paper of fire-crackers among a crowd of ladies and children; and some fellows actually swore they'd put me out if I attempted any noise. Of course I couldn't do any thing alone; but if I had had my gang to back me up, I'd have licked any one on the ground. You may bet on that, old fellow!

"What a jolly time I had this Fourth! You may believe I stuck to town! A parcel of us, all first-rate fellows, laid in a select assortment of pocket fire-works on the 2d, had a grand spree on Sunday night—at my place, you know, where I had a cat in a flour-barrel, all ready, and about twelve o'clock, when every body was asleep and puss was unsuspicious, we threw a lighted pack of best cannon-crackers into the barrel, slapped on the head, and awaited the turn of events. Didn't that old tom fly around the barrel, though?

"In the midst of the sport, who should open the door but my old woman! She began to whine about waking up the neighbors, and a sick lady over the way, and cruelty to dumb brutes, and that trash, you know; but I soon set her right on the goose, for what's the good of having Fourth of July, you know, if you're to do nothing for fear of disturbing sick folks or disfiguring a tom cat. Says I to her, 'They made such an everlasting clatter on the first Fourth, that Johnny Bull hasn't got well over it yet—and are we to sit down like milksops or country-jakes and say nothing? Nev—'

"Just here Tom Sacket let the cat out of the barrel, who flew at once at the nearest window, and the rest of my speech was lost in the sound of breaking glass.

"Well, on Monday we had the jolliest time you ever saw. To be sure the sick lady across the way sent over to ask if we would please not throw torpedoes out of my window against the side of her house (just over peoples' heads, you know, who were passing along, which frightened them confoundly), and so we had to stop that; for the sick lady's husband, who is in the country on business, is a mean man, whose head I'd like to punch, if he wasn't so confoundedly broad-shouldered. He was a farmer you know, and is really a disgusting brute, with no fun about him. In the afternoon, we made up for lost time by a jaunt down Broadway, scaring the ladies with torpedoes. And then in the evening we had a grand display of fire-works on our corner, and such a supper!—where wine, cigars, and singing did abound.

"Let me know what you think of our Fourth. It's a great institution, old fellow! and must be kept, you know. Just say a good word for us, when you have time; for some of our old fogy neighbors think us fellows a nuisance. Boys must be boys, you know; and if a man (or woman) can't make a little sacrifice on such occasions, they are not worthy of the liberty they enjoy. These are my sentiments; and I'm sure they will be yours, friend Lounger.

"Yours,

"A New York Patriot."

—Of course, "Patriot;" no doubt, old boy. What right, indeed, have women to be sick, or children to have illnesses, on the glorious Fourth? They ought to be ashamed of themselves, and you vindicate your patriotism characteristically by depriving them of rest and sleep as the penalty of their mean conduct. But take a hint, old fellow! beware of that tom-cat! Women and children are safe to bully; tom-cats have claws. Verbum sap.

TRAVEL NOTES IN BIBLE LANDS.

No. XXXIV.

Sardis to Smyrna.—Preparations to Start.—We reach Magnesia.—Thence to Thyatira.—Backsheesh.—A Christian.—Wells at Thyatira.—Mohammed Bey again.—His House, his Dinner, and his Wine.—The Dancing Girls.

We returned from Sardis to Smyrna. Here we rested again a fortnight at the hotel of the two Abigustures before spoken of. I would like well to sketch for you some of the Smyrniote people, but my brief space in these letters forbids the attempt. You have heard of the potters who carry each immense basin. It is not uncommon to meet a man carrying a bale of wool, or rags, or something of the kind, which fills the entire street from wall to wall. His head and shoulders are buried in the bundle, and you see his two feet moving under the mass as if the bale had its own legs, and guided its own course along the streets. It is a study in Smyrna to see the old Turkish scribes, or letter-writers, at their work. To watch their customers, who are chiefly ladies; to see the flashing eye, the anxious expressions of their countenances as they intrust their secrets to the old fellow who, they know, will sell them the first moment he finds an opportunity. Still this is the way of the world here, and they confide in him as a business matter, only trusting he will never know who they are.

For you may well suppose it would be difficult to recognize an Eastern lady again after once meeting her, since they only show their eyes, and all their eyes are alike deep and splendidly beautiful.

It was with great hesitation that I conveited he route our friends now proposed to take. We had not yet visited Pergamus and Thyatira. They were both on the route, or on one route, to Constantinople, and if we would abandon the sea-voyage thither and make the journey by land we would reach the Dardanelles in ten or twelve days, visiting the Troad on the way. The temptation was great, but since the war the country has been overrun with lawless vagabonds.

But Miss Grandison's courage and partinacity prevailed, and I yielded. We replaced the tent we lost at Laodicea. By-the-way, we heard from Laodicea that the Agá was in a fury at our departure, and it was supposed he would slaughter the unlucky dog whom we left bound and gagged. He believed him an accessory to our flight.

Our equipage being made all right, we hired an extra guard of five men, so that we were nineteen in all, and thus attended we left Smyrna, as is customary, in the afternoon, and camped for the night outside the city.

We were two days from this camp to Akhissor, as it is now called, or Thyatira, as it once was.

Our camping-place for the first night was at Magnesia, a city of whose celebrity I shall not pause to remind you. I can not but regret (though, perhaps, you may not join me in it) that the space to which I have limited myself in these letters forbids that I should do more than sketch the merest outline of our route through Asia Minor. Were your space sufficient, I might try ten times as much as I do, nor exhaust the novelties which I met with. For it is very remarkable that Asia Minor is a country so little known to the Western world. I find no guide-books that are of any value. Murray's red book is worse than useless, since it misleads at every turn of the route, and lays down cities whole days out of their places. I say whole days, because they measure distances here altogether by time, and you may imagine the comfort of laying out a day's ride in a wild country, through inhospitable regions, and at evening finding yourselves in a mountain pass or on a bleak plain, unprotected and uncovered.

AN EASTERN LETTER-WRITER.

The scenery through which we have been for four weeks traveling is wild, and grand, and very beautiful. Grandeur and beauty mingled as I have heretofore seen in the Lebanon country. Switzerland contains no such views as I have found in the East, and when it shall be at length brought under the influence of civilization, I am satisfied that the world will make Asia Minor its grand resort for scenery, to say nothing of its old associations.

We approached Thyatira (Akhissor) at sunset. Our tents were waiting for us outside the town, for we had loitered on the way. Before the door of my tent stood Selim, with a fire of decidedly unpropitious aspect.

"What is the matter, Selim?"

"I am afraid you can not stay here, oh Howajji! The people are too rough, and they demand backsheesh for the land where the tents are standing."

"Who demands it? Bring them here."

Selim went, and returned in a few minutes with a tall, bony-looking native, who, in the presence of strangers, seemed very different from the person Selim had described him. He was, in fact, very humble and polite, and asked for his backsheesh as a matter of rent, and I paid it without hesitation. Then I chatted a little with him, and to my surprise found him a very respectable Christian; the first Oriental I have met among these ruins of the Churches of Asia who named the name of Christ with any other feelings than those of contempt, except in Philadelphia.

It was something, however, to find even one. And for the sake of it I talked with him, Demetri being interpreter, and, let me tell you, one of the pleasantest hours of my Eastern travel was that evening talking with a solitary representative of the Church at Thyatira.

We preferred our tents to the accommodations within the town. There is a consular agent here of several of the Western powers, but consuls' houses are not tempting places to a traveler who has had much experience in the East.

The city resembles Philadelphia more than any of the other churches. It is inhabited, which is more than can be said of Ephesus, or Laodicea, or Sardis. There is, too, a fine church—of modern time!—here, and there are priests and bishops and Christian worshipers. Ruins there are around the city, but none which can be identified as ancient, and for the rest Akhissor is like all the other Turkish towns in this part of the world.

The surrounding country is richer and more luxuriant, the air is fresher and more perfumed with the fragrance of cultivated fields. Every thing is more brilliant and more beautiful outside the inhabited town. The pavements of the streets have been gorgeous columns and capitals and architraves; close to our tents was a well, the curb of which was once the capitol of a Corinthian column, and I could see half a dozen within a hundred rods all having similar mouths.

Early in the morning we rode into the city. You will smile at my next sentence, if you remember my former letters. As we were quietly riding through the streets of the city, talking in the most lovial manner, I said "Good-morning!" greeted us, and looking up we were astonished and delighted to see my friend Mohammed Bey, whom you will recollect in Jerusalem, and again in Antioch.

The good-souled fellow was in grand spirits at meeting us. He had heard of the arrival of four strangers, and by intuition knew that we were come, and he had set out to find us.

He had found at the tents no one but the boy he gave to Miss Grandison, and whom she has kept constantly with her in all her wanderings; and now, on his overtaking us, Master Johnson (for such was the name John Steenburger had given him, and to which he answered) was close in his rear, grinning with all his teeth, and overflowing with delight at meeting his old master.

Mohammed was for office at home. It seems he has possessions in Akhissar, and comes here once a year to take care of them. So he invited us forthwith to his house, and to his house we went, and found there already our servants and baggage. In point of fact the magnificent Turk placed every thing he had at our disposal, and I knew him well enough to know that nothing would please him so well as to have us accept all that he could do for us.

We dined with him. Miss Grandison was taken charge of by the ladies, and disappeared in their apartments; while the servants brought into the room where we sat a dinner that would have satisfied the palate of a Parisian.

I don't know what particular motion of my eye it was that suddenly attracted the attention of Mohammed.

"Allah Kerim!" he exclaimed; "God is merciful—I had forgotten the drink!" and he clapped

MODERN THYATIRA.

A PRAIRIE HUNTER OF THE OLDEN TIME.

PRAIRIE HUNTER OF THE PRESENT TIME.

his hands thrice, to signify that he wanted his chief butler. The fat fellow made his appearance, and an order was given him in a low tone, which resulted shortly in the arrival of a novel exhibition for the house of a Turk. Nine bottles of wine—three of vumiskakilde Tquem, three of colmiot Champagne, and three of a wine that I would pause to eulogize were it of any use to do so. It was Turkish wine grown at Brousa, under the shadow of Mount Olympus. It was a hock, and no such wine grows on the Rhine banks, nor ever the vaults at Johannisberg. You may think me extravagant in this expression; but I assure you as a fact, that there is made at Brousa wine which is worth its weight in silver.

The appearance of this array was certainly startling.

"But, Effendi!" I exclaimed, on seeing it.

"Be silent and grateful, oh traveler!" said our host. "My house at Akhissar has many treasures like this. I never taste it myself—except only the Champagne—but it is yours—all yours."

So passed the afternoon, and—shall I confess it?—I never thought of the fact that I was in Thyatira till the moonlight stole in on us, and then Mohammed drove it away again by sending for the dancing girls; and the ladies came in, wrapped in long veils, and sat in a remote corner, and the graceful Circassian children danced to wild, sweet airs, which they themselves played and sang.

PRAIRIE FANCIES.

"ONE doesn't find the Book of Nature spread out here before him with the attractions it had in years gone by," said our hunter-poet, as his eye traversed the wide expanse of prairie around him. "The romance of the prairies is gone! Your genuine hunters and trappers—that old aristocracy of the plains and mountains—are almost all dead, or degraded to the rank of 'bull-driving' in the wagon trains. Even the wild Indians, who would once plunder your 'possible kit' and lift your hair handsomely, are degenerated by civilization and bad whisky into contemptible sneak-thieves, and streak it over the prairie, rigged out in white man's beggary. And as for Nature—where is it?

"It is true, one can stand here in this solitude, after the fashion of Campbell's 'last man,' and, gazing out into infinite space, where blue sky bounds the horizon, feel himself the atom that he is of this great universe. Here is the Temple of Immensity—a huge azure dome, resting on ethereal pillars, throughout whose boundless space Silence reigns supreme and by its overwhelming vastness compels solemnity and reflection. To him whose eye has never before rested upon this interminable waste, what an infinite conception it is! Distance becomes inappreciable when, peering through the lilac atmosphere to the utmost limit of sight, we know that from that remotest spot the eye may start afresh and continue its searchings with yet no more palpable results.

"But what does all this amount to, after all? To the practical mind, simply how long it will take civilization, at its present rate of progress, to overrun this vast area and convert it into pastures and corn-fields. Look at that wagon-ent now. There's one blot on Nature's page. Now mark that old Conestoga lumbering along. No poetry about that. I tell you, boy, the classic days of the old field are gone!"

The speaker paused abruptly, and rounded off his period by pounding the ground severely with the breech of his rifle.

"I think I appreciate your feelings," I said. "But then," I suggested, "the general features of the prairie remain as ever. The same game roams the award; the roving Indian traverses its length and breadth; and I think I can discern in yourself at least one representative of the old style of hunters."

"Well," he replied, thoughtfully, 'you won't, perhaps, find a better-preserved specimen of that class, though I did not commence my study of prairie metaphysics until I had completed a college education. But as to the rest, old, cast-iron-and-gutta-percha fraternity, such as were bred in the forest, with a 'Green River blade' and rifle for plaything, the day is not far distant when they will be known only in history, and the pages that records their adventures will be read by future generations, vested with all the wildness and apparent improbabilities of an Arabian tale. Strangely heroic annals are theirs; many their hair-breadth escapes, their rencontres with wild beasts, and hand-to-hand conflicts with blood-thirsty savages. Many are the crops each old trapper has counted; and the hair he has 'raised' would suffice to stock a Pawnlean's toupee shop. Alternately feasting and starving, freezing in winter, parched with thirst, drenched with rain, running the gauntlet of a thousand dangers, he regards all these as the natural vicissitudes of his roving life, and takes the bitter with the sweet with calm indifference. Habit and a strange philosophy have made him the man he is. In him the severest trials and cares

> "Wake no more emotion
> Than pebbles flung into the ocean,
> That leave scarce a ripple behind."

To his roving and adventurous spirit are we indebted for a knowledge of regions before untrodden and unexplored by any other civilized being. Penetrating the remotest wilderness, often alone, or accompanied only by his Indian wife, he lays himself down at night, with his feet to the camp-fire, and head pillowed on earth, and composes himself to sleep, while the winds whistle his lullaby, and no thought of danger disturbs his dreams. This is the life of your genuine hunter. Once embarked in his pursuit, it becomes a fascination from which he seldom escapes; and thus he lives on until at length he 'goes under,' worn out with hardships and privations and the burden of years, or, perchance, is 'rubbed out' by some skulking Redskin, who raises his hair while he sleeps.

PRAIRIE WOLVES AT WORK.

"I tell you there is concentrated romance for you. There is true, practical manhood, which one can not but admire. But your toast-fed, hearth-rug sportsman, with his fanciful outfit and new-fangled flummery, can't appreciate all this. To him such experiences would be but 'As base delights compared with better things.'

It requires a pioneer of mind as well as of the forest to understand the beauties of this mode of life. Your modern Nimrod would excite the supreme contempt of the genuine 'mountain-man.' He don't deem his outfit complete unless he carries with him all the luxuries of the parlor. Here, since the recent exodus to Mormondom has attracted the attention of adventurers toward these parts, we find them coming out in swarms, with their tents and traveling-carriages, fancy shooting jackets and India rubber blankets, armed to the teeth with rifles, six-shooters, and bowie-knives, with larders well stored with wines, preserved meats, and such like, and knapsacks loaded with such notions as the trapper would scorn to use! And—would you believe it?—I actually saw, not long ago, a fellow with gloves and linen shirt collar hunting buffalo with a pointer dog! There was a good sprinkling of the animals running at that time, and the chap got pretty well mixed up with the herd; but the last I saw of him, he was streaking it over the prairie with a big bull at his heels, and his horse scampering off in the direction of sundown! Such hunters should be content with small game, such as you find in the woods of Connecticut. Oh, shades of Aubrey, Williams, and Choteau defend us!"

Such is a sketch of prairie life as it was, and as it is now. To compose one's self comfortably to rest on a mattress laid on the bottom of a wagon is quite a different thing from camping out alone in the stillness of the night, with no companions but the prairie wolves and your horse munching grass at your side. Your modern hunter would hardly be satisfied to lie rolled in his blanket on bare ground, with coyotes nosing about his pillow, to say nothing of sand rattlesnakes for bedfellows, and mosquitoes for ministering angels. I don't mean to be personal; but when I recall old reminiscences, and read the brief cenotaphs of those whose history lies buried with them, and know that the golden age of prairie romance has well-nigh passed away, I can not but grieve at the ruthlessness of Time's mutations. I see it all in the rut-worn sod; in the close-cropped grass where the teamsters' horses have fed; in the steady advance of the Western frontier; in the march of emigration; in the taming of the wild savage, and in the annihilation of the hardy race of trappers and mountain men.

When the screech of the locomotive shall echo among the Rocky Mountains the era will have ended, and the charm of the wilderness have vanished.

LITERARY.

One of the very pleasant inventions of the day for the amusement of children, and grown people as well, is taught in Leaf and Flower Pictures, published by Randolph. The gathering of green, red, and yellow leaves, and the infinite variety of flower petals, and arranging them in wreaths, bouquets, and other forms, for varnishing and preservation, will be a capital variation to the ordinary summer employments of those who are so fortunate as to be "in the country." The book teaches how to do all this, and illustrates the result in fine colored plates.

In the occasional runs that we have taken out of town, we have been somewhat interested in observing the steamboat and railroad reading of travelers. No season, for many years, has furnished so few books of the lighter class. Novels there are almost none. Many travelers carry volumes of Ticknor & Fields's elegant Household Waverley, which, for convenient size, clear and beautiful type, and legibility, are admirable railway companions. The edition has reached "St. Ronan's Well," and continues in the same excellent taste and perfect workmanship, which make it, in our view, the most desirable edition extant.

Dick & Fitzgerald publish a new novel, under the title, A Poor Fellow, the object of which is to teach, in general, that we are all poor fellows, and need help from some stronger source than human nature. The scene of the story is in New York City, the characters are New York merchants and their families, some fast young men, and some excellent and charitable old gentlemen; the hero being a millionaire, who finds out at the end that he, too, is a poor fellow.

The design of the book is good; some scenes in it are admirably sketched; but there is a little too much of it. The author's appreciation of the life of a literary man in New York is one of the most noteworthy characteristics of the volume. If the book reach a second edition, we suggest to the author that Peekskill is not opposite to Newburgh, and Fishkill is—an error easily rectified.

Every family should possess a good Commentary on the Holy Scriptures, especially on the New Testament. Next to the Bible, such a work should have a place in every library and every house. Sheldon & Blakeman have now completed their issue of The Commentaries on the New Testament, by Dr. Hermann Olshausen, whose name is known in all the Churches.

This work is one of the greatest additions of modern times to our American literature. Professor Kendrick, of the Rochester University, has superintended the edition, revising it from the fourth in Germany, and adding notes of discriminating and valuable character; so that it is presented as a complete and finished work, of which the clergy and clerical students know the reputation and the value, and which all readers of the Word of God should possess for constant reference.

Dr. Olshausen is an author of remarkable clearness and thoroughness combined. No passage escapes with but superficial notice. Every word is weighed, sounded, examined, and its relation to the other parts of the sentence discussed. The views of all classes of theologians are regarded with respect, and their opinions treated with kindness; while the author has no hesitation in acknowledging the power of their reasoning, and admitting, oftentimes, his obligation to those from whom he differs for material assistance.

We have read with especial interest portions of the Commentaries on the Gospels. The force of the learned author's views, the lucid arrangement of his ideas, the new order of events which he deduces from a careful comparison of the different evangelists, the power of his exceeding simplicity—all unite to absorb, interest, and finally to convince, even in spite of old and settled opinions. Truth possesses a new force and beauty. The sublime story of the life of God on earth has a new and overpowering significance. We read as if we now read for the first time very much of the history.

Our space forbids a general notice of the work, and these remarks must suffice to give our readers its prominent characteristics. We can not pass it, however, without noticing this very remarkable fact—that it is received with the highest praise by all denominations of Christians. The High Churchman regards the profound veneration of the author for the Holy Sacraments with great approbation; while the most liberal of the Presbyterian, Congregational, Baptist, and Wesleyan clergy find nothing, even in the views which suit the Churchman, to clash with or startle their own notions. Hence it may be emphatically styled an evangelical commentary. Those truths on which all Protestant Evangelical Christians agree are enough for the learned author to find in the Book on which he undertakes to comment. No fear of man forbids his discussion of mooted points. Rather, it is the fear of God which compels him to write with reverence and with charity—that brotherly love which would find the way to heaven, and jostle no one along it, though it be narrow.

We recommend the work heartily as probably the best extant commentary on the New Testament. It is published in six volumes, octavo, the last volume containing Weisinger's Exposition of the Second Epistle to Timothy and the Epistle to Philemon.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

DEFEAT OF COLONEL STEPTOE'S COMMAND.

The disastrous news from the Pacific is confirmed by dispatches received at Washington. Governor M'Mullen says: "An express has arrived from the head-quarters of Colonel Steptoe, in the Simcoe Valley, with dispatches from Lieutenant-Colonel Casey, and letters to me, informing us of the defeat, on the 16th inst., at the First Crossing of Snake River, about thirty miles above its junction with the Columbia, of the command of Colonel Steptoe. The command consisted of five companies, or four hundred men. The Indians are reported as having been fifteen hundred strong, and composed of the Snake, Palouse, and other tribes.

"The action resulted in three officers and fifty men being killed. Two of the officers killed are Captain Wynders and Lieutenant Gasden. The Indians took two howitzers which belonged to the command, and all but sixty pack animals. In fact, so complete is said to have been the rout, that the officer in command was compelled to fall back with the utmost precipitation. The battle took place while the regulars were in the act of crossing the river."

Letters to Governor Stevens, also, say that Colonel Steptoe lost every thing but sixty mules.

AN EARTHQUAKE IN CONNECTICUT.

The New Haven Journal of the 1st instant says of the earthquake: "One of those events which happen only once in a century took the good people of this part of Connecticut by surprise on Tuesday night. According to the general opinion, we were favored with an earthquake. At about 10½ o'clock P.M., a rumbling sound—similar to the passage of a carriage over a bridge, but more sonorous and more protracted in its movement—attracted the attention of many of our citizens. Some of them felt their houses jar, and glasses rattle, and by a sort of intuition became aware that the movement proceeded from a crepitation of the earth. The movement was distinctly perceived to be traveling from southwest to northeast, and continued for something more than a minute. Not the least damage was done to any thing in the city, nor, so far as we have been able to learn, in any portion of the State. The shock was felt in Bridgeport, Milford, Woodbridge, West Haven, East Haven, and North Haven—all towns which lie in a southwest or northeast line from New Haven, and this fact may assist in determining the course of the crepitation. At the time of the shock the sky was clear and the air was perfectly still, though in that respect it did not materially differ from its general condition in the centre of the city through the evening. In Derby the earthquake was felt perhaps more sensibly than here. The houses and even the large stone factories in Ansonia were shaken, and the watchmen alarmed by the movement of the earth."

THE DUDLEY OBSERVATORY.

The dissension in this institution continues.

Mrs. Dudley having espoused the cause of Dr. Gould, and written a letter requesting the majority of the Trustees of the Observatory to resign, the Trustees reply, expressing their determination to adhere to their position, and declaring that in the honorable discharge of their duties under the charter, they must insist on the removal of Dr. Gould.

Meantime the Scientific Council have addressed letters to the Trustees, calling for the charges against Dr. Gould. To this the Trustees reply, refusing to recognize the right of the Council to usurp any such powers or authority.

A scientific council, consisting of Professors Henry, Bache, and Horace, held a session on 1st July, at which an address was adopted, proposing to the Trustees of the Observatory, first, to take unconditional and immediate charge and direction of the Observatory, subject only to the Board of Trustees, thus occupying themselves the place of Directors. If this be not agreed to, they then propose a committee of five citizens to settle the controversy with respect to Dr. Gould. The Trustees reject all propositions peremptorily, not recognizing any right on the part of the Council to interfere with the office of the Trustees, or in any way control their action. It seems probable that the whole Coast Survey will resign their place in the Council, as they can not substantiate any claim to interfere with the action of the Trustees, who derive their power from the act of incorporation.

THE BERLIN FREE-LOVERS.

The Detroit Free Press gives an account of a woman who was enticed into that moral pollution, the Berlin Free-Love Cure.

Some two weeks since, a married man, occupying a good position among the respectable and intelligent of Detroit, applied to a magistrate for assistance in finding his wife, a young and lovely woman, who had disappeared a day or two before. He soon learned that she was at the Berlin Free-Love Institution, in Erie County, and immediately left to rescue her, if possible. The Press says:

"He succeeded in finding her at the institution in question, and brought her home without any demur on her part; she stating, undoubtedly with truth, that she was disgusted with the scenes enacted in that abode of wickedness. Her tale, as it represents things there, is an extraordinary one. She says that she was induced to go there by a female relative, who is a believer in the doctrine, and who, after a long effort, succeeded in instilling into her mind the poison which proved her ruin. Together they absconded and went to Berlin Hill.

"When there, she found the marvelous 'love cure' but another name for all that is degrading and loathsome to a virtuous and high-minded woman. Low-bred familiarities with vulgar, fanatical men; companionship with women who deemed themselves elevated above humanity in becoming the victims of their own and their companions' lusts, and a close familiarity with a brutish, criminal enjoyment, which was the highest sphere aimed at in this delectable community—were what she was obliged to submit to. This was more than womanhood could endure, and in her secret trouble she applied to a relative, not daring to disclose her situation to her injured and much-loved husband. Through this relative the husband found her, and notwithstanding her moral and physical contamination, he took her again to his heart, a shame-stricken, but wiser, wife and mother."

A BOARDING-SCHOOL RUNAWAY.

The village of Carmel, Putnam County, New York, has been the scene of considerable excitement, on account of a clandestine marriage of an ex-teacher of the Raymond Institute with one of the young lady pupils of that Institution. A letter from the Principal tells the story:

"Barthold Myer, better known as 'Professor Myer,' but whose connection with the Raymond Institution was dissolved some three or four weeks since, found secret means of communicating, since his removal from the Institution, with a Miss Fannie Hewitt, a boarding pupil, and induced her to consent to marry him. Accordingly, late on Saturday night (19th), after the young ladies had all retired, and each was seen to be in her own bed, and the lights extinguished by the teacher, who passes around at ten o'clock at night for the purpose of inspecting the pupils' rooms, and after all were hushed in sleep, Miss Hewitt stole out of the Institution, and was married to Barthold Myer, between the hours of eleven and twelve o'clock at night, by Joseph Cole, Justice of the Peace, at the house of Albert Knapp, who, with his wife, were the only witnesses. Fannie appeared in her place on the next (Sabbath) morning, went to church with the other pupils, and repaired late on Sabbath night to the residence of Albert Knapp, where she and Myer were harbored till morning, when they took the stage for Croton Falls.

"Myer had remained in the neighborhood since his removal from the Institution, and had enjoyed no personal interview with Miss Hewitt, and no part of the affair was known, or even suspected by the Institution, until after the pair left this morning in the stage. It is now suspected that Myer communicated with Miss Hewitt by means of some day pupil."

CROSSING THE OCEAN IN A BALLOON.

J. Stainer, of Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, proposes to cross the Atlantic in a balloon, 100 feet in diameter. He says in a letter to the Telegraph:

"I am satisfied in my own mind that with such an apparatus I could cross the Atlantic in seventy-five hours; and the whole cost would not be more than $20,000. The balloon, net-work, and valve would weigh about two thousand pounds, and the boat and rigging three tons and a half. This will leave about eight tons ascending power, for provisions, passengers, and ballast. It would require three good ocean navigators, and one astronomer, besides myself. I would suggest New York as the starting-point; and am certain I would strike within two hundred miles of any given distance in Europe. I would suggest May as the time for making the experiment, and would make the attempt in 1859 if I could get the Government or others to assist me."

WHAT CATTLE SUFFER ON RAILROADS.

The Rochester American says: "Much more than the usual amount of stock is passing eastward over the New York Central Railroad at present.

"All this makes lively business in that particular line, and few think of the amount of suffering which has to be endured by the poor brutes while on the route. Packed closely together, without a particle of extra room between them, they are obliged to ride the whole distance to their destination without once tasting food or water; and in this hot weather it can easily be imagined that the deprivation of the latter, under such circumstances, must drive the tortured animals to the very verge of madness. While the trains of stock which arrived here on Saturday from Suspension Bridge and Buffalo were being made up together for the route eastward, no less than four head of cattle were taken from the cars in a dying condition, and they expired shortly after being removed. Many others were nearly in the same condition; and there can be little doubt that of the cattle confined in the hundred and forty-nine cars, as many as twenty perished, or will perish, through the sufferings they endured in the transit to market. This is horrible to think of; and yet the same scenes are repeated day after day, and nobody seems to think of suggesting a remedy."

PRECIOUS MAIL-BAGS.

At Milford, Massachusetts, a boy at work in one of the shoe shops in that place, recently found in an old mail-bag which the proprietor of the shop had purchased to work into shoes, a letter which had been mailed at an office in Tennessee, and directed to another place in the same State, and which contained four fifty dollar bills, a twenty, a ten, a five, and a three—in all, $238. This firm have purchased several thousands of these worn-out mail-bags, and several other letters have been found in them.

HOOPS AND GEESE.

A Richmond paper says: "A number of young ladies were refreshing themselves with a ramble through the grove, when one of them came in contact with a flock of straggling geese. In a moment they were streaming under her gigantic skirts, double file, heads down, wings flapping and tongues hissing; the fair one in the mean time in a temporary paralysis of alarm, doing the 'nervous' with poetry of posture and delicacy of vociferation entertaining in the extreme. The geese immediately commenced kicking up a row when they found themselves rather more crowded than they anticipated, at which stage of the proceedings, the lady, in an attempt to overleap the difficulty, was carried over a fence and put down in the midst of a corn-field, where the unwelcome invaders of her cherished crinoline relieved her and themselves and ran off, leaving their victim to the assistance of her somewhat frightened, considerably astonished, and extensively amused companions."

PERSONAL.

Second-Lieutenant R. A. Wittier, United States Marine Corps, and Lieutenant E. C. Stockton, United States Navy, were lately tried before a naval court-martial at Panama, found guilty, and sentenced—Wittier to be dismissed from the service, and Stockton to be cashiered. The President has approved both sentences.

The Times says: "Monsieur Belly, who has recently figured extensively in Nicaraguan affairs, and who has been variously reported as an agent of the French Emperor for securing the Nicaraguan transits, a speculator on his own private account, and at other times as a confidence man on a large scale, arrived in this city by the steamer Empire City and took lodgings at the Hotel St. Denis. Since his arrival he appears to have paid the penalty which all celebrated men suffer—that of being extensively stared at, and of being 'pumped.' M. Belly, however, as all great men should, takes the matter philosophically; and as not one in ten of the reporters who have called on him could speak French, and as he can not speak a word of intelligible English, the interviews have been mostly confined to pantomime, ending with a mutual bow, the inquirers leaving about as wise as when they called.

"M. Belly is an intelligent-looking, dapper little Frenchman, below the medium height, of a sandy complexion, a little bronzed, his eye a full hazel, his nose a little aquiline, his whiskers neatly trimmed, and his mustache clipped to the requirements of the season. He may, safely, be called good-looking. He dresses plainly; the only jewelry he wears being a massive gold watch-guard. A modest ribbon ornamented a button-hole on his left breast. He had literally nothing to communicate respecting his visit to Central America, and disclaimed having been there on any 'mission' at all."

A private letter from one of the most distinguished physicians in France, says, that upon consultation by the leading doctors in that empire relative to the case of Senator Sumner, who is now in Paris, it has been decided to perform an operation upon the back, for the purpose of producing a counter-irritation. The operation is that of cauterization—the burning of the flesh and muscle to the spinal column. While this operation is very severe, usually, it is said that it can now be performed by the aid of ether without producing the slightest pain. It is believed that the operation will prove of the greatest advantage to the patient.

The President and his household have moved out to Soldiers' Asylum. Office-seekers are not expected to call before seven in the morning.

A band of six missionaries embarked in the Andrew Carney at Boston. They were Rev. Mr. Powers and his wife, who are returning to the mission in Antioch; Mr. and Mrs. Byington, who go out for the first time, and who will labor among the Northern Armenians; Mrs. Byington is the daughter of a missionary, and was born at Smyrna; Miss A. C. Temple and Miss Johnson, who go out to labor as teachers in connection with the Syrian mission. A large company of friends assembled to participate in the embarkation services, which were conducted by Rev. Mr. Manning, and consisted of the singing of the hymn—

"Glorious things of thee are spoken, Zion, City of our God!"

and prayer.

The furniture of the old Hall of the House of Representatives was sold at Washington on the 30th of June. E. Kingman, Esq., a member of the Press, and native of Massachusetts, and Philip R. Fendall, a son of the Old Dominion, attended, and rescued from the gripe of the Jews and Gentiles some relics of the greatness and glory of the past. Mr. K. purchased, for fifty dollars, the desk from which J. Q. Adams thundered his invectives and spoke his noblest words in defense of the principles of Republican freedom. Old chairs, on which the greatest of American Parliamentary celebrities had sat, went off by the dozen, at a dollar and a half, while the gay carpet on which hundreds of the most honored of America's sons had expectorated for two sessions, was ripped up to a speculator at ten cents a yard.

Senator Fitch, one of the senators from Indiana, made the following response to a serenading party of his office-holding friends and dependents on the night of the 12th instant: "I shall fulfill the promise made to my political friends at the time I was elected—'If God lets me live, I will serve out the full term for which I am elected;' and with such a constituency as I represent, and in such a cause as we are engaged, I feel that He will let me live."

Sidney Webster, Esq., of Boston, who was Private Secretary to President Pierce, has been appointed to be a Commissioner of the United States, in place of Judge Loring, recently selected to fill the vacancy in the Court of Claims occasioned by the death of Judge Gilchrist.

The New York correspondent of the Boston Transcript makes the following pleasant allusion to an amateur operatic performance lately at Dr. Thomas Ward's house in University Place:

"A few years ago, our literary journals teemed with pleasant verses commemorative of the amenities of life, society, and nature, and especially of the quiet beauty and legendary charms of the Passaic River, parts of which more nearly resemble the vicinage of England's rural streams than any water-course on this side of the ocean. These graceful effusions bore the signature of 'Flaccus'—well known as the nom de plume of a genial son of New Jersey, a graduate of Princeton, and an Epicurean disciple of Esculapius, for independent circumstances enabled Dr. Thomas Ward to enjoy the dignity without enduring the fatigues of the medical profession; his leisure, however, was and is devoted to letters and art; and although his muse has been long silent, she occasionally warbles. Last week this good Flaccus gave his friends an unexpected treat. Cards of invitation to a musical soirée at his hospitable and elegant domicile in University Place, drew together an élite assembly, who soon found themselves comfortably seated in the two drawing-rooms before a mysterious silken curtain. Precisely at eight o'clock this was withdrawn, and a picturesque and lovely group of peasants whose faces were strangely familiar, were seen grouped around a rosy, white-haired, jolly landlord, in whose hilarious tones we soon recognized our tasteful host.

"'Flora, or the Gipsy's Frolic,' was given in fine style by an amateur company gleaned from among the best vocalists in private society; and we doubt if any city can boast more choice voices or better amateur style of execution. Two exquisite tenors and two fine sopranos equaled many a professional adept; the choruses were spirited and admirably sung, the acting was graceful and clever; and a succession of songs—martial, amorous, convivial, sentimental, and comic, were united by a thread of natural dialogue; some of the solos and duets were charming and vociferously encored, and the concerted pieces went off most affectively—altogether it was a delightful affair. Among the ladies who contributed greatly to the pleasure of the evening, was a daughter of S. G. Goodrich (Peter Parley), formerly of your city. The genial performance of this little English pastoral opera in three acts—both drama and music by Dr. Ward—was a most refreshing interlude in a week during which the Academy of Music has been closed, and a succession of rainy days threw a damper over every thing including animal spirits. Viva Flaccus!"

It is said that Walker, the filibuster, is certainly preparing a third expedition against Nicaragua. His followers in the South make no secret of the matter, and the Administration has received official information of the fact from the head-quarters of the movement.

The Senate of New Hampshire have concurred with the House in re-electing Hon. John P. Hale, United States Senator, giving him eight votes against three for Wells and one for Colby.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE OUTRAGES QUESTION IN PARLIAMENT.

On 18th, Mr. Fitzgerald, in reply to Mr. Bright, stated that the Government had received no further information in reference to the alleged outrages. It was quite possible that the commanders of some vessels had exceeded their duties; and if they had, the Government would be ready to make an ample and frank acknowledgment. It was obvious that the cases which had been published were grossly exaggerated. In proof of this he read several cases, and added that the American flag had been abused by those who were not Americans for the vilest purposes. He had entire confidence that when these circumstances were known, and when the disposition of this country was known, all the difficulties would be amicably arranged. The Government, acting under the advice of the Crown lawyers, had given up the right of search and of visit in time of peace; but the Government had invited America to join in maintaining an ocean police. It was under consideration whether the squadron should be withdrawn from the Cuban waters and replaced on the coast of Africa, and stringent instructions had been sent to commanders of cruisers enjoining the strictest prudence and caution.

Mr. Roebuck thought the statement of Mr. Fitzgerald most conciliatory and satisfactory, but the disposition had not been imitated by America. The language used in the American Congress was unworthy of a great country. They had always assumed that England wished to insult them, but he hoped they would now learn that she had no such desire. Lies had been told in the American papers for the purpose of pandering to bad habits, and he would not believe that the commanders had done any thing to call for the censure of our own Government.

Lord John Russell said if the Government conducted the affair in the temperate spirit manifested by the Under-Secretary, there could be no doubt that the House of Commons would hesitate for a moment to give them its support.

Lord Palmerston said the cruisers had been sent into the Cuban waters in consequence of the wishes of Parliament, and of deputations to the Government, and also in compliance with the wish of the American Government themselves. He hoped her Majesty's Government would urge the American Government to send out cruisers to prevent the abuse of the flag of the United States, which had been the cause of the difficulty.

Mr. Disraeli said that the best dispatch that could be sent to America was the calm and dispassionate spirit in which the House of Commons was discussing the question. He added that the American Government had been invited to engage in measures to protect each country against abuses of its flag. He had confidence that the existing misconceptions would speedily disappear. He was not annoyed at American ships of war being sent into Cuban waters, because they would there see for themselves what had taken place.

DEBATE ON THE SLAVE-TRADE.

The day before, in the House of Lords, Earl Malmesbury deeply regretted that the efforts of England to suppress the slave-trade had not been seconded by other nations. With regard to the late unhappy differences, he had admitted to the American Government, as a question of international law, that England was not entitled to insist upon the right of search; but had also put it strongly to the American Government, whether they would continue to permit their flag to be prostituted to the worst of purposes; and he had urged the necessity of ocean police, and that some understanding should be come to between the different maritime nations, which would enable the nationality of vessels to be clearly verified without any danger of a breach of international law. He had every reason to believe, from a conversation he had had with the American Minister, that some such arrangement might be come to. With regard to Spain, it was notorious that hitherto the moral support which she had received from England had materially aided her in resisting the wishes of the United States to annex Cuba; but if she still persisted in supporting the slave-trade, it was highly probable that the present anxiety of Great Britain would be exchanged for indifference.

Earl Gray was sorry there should be any attempts to renew the slave-trade. He thought the United States and France solely responsible for the renewal. With regard to the question of international law, so far as he understood it, an American vessel filled with slaves might leave Africa without England being able to interfere with her, notwithstanding a perfect knowledge of her character.

Earl Aberdeen said this definition of international law was quite correct.

THE ROYAL PROGRESS IN ENGLAND.

The Queen is making a tour to Birmingham and the vicinity. She is fond of sight-seeing, loves excitement, and never looks more pleased than when she is in the midst of the crowd, and listens to its cheers. She has just had enjoyment of this kind without stint, giving and receiving pleasure. The Birmingham display excited the enthusiasm of the townspeople, and enormous numbers poured in from the adjacent towns and counties to see the little potentate on whose dominions the sun never sets. Her visit to Warwick Castle must have conjured up historic associations connected with the "king-maker." To the American public the fact is significant, that Aston Hall, near Birmingham, to inaugurate which was the professed object of the Queen's visit to that part of England, is Washington Irving's "Bracebridge Hall," and the subject of some of his papers in the Sketch-Book. The Queen will proceed in a little time to Leeds, where similar honors await her.

SIR E. BULWER LYTTON AND HIS WIFE.

We take the following from the Morning Star: "A most painful scene occurred at Hertford on Tuesday, the 18th. Toward the close of the proceedings of the Hertfordshire election, just after Sir Edward had concluded his address with a fervent tribute of admiration to the womanly beauty exhibited in the long line of open carriages, chaises, and vans, drawn up in front of the hustings, there was an unwonted stir in the crowd, which parted to admit of the passage of a hired brougham from one of the town inns. The carriage having stopped, two ladies alighted, one of them an extremely handsome woman, of about forty-five years of age, with fresh complexion, and with eyes of dazzling beauty. The lady, who was evidently laboring under excitement which exercised all her powers to control, advanced as nearly as she could through the crowd toward the hustings, and announced herself as the wife of the Right Hon. Sir E. B. Lytton, stating that she had come, according to a promise made by her, to confront her husband, and to expose the wrongs which she said he had inflicted upon her, and which she had described in her works, and in a pamphlet published by her. The appearance of the lady was not unexpected, as her coming had been announced in bills and placards; but, owing to a deception which had been practiced upon her by some persons in the town who had introduced themselves to her, she was detained in the town while the election was proceeding in the vicinity. Those in the secret anticipated that she would not discover the mistake until the proceedings were over, and that her design would be thus frustrated. It was nearly so. Recognized as soon as observed, her voice was nearly drowned by the shouts of Sir Edward's supporters, but Sir Edward's eye caught hers, and his face paled. He looked like a man suddenly attacked by paralysis. Those near him say he trembled exceedingly. For a few moments he retained his position in front of the hustings, but turned his back on the unwelcome visitor. Then he suddenly disappeared below the hustings' platform, while his wife cried 'Coward,' and he, having hastily signed the usual declaration, escaped into the residence of the gentleman on whose grounds the election took place. Lady Lytton continued to address the audience assembled for more than a quarter of an hour, repeating her statements in her pamphlet, and asserting her intention to confront her husband on every possible occasion until she compelled him to redress her wrongs. Her ladyship subsequently made an application to the mayor for the use of the Town-hall, for the purpose of making a public statement, but this being refused her, she left the town early in the afternoon. Lady Lytton arrived in Hertford at three o'clock on the morning of the election, having posted from Taunton, where she resides. It is needless to say that the event described has caused the greatest possible excitement in Hertfordshire."

CHARLES DICKENS'S HOUSEHOLD TROUBLES.

A New York correspondent of the Boston Atlas and Bee says: "The scandalous reports about Dickens and his family have excited much attention here; but the manly card of Mr. Dickens, published in Household Words, relieves him from the imputation of infidelity. I was yesterday conversing with a gentleman well acquainted with the Dickens family, and he attributes the difference between the novelist and wife to diverse views they take in regard to the religious education of their daughters. Mr. Dickens is a decided latitudinarian in his views, and generally attends the Unitarian Church; while Mrs. Dickens, an Edinburgh lady, brought up in the stricter doctrines of Presbyterianism, still clings to the religious ideas inculcated in her youth, and naturally wishes her daughters brought up in the same way. The fact of the daughters siding with the father merely shows that, like most young people, they approve of those doctrines that offer more freedom, and are generally more attractive in appearance at least." It is hinted that the character of Mrs. Clennam, in Little Dorrit, may have been intended to reprove some of the austerities which have annoyed the novelist in his wife.

FIRST-FRUITS OF THE PILLAGE AT LUCKNOW.

A lady residing at Clifton, the wife of a gallant major at present serving in India, has received a letter from her husband, which gives a glowing account of the treasure seized by the British troops at Lucknow. As an earnest of his own success, he has sent her home a necklace of splendid pearls and some emeralds, one of which is believed to be of large value. The gems are in a comparatively rough state, the emeralds having been ignorantly and, we had almost said, mercilessly drilled through. The letter speaks of a corporal in the gallant officer's regiment having got a bracelet which will probably be worth from £100,000 to £200,000. Another letter from a younger officer received at Clifton states that the writer has got three superb embroidered shawls of rare workmanship and great price.

ANOTHER FLYING MACHINE.

Lord Carlingford, who has for a number of years been engaged in constructing a flying machine, has announced the success of his undertaking in a letter to the Kilkenny Moderator, in which he says: "Although I have not yet taken flight in the aehredon, which name I have given to my aërial chariot, I may with confidence and truth announce to you and the world the success of its principle from the results I obtained by an experiment three days ago. Having made some little improvement in the plan of starting the aehredon, which consisted in applying a crook to the top of it, and then hooking it to a cord supported between two poles, in the manner of a swing, and having raised it about two feet from the ground, and then drawing it back about two yards and giving it a slight pull forward, it started off, then elevated itself a little in the air, and after going a short distance alighted in the most gentle manner. It acted in this way in consequence of the tail not having been fastened down. By this experiment it must be considered that the principle is fully established, as well as the perfect manner of starting it. When I have made a few more experiments and found out the weight the present extent of wing will be able to bear, and if found sufficient to carry a person without being put to any great speed, which I consider most likely to be the case, it shall be taken to Dublin without delay, and there exhibited for charitable purposes and to the criticism of all."

SIX MONTHS' IMPRISONMENT FOR A KISS.

At the Wareham petty sessions, a day or two since, William Craft, a carpenter, was charged with the following offense: Miss Collyns, daughter of the Rev. H. C. Collyns, of Farringdon Rectory, Devon, went with some relations on board the steamer Ursa Major from Poole to Swanage. The defendant was also on board, and when they landed on the quay he pulled her down and kissed her. It does not appear that she was hurt. The magistrates sentenced him to six months' imprisonment, with hard labor.

A MAN EATEN BY PIGS.

Some time since, Mr. Isaac Love, of Bradford-on-Avon, marine-store dealer, left his home for the purpose of going to his garden, about a quarter of a mile distant, where he had several stys of pigs. His wife, finding he did not return, went to the garden in search of him, and not finding him, further search was made, but to no effect. In the morning his son went to the garden, and on looking over one of the stys containing nine small pigs, observed their noses were very bloody, which induced him to go into the house part of the sty, when he was horrified at seeing his father lying on his back quite dead, with the whole of his face and part of his neck completely eaten by the pigs. It is supposed that the deceased went into the sty, and while there had a fit. He was a stout man, in his fifty-eighth year.

A REAL QUASIMODO.

A most fearful scene was lately witnessed in South Shields market-place. Thomas Cook, a sailor, had returned from Hamburg that morning in a brig named the Castle Eden. He had been a little excited when he came home, but there had been nothing in his manner very much to alarm his wife. After tea he had dressed himself and gone out; and it would seem that he was immediately after attacked with a sudden fit of madness. He was observed running about in a frightfully excited state, and then to clamber by the spouting to the roof of St. Hilda's church. With such agility as only sailors display, he attached himself to the east side of the church-tower by resting his toe-ends upon a thin ledging sloping to the ground, and not more than an inch in breadth, and striking his finger-nails into the lime between the stones, he brought himself to the outside; but finding he could not pass the other angles, he dropped with his hands on the narrow ledge, and passed himself, hand over hand, completely round the tower—a most miraculous performance—as the oldest sailor in the large crowd that had gathered together had expected every moment that he would slip, and be dashed to pieces on the pavement. Having got back to the roof of the church, the unfortunate man tore off his neck-tie, coat, and linen shirt, and rending them to shreds, he threw the fragments among the excited crowd below. He then pulled out his watch, and dashing it to pieces, pitched it at them. He next emptied his trowsers' pockets of money and cigars and threw them away, and every one thought he was about to precipitate himself from the roof, when the police and several young men burst open the belfry, and rushed to the roof. When Cook saw them coming to him he ran toward them and attempted to drag one young man over the leads, but he was overpowered, and was taken off to the police-station by a strong force of policemen and civilians. He was put into a strait-waistcoat. Cook was a remarkably steady and industrious man, and it is thought that his madness has been produced by the extreme heat experienced at Hamburg.

FRANCE.

THE EMPEROR vs. THE BIBLE SOCIETIES.

A singular edict has appeared in the Moniteur relative to the circulation of books and pamphlets by the colporteurs, the individuals so much employed by our English Bible Society. This edict sets out with the assertion that 8,000,000 of immoral books were dispersed over the rural districts of France by 10,000 hawkers "about the year 1847"—that is to say, before the happy period when a revolution prepared that country for its present ruler. "This was the consequence," we are told, "of the imprudent neglect that is adorned with the name of Liberty." For six years the Imperial Government has sought to abate the plague; and not having been so successful as could have been wished, severe means are to be adopted. "It is the duty of the Administration," we read, "to prevent foreign societies, possessed of considerable resources, from dispatching agents to France with the view of producing agitation." We hope this does not mean that the Bible is the next danger to be apprehended in the land of Fénélon. At all events, it pretty clearly shows that the Emperor has a compact with the French clergy which may involve his retention of power.

RESIGNATION OF ESPINASSE.

General Espinasse, Minister of the Interior, has resigned, and his resignation has been accepted. He is raised to the rank of senator. M. Delangle, senator, and President of the Imperial Court, has been appointed to succeed General Espinasse.

The resignation of General Espinasse has produced a favorable impression at Paris. His successor, as a lawyer, can not but have greater respect for the law.

DE PENE'S ASSASSINS ACQUITTED.

The public prosecutor of Versailles has drawn up a report on the late duel which declares that the military engaged in the case are not subject to civil jurisdiction in reference to the two wounds received by M. de Pène. The report states that in the precipitation of the combat, Hyenne, fearing a parry and thrust, and not being fully aware that he had wounded his adversary in the right side, had instantaneously made a second thrust, to which de Pène, by a sudden change of position, had presented the left side. It adds that Hyenne had never been a fencing master.

A TOUCH OF THE OLD REGIME.

There is afloat an interesting anecdote connected with the charming fête given lately at Etoilles by Count Walewski, in honor of the visit of their Majesties. A fine little boy, son of the Count, attracted great notice, and the Emperor calling the child to him, asked, "What is your name, my boy?" The child replied, "Charles Walewski"—"Count d'Etoilles," added the Emperor, completing the answer. His Majesty desired, apparently, by conferring this title on the son, to express how highly he esteemed the services of the father as Minister of Foreign Affairs. Count Walewski has, it is said, ordered, from a first-rate artist, a picture to represent the fête at Etoilles—the occasion of this high mark of Imperial favor.

DEATH OF ARY SCHEFFER.

We have to announce a fact which every lover of art will learn with regret. Ary Scheffer is dead. From the Journal des Débats, which contains the sad intelligence, we learn that he succumbed on Wednesday, 16th, to the attacks of a complaint, the seeds of which had existed for many years, the result being hastened by emotions occasioned by a recent mournful journey. Falling ill, at London, three weeks since, M. Scheffer returned to his country only to bid his family and friends a last farewell. Ary Scheffer was born in Holland, of French parents, in 1795. He studied art at Paris under the celebrated Guerin, and in that city practiced both historical and genre painting with great success. Among his best known pictures are his "Christ the Comforter," a work of great power and beauty, "Francesca da Rimini," "Dante and Beatrice," Goethe's "Margaret," and "Mignon." His works are remarkable for loftiness and simplicity. Their technical merits are very high. His drawing is true and graceful, his touch firm, and his color often beautiful. In France, Ary Scheffer was regarded as the leader of devotional art, toward which he was carried by the strongest tendencies of his character. One of his countrymen has said of him: "All the world is able to admire some at least of those compositions which have become popular, where distinguished taste is associated with the finest and truest sentiment; but only they who are acquainted with M. Scheffer can know from what a living source of poetry those pathetic and charming creations emanated. M. Scheffer was not only a great artist—he had a mind open to all that is noble, generous, and good. His great career—always maintained in a line of the most rigid independence—offers to youthful talent the pattern of a life gloriously passed."

ALEXANDER DUMAS'S LAST DISH.

A Paris correspondent says: "Alexandre Dumas is gone, or talks of going, to Petersburg, Moscow, Tiflis, Constantinople, and 'adjacent parts,' whence he will return in two months, or less, with twenty volumes of travel, or more. I long since ceased to keep the run even of the titles of his new books. But he is something more, not to say better, than a writer; he is a cook—not a common roaster and boiler, but an inventive, 'talented' cook. One of his latest productions in that capacity is a roast rabbit, a meritorious work, of which the following recipe will, I think, lead to numerous American editions; 'Take a rabbit, kill him, open him, draw him, save all the blood; take the blood, the liver, a chicken's wing, two partridge wings, a truffle, a little sausage meat, onion, parsley, a clove of garlic, pepper, salt, etc., a bit of butter—chop and mix all these, and stuff the rabbit with the compound; hang him for two days by the hind legs in a cool, dry room; then put him on the spit, and turn him simply, without basting—for, mind, he is in his skin yet; when little jets of savory issue from him, remove him from the fire, hold him in the left hand by the hind legs, seize his apology for a tail with the right, give it one firm jerk, and your rabbit is skinned; serve him up with a butter sauce; sit and eat with thankfulness,' and drink to the health of Alexandre Dumas."

A THIEF CAUGHT BY PHOTOGRAPHY.

"Five or six days ago," says a late Paris paper, "M. X——, a photographer, allured by the brightness of the sun and the softness of the air, provided himself with necessary baggage, and hastened to Fontainebleau to take views in the forest. He installed in a very picturesque quarter, erected his apparatus, prepared his plates, opened his object-glass, and, enveloping at once his case and his head in a large, dark, and fluctuant vail, set himself to the task of seizing the objects in view. He had just taken out his proof from the dark chamber, and was subjecting it to chemical reactions, when a strong hand was placed on his shoulder. He turned round hastily and found himself in presence of a species of giant, meanly attired, who, by gesture and voice, demanded his purse. M. X—— is not a Hercules, and, from the first glance cast toward his adversary, he concluded that all resistance was useless. He therefore politely offered his purse, which was accepted with thankfulness. The robber bowed, and, leaving him to his resignation, went into the depths of the forest. Poor X——, meditating on his sad lot, remained some time motionless; his looks were mechanically set on his photographic proof; he mused upon it with a diverted and unconcerned eye; suddenly—'What is this?' exclaimed he; 'what is the human form in this coppice, under the shade of this oak? Heaven! should I believe my eyes? It is him, it is my robber, perfectly delineated, and very easy to be recognized. Oh, Providence! Oh, divine sun, my co-laborer, how well you do things!' On his return, he repaired to the police commissioner's at Fontainebleau, related his adventure, exhibited his proof-plate and the malefactor's likeness. Next day, with the aid of this singular description, the robber was arrested!"

ITALY.

THE PRESIDENT PRAYED FOR AT FLORENCE.

A letter-writer from Italy tells a story of a display of the right sort of "Americanism" by one of our countrymen in Florence. The Church of England has a congregation there, the expenses of which are paid by an admission fee of two pauls, demanded of all who enter the church. The receipts from this source being insufficient to provide for the support of the minister and sexton, the vestrymen (all English) had to make it up from their own private purses. One of the members resigned, and an American gentleman was requested to take his place. Knowing very well the object of the proposition, our countryman determined, at least, to make the best bargain that he could, and consented to serve, on condition that a prayer for the President and his Cabinet should be inserted in the service along with that for the Queen and Royal Family. The terms were accepted; the new vestryman was installed into office; the worthy clergyman and the vigilant beadle are now provided for; and public prayer is constantly made for the American President and his ministers on the banks of the classic old Arno—all the results of a good Yankee bargain.

TURKEY.

MARRIAGE OF A SULTANA.

Nezibeh Sultana was married on 3d June. The Times correspondent thus describes the scene:

"At one o'clock the indispensable salute of cannon announced the beginning of the proceedings. One by one the high officials entered their caiques; passing the palace, they stopped at some distance from it, waiting for the appearance of the bride, and ready to head the cortége. By degrees the palace caiques approached and moored along the quay, leaving the place of honor before the gate to the splendid state caique destined for the Sultana, and immediately before it another, similar, but not so rich, for the Kislar Aga, who has to deliver over the bride to her future husband. The Sultana's caique was painted white, with richly gilt carvings along the bulwarks, and rose-colored oars, likewise relieved with gold ornaments. In the afterpart of it a beautiful little cabin, all gold and pale blue, with glittering Venetian blinds, was erected. A faint sound of song, the usual marriage ditty, heralded the approach of the bride; the children disappeared, the servants formed a row, and the procession began.

"First came, supported by two blacks, the Kislar Aga, who is at the head of the whole female department of the palace, and plays a prominent part on all such occasions. After him the mother of the bride, gorgeously dressed in pink satin ferigeh, likewise supported by two blacks, one of them holding a large pink umbrella, embroidered in silver, over her head. She was followed by the younger brothers and sisters of the bride, each of them accompanied by their mothers and their suites of ladies and blacks. When these had passed and taken their seats in the caiques, the red screen was spread out and drawn down to the door of the little cabin, so as to conceal the bride from profane eyes. In spite of these precautions, before she descended the flight of steps one could catch a glance of her as she came out, covered with a rose-colored vail from head to foot, and followed by a host of ladies and children of the palace, who accompanied her, singing the monotonous marriage chant, which sounded quite melodious as it came across the water. The screen was withdrawn, and a fat eunuch in a rich uniform sat before the door of the cabin, which had let in the bride."

THE WEDDING PROCESSION.

The signal was given and the procession started, the high officials in front according to their rank—the highest nearest to the bride; after them the caique containing the Kislar Aga, and then the bride, followed by her sisters and brothers, and her own and their suites.

The distance from the palace to Emerghan, where Mustapha Pacha's summer palace has been taken for the couple, is about five miles, and the sight which they presented while the procession passed slowly was quite unique. Wherever there is a quay along the whole distance, it was covered with a multitude, almost exclusively women, who in sight-seeing have here always the right of precedence. Wherever there is no quay and the houses rise close to the water, the windows presented the same aspect. On all the prominent points the military were drawn up, with their bands playing, so that the cortége was almost all along accompanied by the sound of music. The effect which this ensemble produced it is impossible to describe. Color, which forms the most prominent feature in every Eastern tableau, lent to this, too, a charm of its own; the most glaring tints harmonized, and were framed in by the equally bright-colored houses on both shores, looking their best in the brilliant sunshine, with emerald green hills as a back-ground, a cloudless sky above, and a blue, calm sea below. It was a real feast for the eye.

After a row of about an hour and a half the procession reached its destination. The Sultana stopped before the harem door in her caique until all the female part of the cortége had landed, and formed inside to receive her. Before the screen was closed one could see the grande maîtresse come down to introduce the bride to her house. Again the sounds of the marriage song were heard, the screen was withdrawn, and the bride had passed.

ALGIERS.

HOW TO MAKE RAIN.

At Bona the native Algerines, angry at no rain falling, seized half a dozen Marabouts, and plunged the holy men into the sea, keeping them in the bath until a shower came. It actually began to pour down at once. The Lazzaroni at Naples are trying a similar experiment against the lava of Vesuvius with a wooden doll of St. Januarius.

INDIA.

ILLNESS OF MR. RUSSELL.

The Bombay Gazette says: "Much suffering has already been entailed on our men in the field from the great power of the sun. We see, with regret, that Mr. William Russell, the Times' correspondent, was struck in this way at the attack of the Bareilly cantonments, and requires much care and attention before he can recover. His first accident was a kick from a horse, which compelled him to resort to a dhooly. When the baggage was in danger at Bareilly his bearers put him down on the road and bolted. Weak and very ill, he nevertheless managed to mount a horse, when a sun-stroke knocked him down, and very nearly proved fatal."

AN ELEPHANT-RIDE.

Mr. Russell thus describes an elephant-ride which he had before he was struck down: "I had not been long asleep under my tree when I was awoke by Colonel Pakenham calling out, 'Where is my elephant?' very much in the same tone of voice as a man in a club would ask for his hat. The elephants were punctual. At the word of the mahout, the ancient pachyderm, who was to carry the Quartermaster-General, Colonel M'Pherson; Major Stewart, Deputy-Assistant Adjutant-General; Dr. Mackinnon, Surgeon to the Head-quarters, and myself, knelt down, with infinite condescension, and permitted a ladder to be placed against his side, by which we mounted to a contrivance just like the body of an Irish jaunting-car, strapped over his back. We preferred that mode of mounting to the more usual way of putting one's foot on the animal's proboscis, and holding on by the lower flap of his huge Indian-rubber-looking ear, while he, by a gentle curl upward of his omnificent snout, raises the rider to his back—or to the equally popular mode of seizing his tail and putting our foot against his hind-leg, which the animal elevates at the word of command till the biped is high enough to scramble to his seat on the howdah. We sat back to back, two at each side, nicely balanced, and, having undergone two smart shocks of an earthquake while our friend, in two great heaves, fore and aft, got to his feet, proceeded on our journey. I can not say, notwithstanding the honor and glory of the thing, that the elephant is an animal which makes a favorable impression as a means of locomotion. The only thing to which I can compare the pitching fore and aft, as he rises and falls in his stride, is the riding of a light collier brig in a joggling tide-way. One of our party was soon sickened, and the others were engaged with great severity of aspect in holding on to the rails of the vessel, 'like grim death to a backstay.' We passed along above the dust with a nightmary sensation, and before two o'clock in the morning our line of elephants had delicately picked their way by their noses over the bridge of boats, and were in Rohilcund, plodding through the crowd of animals of an inferior order—man and beast—toward their destination. And so we went on till dawn, very sleepy, and very tight-ropy and noddy. We roused up to an attitude of attention at the sight of a broad and deep-looking river, which looked any thing but inviting under the combined rays of the setting moon and the rising sun. This was the Ramgunga, and the bridge of boats a few yards above us were those which had been secured by the victory at Allehgunj, after the sad affair at Rhadamow. The Lord Sahib's elephants were just crossing the bridge, and so ours were driven to the ford, and at once plunged into the stream. As these sagacious and highly intellectual beings are horribly fond of practical jokes, we watched the depth of the water with some anxiety, lest our bearer should avoid the trouble of swimming by the simple expedient of letting his feet drop, and walking on the bottom, while the top of his proboscis, held above water, supplied him with air; but the stream was not more than six or seven feet deep, and we crossed without an involuntary ablution."

A DUST STORM IN INDIA.

Mr. Russell tells the following story: "We have just had our first dust storm. The evening was sultry and oppressive, and on leaving the mess tent, about eight o'clock, to go to bed, I saw that a large bank of clouds lay under the moon. As I looked a large globe of fire opened out as it were from the cloud, and seemed to fall to the ground. I returned to the tent and mentioned what I had seen, but there was no need of any telling that a storm was brewing. As I walked to my tent, and just as I was within ten yards of it, I observed something like a wall of mud, ten or twelve feet high, advancing toward us. In an instant I was half smothered and quite blinded by a rush of dust and fine pebbles, carried by a strong blast, above the noise of which rose the flapping of tents and the mutterings of thunder. I had to shout for assistance, and my servants led me to the tent, which was intent on joining the dust and pebbles, but was coerced by ropes to desist. The sky became pitch dark, in spite of the moon—lightning flashed through the storm now and then, only to show how dense it was—the dust was irresistible and overpowering—tents were blown down and over—thunder rolled and great drops of rain fell, but long after our tired soldiers were fast asleep the storm passed away."

ON THE ROAD.

ON THE BEACH.

ON THE ROAD AND BY THE BEACH.

"Tue Road," as a technical term, has borne very different significations since their mother tongue of ease was first invented. In the old mother country, when a man took to "the road," he became a highway robber. When a gentleman "tried the road," he drove a coach-and-four over a well-beaten turnpike in advance of the "jarvey" of the day. When a laborer fell back on "the road," he became "a tinker" not by any means a member of pots and pans, but a peddler, and roughly speaking a police call a meek-stick. When a poor mother and her children were "on the road," it was certain that they had been turned out of house and home by a scoundrel of a husband and father. In this moralizing, and in our day, people who take to "the road" drive fast horses on the dusty avenues which lead from the northern portion of the city to the upper end of Manhattan Island.

It is a dreary pastime. The overwrought New Yorker may not unreasonably seek a mild form of recreation by driving his family out of an afternoon on the only country roads which lead from the city into the country. But alas for our peace and comfort! democracy has its rights and the means of gratifying them; and a gentleman's horse will kick up as much dust as a hook driver, a hackman, or a bully. The "gentleman rides" fondly imagine, fashionable drives for the aristocratic portion of our people, the fashionable drive from the city northward are the resort of all that's least admirable in our motley population. Jim and Jack, who belong to the class which has for designates us "loose, idle, and disorderly persons," are the prominent characters on "the road." They have 2:40 horses, and they pride themselves on the discomfort of their vehicles, the savagery of their costume, and the number of victims which they have run over. Every fine day Jim runs a race with Jack to the most distant discomfort of Harlem Bridge, who is taking Mrs. Park and the little Parkers out for a quiet drive. Whether Jim beat Jack, or Jack beat Jim, the Park family must inhale the same amount of dirt. Who are they—blustard aristocrats, indeed!—that they should complain and wail for certain the privileges of the unterrified democracy?

Sometimes Montmorency De Rohan Trevylyan condescends to drive out on "the road." Him do Jack, Jim, and the empire to generally with their short-tailed cobs athwart the proud nose of his thorough-bred, and filling that of his owner with dust. He rests on the nobility of Trevylyan, and long and often such a provocation. A time comes, sooner or later, when he is taken up for furious, and a more hist—with rein, voice, or whip—is given to through-fast that he may "acquire" it. He, learning in almost human, forgets all his pride, begins to air his mettle; Jim and Jack must see about it that they are not left behind. To the credit of our great sawdust be it said that they seldom decline a fair race. Jim drives a butcher's cart, and delivers orders at Newport in the season; Jack has lately enjoyed the genial hospitalities of the Governor of Sing Sing. But "the road" at this at least among the characteristics of a better place—it is no respecter of persons. Jack and Jim, behind their cobs, are the equals of Montmorency De Rohan Trevylyan; and if his horse be the slowest of four, they run his opponent's nonetheless. Fate thus decrees. Generally, however, as the fickle novelists say, blood will tell in the end, and, as our article depicts the scene, it is the cur Jack who swallows the dust. At any rate, both tear along "the road" at dangerous pace, endanger horses, men, women, and children, if they chance to be in the way; and choke Mr. and Mrs. Cotton Park without the least compunction.

Rumor—that very scandalous dame—will have it that Mr. and Mrs. Cotton Park are among the representatives of fashion who are regular patrons of "the road." It is said that the music of history has been often lashed a fast horse relentlessly, only to talk in a stinson of dust. It is whispered that several millions of colonial currency and a high palatal have been recklessly endangered by a race with a fast steamboat. These scandals may pass; but when gossip dares to assert that the pillar of pure orthodoxy and the largest contributor to benevolent institutions has been seen to jog the whip on a light hay with a view to outstrip an indecent driver by number inches, it is time to stop its mouth and change the subject.

Brown knows better than to tock exercise or portion on "the road." He—the man has already fed the city. Accident—the merest accident—induced him to select Moonshine Bay as his summer retreat. It chanced that the Miss Smiths were there. Eumus adores riding; Emily loves riding; Lucy can not live without riding. It is more natural, then, than that Brown should ride out of a summer-day with the Miss Smiths on the hard sand beach? There are no Jacks or Jims there to disturb the delicious pastime; and if they were there, there is no dust to be conjured. Nothing underfoot but the hard, clean beach, and now and then a spatter of sweet; nothing above but the tearing sea air coming swelling from great Atlantic depths, rebounding from the rough faces of the surf. No sound is there but the roar of the breakers and the chirrup of insects; for if Brown does now and then drop behind when Emily rises up to enjoy a particular effect of the moon, they do not converse in tones loud enough to break the great silence of the scene. Indeed, it is the delightful thing it is to have a gallop on a good horse by the seashore, with a lovely girl to share the pleasure!

WHAT HAPPENED THE OTHER DAY IN OUR VILLAGE.

THERE came one day to stay with Mrs. Quirk, the boarding-house keeper in our village, a pale, slender youth, who seemed to have glided into the place like a spirit. No one but Mrs. Quirk—not even his landlady, I believe, he appeared, as it were, and wandered up and down our street, and through our woods, with something ghostly in his air. He was very beautiful—something like what Hyde must have been when the river nymphs twined themselves round his delicate limbs, and bore him to their fountain palaces. A fine spirituality had, almost drowning, as it were, in billows of rich golden hair. Large, deep-blue eyes, as tender yet as shy, that they looked like Lucy Ashmere stars bathed in the falling dews. Delicate white hands, and small graceful feet. He was not fat, far too beautiful for a man; never theless we were all in love with him.

He proved to be possessed of a pretty river run through our village — one of those sweet New Rivers of Hertfordshire, brimmed with trout, and set with water-plants, and rich with the blue forget me-not and the crimson lobelia. Here he would spend the greater part of the day, playing his small white hand into the water, weaving wreaths of the wild flowers that grew among the rushes, and watching the swallows, as they drove, like flying leaves, through the air.

He pursued all the amusements usual to youths of his age. He neither fished, nor shot, nor hunted; nevertheless he would be seen with a look in his hand, but this was unfrequent; the greater portion of his time was spent by the bank of the little river, with a book in the hollow of his hand, resting in the sunshine, and drinking in the breath of flowers.

Who was he? No one knew. Is avoided all intimacies, and rarely spoke even to good Mrs. Quirk, who, by the way, from some reason unknown to me, entertained the mystery in which he had enshrouded himself. All we knew was, he called himself Henry Aspen, and came from New York. With this scanty information we were feign to content ourselves; and every one and every one's name that he was of a young girls saw him passing down the street, with his delicate features, and his rich hair falling in long curls over his shoulders, we would wonder among ourselves as to his name, his connections, and his history, but no question that he had been crossed in love.

The summer-house, and the mansion had already kindled its early fires in the woods, and you remarked that day by day, the youth Aspen became paler and paler, and walk with a slower step. He now might be seen, day after day, creeping to the river-side, with a book in his hand, upon which were the sun shone, with closed eyes, and cheeks that seemed as wan as the lilies that grew near them.

One fine autumn evening, when the sun was shaking shafts of golden light through the dark blackest ebony against his fiery disc, we beheld Mrs. Quirk issue in a state of unusual agitation from her house, and run across the road to the doctor's. In a few minutes she reappeared, accompanied by our good physician, who had been summoned her house. Something was evidently the matter. What could it be? Was the poor youth taken ill? Is there severe cyst, or consumption? with tears at the very thought of such a contingency.

In less than an hour the doctor issued from Quirk's door. He looked so grave and sad that we knew that death was in our village.

Mrs. Quirk was questioned, but could not be information save that Henry Aspen, as he called himself, had taken to his bed in a state of a blood vessel in the lungs. The doctor returned evasive answers to every other question we put to him, and left the village. Two days elapsed, however, that evening, and then we knew that something must happen.

Sure enough the very next day a carriage dashed up to Mrs. Quirk's door, and a lady and gentleman got out, and hurried into the house.

Poor people! thought my the father and mother, of course. Consumption has got the better of him.

There was a funeral: the next day, and we could see in the depths of a large carriage two pale, sorrowful faces, mourning for the dear child.

Conceive our astonishment, on the very next day, while we were all talking over the matter, the Rev. Linus Bean, invite our prayers for the soul of Lucy Henrietta Aspen, who died on the evening of the 30th inst., aged 17.

Henry Aspen, therefore, was a woman!

Of course, from that moment the youth had been forced into a match with a man she detested, by her parents; and lovely lovers a young naval officer who was far away at sea. On the morning of the wedding she disguised herself and fled. Her parents, grieved, flew to mourn and die.

Peace be with her!

MR. JAMRACH'S COLLEGE FOR YOUNG BEASTS.

BEYOND the leading articles of my newspaper, in which I am a connoisseur, I seldom look at any other part of it. Though I constantly aim at result, I despise conclusions, and if I can avoid all, either, I often pursue things not bargained for or expected; and in this manner, I can not tell exactly when, a paragraph met my eye purporting that a certain tiger broke loose on a certain day, from the menagerie of Mr. Jamrach, a dealer and importer of wild beasts in London, England, ran into the street, was recaptured in the same, and, by and a certain man, armed with a crow-bar, on the other; the animal eventually ended in the ferocious future of the wild beast and her ignominious return (it was a lady tiger) to her prison cage. So much is a note of it, determining in my own mind that I would beat up Mr. Jamrach some fine day. The resolve remained some time in abeyance, and might have continued so some time longer, were it not for a certain announcement which again came under my eye, to the effect that a fine rhinoceros had arrived at Mr. Jamrach's seminary, preparatory to undergoing such courses of education as rhinoceroses should make the animal fitting society for the beasts of a civilized menagerie. Not knowing how long this educational course might last, to Mr. Jamrach I went without further delay.

I though ignorant of the number of that gentleman's residence, I took it for granted that the name of one who had conquered a truant tigress and led her back to captivity, could not be hid under a bushel, and that he would be certainly known to every cabman in town. I was not mistaken. I was the first boy I met directed me to a shop where wild animals were sold, and crowing commercially fell on my ear, and certain stuffed specimens of natural history placed in the windows would have satisfied me that I had got right place at last, but for the name of Jamrach had not been printed in Large letters over the door. Mr. Jamrach presented himself in the form of a stalwart German—of whom a prudent lion or tiger would not care to make a meal—and on my query if Mr. Jamrach was disposed, for I subsequently had to learn that a rhinoceros was a very different subject to deal with as wild beasts as a cane to the hands of a pedagogue. The object of my call was soon explained. I wanted to know what the wild beasts, his pupils; to study their course of education; to familiarize myself with their habits; whether they took kindly to human discipline or not; whether they remembered favors; and, in short, any other collateral points which the master might be kind enough to indicate. He entered into my views at length of detail, and I take a public opportunity of thanking him for all his civility.

"I have only small animals here," he said "birds chiefly, but you will perceive. But come with me a little way down the street, and you shall see my large animals. I have an only distant from here about three hundred yards."

So away we went.

In a large, court-yard, I found myself between two rows of cages. There were not many animals in that part of the establishment. Some of the Andes, moping sullenly in her cage, had one side of the court-yard pretty nearly to herself. Passing on, I came to the Bengal tiger, and to a new order. That lodder Mr. Jamrach told me to mount, which made me shy of looking at the animal as I had to found my there? My informant explained.

"She is not up there," replied he, "but she is below in the cellar, with a joint in the flooring you will have to see her."

Down there I went, and had I peeped, and there, in a den, sure enough she was, nibbling hay with much complacency. Mr. Jamrach now went away, handing me over to the guidance of the keeper, I mean, of his wild animals. This keeper was a young man, and had a very tight waist, led as the animals under his charge. A very small man, indeed; yet to him I found the credit was due of having taught the leopards to dance the tiger-dance. I found him full of anecdote; and I, making the best of my opportunity, put to him questions him about his system of education, and the peculiarities of his pupils. I asked him first about the tiger, which I considered dangerous. It was, among his pupils, to gain the confidence of a lion than a tiger; yet tigers were not to be trusted, though they have very pretty ways. "That very tigress which escaped," said he, "knew me well, and seemed to be very fond of me. Often, when I was passing the front of her den, she would thrust out both her paws between the bars, and lick me."

"And did you accept her invitation?" said I.

"Often enough," said he, "but not one on either side of my neck, she would caress me."

Lions and tigers are often gentle enough while in their dens, but outside of them, if by chance they break loose, their natural ferocity again possesses them, and they forget all friendship and one must shoot them no favor or mercy. There is only one way to deal with them."

"And that is?" I asked.

"Knock them on the head at once—stun them. That is how I served the tiger that broke out with the slow of a crow-bar. For a time she lay like a thing dead, and when she recovered well enough to rise, I led her back to her cage. She showed her teeth, and pulled one way—I showed my crow-bar, and pulled the other way. So she and me had like going back, I assure you; but I got the better of her at last.

"And did she ever forgive you?" asked I.

"There was an end to her invitations and caresses, I assure you," said he.

"Not a bit of it," said the keeper; "she forgave me, and after a few days we were as good friend as ever."

"Her memory must have been indifferent," I ventured to suggest. "Probably she forgot about it."

The keeper smiled and shook his head. "The memory of tigers is long," said he, and may be so; he: "I will give you a proof of it. Look at those cages. You will observe we have to clean them out with a hose, through an opening below the railings. Now it is a very common trick of tigers to lie perdu, crouched in a dark part of the cage, and bite at hand as it is. That bad habit must be cured, and there is no dealing with the beast vicious after that fashion. We have a certain cure," continued he; "and when I tell you what it is, you will see that the memory of those tigers have very good memories. We make the tiger lie in the back part of the cage, after biting it once, never bites it a second time.

At this period of the narrative a short grunt from the lion and lioness caused me to turn and look down through the hole. But the lady had by this time herself invisible. No talking to be stared at, as it would seem, she had shrunk away to the farther corner of her den, where, shrouded in darkness, my inquisitive eye-glance could no longer follow her. The keeper was indignant. What business had she to be then my and retiring to a gentlemen formally introduced?

"So he, Mosta?" said he, calling her by her Italian name, "you will be a donna all the same!"

"I'll teach you better manners."

"Wait a bit, I will see to be me; I'll go down and bite her up; I'll make be as quiet as a lamb."

I begged of him to do no such thing: it seemed to me sheer recklessness. Smiling, he bade me have no concern. Then, as a schoolmaster might have seized his cane to correct a stubborn boy, or a huntsman his whip to check the barkings of an unruly dog, so did the usher of Mr. Jamrach's educational establishment lay hold of an instrument proper, I suppose, for the correction and management of rhinoceros-tempers. It was a marvellous-looking thing, rather like a long tomahawk.

Down descended the lion, and lioness' usher bobbed. Bang went the tomahawk, right and left, and with many a snort and grunt, forward, in a position of defence, the rhinoceros came, and came the rhinoceros. I beg the reader to have no manner of anxiety for her comfort. Accustomed to the thickness of her skin, the tomahawk, murderous though it looked in the abstract, could not hurt her much, I dare say. Now that I have perceived that the nose horn, from which the species name of rhinoceros is derived, is not always disappeared—the invariable result, I was informed, of keeping the two animals in captivity. They are in the habit of rubbing and filing their horn against the hard sides of the den, faster than the horn can be produced and grow.

Passing now near a row of cages, in which some little animals were confined, I felt a soft velvety touch on the back of my hand. Looking round, I perceived a creature, not quite a monkey, but something like it, standing by my side. I was supposed enough to imagine that it might be one of the lemur tribe, previously mentioned, but was supposition which my guide confirmed. It was beggar, poor little fellow, for something to eat. Lemurs, like monkeys, are great adepts at begging. Among the larger animals, a pair of jackals struck me, they were so beautiful and so disgusting. I shall doubt the teaching of Lavater, if what he says be true about the jackals was reliable. He gave them a very bad character indeed. They were cruel and scratch, and do the utmost mischief in their power. To make pets of them, and let them run loose about the premises, was impossible; but among other evil propensities, they were given to cat-killing and cat-eating.

Mr. Jamrach's college numbered among its inmates a goodly lot of monkeys. There they were, of many different sizes, playing, fighting, chattering, making very faces. For the first time in my life I discovered what a baboon looked like. Ugly and wherewithal in London, after their importation. I am somewhat of a monkey admirer. I have always been a-loving that way, and many times have resolved to increase the number of my family by one of those little wonders. But, after long experience, not being cognizant of the monkey mart, and applying to happy-family men and organ-grinders for information, the result was, that monkey-truths was enveloped in such studied mystery, that I began to suspect that the monkey-trade was a caricature presentments of humanity to my household circle. The price of monkeys is not so outrageous, and I will not give up the right now for them. Deponent and carriage count for a good deal. Then, again, the market value of a man is more than personal appearance: and now, in testimony to the good qualities of monkeys—for the softer sex, I am happy to inform my readers that lady-monkeys fetch a higher price in the market than gentleman-monkeys. Of this fact Mr. Jamrach, I was informed, stand the climate almost better than any other. The bi-lateral monkey is a great more gentle. Therefore, between a ring-tail and a bluefaces lies my choice whenever I go into the monkey-market, as a purchaser. But, in the truth, after what I saw at Mr. Jamrach's, I do not think that a monkey would be any delicacy, except I can procure one with a certificate of good character—a contingency not very probable, by-the-way. A friend recommended me to eat of a very pretty pet—one had just been sold at Mr. Jamrach's for fifty shillings ($12.50)—a very pretty pet indeed, with a long tail, and a countenance supposed to be all gentleness. Sweet little things they are, I was informed, when well treated. But what was the general cruel enough to treat Ah! Although me of opossum rugs, now being manufactured in such numbers for our market. A certain proprietor of an opossum rug (price $60) told me, as a recommendation, that not less than about a dozen opossums were killed in the manufacture of it. Alas! poor opossums.

"Have you ever seen a somewhat dangerous life of it?" remarked I. "Are you not afraid sometimes?"

He smiled. "Not of beasts and birds," said he; "but the snakes, ugh! I don't like them particularly."

"Do you deal in snakes, too?"

"Of all sorts and sizes. I understand the ways of them, and never get bitten. Any one, and many snakes come here, the ways of which I don't quite understand. Of all snakes, I dare say pythons most. A short time since forty puff-adders came here in a box. I had to remove them one by one, and they were very savage indeed. I got bitten over-out quarters. I didn't half like the job, I can tell you."

"You handle them with tongs, I suppose?"

"We have not a pair of tongs on the premises," replied he.

"How do you catch them, then?"

"With my gloves on," said he, and thumb, and hold them fast. That's the only way to deal with them."

"Do you wear gloves?"

"Yes, very thin gloves. Thick gloves would interfere with the delicacy of one's fingers. A snake would easily bite through many such gloves as I wear; but I fancy leather, however thin, would catch some of the poison. A puff-adder is the ugliest snake I know of. His ways are as ugly as his looks. The rattlesnake I don't mind: he is a gentleman—a fair dealing fellow. Before he bites, he gives you warning by sounding his rattle. But I say what you may with your one rattle; but after rattling the second time, stand clear, or you are like to get hurt.

The part of the narrative I could not help fancying that it would be better to leave pedlars, rattlesnakes, and others of the poison-tooth tribe, alone to crawl in their native wilds, doubted whether the curiosity of noticing such animals in captivity would justify the danger to human life involved. As our conversation proceeded, I found that even pedlar-like and rattlesnake-traffic admitted of a plausible defence, on the score of utility to man. These creatures are distributed among physiologists and others who study the effects of poisons. Many of the pedlars, for example, just alluded to, were taken to Germany by Jessop, my informant, in the course of as it have mentioned. I had kept English snakes myself. Harmless creatures enough these are, except to the frogs. A person unaccustomed to the ways of common snakes would never credit their gorging powers—how they seize a swallow, with apparent ease, frogs larger than themselves. Now, rattlesnakes and pufferfish only I believe, poison snakes generally, according to the testimony of my informant, do not care much about gorging. Occasionally they will swallow a mouse or a bird; but it is not their regular way of feeding. They suck the blood of their victims.

"You remember the Amsterdam salamander?" inquired Mr. Jumrach. Of course I did. Was I likely to have forgotten that strange creature? Did not I pit the salamander, and smooth him down, proud in my own conceit that in the end I might boast how I had seen and touched that mysterious beast? It is a pity I should destroy a pretty illusion which may be lighting up the imagination of the reader. Did the salamander burn me? Did he live in furnace? Alas! I pity fact here! Oh no, none of it. The Japanese salamander is a sort of huge water-newt, without scales, slimy to touch, like an eel. He should feed on fish, and if thrown into furnace flames, after the manner of the fabled salamander, he would find himself very much out of his element. I learned that, subsequently to my visit to Amsterdam, the sobriety salamander touched by me was followed by the pressure of another—some all the way from Japan to keep him company.

By-the-by, I'll tell you an anecdote of that fellow," said Mr. Jumrach. "Salamanders exist nowhere except in Japan, and even there they are scarce. Still, a Dutch medical man, some time before my visit, was fortunate enough to find a couple of them—an little fortune, if by chance he should succeed in bringing them alive to Europe. While stowing salamanders, as well as ordinary armies, the commissariat is the chief difficulty. Picture to yourself creatures requiring live market fish, and plenty of them, all the way from Japan! To provide a tiger's daily meal all the way from Bengal is not the easiest matter; but to feed a turbis bis in comparison with the difficulties of this Dutch doctor. Well, to use their own phrase, fresh fish, and salamanders. Whether the voyage was longer than usual, or the salamanders' appetites would vary under change of diet, I don't know. One by one the fish were apportioned, and the salamanders began to eat each his own. What was to be done? Only one thing, and I grieve to narrate it. Salamandrine cannibalism was resolved upon. Salamander number one—we fell under the commissariat knife, and, being distributed by rule, his former companions—and fresh fish were soon procurable; so salamander number eight found his way in safety to Amsterdam.

I must really gossip no longer, particularly as I hope to visit Mr. Jumrach's college again. Let me conclude by telling my lady reader that since such a beast as a pet rhinoceros, that she must be prepared to give some twenty-five hundred dollars for the same. Should her tastes incline to the possession of a tiger, the lady may at times, when the tiger-market is glutted, procure one for—say five hundred dollars, cash down; no discount, and no abatement. But I am informed that twenty hundred dollars is a far more probable sum. As regards lions, they are somewhat cheaper, I believe; but if fair reader wishes to keep a lion, a lion, I will make it my business to inquire for her.

COMMON SENSE.

SIR: came among the gathering crowd,
A modest face, without pretence;
And when they asked her humble name,
She whispered, mildly, "Common Sense."

Her modest garb drew every eye,
Her simple shoes, her shoes of leather;
And, when they sneered, she simply said,
"I dress according to the weather."

They argued long and reasoned loud
On dubious Hebrew phrase and accent;
While she, poor child! could not divine
Why girls so young should be so serious.

They knew the length of Plato's beard,
And how the scholars wrote in Saturn;
She studied authors not so deep,
And took the Bible for her pattern.

And so she said, "Excuse me, friends,
I find all have the deeper learning,
And Common Sense should stay at home
With cheerful hearts and smiling faces."

PAUL DRAYTON'S CHARM.

It was a very warm day in July. The streets were quiet, perched, deserted; the city was out of town; only those whose business or poverty was imperative dared admit, by personal presence, that they were not at Newport, Niagara, or Saratoga.

Among the last was Paul Drayton, a young physician, struggling his way to that doubtful fortune that sometimes, after many years of toil and deprivation in the midst of a great city, rewards the skilful practitioner.

Paul Drayton was twenty-seven. Five years had he fought his battle against poverty and bigotry. Slowly, year by year, he had added to the number of his friends and patients; but not among that class who could pour wealth and fame into his hands; blessings and praises were his in abundance, but Paul Drayton remained poor. Once, after one night had he plotted and planned with his young wife. The last bullet castles together, and with a laugh had watched them topping the clouds of air. They were brave hearts; but the years swept away and there came no change, and Paul viewed with unquiet gaze his increasing family and stationary income.

"I doubt, Lizzie," he would say to his wife, "if I would not be better off were I to cut my stars with me now above me—those whom I know to my own heart are my children, and I should feel but as a fatalist, who looks upon himself as one of the foreordained?"

"No, no, Paul; you are so hard upon the great Who don; let us rather look upon the world as the fools were, and think of the wise men as guided by good sense. Courage, Paul; the years will soon fly over, and I shall yet see you Professor Drayton, sparring at your fifteen hundred dollar fee."

The table with laughed, and Paul smiled for sympathy. Over their frugal breakfast had they been talking; and now Paul rose—"Away, angel, away!" he said, as a spider in a web was waiting for flies. Good-by, Lizzie. I hope one of these hundred-dollar customers will call before I get into golden dollars, and spread them over the desk. "Ten dollars, which is exactly two dollars per month!"

"For the love of God, young gentleman, give me something to eat!"

Drayton turned quickly, to see a tall, gaunt woman, of apparently seventy, standing by his side. Her face, thickly covered with white hair, mingled of a silvery whiteness, straggled out from under a wretched bonnet. She extended her tin coin he had so lavishly displayed, and replaced it in his pocket. There was a greedy glare in the eyes of the woman, which for the first physical strength about her, that naturally hastened such an act. But there was no sign of weakness in her.

"Here," thought he, "is a real case of poverty, to whom my sixty-five dollars per month would be a godsend; but the pittance in my own pocket would bring scores of happiness. Why should I not give to her? Is it not the duty of every man more than I can receive in its outlay?"

The woman stood motionless, gazing into his face as though she read every thought, and but waited the relief.

"But—but," he continued, "should I give her such a sum it would but lead her to extravagance. The eyes of the woman, for a moment, as she looked doubtingly; then, closing her hand quickly, found more mysterious opening in her pocket—a receptacle for the "alms" worthy of thanks she hurried away, followed by the astonished eyes of Paul, who had received a shower of blessings for his liberality.

"I was plain enough," the woman believed she had received the coin in mistake; and in her anxiety to get away before discovery forgot her thanks.

It was, as I have said, a very warm day, and Paul Drayton sat by his desk and thought. His thought time was short, for he was soon at work, into the best years of his life; in thought of his educated youth, which every day of his life smothered, because poverty forbade their indulgence; in thought of the sweet wife at home, loving and uncomplaining; of the little ones, who should be not better himself by some bold, even if unscrupulous, step? Why had he not set on his name as the head of an advertisement of "Drayton's Improved and Dying Man's Friend Pills," or "Drayton's Life Pill?" Why should he care whether the Academy approved, as long as wealth rewarded. He saw the name of "Drayton Pills," and the "retired physicians, whose hands of life had nearly run out," filling in their carriages and building palaces. Could he not do the same? If the people wanted cannabis indica, opium, and chloroform, why not? Would not the full rush from his desk the material to compound a medicine that should banish a world, and bring him wealth boundless as his desires.

"A stimulant! All the world wants stimulating. Alcohol poisons—but half his powers. Stimulants will cell it out," said Paul, as he mixed the opium and cannabis indica. "Chloroform for dilution; it is revivifying," and he poured in the liquid ether. "Drayton's Revivifying Elixir. One Dollar per Bottle. The world will rain the dead," and Paul, with gentle and merrier, watched together the ingredients that were to form his wonder-working compound. As the aroma of the chloroform rose about him and filled the room, Paul rubbed away, making and with every rub rubbed away his dread of the Academy of Medicine. Visions of gold danced through his head. He would be a second Swaim, or Brandreth; the patent office, the Queen's speech of half a million per annum in advertising. The sums of Drayton's income in the last month of the year. How delicious the perfume of the chloroform! How the compounder would be blessed! A slight noise at his elbow made him turn; and again the old woman stood by him.

"——the grist thick and slab?"

"Good gentleman," said she, "you gave me this moment a coin of gold."

He nodded assent.

"I thought," she went on, "that you might have given it in mistake. My first impulse was to keep it, and be grateful to you; my second, to return and ask if you knew the value of your gift."

"It is yours," answered Drayton. "I knew its value when I gave it."

The woman's eye wandered from Drayton about the room. "And this is the world. When I am carried off a thousand, I shall wish to make it ten; when I am ten, I shall struggle for a hundred."

"Yes, most true," said Paul, as a philosopher—a student of human nature."

"Stay!" said Drayton to her, as she turned. A few wandered over the broad earth for sin; I have spent more than half my life in the search of luxurious in seeking it; but here I stand—seven-ty-eight years are upon me—and your dollar all I possess in the world."

Drayton slipped the other nine into her hand.

"This is not charity, good woman, I hope, surely! No sum man would not thus!" She turned the coin over, looking at Drayton, and biting her lip till she almost started.

"Did you not say you were poor?" answered he. "Do I not see you are unable to work? You have now my earnings for two years. Take them—you are welcome. I have health and strength; I can earn more. Are you poor, indeed?"

The woman walked backward and forward across the room for a few moments, and then, as though come over her face. "Yes," she said, "I will take them; they will save me. I can be healed yet! Heaven, sir, makes no movement in the best, but stopped and looked toward Drayton. "I can yet be about my work; I will be grateful to you." She continued, coming forward, and unfastening her shawl, "I shall give you what is greater than gold. I am a poor old woman, and have no wealth, fame, and happiness."

While speaking she drew from her neck a little bag, made, apparently, from a scrap of oiled silk, where it had hung by a black cord. "Take this," she said, "and be happy." My father gave it to me, gius; this was given him by a dervise, a mahometan sprite, one of the Hallingdarian tribe."

Drayton looked smilingly upon the little dirty bag that lay upon the woman's hand; and by-an, drew the mouth, and commenced to examine its contents. A single bit of parchment was found, and no more. This was scrawled over with a number of irregular characters, written in red, and a seal in the centre of the same color, looking as though it had been impressed with the end of the naked finger.

"Runes, I suppose?" he said, aloud, and turned to the woman for a response. She was gone!

Drayton looked from the parchment to the drawer of the desk, with, "Crazy! I thought she had something well-looking about her. Some poor, old, half-crazy body, and that will be the end of all the good it will do her. However," he continued, thoughtfully, "I shall keep the bag home; it will be a droll story to tell Lizzie, and she must see the charm." With this he put the oil-silk bag in his pocket.

Over his supper Paul told the story of the old woman, and, as he spoke of the bag, took it very unwillingly in her fingers, giving it a suspicious look—as on account of the dirt—and a reasonable doubt as to its cleanliness. She turned it about, and, looking inquiringly at Paul, nodded her head in a way which was significant to say anything. "Throw it in the street?"

"Oh, no, not that," replied Paul; keep it in sheer; it will be an illustration of my story."

"Your story, Sir," responded Lizzie, "I think will take the form of a poor fellow, with a wife and three children, gave ten dollars, the last he had in the world, to a wretched beggar woman. That ten dollars would almost have bought me the silk dress you have been promising these three years."

Paul pocketed the bag and the supper together, and stopped Lizzie's mouth with a kiss.

"I do not think I shall ever sing to the bedside, "what is the matter with Jennie to-day. She has not seemed well; she would eat no supper."

The father approached the bedside and looked at little Jennie, whose full-encircled child of three years. She was feverish. He felt her pulse.

She has eaten something that has disagreed with her. She will be well in the morning."

In an hour or two Jennie began to toss restlessly in bed, and soon she was seized with violent retchings. An attack of infant cholera nurinary—that rapid and fatal consumer enemy of children—had seized upon her. Every thing that the father's skill could suggest was tried; the aid of another physician was called in, but all was unavailing, and in nothing better than had been done; and the first dawn of morning saw the weeping parents watching by their little one, watching, every moment expecting its last breath.

Oh, Superstition! where hast thou not thy victories? Who is there can stand before the world and say he is not, in some one thing, thy slave? Drayton thought of the old woman's gift, the bag.

No! no! it was horrible, in such a moment, to dream of the thing. That which he viewed only as a joke—as the lumber or trash of an old beggar; he would not think of it! And yet what harm could there be in it? He knew it could not save his darling, but it could not injure her. He looked at Lizzie, as if to divine his thought? No, he would not use the bag; he would not disgrace himself before her. Disgrace! what was disgrace if he could save his child? Lizzie knelt by the side of the bed, and buried her face in her hands. Paul, she knew, was praying, and let him the mode to save his feelings, and give him a chance to try the charm. He would! In a moment the table bag was in the child's hand. Lizzie, in the agonies of her sickness she head was tightly shut, and Paul felt as he forced it open as though he were violating the sanctity of death. He kissed the pale forehead of his child, and again resumed his chair by the bedside.

In a few minutes Jennie stirred. He sprang to the head of the bed. He opened her eyes; the glazing sensation of hope for an instant paralyzed him. No, it could not be! It was only the revival before death. He turned to his wife, and from the fire to another. "Papa—mamma," she murmured—"I—I—feel—well." Heaven! hope for the drink—Paul, with an entire prayer uttered in the rush of his words, "O God!" and Lizzie, with a strange cry of joy.

Jennie was raised, and took a good drink, and then sank into a refreshing sleep. She looked very tired." In a few moments she had dropped away in a sweet slumber. Paul and Lizzie, with a solemn consequent on the attack, stood over the mother and the mingled together their hearts. Paul covered little Jennie, and in doing so noticed the bag from the bed, where she had dropped it on rising to drink.

Paul carried it to a far window of the room, and looked upon it in the gray morning light. What strange superstition! Paul, in the sincerity of peace, or did this bit of parchment possess the mighty power claimed for it? Paul, in all wonder, exclaimed, Paul Drayton, he thought. You, the man of mind and education, rejecting the mercies of Heaven, and all for a moment! Paul shrieked in the unnatural tales of an old ignorant beggar! Upon the window and drew the parchment. Drop away from you! No, urged Superstition; pray, hope, yes. Perhaps more! Perhaps there is a power in it. I shall pray, and Paul prayed.

Paul returned to the bed. Jennie was sleeping serenely; Lizzie was watching by her side; and Paul put the bag in his pocket.

Reason goes but little way against fate. A week from that day Jennie was dead, and the child of man could raise her, and yet in a few moments he had thrown himself out of the room of death, and now only wanted rest to be the same as ever; and each time as he thought of the bag would hastily draw the charm from his pocket and look upon it.

The breakfast was late next morning; for Lizzie lay long sleeping, with little Jennie in her arms; and great was the joy of Paul when he knew they was their sick ticket of the night before propped up in her high chair, nibbling at a bit of toast. Although he was forced to make his visits early, and the thought of the charm, and his anxiety to try it, took him over the most distant side-day as he left for his office; the sun poured down its hottest rays, and Paul luxuriated in an umbrella, and pitied a great gentleman in a carriage with a friend of him without one. The good gentleman stopped to reassure his friend and with the perspiration from the bald spot on the top of his head. While engaged in this operation the great gentleman seemed to stagger, fell back in his chair, and before he was went before Paul could reach him. He was rather too heavy for the task of lifting by himself, he was, therefore, obliged to remain content with holding the umbrella over his head, and calling for aid, which soon came in the shape of a couple of burly Irishmen, from a building just being erected close by. They took up the old gentleman, and then the bald spot on the top of his head. While engaged in this operation the great gentleman seemed to stagger, fell back in his chair, and before he was went before Paul could reach him. He was rather too heavy for the task of lifting by himself, he was, therefore, obliged to remain content with holding the umbrella over his head, and calling for aid, which soon came in the shape of a couple of burly Irishmen, from a building just being erected close by. They took up the old gentleman, and then him to a drug-store on the corner, where, Paul announcing himself as a physician, every thing was at once placed at his disposal for the patient's relief. It was useless; he had received a severe stroke of the sun, and at the end of an hour was dead.

Paul brought the body home to the old gentleman, and then at last, and said, "Dead!"

"No," said Paul, "not yet, the artery beats. Good Heavens," he thought, "the charm! Why not try it? He took it from his pocket and the little back room, where the old gentleman was carried, Drayton, with a feeling approaching a presentiment which he pretended he wished to try, sent the drug-gist out to compound it. He then slipped the bag into the old gentleman's hand. The druggist was back in a minute with the mixture, and Paul dropped a table spoon full into the dying man. In a very few moments he opened his eyes, and resting them on the now frightened druggist, asked where he was. That gentleman responded by handing his card, which the old gentleman sat up to read. Paul, seeing the name of the druggist, which Paul very quietly pocketed, rather doubtful himself whether he was not possessed of some of the powers of the bag.

"I believe I am indebted to you for my life," said the old gentleman to the druggist.

"No, no!" said that not yet composed person; "not to me; there is the one who saved you; and a most extraordinary thing too, to bring a dead man to life with a few drops of aqua ammonia and spirit vinum."

The old gentleman by this time had got upon his feet, and advanced toward Drayton, his hand outstretched, which Paul heartily grasped. In a few moments a carriage was called, and, handing Paul a card bearing the name of one of the wealthiest merchants in the city, invited him to extend his attentions so much farther as to accompany him to his house. As it was in a professional light, Paul readily consented, and escorted his patient safely to his home, where he advised his immediate retirement to rest and sleep. The old gentleman shook his hand affectionately at parting, charging him to call next day, and by the same grasp transferring a bank-note to Drayton's palm. When he reached the street he opened the deposit, and found the first of the hundred-dollar fees that Lizzie had promised him. Paul was astounded. Here was an investment. Ten dollars one day returning a hundred the next. He hurried through the street, clutching his hand tightly over the pocket which contained the bag. At last he had something to lose, something to guard. Visions of wealth, boundless as the sea, rolled in on him; his fancy already had ensconced Lizzie and the children in a double brown stone house; in a few minutes more he had settled the style of his liveries, and concluded in what banks he should keep account. He would not waste time, he must now make money; five years of his life were gone for nothing; every day must tell its story; and he drew from his pocket the hundred-dollar bill and gazed again upon it with admiring eyes. All that day sat Paul in the office dreaming over what should be his course in his newly-acquired power. He had yet to tell all to Lizzie. Ah! there's the point; should he tell all? He would not be in a hurry about it. Wait a little. Women are fickle; women love to talk; women—women—well, what are women? Why, women are women. True; so Paul concluded he would wait. It was the first thing he had ever concealed from Lizzie; and that evening when he went home there was a guilty feeling about him which he had never experienced before. When he told Lizzie the story of the hundred-dollar fee he did not tell her the great secret of it, and her womanly instinct told her there was something wrong, but she said nothing. Though notwithstanding the knowledge of possessing more money than they had been in control of at one time since they had been married, and that Paul had told her, "Now she should have that silk dress right away, to-morrow," yet Lizzie was not happy. And though Paul walked about the room and whistled, and tried to persuade himself that it was better to have it so for a while—just for a while—yet Paul was not happy. Paul thought it must be the weather, it was so oppressively hot. And then when Lizzie came to him, with just the least bit of a tear struggling in her eye, and throwing her arms about his neck, kissed him, and, looking in his face, seemed to say, "Dear Paul, tell me every thing," then his resolution was staggered, and he thought he would make a clean breast of it; but Lizzie did not say the very words, and so Paul made no confession.

Oh, this first fatal error of those who are sworn to love and confidence! It is like the first step in crime, it gathers force as it proceeds, and is only checked by total ruin, or by disgrace and distrust, that years of truth and probity scarcely fail to remove. No permanent trouble can exist between husband and wife where there has been entire confidence on both sides. Love is ever forgiving, and though they err for the hundredth time, yet will the heart be open to receive, and the answer to the confession, "No matter for the past, let the future retrieve it."

There was more about this charm than merely its healing properties. So thought Paul Drayton as he sat in his office next day, when a breathless servant entered to summon him to immediate attendance on her lady—a lady whom the young physician knew immediately, on hearing the name, to be one of the most aristocratic leaders of ton. Her house was near, and, as the servant explained, "She had been took very bad with bleeding, and the whole room was covered with blood." When Paul arrived, he found a young and beautiful woman, in the last effort of life, bleeding from a ruptured blood-vessel. Paul saw at once there was no hope, and saying so to her weeping friends, advised them to send immediately for their family physician. He had been sent for, but the messenger had not yet returned. Paul stood painfully affected, holding the pulse of the dying lady, and asking the circumstances of the occurrence. A flood of passion and anger at an erring servant was the cause. Soon came the regular medical attendant of the family, who advanced to the lady, merely glancing at Paul, and, taking her pulse, pronounced it too late—nothing could be done.

"Do you give her up, doctor?" said Paul, respectfully. The doctor was one of the magnates of the profession, whom Paul in his most triumphant visions of success never thought of meeting in consultation.

"Ah! yes, yes," said the great man, looking at Paul through his glasses as though he was looking at some casual picture to which he was obliged to give attention; "I don't see that any thing can be done."

"I will try," said Paul, quietly, "to stop the bleeding."

The great physician merely looked again at Paul through his glasses, with an expression that seemed to say, "What impudent rascal is this, who dares put his opinion in opposition to mine?" So tyrannical is the force of habit, that Paul, to the moment of making this observation to the great doctor, had forgotten the possession of the bag—that which for hours previous had absorbed every thought. Now that he was brought into the chamber of the sick, the old practice came back upon him, and only the remedies that education suggested came to his mind. The charm was forgotten. Now it flashed upon his mind. If in this case it was successful, no longer could he be a doubter.

The last spark of life was trembling in the fair lady's frame when Paul stepped to her side and raised her listless hand. The great doctor walked about the room, holding his handkerchief, and seeming to say to it, "What is to become of the profession when such quiet, plain-dressed men as this are suffered to come into great families and give an opinion?"

Paul, unnoticed, held the bag in the lady's palm, pretending to examine her pulse. Scarce ten minutes had elapsed when the blood ceased to pass from her mouth, and she opened her eyes. In a few minutes more she looked at Drayton, and said, "Doctor, I dreamed I was dead."

The great doctor started; it was the first intimation he had received of her recovery. He had been too busily conversing with his handkerchief to notice any thing else. "Good Heavens! what a wonderful recovery!" he ejaculated. "Extraordinary constitution, to recover from such an attack!"

Paul held up his finger for silence. The great doctor strode away in disgust.

In a short time the charm was softly withdrawn, and the lady lifted by Paul to the bed, where she soon dropped away to a comfortable sleep. The young physician then withdrew, after seeing the great doctor away before him, and charging the attendants to let nobody interfere with his patient, or give her any thing until he returned.

In the afternoon Drayton was with her again, when she awakened from her sleep. She blessed him with her eyes. He had forbidden her to speak. She took his hand, and before Paul was aware of her intention raised it to her lips, and drawing from her finger a valuable ring slipped it on his. This was a style of professional fee he had never yet received, and he scarcely knew what to do, but on the first appearance of an attempt on his part to replace it on its original finger, the look of the lady deterred him and he retained the costly gift.

As Paul went home that evening he glanced again and again at the magnificent ring and thought of the lady. He thought how beautiful she was. "Ah! why did I marry so early in life? If I had waited until now, wealth and position would have followed my marriage. I could have chosen from the highest and the proudest." And then how his heart chid him; it was his first treasonable thought toward Lizzie, that sweet wife who had struggled with him through poverty and humbleness. Why should he now wish to deny her reward, when he saw before him wealth and greatness? Again Paul entered his home with constraint. He felt when giving the ring to Lizzie as though it were dishonestly obtained. And when Lizzie looked in his eyes, burst into tears, and returned him the gem, saying, "Keep it, Paul, wear it yourself!" Paul determined next day to settle the matter by selling the bauble, and using the money for her and the children's benefit. Never before had Drayton spent such an evening at home—never before had he felt that what lay heaviest on his own mind could not be transferred to Lizzie's, that they might bear the load between them. He walked nervously about the room, and finally took his hat and hurried away into the street. Paul felt the cool air upon his heated face, but it could not quench the fire in his heart. There was but one thought in his brain—money, money! He must be rich—he must be rich, and why should he tell any one how he acquired his wealth—was not his profession a cloak to this?

"Oh dear! oh dear!" cried a little weak voice at his side.

"What is the matter," said Paul, rather sternly, turning to see a little barefoot child running by him.

"Oh dear! oh dear!" was the answer.

"Why don't you speak?" shouted Paul. He knew he was not speaking in his natural way, but then he was nervous. "And why didn't the child answer him?"

"Oh father, father!" sobbed the child.

"Where?" said Paul; "what's the matter with your father?"

"Dying!" gasped the girl, pointing down the street.

"Come," said Paul, "I will go with you."

"I was sent for a doctor," answered the child.

"I am a doctor," replied Paul, and for the first time he thought, "This does not seem like a very promising patient."

The child trotted on before and ushered Paul into a cellar, where, upon the floor, his head supported by a straw pillow, lay a man, bloated and blue-faced, in a fit from drunkenness; the other inmates of the cellar were a pale-faced, consumptive-looking woman and three crying children.

Paul looked a moment at the man, and then turning to the woman, bade her silence the children and he would do what he could: he gave him the proper remedies and stood waiting to see their effects. The woman, who had quieted the children, returned to gaze upon her beastly husband, and Paul drew from her the following particulars of her life: She had married this man while she was very young, in opposition to all her friends. He was then wild and dissipated, and had grown worse each year, until he had reduced himself to the present degraded state. She had lost all care for him, but feared to leave him, as he had threatened in case she did so to kill her on the first opportunity, and she declared in a flood of tears that she knew he would. Could she leave him, her parents, who were still living, would again receive her and her children; but as long as she remained with him they could not. In truth, she would not ask their assistance. It would only aggravate her position. This was the woman's story. And now, Paul Drayton, where is your charm? The bloated drunkard, the false father, the brutal husband, lies there dying on the floor, and all the skill of your craft can not save him. You know it too, Paul Drayton. You know he can not be saved but by the charm. Why should you not? Is one human life more valuable than another? Is this drunkard less in the eye of God than the beautiful lady or the wealthy merchant? Who made thee, Paul Drayton, the arbiter of life and death? Do you remember the oath of Hippocrates? Save this dying wretch. "No," said Paul Drayton, "let him die!"

And he died!

Paul Drayton went forth that night from the cellar and looked again upon the stars a different man. He had taken in his own hands that which the Great Power hath said belongeth only to Him. Reason and argument could not acquit him in his own conscience. And he returned to his home only to feel that if he had concealed from Lizzie a portion of his secret he must now conceal from her all. The gulf widened between them.

Doctor Drayton was attaining reputation. His cures did not long remain hidden. They were in the mouths of the great. And soon he emerged from his little shabby office in a by-street to a brilliant suit of rooms upon a great and fashionable thoroughfare. Lizzie clung to her humble home as long as possible, but the family of the rapidly rising physician could not remain in obscurity. They must go into society. No lack now of silk dresses. Paul has a carriage, we were about to say a brougham, and the brilliant young doctor is sought beyond his power of reciprocation. Wealth rolls in; but a shade is upon the face and upon the heart of Paul Drayton. He is no longer happy. He has thrown off all his old patients, all the poor. He has not time now for charity calls. The bright, the beautiful, the gay, the rich, come to Dr. Drayton. He sits in his sumptuous office and receives them with gravity and hauteur. His secretary takes the fees. It is only those of the great who can not come to Dr. Drayton upon whom he will call. Lizzie has become a fashionable woman of society. She tells the doctor that she feels every day of her life that she was intended for this, she is so admired, so flattered. There are no more quiet dinners and suppers; no more evenings to themselves. Lizzie is always engaged. The doctor's friends congratulate him on his beautiful and gay wife. And Lizzie comes from her balls and parties too wearied to tell Paul what has been said, and what has been done. Paul hears it, however, from kind friends, and Paul does not feel easy. Lizzie calls him now "Drayton," or "Doctor," no longer "Paul." The children Paul sees seldom; they are in the hands of their bonne, or their governess, and when Paul has an interview it is a stately one. He is now a great doctor; it will not do to unbend even before servants. Paul loses few patients—very few. But—ah!—but he must lose some or there would be suspicion. Oh! Paul Drayton, the charm! the charm! If it saves one, it saves all. Remember the poor drunkard on the cellar floor. "Oh yes; but that is so long ago." Paul Drayton has become inured to this. He must not save all. This power that rests with him is a mighty one, and he uses it with the best judgment.

He does? Then Paul Drayton goes into the highways and by-ways, and seeks out the poor and forlorn; he makes no difference between them and the rich. Is this so? But why does he lose any patients?

Paul Drayton goes not into the highways and by-ways; his mission lies among the rich and great. Paul Drayton could not save all; if he did, suspicion would attach to his wonderful success, and all good be lost.

All wrong—all wrong! Paul Drayton, this is a gift that should not be in the hand of man. Surrender unto God the power that belongs to him alone. Destroy the charm.

No, no! Paul Drayton must keep the charm; he must save; he must have wealth. The charm was given into his hand without restriction. He will keep it.

Keep it!

How wonderfully the world prospered with Dr. Drayton! Now he had houses and lands; now he had carriage and horses; now he had bank-stock and bank accounts; now he looked into the papers to see whether Erie and Central stock had fallen or risen; now Lizzie had silks and satins, diamonds and damask, rosewood and magnificence. No dinners surpassed Dr. Drayton's; no parties equaled Mrs. Drayton's. But where were the smiles, where the dreamy looks from Lizzie's eyes that, now no more seen, were to Paul better than thousands? Where were Lizzie's tears? Mrs. Drayton did not cry any more, save for vexation at the failure of a mantua-maker or milliner to please her. Mrs. Drayton now could talk to her guests of the folly of embarking freely in the ordinary affairs of the world. Mrs. Drayton became a patron of great charitable societies, and her name was seen in the newspapers. But Mrs. Drayton was never seen among the lowly and humble. Mrs. Drayton did not encourage beggary.

Paul was too busy to go with his wife into society. Occasionally he accompanied her, but not by her own persuasion. Mrs. Drayton had become sufficiently fashionable to believe in a wife being free from the surveillance of the husband. She had no hesitation in avowing this to Paul. Good-natured friends told him pointedly that he ought to accompany Mrs. D. more. Paul did not understand. One who signed herself a "Friend," by an anonymous letter, called his attention to the fact that Mrs. D. was seen rather too much with a certain roue in the streets, and in public places. Paul burned the letter. He would as soon have doubted the truth of his charm as Lizzie. One evening, seated in his office until a late hour, there came over him a dullness unusual, and without cause he rose and rang for a servant, who was instructed to go to Mrs. Drayton and say to her the Doctor wished her.

The servant returned to say Mrs. Drayton had gone to a party at Mr. S——'s. Paul remembered he had promised to add his own presence to his wife, but having forgotten it, Lizzie had not brought it to his memory. He would go; the carriage was ordered. An hour afterward Paul Drayton entered the house where he expected to meet his wife. She passed up the rooms as he advanced to greet the host, but did not see her husband. It was with a slight spasm of pain that Paul saw her leaning on the arm of the man against whom the anonymous letter had warned him. It was gone in a moment. Gerald Morton might be a roue, but he was a friend of Paul Drayton. No man could abuse the confidence of his friend; so Paul argued, but not satisfyingly. He watched Lizzie and Morton, and still tried to persuade himself that he did not. Why did not Paul advance to her? Why did he rather seek the shade of a curtain, and sit, half-hidden, in the conservatory? Lizzie was pleased with the words of Morton. She never gave her husband those looks now. Could she love him? Oh no; Paul would not think of such a thing, coupled with the name of Lizzie Drayton. See, they come toward him. They have seen him. No—they come to seat themselves on the ottoman near Paul. Why does he crowd closer behind the curtain? Does he mistrust? Listen!

"Drayton may be a very good man, but does he fill the requirements of a spirit like yours?" said Morton, as they seated themselves. "Can he, the dull, plodding, methodical man, absorbed in his profession, know the spiritual wants, the cravings of your heart?"

"Drayton is no longer what he was," sighed the lady. "Once he knew no world but myself. We were poor, and he brought to my feet all his hopes and sorrows, and shared with me all his benefits. Now he brings me only his sorrows; his joys, if he has any, he keeps to himself."

"Oh that it had been my lot to have met a spirit like yours untrammeled! What homage could I have offered! The world has nothing to give me now but this! I have wealth, position, youth, and talent; under such guidance I could become great!"

Paul Drayton clutched the curtain; the world seemed passing from under him. Could it be that Lizzie—his wife—could sit and listen to this!

"Mr. Morton, you are young enough to find one who will yet meet your heart's requirements, and who will be untrammeled to respond to them."

"No, Lizzie [Lizzie! oh Heavens, he called her Lizzie!], not on this earth! To you only I can look for this. Only say you love me! Say but this word, and I can be happy!" He caught her hand, which she allowed him to retain.

"Gerald [again Paul Drayton clutched the curtain and groaned], I love you, but I am the wife of another; and, however much I love you, that love can never be other than it is."

"Lizzie, listen to me. In one week I leave this country for Europe. Say but the single word, and your children shall be with you, and in the—"

They rose and passed away. Staggering like one struck with sudden blindness, Paul Drayton reached the street and his home. The last hope, the last stay was taken from under him. What was his wealth to him now—what his fame? The pure heart that, in the days of his poverty, he could pour all his own into, had passed away from him. He had no longer a wife. Better had she died in the days when she was his own Lizzie than lived to this. What should he do? Should he meet her upon her return, upbraid her, curse her? Or should he leave her to her own willful course—let her go to that ruin to which she was fast hurrying? Should he seek to win her back? No! she was no longer worthy of it. He paced his rooms; he bit the flesh from his finger ends till the blood started; he rang for light. "More light!—wine!—throw open the windows!" He threw off his coat—"Hot! hot! my brain burns!"

Was this the calm, quiet Paul Drayton, like a maniac, striding through the rooms to the speechless terror of the servant he had summoned? Could this be the great doctor, tearing coat, vest, and cravat away, and calling for wine?

Yes! Paul Drayton—the man of uncounted wealth—the man whose great triumphs in physic had reached a world.

But what is the matter with Paul Drayton? Why does he stop so suddenly by the light? Why does he look at his arm; and why has the color gone from his cheek? Why that bloodless lip?

Yes, Paul Drayton, it is so; that dark skin gathering on your arm is what you suspect. The charm! the charm, Doctor!—from the charm! Ha, ha! well may you shriek. It is leprosy! From the charm, Doctor! The charm carries the infection. But the charm has no power to cure one who has wielded it.

"A letter—from whom? What is it? Read—I can not see."

"A message from Mr. S——:

"'Mrs. Drayton has gone away with Gerald Morton—'"

There was one long groan and a heavy fall, and Paul's next consciousness found him stretched upon a sofa, and several very familiar faces looking down upon him. Lizzie's was the first he recognized.

"Oh, Lizzie!" he gasped. "Then it is not true—is it? You did not go off with Gerald Morton?"

"Gerald Morton! who is that, Paul? What are you talking of? Here have you been frightening us all to death; and but for good Mrs. Smith you might have killed yourself."

"That's true, Doctor," chimed in another familiar face—the old lady from whom Paul hired his furnished office. "I heard a great noise, and I took the liberty of looking in, and found you raving round like, and breaking things. So I jist sent off for Dr. Wilson and Mrs. Drayton, while I and this ere gentleman held you quiet for a while."

Paul shook hands with Dr. Wilson. The Doctor merely remarked that "the effects of chloroform were very singular, and no reliance could be placed on its action." Paul looked around on all the familiar furnishings of his old office, and upon Lizzie, and thought so too. And then he slipped his hand gently into his pocket and felt for the charm, which he did not find; and again for the golden dollars, of which he did find nine.

Some years have passed away since then, and Paul Drayton is now the successful physician. He bids fair yet to know the meaning of a hundred-dollar fee. Lizzie has luxuriated in many a silk dress; and Paul drives a gig, and is one of the severest disciplinarians of the Academy against vendors and makers of patent medicines. Yet Paul is slightly inclined to think that there was something in that Vision of Chloroform; and that the old beggar would confess, if ever he could find her, that she possessed some little powers of witchcraft.

THE ROSIÈRE OF 1858.

ONCE A ROSIÈRE.

THE ROSIÈRE OF 1712.

THE CEREMONY OF CROWNING A ROSIÈRE IN A FRENCH VILLAGE.

HOW GOOD GIRLS ARE REWARDED IN FRANCE.

We herewith give an illustration of one of the most interesting social institutions in France—the crowning of a rosière.

Many of our readers may be unacquainted with the custom. It is of the highest antiquity, and prevails very generally throughout the rural districts of the Empire. It has outlived many a reign and many a régime. Rosières were crowned before the great monarch, Louis the Fourteenth, was born; rosières are still crowned, in the same way, and for the like reasons, under the sway of the Emperor Napoleon the Third.

A rosière is the young woman who has proved herself the "best girl" of her parish, commune, or village. Once a year, in many rural districts in France, the Mayor and municipal authorities are called upon to decide what unmarried girl in the parish or village has proved herself kindest, best, and truest. They are bound to make a selection. They may take evidence. But in small communities the virtues and failings of every member of society are so notorious that the judges, on the rosière question, seldom need the aid of witnesses. Long before the day arrives for the solemn ceremony of the coronation every one has decided who deserves the honor, and the pressure of public opinion is such that the authorities can seldom practice any unfairness. Once or twice instances have been known of young ladies obtaining the crown of rosière through the mistaken kindness of relatives in authority. But on such occasions the public dissent from the official verdict has been so decided as to render the honor decidedly unenviable; and, in general, it may be said that the decisions of the authorities are impartial.

As the qualities which entitle a young lady to be crowned rosière are goodness of heart and intelligence only, neither beauty nor rank are of any avail in procuring the much-desired honor. Indeed, as it happens in France (of course no such rule obtains in the United States) that young ladies who are beautiful or rich seldom condescend to enhance their attractions by a display of extraordinary kindness and amiability, it is a mere occurrence that the rosière is either lovely or of high station. Generally speaking, the favored one is plain and poor; the daughter of some poor workman, famed only for her gentleness to her sequestered life, her assiduity in tending the sick, and her readiness to give up her own enjoyments in order to minister to the comfort or happiness of others.

The rule is that no girl can be twice crowned rosière. This is no absolute rule; there is no law on the subject. But either—like our own law against the second re-election of the same person to the Presidency—as deduction from practice thus a product of principle. In fact, as no married woman can be crowned rosière, there is seldom a possibility of crowning a young person twice; but when reflected on a lady by her coronation as rosière is sure to secure her a choice of husbands for the year in question. A young French farmer is prouder of being able to say that his wife was a rosière than of winning a prize in every within her.

In itself, the coronation of a rosière is an honorary distinction merely. The ceremony is picturesque, but confers no practical benefit. The lady is led to some public place in the village or parish, where a speech is made to her by the orator of the day; and a sermon preached over her by the priest. Then the Mayor, or the highest public functionary present, crowns her with a garland of roses, and admonishes the young women present to follow in those one hundred and forty-six years ago. The coincidence has added much interest to the ceremony. A portrait of the two rosières—one of 1712 and the one of 1858—will be found on the preceding page.

At the same place, Nanterre, there was, some ten years since, a close contest for the honors of rosière. The competitors were Jeanne, the daughter of a baker, and an orphan named Madeline, who supported herself and a sister by sewing—a more difficult task in France than it would be here. Both were, undoubtedly, very good girls. Neither had ever been known to do or to say an unkind thing. The baker's daughter was rather good-looking; Madeline was small and plain. Each had her friends, and loved each other as young girls love. As the time approached they were the only residents of the village who were not excited about it. Madeline's fault was satisfied that the other ought to be rosière. The choice being otherwise entrusted, it was likely that Jeanne would win the day, the baker, her father, being a man of influence and weight. She was universally beloved, and all would be pleased to see her good fortune. But, strange to say, a few days before the selection, the village of Nanterre was shocked to hear that Jeanne had roughly repulsed a poor crippled woman who had solicited alms of her, and had the old creature not fled from her blows, or want but for the kindness of Madeline, who had shared her humble lodging with her. This settled the question. Madeline was the rosière. No one congratulated her more heartily than Jeanne, and the marriage, within a few weeks, a promising furnace of the neighborhood. It was not known till long afterward that the attack of the old woman was an imposture, planned by the good Jeanne, in order that her friend should win the prize.

Miscellany.

What is Life?

Dr. Chalmers says:

The mere lapse of years is not life. To eat, drink, and sleep, to be exposed to darkness and light; to pace around in the mill of habit, and turn the mill of wealth; to make money and lose it, keeper, and thought an implement of trade: this is not life. In all this but a poor fraction of the unconsciousness of humanity is awakened. In it the sensities still slumber which make it worth while to be. Imagine, then, a fresh, keen, watery, goodness, faith, alone can give vitality to the true conclusion of existence; the laugh of mirth which vibrates through the heart; the tear which flows from the wastes within, the music that brings childhood back, the prayer that calls the future near, the death that startles us with mystery, the hardship which forces us to struggle, the anxiety that ends in being.

—Punch, who, as every body knows, is the best-natured of funny men, has generously communicated to an anxious world the secret by which Mr. Barney Williams

"Dances Jigs."

We are so pleased by our inquisitive acquaintance as to the modus operandi of Mr. Barney, as at the sacrifice of our sweet, and the risk of incurring a penalty of £5000 for a violation of contract with the illustrious horse-tamer, we proceed to make known to the world the system by which the most vicious and unmanageable horse is rendered perfectly amiable and tractable. We will give the case of Cruiser. Mr. Barney, after carefully approached this violent animal, and having established a communication between them which succeeded perfectly satisfactory to the horse, Mr. Barney proceeded to unstrew the four legs of Cruiser, and to remove his head. Having performed these difficult operations with considerable skill, Mr. Barney then introduced himself into the interior of the animal, and remained some five or six minutes. He then emerged, and rubbed the horse's tail with a preparation of cold cream and cayenne pepper, replaced the head, rescrewed on the legs, and Cruiser from that moment was subjugated forever.

—Mrs. Eliza Bus insisted that

What the Girls need

Is a little love, to keep our girls, you want, generally speaking, more liberty and less fashionable restraint; more kitchen and less parlor; more knowledge and less music; more making puddings and less piano; more frankness and less mock-modesty; more breakfast and less lying abed in the morning."

Providence.

"From morning mist will shadow steal."

The stone upon the wayside road will feel,
And from the bird's mouth; and in that silent veil
It quivers, and it trembles, and it grows
Till, lip-and-by, a rose, a single one,
Lifted to Heaven, unto the sun.

It chanced, a wicked man approached one day,
And saw the tender, glorious look it wore;
Perhaps—for it, remember, is a story—
Grew in a garden-bed, or by the door
That he in idleness days had plucked around,
For his knees, trembling, sank upon the ground.

Then, o'er this place of bleeding earth, the tears
Of penitence and sorrow fell like showers;
The golden key of love—that sin for years
In his stone heart had held—opened there,
Was loosened, and his heart, that very hour,
Became a heart of love, a emotion, like a flower.

—The following letter from General Bonaparte

to a young lady who should be read by every little boy and girl in the land.

"My dear Georgie.—This is your birthday, and here I am in the midst of the home in which I was born, five years ago, to write you a letter. Now, though I am in the midst of the home of freedom enough, when you get these lines, to call to mind how very good God was to you on this day, in preserving the life of your poor mamma, who was so sick that no one thought she would recover. At that time you had a little sister also, but am now so much better, by God's mercy, that I have not had my suffering to complain of since I returned to this beautiful home. I am sure that when I get on board my steamer at Boston, to go to Maine, on my way to Lake Erie, taking that, nowadays, it is the fashion for little boys, like you, to do so work till they are seven years old; so, if you are good you will be seven years old the next day; but then you must begin to labor in earnest. And I will tell you what I will do for you. The first thing is to love God, and to understand His law, and obey it, and to believe and love Jesus Christ, who He sent into the world to die on the cross to all people who will believe in Him. Then, as it is likely you will be a soldier, as all boys are in India, you will have to be taught to ride well, and a little Latin, and a great deal of mathematics, which are also very useful to soldiers, and English history, and French and German, Hindostanee, drawing, and dancing. But not all these at once, as a great deal—quite a jumbo, and a cart-load of learning. But if you are from the first very industrious, and never let any of the little things pass over without four hours' diligent study, at each, you will get through them wonderfully, and everything before you is cut down into a very little hill indeed."

Chemistry in Germany.

It is usual for lovers to tie large bunches of hawthorn to the windows of their sweet-hearts on the 1st of May. Some young ladies, however, who have not been fortunate enough to have obtained an offer, get the bunches for sale, and conceal it by the spiteful or the peculiar over their threshold; and it is by no means uncommon for the fair creatures who are thus treated to take the hawthorn from the casements of their rivals in the night, and tying them to the sash of their own, display them with some of their chaff in return. It is customary, also, for swains to go to the windows of their fancies, and play on a pipe, by which they gain a happy new-year. The term of betrothal is of different durations. In some cases it lasts only for a short period, but in others it continues for many years. It is frequently the custom for a lady to be betrothed to a young man, before the subordinate situation under Government, upon the understanding that he may be promoted, the object the youth's salary reaches an amount that is deemed sufficient for the maintenance of the pair. Others, again, are betrothed during their infancy, even though every one in Prussia knows that the full person "Children are born betrothed, and they marry until they reach the rank of captain, unless, indeed, they be able to depart the sum of twelve thousand dollars to the crown, by the intercession of the interest of which is, under certain circumstances, held to be little less than the maintenance of his wife. The State, however, does not limit its paternal care to officers alone; it has a like regard for the interests of all persons of limited means, and will not allow them to commit matrimony until they give good evidence that they have the wherewithal to support a family. In Coblentz, for instance, no one can become a benedict unless he can show his fashionability. This is a little while ago, cost only eight thalers; but the poorer families were found to increase in equity at these moderate terms, that the richer deterred upon raising the purchase-money for the city freedom to thirty-six thalers (upward of $20), so as to offer every obstruction they could to marriages among the humbler portion of the community.

—A recent traveler thus describes

Life in a Tycoon's Palace:

The nuns never lie down, but sleep upright. I went up a narrow, cork-screw stone stair-case, into their cells, and saw these extraordinary beds; they consist of a hard and almost cylindrical mattress stuffed with straw, about three feet long, at right angles, to which is fixed an equally hard, upright pillalone, to support the back. There is no pillow, neither are there sheets, and only one small thin blanket. A basin and ewer of water stood on the ground, and the sleeping nun had a wooden log behind the door. There was no other furniture. A small window opened on to the garden, and the honey-suckle which embowered it gave something of a cheerful aspect to the denuded little dormitory.

They rise at 2 A. M. (mid-day, an only allowed two minutes to wash and dress, and go down to chapel, where they say their matins and half past five, when their first mass is said. This is always at a fixed hour, and is followed by one and sometimes two others. About three they remain in the chapel till breakfast eleven. Their first meal, which they call asaze, is at half-past eight, and consists generally of barley, vegetables, rice, eggs, etc. Butter, cheese, milk, and what they call dad sauce, they also eat, but never flesh, nor seasons. Their second and last meal is at seven, and consists of dry bread and thin tea—no milk or sugar. The sisters may sing for themselves—washing, mending, sweeping, scouring, etc. The rule of the lay sisters is slightly less severe in some respects, but none is so strict as to enough to startle most peasants.

The life of the Tycoon and the mysteries of the house was a very pleasant, amiable-looking woman of about thirty-five. She had a peculiarly calm expression of countenance, and appeared to enjoy perfectly happy in the life of which she had made her choice, and which was one of strict rule and discipline they observe, she said, was ben pour l'ame et bon pour le corps sauve. It seems they are renowned for their cookery, and to prevent too great an attachment to one locality.

The Sores of Egypt.

She and another lady sister were sent a short time ago on a mission to England, and this was another considerable grievance to her; but she does not appear to have thoroughly accepted as one of acts of submission to the will of her superior to which her rule bound her. She was eight days on board at London, when they put up at the hotel, they were shown into a room where the beds were, of course, unoccupied. She was a difficult while had not occurred to them, and they made up their minds to sleep on the floor, as was the rest of the world. But no sooner had they tried it than they found it impossible to sleep; accordingly, they removed the bedding to the floor, and taking the mattress off the bedstead, placed it half upright against the wall, and found it to be perfectly satisfied with their ingenious expedient.

—Michael Angelo Titmarsh has this sensible word to say

Consolation for Wall-flowers.

My fair young reader, if you are not so perfect and pretty as Miss Lucinda-Amanda-Jemima-Sophia-Ball, if at the end of it, as you retire to bed, you perceive that you have not had so many partners, while Lindamira has had a crowd round her all night—consols yourself with thinking that, if she's pretty, she is a fool and ignorant as you appear now at eighteen. You will not have to lay down your cash as she will of vanity and to see the depreciation of your smiles. You will not see fashion forsake your quarter to follow after her. You will not, within a within your once splendid saloons, and placards in your sad windows, gaunt, lonely, and dark. You will not have the pleasure of seeing her, but you won't feel any desertion. You will not have enjoyed millions, but you will have enjoyed tranquillity.

Odd Thoughts.

Grey hairs, like honest friends, are plucked out and cast under foot by unpleasant people.

When a woman begins to count her admirers, it is a proof that she has not a number in decency.

"Do not cry," said Sophie, the German critic, to a lady who was evidently reaged: "your tears will make you plain."

"The heart of a cold beauty," says Saphir, is one of his works, "is like a pond, in which she preserves her affections or her lover."

He was justly accounted a skillful poisoner who destroyed his victim with a bouquet of lovely and fragrant flowers. The art has not been lost; nay, it is practiced every day by—the world.—Bishop Latimer.

Dark blue eyes are most common in persons of delicate, refined, and sensitive nature; light blue, and much more, gray eyes, in the hardy and active. Greenish eyes have something of a double meaning in them. Hazel eyes are the most usual indications of a mind masculine, vigorous, and practical. Shakspeare, it is said, had hazel eyes; Swift, blue eyes; Milton, Scott, and Byron, gray eyes.

"The goal of yesterday will be the starting-point of to-morrow."—Coleridge.

"Without books God is silent; justice dormant, natural science at a stand; philosophy lame; letters dumb; and everything involved in Cimmerian darkness.—Bentham.

"Reading in a man is a short word—a small substance, scarce enough to give a hint a meal; yet great is capacity—yea, so indefinite in desire, that the round globe of the world can not fill the three corners of it!" When it desires more, and cries, "Give—give!" I will set it over to the infinite good, where the more it hath it may desire more, and see more to be desired.—Bishop Hall.

"In doubt, act with light; skill, with truth; and in all things, with love."—Mason.

"A helping hand to one in trouble is often like a switch on a railroad track—but one inch between wreck and smooth-rolling prosperity.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

If we Cobbett who said—and he said the truth, too—that woman is never so amiable as when she cooks; and as for beauty, though a man may fall in love with girls at play, there is nothing to make them stand in their love like seeing them at work, engaged in the useful offices of the home and family.

Abel by some degree of woe
We every bliss must gain
The heart can only know a tempest know
That never feels a pain.

A tectotaler, on seeing another, asked a neighbor if he were not inclined to the Temperance Society, and he replied, "Yes, for when he now liquor his mouth out."—Herald.

It is said that one of the editors of a New Orleans paper, originally connected with the Picayune, has become a member of the Legislature of that State. The next time he attended service he was considerably surprised at hearing the minister announce as his text, "My daughter is grievously tormented with a devil."

"Did you not tell me, Sir, you could build the blow of a mill for nothing?" "Aye! by my troth, I did." "Now the dence can I build it, and two horses drawing it between them?" "Why, Sir, you have but to build it built it with my help."

In 1676 Joseph Lowe, of Nottingham, was fined by "ye Corts at Springfield" £10 "for wearing of silk in an unlawfull manner, in ye immoderate and gaul"—probably in the hoop fashion now prevailed.

Physiognomy.—A love scene overheard and photographically reported by Punch's Fleet Street Pilot: "Flushed of the phiz," signed the lover, "glossy my ploughing when I gazes on the graceful consequence of your pleading glances your feathers pleasantly. Your plethora of hair, your ivory forehead, your eyes like sloes, your nose, your lips, your cheeks sparkle in glorious array on your love, I plead I plunge the pleasure of becoming your husband, Fanny Fitzgerald." Fanny answers: "Hold, Farnaby, hold!" screamed Phrances; "it will be all over when you discover." But Farnaby plied, and Phrances pleaded.

New Metaphysician.—Why is twice eleven like twice ten?—Because twice eleven are twenty-two, and twice ten are twenty, too.

The Dressing Bell.—Got a four-horse power engine. Put it in the back kitchen, run shafting in every room connected with the establishment. Connect it on the shafting plan fly wheels, smear the wheels with treacle, and set the engine going. The treacle, attracted by the treacle on the fly-wheels, will light on them, and the forced revolving will throw the treacle upon them. Have a boy under each wheel with a hat, and let him seize them as they fall, and bolt them down in reverse from their distance. A smart boy has been known to do a dozen hats in a day.

In fishing, we have occasionally seen a big pike watching a bait, and he has certainly watched us between getting a good dinner and being a good dinner. His mouth has been able to weigh very accurately—he had so many smiles.

What's the difference between a young woman and an old one?—Love affairs and love affairs. Which is a mistake and copy?

Brevities of Business.—Make buy while the sun shines. That is to say, take advantage of the season, so long as it lasts. Do not sweep off prematurely.

Texas and the Fogs.—The inhabitants of Nopalda, boasting of the approach of the conqueror, prepared to defend themselves from the foe. Igor, their chieftain, not liking the nothing of the sort, but to treat him alone, and his followers, with the utmost hospitality. Igor, with his escorts, was duly welcomed. Arrived at the camp of the besieger, Nanny, who knew it was useless to attempt to fight with so great a force, was surprised at what gift was likely to be most acceptable. He resolved it should be a fine cow, for he had plenty of fine pastures. "I will consult with my sister," said Nanny, "and you shall have your choice." Igor was pleased at the idea of his sister's opinion, and was delighted to take quizzes, as the larger fruit. "Very good," said Nanny, "I will consult your opinion with that." When he reached the tent of the throne of Timorlane, he announced to him the object of his visit. Timorlane, delighted at the proposal, as an offering of peace, he hastened to the tent of his sister, Igor, and informed her of the proposal. Igor, with a look of the utmost expressive of the people of Jengi-Schelver. The reunion was a happy one. Igor left the tent, and Nanny and Timorlane, and Nanny, who stood patient and immovable, gently exclaimed, "Brother, what is your choice?" "Why the Prophet be thanked!" or, "Oh, admirable! how can I sufficiently express my joy!" What did Nanny say? He replied Nanny: "I gratefully enjoy the consequence of my own wit. My wife was delighted with the present, and I chose to bring Igor; and well that I did, for with his own hand he cut off the head of the chief who had caused so much trouble to Timorlane." Timorlane, overjoyed, and declared that, for the sake of one fool, he would not destroy the whole. He then embraced and loaded them and their property.—Then," cried Nanny, "the entire population of Nopalda had no time nor heart to communicate the joyful intelligence.

CHILDHOOD'S INNOCENCE.

Happy those early days, when I
Shined in mine angel infancy!
Ere I had left my first white coat,
And trend again that ancient track,
Before I thought the road was long,
My innocence with a mind sound!
Oh, how I long to travel back,
And tread again that ancient track,
That I might kneel and pray
The pure and active innocence
As odors crush'd are sweeter still.—Rogers.

Mademoiselle Rachel hardly ever received without some reading or rehearsing before that day. It is her rest. In England, the report was spread of her marriage with Lord Normanby, and Lord Normanby. Certainly Mr. Lumley had given certain parties to her house to hear her read a new piece, and on the day before the last party he met her at the door of the theater. On an second journey to London, it was young Lord Edward St. —— who was the object of the matrimonial, the Court J. "Count," said she to him, one morning in the Champs Elysees, "I am going to read to-night to Horace," "do you know what is said—that you have offered me your hand?" "I offer you my hand, every evening, to applaud you!" "That's right; one gains wit and courage."

He that hath bedicted with stern adversity,
Read known to shape his course to happiness.

In a debate recently, in the literary society competed exclusively of the pupils of the Kentucky Deaf and Dumb Asylum, the Devil and Daniel Webster were discussed, and "Which was the most beautiful—the rocks of Nature, or the works of Art?" The advocate for the service of Nature, among other proofs of their superiority, instanced woman, describing affection at the same time, by a sign which, in the deaf and dumb alphabet usually and knowledged ladies who were present.

—Mr. Bright has been lecturing in their words by hands), in his turn, advocated to this particular argument of his opponents, and said that it was a singular coincidence, he told he, "it is the draw of the Indian beginning that cleaves, and Britain they are emphatically a work of

Colonel Moore, a welcome politician of the Old Dominion, was a noble pleasant and affable gentleman, and a fine specimen of the Virginia planter. He was much embraced in knee-many men; but a story is told of him which he failed to convince either himself or the standpat of their previous acquaintance. All things to all men, he met a countryman one morning, and, in his usual hearty manner, shook hands with him, saying:

"Why, how do you do, Tim? am very glad to then you's a free guy, Tim. I see you that ride your free old grey, Tim."

"No, Sir; this horse is one I borrowed this morning."

"Why, so I see. Well, I'se how are the old woman and baby?"

"My parents have been dead about three years, Sir."

"But how the poor wife, Tim, and the children?"

"I am an unmarried man, Sir."

"Poor enough, Tim, you'll live on the old farm?"

"No, Sir: I've just arrived from Ohio, where I was born."

"Well, Tim, I guesh I don't know you after all. Good-morning, Tim."

Here is a specimen of Emerald wit that isn't so bad. On the Cambridge road there was a fair, and a man was exhibiting. Two Irishmen approached from Boston, rather disappointed. "I spy'nose and that's a pig's rod" with which to pust the gate. A passer-by, on observing the cause of them a passage to how he would this avail to get them both over? After having there heads together," one of them approached the man in charge and asked, "Sure me how much is it to go over?" "A penny a piece," was the reply. "Arrah now, and have ye carry a boodle on ye back?" As much as you please," said the imbecile. The Irishmen then mounted the gate, and taking up his position on the ground by his bundle, the man with the penny, marched on with his burden, to about the middle of the bridge, when they stopped and gazed and Mike tolled Pat over to Cambridge side. The astonished was vellenened, the bridge being about a mile long.

Children love a good joke sometimes as well as "old folks." Looking out the window the other day, I saw my little six-year old sitting on a post, and watching the approach of a distressed looking old man, with an unusual of absent a minute, "Chressel! Chressel! Where are you?" The old man, as he came up, answered in a frank tried out, "Mabel, what if you were to see a little boy Chressel?" cried the man of fond. "Well, says Frank, he no budged but to escape from the whip, "I should think that was rather poor eating!"

An umbrella is an article which, by the morality of society, you may steal from friend or foe, and which, for the same reason, you should not lend to either.

The not uncommon custom of getting a friend, after he has left the company, across to his house, is condemned by the practice of the ancient tribes, who erected a monument in a departed hero by throwing another man into the grave.

Medical practice may be said to be guessing at Nature's intentions and wishes, and then endeavoring to substitute man's.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Saturday, July 3, 1858.

The Wholesale Produce Markets have been lest fros for Flour, which has been in active demand, chiefly for home use. Prices lots of Wheat and Corn have been unsettled, and have been in favor of buyers. Provisions have been dull and heavy. Rye has declined, closing quietly and languidly. Butter has been very scarce and inactive. Oats have been pretty freely dealt in. Cotton has been in dull demand, and prices have trended downward. A good inquiry for Coffee and Sugar, and Molasses has been active. Rice has been in favor of the grower. Tobacco has been in moderate demand, slightly, closing steadily with a fair general demand.

The sales of Flour have sought after at unchanged prices. A moderate inquiry from the near-by and local trade, for really desirable Dry Goods. The Jobbing sales have nearly ceased for the season. The movements of other articles were unimportant, and without feature of any remarkable alteration.... We append a revised list of the closing quotations of the Produce Markets:

Ordinary to extra State Flour, per bbl.	$3 75	@ $4 00
Superfine State do. do.	4 00	@ 4 10
Extra Western Flour, per barrel	4 00	@ 4 10
Fancy to extra Genesee, per barrel	4 15	@ 4 50
Super to Extra Canadian, per barrel	4 10	@ 5 30
Fancy to extra Canadian, per barrel	5 00	@ 5 50
Super to favorite Red Flour, per bbl.,	4 10	@ 4 30
Corn Meal, per barrel	3 50	@ 4 00
White Wheat, per bushel	1 30	@ 1 40
Red Wheat, per bushel	1 25	@ 1 30
Corn, per bushel	0 70	@ 0 72
Rye, per bushel	0 70	@ 0 75
Barley, per bushel	0 60	@ 0 70
Western Oats, per bushel	0 45	@ 0 46
State Oats, per bushel	0 46	@ 0 48
Beans and Peas, Oats, per bushel,	0 60	@ 0 64
Southern Oats, per bushel	0 44	@ 0 46
Cotton, middlings, per pound	12 @	12½
Pork, Mess, per barrel	17 50	@ 18 00
Prime Pork, per barrel	14 00	@ 14 50
Country Mess Beef, per barrel	10 75	@ 11 50
Prime Mess Beef, per barrel	13 50	@ 14 00
Ref Hams, per barrel	15 00	@ 17 50
Cut Meats, per pound	9	@ 10
Lard, per pound	10½	@ 11
State Butter, per pound	17	@ 20
Western Butter, per pound	10	@ 17
Cheese, per pound	8	@ 10
Beer, per 100 pounds	3 50	@ 3 75
Hops, 1857, per pounds	7	@ 8
Hops, 1858, per pound	5 @	14
Tobacco, Kentucky, per pound	6	@ 10
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon	27	@ 30
Syrup Teas, per gallon	30	@ 35
Tobog Teas, per pound	27	@ 40
Domestic Whiskey, per gallon	24	@ 25
Soaps, per pound	6	@ 8
Rice, per 100 pounds	3	@ 4
Tallow, per pound	8	@ 9½

Stocks of several Articles in New York, July 1, 1858.

	1858.	1857.
Coffee, packages	16,115	40,817
Tobacco, hhds.	2,000	3,000
Sugars, number	105,631	116,163
Molasses, hogsheads	11,000	8,500
Molasses, barrels	17,058	6,561
Beef, barrels	1,000	1,000
Pork, barrels	14,342	14,700
Sugars, hogsheads	4,754	7,000
Sugars, bags	6,117	12,300
Sugars, boxes	21,713	19,411
Tobacco, bags	1,000	1,000
Tobacco, bales	2,000	6,453

Freights were inactive. For Liverpool—Cotton, 5-32d. @ 3-16d.; per pound. Flour in bbl. @ 1s. 6d.; per bbl.; Grain, 4d. @ 4½d.; per bushel; Bacon, 1s. 6d. @ 1s. 9d.; per barrel; Beef, 2s. 6d. @ 2s. 9d.; per barrel; Pork, 2s. @ 2s. 3d.; per bbl. For other ports more favorable rates. The total number of vessels of all descriptions in port was 1,000.

The Dry Goods Markets last Wednesday were not so fully supplied with buyers as yet, in the early part of the day, prices declined a shade.... Mitch Cows were less plentiful, and were in request. Veal Calves were also in demand, while more were abundant than they were needed; hence, prices declined 50 cents.... Sheep were quiet and languid in price.... The reported receipts of Live Stock during each of the last two weeks compare as follows:

	Week ending June 28.	Week ending June 21.
Beeves	4,703	3,941
Milch Cows	233	170
Veal Calves	1,693	879
Sheep and Lambs	19,000	19,128
Swine	6,156	4,420

Of the forty-fourth Street Market's supply of Beeves last Wednesday there were received from

Illinois	1,754	Kentucky 29
Ohio	715	New York 72
Indiana	1,133	Unknown 1

The range of prices according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday was as follows:

Poor to premium Beeves, per pound.. $ 6 @ $ 7
Cows to Ex. Milch Cows, per head.. 25 00 @ 50 00
Veal Calves, per pound.. 4 @ 6
Fancy Veal Calves, per head.. 5 00 @ 8 00
" per pound.. 7 @ 8
Live Swine, per pound.. 5 @ 6
Dressed " .. 7 @ 8
Fatting Pigs, each.. 1 00 @ 2 00

The Country Produce Markets are generally well stocked with Early Vegetables, and prices are low in consequence of the abundant supply. The demand is fair. Poultry, Game, and Eggs are in full supply.

SUMMER CLOTHING FOR PERSONS AT WHOLESALE.

Strawberries, per bushel crate	$3 00	@ $5 75
Gooseberries, per bushel	2 00	@ 2 50
Cherries, per pound	5	@ 6
Currants, per pound	3	@ 5
Raspberries, per 200 baskets	8 25	@ 10 00
Peaches, per box	3 50	@ 1 50
Pears, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 25
Beans, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 75
Peas, per bushel	1 25	@ 1 50
" new, per barrel	3 75	@ 4 50
Onions, new, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 25
" per 100 bunches	3 50	@ 4 00
Turnips, new, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 25
Carrots, new, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 25
Beets, new, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 25
Cabbages, per 100	2 00	@ 3 00
Squashes, per barrel	2 00	@ 3 00
Cucumbers, per 100 baskets	1 00	@ 1 50
Radishes, per 100 bunches	37	@ 50
Green Peas, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 50
Tomatoes, per box	2 75	@ 3 00
Asparagus, per 100 bunches	4 00	@ 6 00
Eggs, per dozen	9	@ 13
Lard, per pound	9	@ 10
Fowls, per pound	11	@ 14
Turkeys, per pound	12	@ 14
Ducks, per pair	62	@ 1 25
Spring Chickens, each	62	@ 1 25
Pigeons, per dozen	62	@ 1 25

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE ETERNAL PERFUME.
FROM THE HOLY CITY.
"Oh! that I had such a handkerchief,
I would ask no other boon,
To dream of Jordan's flowers and flowers
Beside the Holy Sepulchre."
Bouquet of Imitations.
Frangipanni, the Odor, Frangipanni, the Sachet,
Frangipanni Soap. Frangipanni Oil.
Sole Agent for the United States,
EUGENE DUPUY,
Perfumer,
69 Broadway.
Sold every where.

GODFREY'S EXTRACT OF ELDER FLOWERS.
The most efficient and really the best perfect
BEAUTIFIER IN NATURE.
This admirable preparation of Elder Flowers is very fragrant as a perfume. Elder Flowers have, from the earliest period, been held in high estimate as a valuable, yet most perfect beautifier of the Skin. Tan, Sun-burn, Freckles, Redness, it will speedily remove completely.
CHILDREN—It is singularly beneficial and perfectly safe in preventing and removing Chafing.
SHAVING.—It is valuable beyond any thing, sensible. Any person shaving will find it exceedingly soothing, and not soft and firm, preparing it to completely for the razor.
A NEW AND PERFECT—GODFREY'S EXTRACT OF ELDER FLOWERS. will be found beyond all praise, and needs only a trial to be appreciated.
EUGENE DUPUY, Family Chemist,
69 Broadway, N. Y.

HILDRETH'S HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES.
First Series—From the first Settlement of the Country to the Adoption of the Federal Constitution. 3 vols. 8vo. Muslin, $6 00; Sheep, $7 50; Half Calf, $9 00.
Second Series—From the Adoption of the Federal Constitution to the End of the Sixteenth Congress. 3 vols. 8vo. Muslin, $6 00; Sheep, $7 50; Half Calf, $9 00.
As an introduction to the study of American history, this work, by common consent of the most competent judges, stands at the head of all the publications which it has been compiled, and highly perspicuous narrative, the writer has brought out the most important facts connected with the history of the administration of President Monroe. The course of legislation, the rise and development of parties, National affairs, are fully described, reviewing, from the hands of the author, the great questions which the country has passed through, in relating the early settlement of the Colonies and the growth of the revolutionary struggle, he crowds a great amount of matter into a narrow compass, leaving no important point unnoticed. The style is clear, and the interest of the theme into an unnecessary diffuseness. The work is impartial, and is written in a truly philosophical spirit, and is the standard American history. In no other way can the student of American history so well acquire a knowledge of the subject as by reading these volumes. The accuracy of their details, the accurate weight, value of their comments, and the comprehensive and naturalness of their style, make them equally indispensable to the statesman, the politician, the man of letters, and the general reader.
Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

* * HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States under 3000 miles, on receipt of the Money.

QUERUX'S COD LIVER OIL JELLY.
Prepared by the New York Jelly Company, 385 Canal Street, New York, containing 50 per cent. pure Oil.
This elegant preparation, having all the curative and healing properties of the Oil, without any disagreeable taste.
PENFOLD, CLAY & CO., Wholesale Agents,
No. 4 Dutch Street, New York.
Given Premium's Medals, Vol. I, Part 2, page 1.

"The experience of the profession is daily giving more new gifts to have established the fact, that Cod Liver Oil is one of the most valuable remedies in the cure of wasting the progress of Pulmonary Phthisis; that it exerts a controlling influence over the scrofulous diathesis of disease, and thus enables those sometimes to obtain a permanent and radical restoration of health, when otherwise must have produced speedy death."

TO ADVERTISERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A MAGNIFICENTLY ILLUSTRATED PAPER,
CIRCULATING IN EVERY SECTION OF THE UNION.
Offers unusual inducements to those who desire to bring their business prominently before the community.
1. Only a limited space is devoted to Advertisements.
2. The character and diffusion of the circulation are unequaled.
3. The Paper is generally preserved for Binding.
4. The Advertising Pages are rendered attractive, and can not escape the attention of the reader.
5. None but the most respectable class of Advertisements are admitted.
6. The terms are not as large, proportionally, as those of any other Weekly or Daily Paper.
A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for Three, Six, Nine, Months or more.
TERMS.—Fifty Cents a Line.
HARPER & BROTHERS.

BULWER'S NOVELS.
To Bulwer, the author of Pelham, The Caxtons, and My Novel, we assign the highest place among modern writers of fiction. He is always original in the conception of his fancy; he is always polished, witty, learned, and profound in his reflections; he is always rich in characters, and always high on that on which a young our wrestle to Bulwer, we have published a new and uniform edition of his Novels, in the following order:
PELHAM. 8vo. Paper, 25 cents.
THE DISOWNED. 8vo. Paper, 25 cents.
DEVEREUX. 8vo. Paper, 25 cents.
PAUL CLIFFORD. 8vo. Paper, 25 cents.
EUGENE ARAM. 8vo. Paper, 25 cents.
LUCRETIA; or, The Children of Tophet. 8vo. Paper, 25 cents.
ALICE; or, The Mysteries. 8vo. Paper, 25 cents.
ERNEST MALTRAVERS. 8vo. Paper, 25 cents.
LEILA; or, The Siege of Granada. 8vo. Muslin, 25 cents.
CALDERON, The Courtier. 8vo. Muslin, 25 cents.
PECIRINE OF THE RHINE. 8vo. Muslin, 25 cents.
Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

* * HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the Money.

TO THE DEPORTED.
DR. J. P. MANN IS TREATING SUC-CESSFULLY that each-time-destroying and unfeeling—cause of five to twenty years' standing, and there continue from time to time to receive the highest encomiums he has ever received. He would say to the afflicted, Come and see. Many who have despaired of their case as hopeless as you do yours have been cured. Address
No. 192 West 20th Street, New York.
Written assurances, and testimonials, postage stamps, will be promptly answered.

THE FOLLOWING:
"My son had a white swelling, with a crooked and stiff knee-joint, and used a crutch for about two years. I placed him in the care of Dr. Mann. He now walks quite a distance without the use of a crutch."—HARRY MASSEY.
"Watertown, N. Y., Aug. 22, 1857.
"My son Charles had a white swelling of the knee-joint, with running sores, and was lame for about two and eighteen months old. I tried every thing without benefit. I then applied to Dr. Mann, and received the very short time."—MRS. MARGARET JOHNSON.
"Rochester, N. Y., Aug. 22, 1857.
"My son has had a deformed foot for thirteen years. All feet had been done for him but his heel, until I employed Dr. Mann. I rejoice to say he has effected a complete cure."—MRS. HANNAH HOLMES.
"Syracuse, New York."
"For four years I have suffered from a sore leg, very large, and discased bone-joint. I suffered great pain. My joint was so lame I could not walk, but I walked with a crutch. By the skillful treatment received from Dr. Mann, my leg is now entirely well. The bone has ceased and the pain is gone. I can not sufficiently express my gratitude for his skill."—MISS ELIZA ALLEN, Jr.
"Oswego, December 3, 1857."
"My daughter has been lame six years. I have used the prescriptions of the most eminent physicians in the United States. At length I placed her under the care of Dr. Mann, who has successfully removed the disease, and feel that he will not encourage hope when he is not sure of success."—C. DILLABY, Syracuse, N. Y.
"My son had a white swelling on the knee-joint. The leg was least at right angles and much enlarged, and required the constant use of crutches. I was induced to try to get him cured, but without success. Dr. Mann has made the cripple straight, and healed the sores, and now without crutch or cane, and with straight legs."
JOHN MOORE.
"Rochester, N. Y., Aug. 22, 1857."
"My son was born with both lower limbs deformed. Both feet were permanently bent at right angles, and of one foot the heel was drawn up. He was five years learning to walk, and then only with the aid of crutches and stiffness of the limbs, and required much bending of the spine and bracing of the whole body. I applied to Dr. Mann to render the effect of walking most painful to behold. Surgery was not necessary in this case. The operation of unbarred declared his case hopeless. He now walks straight, with use of their members, and with no crutch or stay which automatons all who see him. This case has been published to the world before. Let its record suffice his child or friend to remain deformed."
JOHN DELSEY.
"Seneca Falls, N. Y., 1857."
"I have had a deformed and crooked knee-joint for twenty-three years. I have been an object of pity to my friends, and a burden to myself. I have been under the treatment of Dr. Mann for one year, and can say that I am now able to walk with my leg sufficiently straight, and have no pain."
O. P. THOMPSON,
Cayuga County, New York."
"My daughter has walked with a crutch the whole of her life, from a white swelling of the knee-joint. Dr. Mann has failed. I placed her in charge of Dr. Mann. To-day my daughter walks with ease and grace, perfectly erect, with both limbs of equal length."
JOEL DIBBORN.
"East Bolstead, New York."

REFERENCES—Hon. Gerrit Smith, N. Y.; Gen. James W. Nye, New York; Ernest Prosser, Esq., Buffalo, N. Y.; Hon. Millard Fillmore, Buffalo, N. Y.; Rev. Thomas Anderson, 99 Bowery, N. Y.; Bishop Baraboe, 76 Henry St., N. Y.; Rev. Dr. Cummings, N. Y.

Persons interested will preserve the name, and street, and number, as it is not in the Directory.
J. P. MANN, M.D.

Sent by Mail, postage paid, on receipt of price.

G. P. R JAMES'S NOVELS.
MR. JAMES is the only conspicuous representative of the school of fiction so signally illustrated by Sir Walter Scott. His prolific genius has given birth to a whole library of novels, of which the following are a few, and which has not its equal of approval. In episodes of thrilling interest and copiousness of description, and felicity of characterdrawing, James is one of the few writers who have united his popularity with the million will sustain the test of time. The historical character of many of his novels makes them agreeable sources of information. They recall the days of chivalry, and present a view of a glowing illustration to the incidents of a by-gone age.
HENRY MASTERTON. 8vo, Muslin, 75 cents; Half Calf, $1 00.
THE GIPSY. 8vo, Muslin, 75 cents; Half Calf, $1 00.
ARABELLA STUART. 8vo, Muslin, 75 cents; Half Calf, $1 00.
DARNLEY. 8vo, Muslin, 75 cents; Half Calf, $1 00.
ONE IN A THOUSAND. 8vo, Muslin, 75 cents; Half Calf, $1 00.
THE HUGUENOT. 8vo, Muslin, 75 cents; Half Calf, $1 00.
THE ROBBER. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cts.; Half Calf, $1 00.
THE GENTLEMAN OF THE OLD SCHOOL. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cts.; Half Calf, $1 00.
THE ANCIENT REGIME. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cts.; Half Calf, $1 00.
THE CASTLE OF ESTERN-STEIN. 8vo. Paper, 25 cts.
THE CASTLE OF ESTERN-STEIN. 8vo. Muslin, 50 cts.; Half Calf, $1 00.
HEIDELBERG. 8vo. Paper, 25 cents.
THORPE-MOUNTJOY. 8vo. Paper, 25 cents.
THE CROSBIER. 8vo. Paper, 25 cents.
ANCHUSET. 8vo. Paper, 25 cents.
ANNAN SAUL. 8vo. Paper, 25 cents.
ROSY CASSELL. 8vo. Paper, 25 cents.
ARABELLA STUART. 8vo. Paper, 25 cents.
THE FIRE HERB. 8vo. Paper, 25 cents.
THE FIRE HERB. 8vo. Muslin, 50 cents; Half Calf, $1 00.
THE SERIES OF PEARLS. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cts.; Half Calf, $1 00.
THE SERIES OF PEARLS. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cts.; Half Calf, $1 00.
THE HUGUENOT. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Half Calf, $1 00.
THE ROBBER. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cts.; Half Calf, $1 00.
THE GENTLEMAN OF THE OLD SCHOOL. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cts.; Half Calf, $1 00.
THE ANCIENT REGIME. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cts.; Half Calf, $1 00.
Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

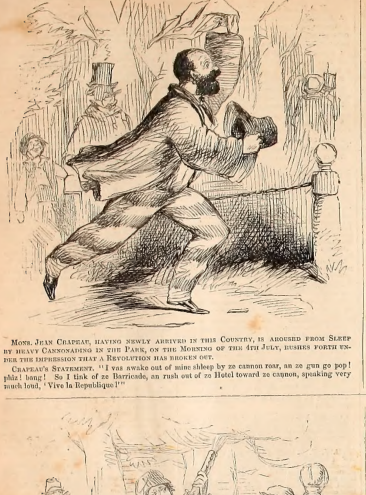
SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.—
"No remedy has ever been offered to the public which has proved as uniformly successful as this for purifying the blood, and for the cure of all diseases that arise from it." Where the worst symptoms of this distressing complaint exist in a mild degree, it operates a radical cure.
Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 Fulton Street, New York. Price $1 per bottle.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.
MR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL, "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous Illustrations by the Author, will be commenced in the July Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. It is printed from early sheets received in advance of the publication in London and England—for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A PERFECT-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE ONLY POPULAR AND CHEAP
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.
TERMS.
FIVE CENTS A NUMBER: $3 00 A YEAR.

BULWER'S BRILLIANT ROMANCE, Night and Morning, will be commenced in the July Number, and to be the masterpiece of this polished, witty, and learned author. Many who have read it with the Author, appreciate it. HARPER'S WEEKLY simultaneously with its publication in England.

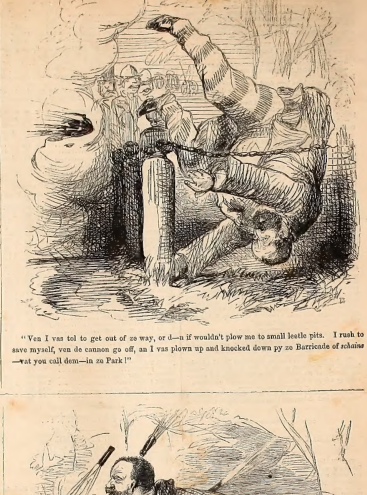
TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.
One Copy for One Year.... $3 00
Two Copies for One Year.... 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year.... 2 50
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.



TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.
One Copy for Twenty Weeks.... $1 00
One Copy for One Year.... 3 00
One Copy for Two Years.... 5 00
Five Copies for One Year.... 12 00
Ten Copies for One Year.... 20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year.... 50 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Twenty-five Subscribers.

The Volumes of HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $1 00, now ready.
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

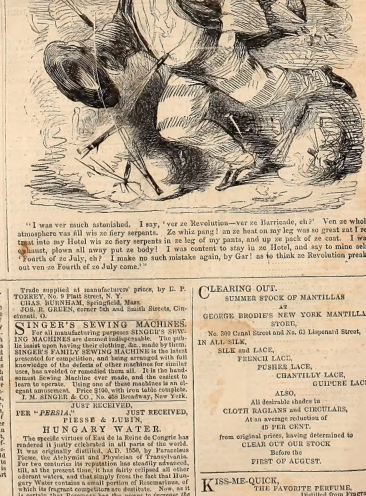
TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.
One Copy for Twenty Weeks.... $1 00
One Copy for One Year.... 3 00
One Copy for Two Years.... 5 00
Five Copies for One Year.... 12 00
Ten Copies for One Year.... 20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year.... 50 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Twenty-five Subscribers.



The Volumes of HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $1 00, now ready.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY may be sent to one address for one year for Five Dollars.
Postage within the limits of the County of New York, to subscribers who receive HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, is prepaid by the Publishers. When sent quarterly in advance, the Postage is Twenty-four Cents a year on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty-one Cents a year on the WEEKLY.
Persons residing in the British Provinces will remit, in addition to their Subscription, Twenty-four Cents on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty-one Cents on the WEEKLY, to pay the American postage.
Persons residing in the City of New York wishing HARPER'S WEEKLY left at their houses, will please send their names to the Publishers, or to the Postmasters of their City, to the Office of Publication.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

MONS. JEAN CRAPEAU, HAVING NEWLY ARRIVED IN THE COUNTRY, IS AROUSED FROM SLEEP BY HEAVY CANNONADING IN THE PARK, ON THE MORNING OF THE 4TH JULY, RUSHES FORTH UNDER THE IMPRESSION THAT A REVOLUTION HAS BROKEN OUT.



CRAPEAU'S STATEMENT. "I vas awake out of mine sheep by ze cannon roar, an ze gun go pop! phis! bang! So I tink of ze Barricade, an rush out of ze Hotel toward ze cannon, speaking very much loud, 'Vive la Republique!"

"Ven I vas tol to get out of ze way, or d—n if wouldn't plow me to small leetle pits. I rush to save myself, ven de cannon go off, an I vas plown up and knocked down py ze Barricade of echaise —vat you call dem—in ze Park!"

"Ven I recover mine self, an vas not killed, I vas plown up again py small leetle poy, with a ten pound Pistol, vas he say, 'you got up, Old Bull Frog! I vas not shootin' you; it vas all for ze Fourth of ze July.' Eh?"

"I vas ver much astanished. I say, 'vat ze Revolution—vat ze Barricade, eh?' Ven ze whole atmosphere vas all vis ze fery serpents. Ze whiz bang! an ze heat on my leg vas so great dat I retreat into my Hotel wis ze fery serpents in ze leg of my pants, and up ze pack of ze coat. I vas exhaust, plown all away put ze body! I vas content to stay in ze Hotel, and say to mine self, 'Fourth of ze July, eh? I make no such mistake again, by Gar! as to think ze Revolution breaks out ven ze Fourth of ze July come.'"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

LEAF AND FLOWER PICTURES, AND HOW TO MAKE THEM. With 8 Colored Illustrations, $1 50.
Containing full directions for this beautiful Art.
ARGOD & E. RANDOLPH,
683 Broadway, N. Y.
Sent by Mail, on receipt of the price.

WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES,
343 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Received the highest Premiums awarded, 1857, by the American Institute, N. Y.; Maryland Institute, Baltimore; and at the Maine, Connecticut, Illinois, and Michigan State Fairs.
Also, at the Crystal Palace, containing Editorial and Scientific opinions, Testimonials from persons of the highest social position, &c.

OCEAN HOUSE, PORTSMOUTH, VIRGINIA.—A new, airy, first-class house, affording sea-shore luxuries of every kind, is conducted by the owner and host of fashionable watering-places. Polar and Excursion Steamers ply almost hourly to Old Point and the Capes of Virginia. These trips, with sea-bathing, constitute a great source of health and amusement to invalids and pleasure seekers. Desirable suites, or single rooms, can now be obtained on moderate terms.
J. A. WHITE, Proprietor.
Address
Circulars to be had at 164 Murray Street, New York City.

DR. MUNDE'S WATER-CURE AT FLORENCE, MASS. (Three miles from the Northampton Depot). Price for Patients $11 per week.

COFFEE HEALTHFUL.
DR. HALL'S OPINION.
Considering our habits of life, Coffee, as a beverage for breakfast, is nutritious and healthful, and should be taken in moderation, for a lifetime, without failing of its salutary effects. Used in this way, moderately strong, nerve increased in strength, frugivory, or spare diet, in a positive good, and is far better than as much cold water at any meal, especially to invalids or persons of feeble digestion. Now and then a person will be found with whom it does not agree: then such a person should omit it, at least for a time. To obtain Coffee with its delicious aroma, it should be boiled in a vessel which shall keep in all the steam, every particle of it; and thus, the longer it is boiled the better it is, even if for two hours. THE OLD DOMINION COFFEE POT, manufactured by ARNOTT, BURNHAM & GILLAM, Philadelphia, accomplishes this most certainly. It is extremely known, and it costs but 25 cents for a pot of 50 per cent—that is, seven cups will go as far as four. But to make it of any use whatever, one thing is essential: the purchaser must first learn how the coffee is made, and then remain in the kitchen while the cook is directed how to make it, and see that the directions are literally attended to. After this is done for two or three mornings, neither mistress nor maid will have any desire to return to the old plan, of boiling all the best part away, and allowing the finest aroma to go up the chimney. One quart size is $1 50, and 50 cents for each additional quart. Ten quart size, $5.—Hall's Journal of Health for June.

THE OLD DOMINION
COFFEE POT,
Is manufactured under the patent for the United States by ARTHUR, BURNHAM & GILLAM,
Nos. 117 and 119 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia.
Also, manufacturers for the United States of ARTHUR'S CELEBRATED PATENT AIR-TIGHT SELF-SEALING CANS and JARS.

Trade supplied at manufacturers' prices, by E. P. TORREY, No. 9 Platt Street, N. Y.
CHAS. BURNHAM, Springfield, Mass.
JOS. R. GREEN, corner 5th and Smith Streets, Cincinnati, O.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.
For all manufacturing purposes SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES are deemed indispensable. The public insist upon having their clothing, &c., made by them. SINGER'S FAMILY SEWING MACHINE is the latest presented for competition, and being arranged with full knowledge of the defects of other machines for similar uses, has avoided or remedied them all. It is the handsomest Sewing Machine ever made, and the easiest to learn to operate. Using one, others seem like an ingenious invention. Price $100. Other table complete.
I. M. SINGER & CO., No. 458 Broadway, New York.

JUST RECEIVED,
PER "PERSIA," JUST RECEIVED,
PIESSE & LUBIN,
HUNGARY WATER.
The specific virtues of Eau de la Reine de Congrie has rendered it justly celebrated in all parts of the world. It was originally distilled, A.D. 1550, by Paracelsus Physic, the Alchymist and Physician of Transylvania. For two centuries its reputation has steadily advanced, till, at the present time, it has fairly eclipsed all other odorant waters, and that simply from the fact that Hungary Water contains a small portion of Rosemarine, of which the fragrant compoundeurs desire to extract the Camphor. Hence the difficulty there is to procure the delicate and exquisite Eau de la Reine, as noted by the Band of Avon.
"There's Rosemary, that's for Remembrance,"
we can not be surprised to learn that Orakien, Clergymen, Lecturers, Authors, Bank, give it the preference.
EUGENE DUPUY, Agent, 609 Broadway.

CLEARING OUT.
SUMMER STOCK OF MANTILLAS
AT
GEORGE BRODIE'S NEW YORK MANTILLA STORE,
No. 399 Canal Street and No. 61 Lispenard Street,
IN ALL SILK,
SILK and LACE,
FRENCH LACE,
PUSHES LACE,
CHANTILLY LACE,
GUIPURE LACE.
ALSO,
All desirable shades in
CLOTH RAGLANS and CIRCULARS,
At an average reduction of
40 PER CENT.
from original prices, having determined to CLEAR OUT OUR STOCK
Before the
FIRST OF AUGUST.

KISS-ME-QUICK,
THE FAVORITE PERFUME,
Distilled from Fragrant
———TULIPS———
Kiss-me-quick, the Perfume,
Kiss-me-quick, the Sachet,
Kiss-me-quick Soap.
EUGENE DUPUY, Chemist and Family Druggist,
609 Broadway.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. II.—No. 81.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 17, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

CONTENTS.

I. THE REV. HENRY WARD BEECHER, WITH A PORTRAIT.
II. ENCUMBRANCE.
III. THE LOTTERIES.
IV. THE BOAT AND THE TRAIN, WITH TWO ILLUSTRATIONS.
V. THE LATE ERUPTION OF VESUVIUS, WITH TWO ILLUSTRATIONS.
VI. LITERARY.
VII. DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.
VIII. FOREIGN NEWS.
IX. THE MOON OF OMAGUHUS, WITH POE'S SPLENDID ILLUSTRATIONS.
X. A BROADWAY IDYLL.
XI. MR. GREEN'S CALEST, BY JOHN ESTEN COOKE, OF VIRGINIA.
XII. BELVEDERE: "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?"—Continued.
XIII. THE NEW EL DORADO OR BRITISH AMERICA, WITH A MAP AND AN ILLUSTRATION.
XIV. MISCELLANY.
XV. THINGS VISIBLE AND OTHERWISE.
XVI. MARKET AND FINANCIAL REPORTS.
XVII. CORRELATIVE.

REVEREND HENRY WARD BEECHER.

We present our readers this week with the portrait of the most celebrated preacher and most popular orator in the country, the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. He is one of the many children (thirteen, we believe, in number) of the Rev. Lyman Beecher, a veteran divine who still survives in vigorous health. Mr. Beecher was born in Litchfield, Connecticut, June 24, 1813. He graduated at Amherst College, Massachusetts, in 1834, and studied Theology under his father at the Lane Seminary, in Cincinnati, Ohio. In 1837 he was settled as a Presbyterian clergyman, in Lawrenceburg, Indiana, where he preached for two years, and then removed to Indianapolis, where he remained until he was called by the Plymouth Congregational Society of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, New York, where his ministry commenced in 1847, and still continues. Mr. Beecher was one of the founders of The Independent newspaper, to which he is still an occasional contributor, over the signature of a star. His works—if they may be so called—consist of a volume of "Lectures to Young Men"—"The Plymouth Collection of Hymns"—a collection of some of his articles in The Independent, called "The Star Papers"—and a volume entitled "Life-Thoughts," made up of striking passages from his discourses, reported by an admiring hearer.

Probably no man in the country is more generally known, or regarded with a more personal affection and enthusiasm. Whenever and wherever he speaks, vast crowds assemble; and he is the only orator for whom all the halls and all the churches every where are too small. There are American orators more polished, more elegant, more scholarly, more graceful, more rhetorical, but there is no one who impresses his hearers with a deeper sense of his own sincerity and manliness—no one whose sympathy with suffering and sinful men of all conditions is felt to be sweeter or more ennobling—no one whose affluent imagination so illuminates, and whose tender Christian heart so purifies, the subject he discusses.

Mr. Beecher is identified with various causes; but his independence remains untouched, and he works in his own way. He is a temperance man, but something more. He is an anti-slavery man, but something more. He is an orthodox Congregationalist, but something more.

"God works by the Church just as far as he can," said he, at one of his discourses, "but the stream of his working overflows and runs in a hundred ducts besides." In like manner, his chief sympathy and hope are for man, and they run in a thousand rills of speech and action. Whatever hinders, cramps, confines, or in any manner dwarfs human development, is the enemy with which he deals, and the combat is jubilant and triumphant. He rejoices in his strength and in his work. He sends his words for the right, ringing home like the anvil strokes of a blithe blacksmith singing at his forge.

When he rises to speak his face is full of a lambent light—humorous, and sly, and tweet—a kind of happy, boyish innocence and confidence, which directly win sympathy and interest—so that the orator is eloquent before he has spoken. His discourses are generally prepared, but as the tide of feeling rises it overleaps the limits of his preparation; his imagination floats and soars beyond the course marked out, and, like a strong bird dipping, and reveling, and darting in the summer air, with the lights of heaven and the colors of earth glancing and glittering upon his plumage, his mind decorates his thoughts with an affluence of exquisite illustration drawn from every department of nature—so felicitous, and charming, and novel, that the happy hearer believes, with Cicero, that a great orator is truly a rarer triumph of nature than a great poet.

Mr. Beecher's voice is not especially musical, nor of great range; his action is vehement and dramatic rather than graceful; and the violent contrasts of effect—the sharp, loud cry and muscular movement, followed by a relaxed frame and ordinary conversational tone—are sometimes unpleasantly suggestive of a poor style of clerical declamation. But the next moment some gush of humor lights, like a sunbeam, upon the scene of the discourse, or some lovely sentiment touches it with tender pathos, and thousands of eyes, bright alternately with smiles and tears, proclaim the power which is not to be described or criticised—the magnetic sympathy and persuasion, without which grace and elegance, and music and learning, and wit and fervor, do not suffice for eloquence.

The secret of Mr. Beecher's influence and success with all kinds of minds lies in his broad and sweet humanity. It is both sweet and wise. Like all Christians, as they are usually called, wonder why he remains within the limits of a creed so orthodox. The temperance men wish he worked more technically under their banner. The Abolitionists heartily denounce him as a trimmer, because, while he sees the dangers and difficulties of our national differences, he also sees and grants the splendor of our prosperity and position, and the magnificent scope of our destiny. Hearty and blithe in body and mind, his theology, his philosophy, his sentiment, are all buoyant, hopeful, and cheerful. He believes in the power and the goodness of God, and therefore he believes the ultimate triumph of his Spirit.

However old he may grow (and may he live so long as good men ought to live!), Henry Ward Beecher will always seem to be a great, noble, blithe boy. His fresh feeling, his exuberant and rollicking humor, his genuine love of men, and his faith in their improvement and progress, his most Christian reliance upon the religion of which he is a teacher, will always keep the bloom of youth upon his heart, and its fire in his soul, however Time may brush the hue from his cheek and quench the light in his eye. His youthful appearance is such, that, upon first coming to the neighborhood to preach, he went one Sunday to the church, and, seating himself quietly in the pulpit, was promptly warned off by the sexton. "What do you mean?" said Beecher. "Why, we don't allow boys up here," sternly replied the sexton. But Beecher allows boys. No man has a livelier love for children, and more sympathetic intelligence of their tastes, and wishes, and habits. Some of the most striking and beautiful passages of his lectures and sermons are thoughts and illustrations of childhood and youth; and his eye would moisten with hope, and admiration, and longing over a brave boy or a happy girl, as it would, with sorrow and prayerful entreaty, over a sinful fellow-man.

He is an American in the best and truest sense. There is nothing mean, or narrow, or sectional in his fraternal and national feeling. He believes that this continent was intended for the great experiment, and that it will be fully, fairly, and successfully tried. To this end he welcomes the ever-increasing immigration, for whom labor the untracted Western wilds are waiting. He cheers the ship that he sees from his study window speeding on the bay, and rich with those who shall be developed into citizens and the parents of citizens. Every Sunday three thousand people in the morning, and three thousand in the evening, hear him expound the Gospel of Christ in this human and catholic spirit. Every night in every week, except during his summer rest, somewhere and in some way, either at prayer-meetings—at revival meetings—at lyceums—in halls—in school-houses—in theatres—under the trees—from the steps of public buildings—he is preaching, with a text or without a text; and the substance of his discourse is the song of the angels, "Peace on earth, good-will to men!"

Yes—but "Shorp's rifles," and laying corner-stones of armories, and addresses to military companies, how about all these things?

His answer would be short and simple: Human means for human ends. Because we are to love men, we are not, therefore, to let them murder our children, nor lay waste society. Mr. Beecher does not take a position without understanding it and himself. He rolls up his sleeves and stands to his guns, and whoever attacks it must expect no fair-weather fighting. He occasionally explodes a false rumor about himself with a witticism, sometimes pours in sparkling satire and severe truth-telling; and whoever interrupts him in a speech or a lecture, or in conversation, either playfully or seriously, will find that he has but burnished and sharpened the weapon he opposed.

REV. HENRY WARD BEECHER.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

Mr. Beecher is of medium height, with a florid complexion, and large, soft, humorous blue eyes. His mouth is full and firm, and less poetic than the general character of his face. His boyish appearance is heightened by the hair brushed behind his ears. His dress is always simple and half negligent, like his manner. One very warm Sunday in the dog-days, when he was fresh from the West, he preached in a light linen coat. But he does nothing eccentric for the sake of eccentricity. He is discreet and thoughtful. He fights substances, and not shadows. No man is more liked by his opponents, because no man is more generous to them. A characteristic American, large-hearted, large-handed, large-minded—more learned in men than in books—clear-sighted, and loyal and self-confident, he has already written his name upon the times, and upon the hearts of his countrymen.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 17, 1858.

OUR NATIONAL DEBT.

SECRETARY COBB has advertised for ten of the twenty millions which the Act of the late Congress authorizes him to borrow. Capitalists do not seem very eager to take the loan, mainly because the Secretary, whose experience as a politician is larger than his knowledge as a financier, declines to let people know when the other ten millions are to be awarded. Had a reasonable delay been fixed between the two issues, the whole of the ten millions to be now sold could have been disposed of at a fair premium to two houses in this city. As it is, it is doubtful whether the Government will obtain the money it needs at any thing like as favorable terms as it could be had by any Wall Street banker.

This, however, is a subordinate consideration. The great question which arises, in view of the present condition of the national finances is, Where is this loan system to end?

The revenue tables of the trade of this port for the past year show a falling off in the duties collected from customs of fourteen to fifteen millions of dollars. From September last the revenue from that source has steadily declined. The following table will place the matter in clear relief. We give the revenue from September only, as the effect of the late revulsion only began to be felt then:

UNITED STATES REVENUE FROM CUSTOMS DUTIES, AT THE PORT OF NEW YORK.

	1857-'58.	1856-'57.
September	$2,249,982	$3,702,109
October	867,534	3,391,231
November	1,121,792	2,774,844
December	1,172,392	2,381,969
January	1,041,474	4,537,378
February	2,063,784	5,117,250
March	2,213,452	3,752,184
April	1,736,510	3,301,607
May	1,748,227	1,807,289
June	1,685,663	677,811

It is evident from this that one of two things must happen. Either we must begin to import at the rate current in the early months of 1857, or the Government must ask Congress to authorize more loans in December next. The exigency is fearfully pressing, and there is no escape.

What is the prospect of a revival of the import trade? Those who are best informed among the merchants reply, unequivocally, the prospect is slender. Though during the six months of this year which have elapsed our importations have been over eighty millions less than they were during the corresponding period of last year, there are as yet no indications of suffering from a want of foreign goods. We imported so much in 1856 and 1857 that we can safely be content with what we have for the present. Country merchants have large stocks on hand, and not having yet been paid in full for the goods which they sold last summer and fall, they are not particularly anxious to make fresh purchases. The unanimous report of the merchants is, that their customers are disposed to wait till times revive before increasing their liabilities. This is so thoroughly understood, and the merchants of the sea-board received so severe a lesson during the embarrassment of last fall, that it may be taken for granted that the general trade this fall will be, as compared with that of late years, light; and that some considerable period must elapse before the merchants have the courage to import, or the country dealers to buy, freely and copiously.

If this prove so, the President will be driven, in December next, to lay before Congress the absolute necessity of providing means for the public service from some abnormal source. Either more money must be borrowed, or resort must be had to new methods of increasing the revenue. It is possible to increase the revenue in two ways. One is, by repealing the new tariff, and imposing heavier duties on foreign goods; the other is, by the imposition of a direct tax. The former would arouse violent opposition on the part of the free-traders, who are now undoubtedly a majority of the people. It may be said with considerable certainty that a majority of Congress would refuse at all hazards to increase the burdens now resting on foreign goods and merchandise. This much is evident from the late debates on the tariff. As to a direct tax, the chief difficulty springs from our revenue and specie system. It would be impossible to collect a direct tax in gold or silver. In many parts of the country the people have not got specie, and could not get it to pay to the tax-gatherer. Under the law he could receive nothing but specie.

Whether, under these circumstances, Congress will not find itself forced to adopt, as the least inconvenient course, the cheap resort of new loans, the future will prove. People generally do not realize the enormous straits under which the Administration of Mr. Buchanan has labored, and is still laboring, for want of money. It is not generally known, for instance, that but for the intervention of two or three capitalists of this city, a few months back, the Utah army would have starved ere this. The contractors had exhausted their resources; the Government had not the means of advancing them any thing; and had not some rich men in Wall Street, on the urgent solicitation of the Government, consented to cash the drafts of the contractor on the War Department, the whole machinery for the conduct of the expedition would have broken down. Two or three of the much-abused Wall Street bankers saved the public credit and the United States army.

It will be scandalous if the United States plunge into debt in time of peace; but as things look at present, the chances tend strongly that way.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

PEOPLE have generally ceased to expect to hear of the success of the Atlantic Telegraph. Not only has the Niagara, which sailed from Plymouth on 10th ult., not been heard of, but none of the many steamers which have crossed the ocean since that date have seen any thing of any of the Telegraph fleet. Even allowing twenty days for the steamers to sail to mid ocean, they ought to have steamed by this time to their destination. The inference is inevitable: it is that the cable parted, once or oftener, and that, in obedience to the sailing directions, after unsuccessful efforts to splice and proceed with the work, the fleet returned to Queenstown.

From one extreme the public have run into another. People now talk as though the whole scheme was laid on the shelf, and the Company defunct. We apprehend that the disaster can hardly be as bad as this. Unless the whole cable be lost, the Company will renew the attempt at the earliest possible opportunity. A million of extra stock could readily be placed here and in England, if there were a fair chance of success.

We are much mistaken in the Telegraph Company's Directors if they are the men to give up their scheme on account of a failure or two. One, two, or three more years may be wasted; but the croakers may make up their minds that the wire will be laid at last.

THE ASTRONOMICAL QUARREL.

Two years ago there was founded at Albany, in this State, mainly through the munificence of Mrs. Dudley, a rich and very aged Albany lady, an astronomical observatory. The inaugural ceremonies were imposing. All the science of this country and of Canada was present—the American Association for the Advancement of Science happening to be at the time assembled at Albany. The Hon. Edward Everett delivered the oration—a discourse on Astronomy, which is the most perfect performance on the subject of which the world can boast. Every body heard it—philosophers and politicians, financiers and fashionables, merchants and men of leisure—all graced by their presence the inauguration of the Dudley Observatory, and shared the high hopes that were entertained of its future usefulness and high renown.

Two years have elapsed. The Astronomer-in-chief, a young man whose name is Gould, has enjoyed twenty-four months of ample leisure for study and observation. There is reason to believe that the munificence of the endowments of the Observatory has freed him from the necessity of devoting any portion of his time to mere money-getting pursuits. It is notorious that he has been provided with instruments the like of which do not exist elsewhere in this country, and which are hardly surpassed in the government observatories of foreign countries. Nothing has been wanting for the usefulness of the Observatory.

Yet, it is due to truth that the fact should be broadly stated, the Dudley Observatory has, thus far, added little to the acquisitions of science. No discoveries have been made there; no calculations have been perfected within its walls which have advanced astronomical knowledge, or shed lustre on the greatest observatory in the United States. At least, if any such discoveries or calculations have been made, the public has known nothing of them. We have heard of discoveries at Cincinnati and at Cambridge; we have applauded the labors of Mitchell and Peirce; but of Mr. Gould and the Dudley Observatory we have heard nothing, save when they came to beg for more money for endowments.

Under these circumstances, the public, and especially that large part of it which has contributed to the support of the Observatory, have viewed with peculiar interest the controversy which has arisen between the trustees of the Observatory and the Astronomer-in-chief. It would seem that the former—who are appointed by the charter the managers, directors, and quasi-proprietors of the institution—have for some time been dissatisfied with Mr. Gould and his performance; that they have ground of complaint against him not only on account of his discharge of his official duties, but also by reason of his indocility as their hired officer; and that, failing, after repeated endeavors, to bring him to reason, they finally resolved to displace him. Mr. Gould, on his side, declined to be ousted from the very comfortable berth which he occupied. He met his employers with menace and defiance. His friends openly charged them with ignorance and fatuity, and gave them to understand that they were mere money-getters, incapable of comprehending the uses and aims of an Observatory. He secured, for his controversy, the countenance of three gentlemen whom the country delights to honor—Professors Bache, Peirce, and Henry. These gentlemen had taken an active part in the establishment of the Observatory. They are men of undoubted scientific eminence. To honor and compliment them, the trustees had, on the establishment of the Observatory, created them a sort of Council, with mere honorary functions. It was their duty to see that Mr. Gould calculated eclipses, and made the proper astronomical computations. They were expected to inform that gentleman, in case of need, that two and two made four and not five, and that Saturn was larger than Mercury. Beyond this it does not appear that they had any duties or privileges. They were mere private advisers of Mr. Gould, and evidently held office at the pleasure of their superiors and chiefs—the trustees.

When issue was fairly joined between the astronomer and the trustees, these councilors, with the reckless ardor of enthusiasts, rushed into the arena. They had no more legal right to interfere than the Common Council of New York. They occupied, in fact, a position of less responsibility and authority than Mr. Gould himself. Yet such was their scientific enthusiasm, such their affection for their colleague, and such their natural ignorance of the ways of this wicked world, that they assumed to dispute authority with the trustees of the Observatory, and to question their right to discharge the duties which the charter devolved upon them.

To such a contest—presuming common sense to exist among the trustees—there could be but one issue. The Council, in endeavoring to screen its protégé, simply shared his fate. The trustees very properly made a clean sweep of all the scientific men. In a few days the Observatory will be reorganized on a new basis. It will be of great advantage to the new astronomer to enjoy the benefit of the advice of such men as Bache and Peirce. But it is to be hoped that the boon will be sought in such a manner that there shall be no mistake as to its conditions, and that, whoever aids the new master of the Observatory, there may be no further attempts to make it a mere nursery for scientific priggism.

THE DE RIVIÈRE CASE.

ONE De Rivière, a Frenchman, stating himself, seemingly with truth, to be an ex-officer of the French army, came to this country many months since with a view of engaging in the then pending Central American wars, either on the side of Walker or that of his opponents. He offered his sword to Trojan and Tyrian alike. Both were blind enough to decline it. Under the circumstances, Monsieur De Rivière led an obscure life here for some time, subsisting chiefly, it would seem, by exhibiting a sword which he declared he had waved at the head of a forlorn hope at the famous attack on the Malakoff at Sebastopol. He lectured—not without success; and at last, when fortune seemed to have turned her back upon him altogether, he applied for and obtained a conditional engagement to serve under General Henningsen in Walker's new expedition. At that time this De Rivière was living, after the fashion of his country, with a lady who was not his wife. Feeling some affection for her, and apprehending that he might fall in the new conflicts in which he was about to engage, he desired, before he left, to do what he could to preserve her from future want. Deliberately, therefore, and not dishonorably, he took her before a minister of his faith and married her.

He then left for the rendezvous of Henningsen's corps d'armée in the South. As the world knows, that corps d'armée never had a chance of smelling powder. Monsieur De Rivière led as idle a life at Mobile as he had led in New York. The only distraction he found was fighting a duel with a sagacious Southerner who proclaimed him a chevalier d'industrie. In the conflict he was wounded; was carried from the field to the house of a generous gentleman, who lodged him, and whose family nursed him till his convalescence. That hospitality he requited by inducing his host's daughter to elope with him. He did not marry her. He never tried to do so. He knew better than that. But he took the innocent child from her father's house, led her to Havana, and thence to New York and New Jersey, and at the present moment keeps her hid away somewhere in the interior of that State.

The chief aggravation of the case is, that the law provides no adequate punishment for his conduct. He has been arrested and held to bail for stealing the young lady's clothing; and proceedings have been instituted against him for enticing away a child for purposes of prostitution. But it is very doubtful—even if he should be caught, which is not by any means certain—whether either of these charges could be sustained in a court of law; and at any rate, the punishment, in case of conviction on either, would be slight. Public sentiment and any honest jury would have justified the outraged father in vindicating his own wrongs in the most thorough manner with his own hand. As it is, wrong—and wrong of the foulest kind—bids fair to prevail.

THE NEWS FROM INDIA.

BY the Fulton we have later news from India, and news which is regarded as favorable to the British. Before acquiescing in this view, it will be well to inquire what news from India could be favorable to the European cause?

Battles won and forts stormed could not be classed under this head. For if the experience of the past twelve months proves any thing, it is that this great uprising in India can not be put down by the sword. More battles have been fought in India since May, 1857, than were fought in all the Crimean war. Delhi has been stormed; Cawnpore has been taken at the point of the bayonet; Lucknow has been thrice mastered, and at last occupied; and, after all this, where are the British? Precisely where they were before. Nothing is in their hands but the chief roads and a few strong places. The country—jungle, mountain, and thicket—is still held by the mutineers. Their tactics are those of guerrillas. Now and then they fight, and in such cases they are usually beaten; then they disperse, and are nowhere to be found, till, a few days or weeks afterward, they suddenly loom up on the flank of some unsuspecting corps d'armée, and go through the same manœuvre again. Arithmetic and common sense tell us that, in such a game, the winner will be he who is superior in numbers. To suppose that the fifty or sixty thousand Englishmen can carry on, successfully, such a war as this against 100,000,000 natives of India, in India, is manifestly preposterous.

As it would undoubtedly be a general misfortune for India to relapse, at present, under the undisputed control of the native rajahs, friends of humanity will wish well to the English Government in their endeavor to reconstitute the Indian Government. At the same time, it must be added that none of the constitutional projects which have been made public thus far recognize in any degree the right of the Hindoo to self-government. Without this feature, it is very doubtful whether they would be entitled to even a partial measure of success.

THE SHOCKINGLY DULL TIMES.

IN the sketch of Mr. James Gordon Bennett, published in this journal last week, the following passage occurs:

"The New York Daily Times lately said of him [meaning Mr. Bennett] that, when he was dead, people would honor his memory as a great editor and a great statesman. The remark does credit to the sagacity of the Times."

This, on Thursday, the senior editor of the Courier and Enquirer "imagined would surprise the Times as much as it did him." It does, in effect, seem to have surprised the gentlemen who, in the absence of Mr. Raymond, are conducting that journal. They said, on Saturday, 10th inst., that Harper's Weekly

"makes a pretended quotation from the Times eulogistic of the Herald's editor. We trust that the Weekly will see the propriety of making a full explanation of the forged opinion which it pretends to quote from the Times."

In reply, we beg to refer the Courier and Enquirer and the Times to the following extract from the New York Daily Times of 3d January, 1857:

"Say what people may about Bennett, a hundred years hence his name will be recorded among the great men of the present time. Few persons, vilified, calumniated, and hissed at as he has been, would have .... risen to the high point of influence he has obtained .... Mr. Bennett, in private life, is a gentleman, and in politics, a statesman."

The fact that Congress was in session at the time this was published will probably account for its escaping the notice of the senior editor of the Courier and Enquirer.

We advise the gentlemen who are conducting the Times in Mr. Raymond's absence, to read their own paper. Profitless and even cruel as the task may seem, they should nerve themselves to its performance.

THE LOUNGER.

THE FOURTH.

Our great national day was the pleasantest that most of us remember. The air was so cool and bright—the opportunities of enjoyment so various—the general spirit so peaceable—that, amidst the universal popping, which was never sound nor sane, old John Adams might have been satisfied and have felt that the day was duly honored. New York was comparatively placid; but Boston came out very strong in speech-making. While Mr. Choate and Mr. Holmes made each one long oration, and Mr. Everett two short ones, Mr. Caleb Cushing introduced us "the favorite son of the Massachusetts," spoke to us in New York. Over the river, in Brooklyn, Rev. Henry Ward Beecher was the orator. Somewhere at the West, on his homeward way, Mr. Douglas made an "unparticular" speech. In Philadelphia his friend, Mr. Buchanan; and upon a steamer at sea, coming to Boston, the Hon. Jefferson Davis. And besides these distinguished ones, all kinds of orators, in every town and village in the land—in pulpits and groves, on platforms and "stands"—improved the day and its lessons, gayly or gloomily, as their minds inclined.

The great significance of the day in our vicinity was, that it was a festival of free-speech; and so may it always be, and with ever-increasing eloquence and influence! Whatever a man thought of our country and the condition, its progress, its glory, or its danger, he could freely utter. The most diverse sentiments were spoken in the most vehement way; there was not a single occasion which, upon being read, will not be repugnant to the convictions of at least half the people, and think what a fortunate state and society that is in which the public letters decorously to every man who can say what he honestly thinks, and from what he thinks fit to say he thinks—with tolerable facility.

This great fact, of itself, shows what has thus far been done in this country; and is, so far, a splendid justification of the day. Mr. Choate's most prolonged period—Mr. Everett's most elegant sentence—Mr. Cushing's most denunciatory allusion, could not overstate the magnificent possibility of the nation whose birthday has just passed. With the spirit and the sentiment of Independence, with his calm, indomitable faith in liberty, and his unwavering resolution to make his opinions free, or die in the effort—denounced as a rebel and traitor—asserted at last as enthusiast and an incompetent militia colonel—with his spirit, and sentiment, and wisdom as our guides, we are not likely to go wrong. It will be pleasant to see how the eloquence of the day culminated in homage to that great and good example, as the glittering constellations circle around the pole. And when the evening gown were fired, and the eighty-second anniversary ended amidst the universal crackle of musical bells, who did not feel that if indeed the statesmen and orators, the lawyers and leaders of the land, will imbue themselves with the true liberty, sobriety, honesty, patriotism, and wise humanity of Washington, the country will become what even he scarcely dreamed it might be—"brightest and best of the sons of the morning?"

A MAN'S NAME.

[In reply to "A FRIEND," who inclosed an extract from a Boston paper of June 18.]

In a man owns any thing, it is his name. He is its natural guardian in every way, and it is impossible for all that the individual bearing that particular name may do or say. Whoever uses it for any purpose without his consent is a forger. It is no excuse to say that you may put his name to a check in favor of somebody to whom he has given some money to that somebody's sister or brother yesterday. It is a pure, absolute, criminal forgery. He uses his name who signs it.

Recent discussions and disclosures have shown how widely the bad habit has spread of using a person's assent to a certain use of their names. If a petition is printed, or a meeting is called, or any kind of a project is supported by the names of persons, it may be pretty certainly understood that some of them were used without authority. And what can a man do, who sees his name bandied about by thoughtless people for purposes which he may not approve? Of course he can not prevent them from giving his name where he thinks he ought to, because somebody else may use it in a manner more or dissimilar cause. A man, for instance, is not to cease to be and to call himself an ardent democrat, because somebody may therefore use his name as against all law and order in society.

Washington Irving agreed with Tom Paine in his republican views—was Washington to deny his democracy, or repeal of it because somebody might declare that he might as well go to Canada and become a drunkard?

A man's only protection in such cases must be his character and antecedents, and his friends must rely upon them. There are a great many stories told to the injury of famous men, which, a year or other days, which can now be disproved only by the force and publicity there may be in a denial.

Every generous soul acquits Sir Philip Sidney of any wrong toward Lord Penelope Devereux, upon the ground of pure character. And the popular character is not always sufficient. The late atrocious rumor that Bishop Hughes carried his wife on grounds notorious in London, was blasted at once by his personal character in every honest mind; and when he wrote his card, and stated that the reasons were entirely private and peculiar to his wife and himself, and that nothing could or should be any thing else finally lied, he ended the matter at once, and smashed the rumor like a bubble. His character protects him. Will any body be such a fool as to suppose that a man who would separate from his wife would therefore probably be guilty of licentious crimes?

So with lesser men.

But the newspapers which propagate these false rumors, and then moralize upon them, are not very beautiful or edifying spectacles. They do an injury they can never undo; and before they brand a man they do not even look to see if he be a criminal. Nobody knows so well as an editor how often men's names are used without their authority, and how impossible it is for any correction to overtake or extinguish the effect of the publication. So man is therefore so closely bound by every honorable consideration to take care that he is telling the truth and not "improving" a falsehood to the injury and hurt of his readers.

But it is useless for a man to write letters and try to catch the airy slanders that dart and sting about the street. If he be consistent and honest it will all come right. If his character can not conquer his words will not.

SONG OF THE ROSE.

Sweet botanists, who search in the nightingale wooing the rose, sings to his own rose in that remembered music:

I.

I watch with thee the silent summer night,
When hills I follow every sparkle star,
And waiting moon lies risen to our sole sight,
Till from their patient quest,
All, all are sunk to rest,
And in the dim slumbrous west,
And, lady, thou and I.

II.

Oh, weary heart! deep sky that watch unbow'd,
Though round thee steepers toil the long night hours,
And many-voiced day is loud,
And silliness is loud,
And the watch it keeps,
Transcend in its remoter scope,
And wandering zephyrs faint on beds of flowers.

III.

E'en while with sight you cool your throbbing brow,
God's living hand is on all that you see now;
And all that pathway white
Is yonder warm bright,
Is but the deepening light
Of angels bringing peace for all thy days!

IV.

The perfume which I bear is but the kiss
That Heaven has upon me in blessing. Rightful token sweet they left for you it is.
And see! that star
The tears they wept for you—
Which, falling on the earth, I turned
I garnered in my bosom all the night!

V.

The morning comes, and Nature is at prayer!
And with the early light and hush of dawn,
Soothed with the song of birds and blossoming air,
With suffering long express'd,
At last I have found rest.
By gentle Sleep cares'd—
Sleep standing by, care under breath to wane!

VI.

Oh! sleep, dear lady, sleep! Sleep, sleep, nor dream!
Let not the world's rude sounds disturb thy rest!
Oh! tranquility, as glides the noiseless stream.
Sleep, sleep on, sleep on!
Sleep, sleep, oh, weary breast!
Sleep, sleep, oh, dearest heart!
Too happy I to guard thy rest alway!

TOAD-EATING.

The season for this delightful food is peculiarly auspicious. Some of the largest, finest, ripest, pulpiest, richest, and most savory toads ever produced have been served up during the last few weeks, and consumed with immense relish by a large, but choice, circle of gourmands. The excitement which has been created in the midst of our fellow-citizens has been very great. The first cut of a delicate specimen with the sweetest of peas, or the earliest shad broiled to a turn, are both delicious and are eaten with less avidity, than the delicious toads which have made their appearance remarkable. It is a happy provision of nature that the most delicious of all ways to gratified, and the intelligent observer can not go far in the country without encountering some of the many lovers of the dainty busily engaged in the consumption. But the specimens we generally meet in this country are but faint when the consumer desires. In fact, it is only rarely that a toad consumer have a delicate toad to eat and toad-eating. The best opportunities are offered in England, and under peculiar circumstances in the United States. When they are plenty, however, there is an entire devotion to the enjoyment of the repast which is truly touching to witness. In truth, it is a question whether the rarity of the best specimens of toads does not make them —when they do occur, and are presented to the most extraordinary specimens of toad-eating in the whole world! Our Washington correspondent, in the department, Mr. Thackeray, who may be called the very high priest of toad-eating, might learn new truths of the human capacity in this direction among his transatlantic brethren. Two Americans, who have recently been travelling in this country—quiet and educated gentlemen, entirely unacquainted with the various movements are in no sense public property—will be very successful in giving the celebrated naturalists and social philosopher the benefit of their toad-eating devotion, gathered from their personal observation and experience, of American toad-eating.

"JEMS PIPS OF PIPESVILLE."

Mr. STERNE PARK is a gentleman who thinks some things may be done as well as others, and that, because Mr. Matthews and Mr. Albert Smith have been successful as monologuers, they have not monopolized success. He is a singer, a dancer, a dramatic reciter, and a humorist. He has been quite round the world, appearing amusing it to its extreme satisfaction, and he has now returned to amuse his fellow-citizens with his many triumphs, in America. Let us give him a fair chance, and he has surely as much right as any of the world to know that if he can really entertain the public, he is sure to succeed, if he only lets the public know that he is waiting to amuse it. Every body is willing to laugh and be pleased. And the artist only put it so that the public can not help the public.

MOUNT VERNON.

The women of America propose to buy the land upon which stands the tomb of Washington. In the spirit of a generous spirit, but with that large and sweet sympathy which belongs to women—hoping that in doing one thing they may do many, that the rewards of patriotism may be made many, and he also fragrant in the nostrils of a nation, begin their thoughtful, considerate, considerate, charity—that while they honor the grave of the dead, they may quicken universal love and reverence for the spirit that inhabited the body, and so fulfill a great, magnificent, beautiful ministry of peace—they are endeavoring to secure the country, and by invoking the interest of good men and women in an object which can not but seem lovely to all people, and of good report in all agency—entertainment according to generosity and ability and feeling—they hope to collect the requisite sum before many months.

Meanwhile, Mr. Washington, the present owner, has consented to hold the estate at their disposition for a limited time for a certain sum—about two hundred thousand dollars. In itself nobody supposes the place is worth the money; but value is very arbitrary. In commercial cities, it is an axiom that a thing is worth what it will bring. In the present case, it is most true that it is worth the owner asks for it. But that the grass of our greatest citizen should not be dishonored, or become a mere speculation and show—that it should be a national shrine, a perpetual and perpetually honored pleasure-place for great principles illustrated by the career of its great inmate, is beyond question. Hence to its ownership and the great expenditure of goodness. May all the Washington legend garlands, in the hands of the women of America, turn to wreaths of living cooling the spirit of him they honor, to feed the discord they deplore! May they bloom into fragrant fruit, and may the angels waved on the eve of the birth of the religion of peace on earth, good will to man!

And may all this be proof, cy, "Amen!"

A COMPLETE LITTLE WRITER.

Tom Lounger dined with his friend, C. A. Baltimore Clerk," who sends the following example of worshipful humility, falling in love:

"A young lady newly married, being obliged to shew to the husband all the letters she wrote, sent the following to an intimate friend: 'Le key is, to read the first and then every alternate line only.'"

"I can not be satisfied, my dearest friend!
Most as I love thee, and must ever love,
Unless I pour into your friendly bosom,
Which has ever been in unison with mine,
The various sensations which swell
With the tumultuous throbbings of my pleasure,
my almost bursting heart. I tell you my dear husband is one of the sweetest men
I have now been married seven weeks, and have every reason in the world to regret the day that joined us. My husband is both in person and manners far from resembling ugly, cross, old, disagreeable, and jealous monsters, who think by confining to secure a wife, it is his maxim to treat as a person, friend and confidant, and not as a plaything, or menial slave, the woman he chooses to be his companion. Neither party
he says, always enjoy himself completely;
but each yield to the other by turns.
As ancient wisdom says, which is a large,
but choice, circle of gourmands. The excitement which has been created in the midst of our fellow-citizens has been very great. The first cut of a delicate man with the sweetest of peas, or the earliest shad
broiled to a turn, are both delicious and are eaten with less avidity, than the delicious toads which have made their appearance remarkable. It is a happy provision of nature that the most delicious of all ways to gratified, and the intelligent observer can not go far in the country without encountering some of the many lovers of the dainty busily engaged in the consumption. But the specimens we generally meet in this country are but faint when the consumer desires. In fact, it is only rarely that a toad consumer have a delicate toad to eat and toad-eating. The best opportunities are offered in England, and under peculiar circumstances in the United States. When they are plenty, however, there is an entire devotion to the enjoyment of the repast which is truly touching to witness. In truth, it is a question whether the rarity of the best specimens of toads does not make them
—when they do occur, and are presented to the most extraordinary specimens of toad-eating in the whole world! Our Washington correspondent, in the department, Mr. Thackeray, who may be called the very high priest of toad-eating, might learn new truths of the human capacity in this direction among his transatlantic brethren. Two Americans, who have recently been travelling in this country—quiet and educated gentlemen, entirely unacquainted with the various movements are in no sense public property—will be very successful in giving the celebrated naturalists and social philosopher
the benefit of their toad-eating devotion, gathered from their personal observation and experience,
of American toad-eating.

"JEMS PIPS OF PIPESVILLE."

Mr. STERNE PARK is a gentleman who thinks some things may be done as well as others, and that, because Mr. Matthews and Mr. Albert Smith have been successful as monologuers, they have not monopolized success. He is a singer, a dancer, a dramatic reciter, and a humorist. He has been quite round the world, appearing amusing it to its extreme satisfaction, and he has now returned to amuse his fellow-citizens with his many triumphs, in America. Let us give him a fair chance, and he has surely as much right as any of the world to know that if he can really entertain the public, he is sure to succeed, if he only lets the public know that he is waiting to amuse it. Every body is willing to laugh and be pleased. And the artist only put it so that the public can not help the public.

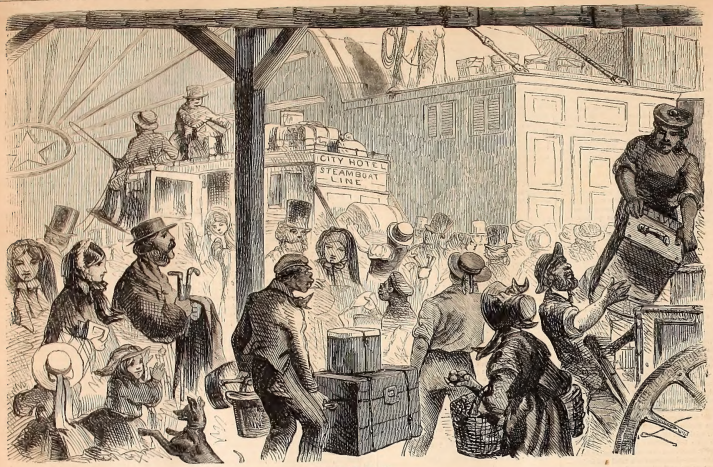
MOUNT VERNON.

The women of America propose to buy the land upon which stands the tomb of Washington. In the spirit of a generous spirit, but with that large and sweet sympathy which belongs to women—hoping that in doing one thing they may do many, that the rewards of patriotism may be made many, and he also fragrant in the nostrils of a nation, begin their thoughtful, considerate, considerate, charity—that while they honor the grave of the dead, they may quicken universal love and reverence for the spirit that inhabited the body, and so fulfill a great, magnificent, beautiful ministry of peace—they are endeavoring to secure the country, and by invoking the interest of good men and women in an object which can not but seem lovely to all people, and of good report in all agency—entertainment according to generosity and ability and feeling—they hope to collect the requisite sum before many months.

Meanwhile, Mr. Washington, the present owner, has consented to hold the estate at their disposition for a limited time for a certain sum—about two hundred thousand dollars. In itself nobody supposes the place is worth the money; but value is very arbitrary. In commercial cities, it is an axiom that a thing is worth what it will bring. In the present case, it is most true that it is worth the owner asks for it. But that the grass of our greatest citizen should not be dishonored, or become a mere speculation and show—that it should be a national shrine, a perpetual and perpetually honored pleasure-place for great principles illustrated by the career of its great inmate, is beyond question. Hence to its ownership and the great expenditure of goodness. May all the Washington legend garlands, in the hands of the women of America, turn to wreaths of living cooling the spirit of him they honor, to feed the discord they deplore! May they bloom into fragrant fruit, and may the angels waved on the eve of the birth of the religion of peace on earth, good will to man!

And may all this be proof, cy, "Amen!"

A COMPLETE LITTLE WRITER.



Tom Lounger dined with his friend, C. A. Baltimore Clerk," who sends the following example of worshipful humility, falling in love:

"A young lady newly married, being obliged to shew to the husband all the letters she wrote, sent the following to an intimate friend: 'Le key is, to read the first and then every alternate line only.'"

"I can not be satisfied, my dearest friend!
Most as I love thee, and must ever love,
Unless I pour into your friendly bosom,
Which has ever been in unison with mine,
The various sensations which swell
With the tumultuous throbbings of my pleasure,
my almost bursting heart. I tell you my dear
husband is one of the sweetest men
I have now been married seven weeks, and have every reason in the world to regret the day that joined us. My husband is both in person and manners far from resembling ugly, cross, old, disagreeable, and jealous
monsters, who think by confining to secure a wife, it is his maxim to treat as a person, friend and confidant, and not as a plaything, or menial slave, the woman he chooses to be his companion. Neither party
he says, always enjoy himself completely;
but each yield to the other by turns.
As ancient wisdom says, which is a large,
but choice, circle of gourmands. The excitement which has been created in the midst of our fellow-citizens has been very great. The first cut of a delicate man with the sweetest of peas, or the earliest shad
broiled to a turn, are both delicious and are eaten with less avidity, than the delicious toads which have made their appearance remarkable. It is a happy provision of nature that the most delicious of all ways to gratified, and the intelligent observer can not go far in the country without encountering
some of the many lovers of the dainty busily engaged in the consumption. But the specimens we generally meet in this country are but faint when the consumer desires. In fact, it is only rarely that a toad consumer have a delicate toad to eat and toad-eating. The best opportunities are offered in England, and under peculiar circumstances in the United States. When they are plenty, however,
there is an entire devotion to the enjoyment of the repast which is truly touching to witness. In truth, it is a question whether the rarity of the best specimens of toads does not make them
—when they do occur, and are presented to the most extraordinary specimens of toad-eating in the whole world! Our Washington correspondent, in the department, Mr. Thackeray, who may be called the very high priest of toad-eating, might learn new truths of the human capacity in this direction among his transatlantic brethren. Two Americans, who have recently been travelling in this country—quiet and educated gentlemen, entirely unacquainted with the various movements are in no sense public property—will be very successful in giving the celebrated naturalists and social philosopher
the benefit of their toad-eating devotion,
gathered from their personal observation and experience,
of American toad-eating.

"JEMS PIPS OF PIPESVILLE."

Mr. STERNE PARK is a gentleman who thinks some things may be done as well as others, and that, because Mr. Matthews and Mr. Albert Smith have been successful as monologuers, they have not monopolized success. He is a singer, a dancer, a dramatic reciter, and a humorist. He has been quite round the world, appearing amusing it to its extreme satisfaction, and he has now returned to amuse his fellow-citizens with his many triumphs, in America. Let us give him a fair chance, and he has surely as much right as any of the world to know that if he can really entertain the public, he is sure to succeed, if he only lets the

GOING ON BOARD.

THE BOAT AND THE TRAIN.

THE accompanying illustrations depict a phase of life which is interesting to the bulk of our readers at the present season. Everybody, but a few editors and other slaves, spends a large segment of the dog-days in cool retreats.

The first picture, "Going on Board," will remind many a reader of the brief period of misery which is the unavoidable introduction to a trip to the country by steamboat. The throng, the noise, the reckless manner in which luggage is handled, the excitement about lost trunks, good berths, and misplaced keys, the terror lest Jimmy or Polly should fall overboard from the gangway, the nervousness caused by the ubiquitous sign—"Beware of Pickpockets!"—all these form an ensemble which travelers do not readily forget, and which our artist has happily seized.

The second illustration, "Waiting for the Train," represents one of the country stations which serve as outlets to the rural retreats where it is so delightful to waste a few days in July or August. The "company" is evidently city bred, though we notice that one of the trunks hails from that snug little place, Providence, Rhode Island. The young lady who forms the centre of the group, is taking a tender leave of her little sister in the sun-bonnet—an operation which appears to be full of interest to the party with the mustache, in the background. The customary dispute about baggage is being waged between the old gentleman with cane and umbrella and that exasperating personage—the baggage-master. At the other side, a comfortable character is beguiling ennui with the aid of a cigar; while the most philosophical, if not the best looking of the party, is enjoying a real pleasure in the inspection of the cuts in the last Harper's Weekly.

WAITING FOR THE TRAIN.

THE LATE ERUPTION OF VESUVIUS.

IN a late number of this journal we published a series of cuts illustrating the terrible earthquakes which devastated the country lying south and southeast of Naples in the early part of the present year. In a subsequent number we gave an account, from the pen of an English manufacturer who had benevolently undertaken to relieve the distresses of the sufferers, of the dangers done by those frightful convulsions. We now subjoin, as a fitting appendix, two illustrations of the eruption of Vesuvius which took place at the end of May and the beginning of June.

The connection between earthquakes and volcanic eruptions has always been conceded by men of science, but has never been explained. Daubeny, Humboldt, and other philosophers have ventilated various ingenious theories to account for the connection; but after all they know no more than the peasant of the campagna, who says, in his artless way, when the earth quakes, that she (the earth) has the colic, and will not be relieved until she has a copious evacuation through some volcano. In accordance with this homely theory, the Neapolitans have been preparing for an eruption of Vesuvius ever since the earthquakes. Other portents confirmed their anticipations of disaster. The almond-trees flowered and cherries half-ripened in December last; in May it stormed and rained, and snow fell heavily in the mountains.

It was on the 24th May that Vesuvius first showed symptoms of a new excitement. The reader may be aware that the same crater seldom serves the purpose of more than one eruption; a single effort appears to exhaust it. Travelers walk securely over the crater from whence issued the terrible eruption which overwhelmed Herculaneum and Pompeii. Accordingly, when the mountain revived to activity in May last, the old crater on which travelers have gazed with wonder for a century or so was saliently silent and dark. It was from a number of new and smaller craters, scattered over the space between Monte Somma and the old cone, that the lava and scoriæ burst forth. Some of these juvenile mouths seemed especially charged with the duty of hurling molten stones into the air in regular volleys. Others resembled caldrons full to the brim of liquid fire, hissing, roaring, bubbling up, pouring over the edge, and rolling great red torrents down the mountain side. The best generated from these fire-mouths would have sufficed to keep a great city warm for a whole year. At first, the lava stream rolled slowly and unlikely toward the crest of the Observatory, crossing in its course the old road which, no doubt, many readers have traveled, between the Hermitage and the cone. Near the Observatory the stream divided into two rivers, each of which pursued a steady march downward. A third river, led by a separate crater at the foot of the cone, and above Resina, followed a different path, and promised at one time to lay a new coat of lava upon Herculaneum. When the eruption was at its height one of these lava streams was half a mile wide.

Of course the destruction of property has been considerable, though nothing like that caused by some former eruptions. Several pleasure-houses and residences near the mountain have been overwhelmed. Instances of remarkable philosophy on the part of sufferers have been noted. A priest, whose house, in his absence, had been devoured by the lava, ran boldly to the end of the stream, and threw into it his latch-key, exclaiming:

"Thou hast taken my house; take the key also!"

The Neapolitans seem to have rather enjoyed the spectacle. A correspondent says:

"On each night several thousands of persons of all ranks, from the peer to the peasant, urged by curiosity, repair to the scene of this extraordinary spectacle. The darkness being complete, and the route in many parts difficult, each party is furnished with a torch, and the view of these hundreds of torches flitting about between the streams of lava is most curious, presenting the appearance of multitudes of fireflies.

"The Hermitage, which is close to the great basin of craters and rivers of lava, is approached by a tolerably good carriage-road, and, as may be supposed, hundreds of vehicles of every description, from the calèche of the millionaire to the humble corsicle, are collected there toward midnight. Donkey parties abound, of which ladies do not fear to form a part."

In some of the country parts the news of the eruption was received with excessive joy, as an indication that the earthquakes, which for five months have endangered life and property, would now terminate. Throughout the campagna of Naples people are still living in sheds and tents, prudently waiting till the earthquakes are over before commencing to rebuild their houses.

Never was so miserable a condition of affairs. Notwithstanding all that has been written, the fearful effects of the late convulsions of the earth in the kingdom of the Two Sicilies are very imperfectly realized abroad.

Saponara, a fine town of 6000 souls, was shattered at a stroke, and only one building—a castle—left standing. Half the inhabitants perished. In an old fort, whose walls were several feet thick, a sum of $300,000 had been concealed in specie; the keeper of the fund and three-fourths of the money disappeared together in the ruins. At this place the earthquake was a series of unaccountable shocks from side to side; it seemed as though some monster had taken the place in his teeth, and was shaking it as a terrier shakes a rat. A priest was thrown out of his window, and caught, in air, a peasant who had been ejected by a similar process. Both fell to the ground alive, clasped in each other's arms. In one house every person who was sleeping on the upper story was crushed to death; the tenants of the story below were not disturbed. The City Judge had a singular escape. His house was destroyed, and he and his wife were dashed—somewhere—under a mountain of ruins. Happily for him, he fell undermost; and her arm happened so to strike the earth that it formed a shield for her husband. Death stiffened it; the Judge was dug out alive, the corpse of his wife still continuing to sustain the weight of the ruins above him.

A CRATER IN ERUPTION.

THE LATE ERUPTION OF VESUVIUS.

Montemurro, once a fine town of 7000 inhabitants, is a pile of rubbish, near which are encamped two thousand survivors, in mourning for five thousand deceased relatives. Viggiano, which furnishes a large proportion of the organ-players and itinerant musicians who are found all over the world, is in no better condition. A thousand persons were killed here in endeavoring to escape. Three men at this place were lying in one bed. At the first shock a beam fell and at one stroke severed six legs. They were found alive three days afterward.

LITERARY.

A CYCLOPEDIA OF COMMERCE, edited by J. Smith Homans and J. Smith Homans, Jun., and published by Harper & Brothers, is a book to which we would draw the attention of every man who desires to possess books of reference, and especially every one who wishes a compendium of information on all commercial subjects.

When the broad signification of the word commerce is considered—the fact that it includes every thing which is bought or sold—applies as well to a horse trade as an importation of teas and silks—to a pound of geese feathers as to a cargo of whale oil—the amount of information which ought to be contained in such a cyclopedia will appear evidently immense. All this the volume does contain, admirably arranged, and most thoroughly digested. From the article on page 1, on the Aam, a liquid measure in Holland and elsewhere, to that on page 2000 (and last), on the Zoll-Verein, every page teems with information of value to the merchant, the mechanic, the farmer, and the student. We know of no class of men who will not find the work most valuable. If any one of our readers will enter a book-store and turn over a few pages of the volume, we are persuaded that he will consider it a necessary work for his own use, and for the instruction of his children—containing between two covers what can otherwise be found only by opening two or ten thousand.

By way of illustrating this eulogy, we open the book at random. We strike upon page 210, and find the word Shoal defined; next, Shoes, under which are interesting accounts of the boot and shoe trade. The annual value of the boots and shoes made in Massachusetts is $37,400,000. In Essex County alone, in 1855, they were produced to the value of $12,000,000. The article is full of statistical information. Shola is a substance of Indian manufacture resembling Chinese pith paper, and is used to make hats and other articles. Shore is the next word. Shumac the next; with directions for its use, and for selecting the best quality. Siam is, of course, an interesting article. Its products, business, and trade are described, its political history, treaty relations to other countries, and all that is necessary to a thorough knowledge of the country. Sicily, Sierra Leone, Silk, Silver follow, and so on. This will show the class of articles which the cyclopedia contains in ordinary succession. Elsewhere we find the amount of an ordinary book devoted to Light, Light-houses, Coast-lights, etc. This is an article of exceeding value and interest, especially the accounts of various great light-houses; and is followed by equally interesting papers on Linen, Lisbon, Liverpool, etc. To farmers, the articles on Corn and Grains, Cotton, Tobacco, Rice, Forest Trees, Flax, Wool, and agricultural markets of the world, are worth all the price of the book. To merchants, there is scarcely an article in these two thousand pages which will not prove important. In New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and other coast cities, the work will, of course, be found in every counting-room. It will be furnished to every ship, and will be as necessary to the captain as his compass. He will enter no port in the world which is not described, with all its resources of manufacture, trade, and prices, and especially its laws of commerce. The commercial law of every nation in the world is here given so clearly that no captain or supercargo can mistake. We hope, also, to see it become a house-book, in the possession of all classes of citizens, as an inexhaustible fund of useful and interesting information.

Dr. Barclay's work on Jerusalem, of which we have heretofore spoken, is now succeeded by a small book entitled THE HADJI IN SYRIA, by Mrs. Sarah Barclay Johnson, who, if we are correctly informed, is his daughter. The publishers are Challen & Sons, at Philadelphia. The book is a pleasant addition to our list of works on the Holy Land. The author pretends to no new discoveries or ideas, but she makes a very agreeable, chatty history of some of the incidents in a long residence at the Holy City. The chief value of her book, however, consists in the accurate and beautiful illustrations, which, to one who has seen Jerusalem, are exceedingly pleasing, and to one who has not been a Hadji must prove very instructive. The reader can not fail to observe the resemblance of the name selected for this work to Mr. Curtis's title, "The Howadji in Syria." For the benefit of those who do not know it, it may be well to say that a Howadji is (in modern Arabic usage) a traveler, while a Hadji is a pilgrim.

It is but a little while since we called our readers' attention to Barry Cornwall's "Farewell to the Muse," and lo! Barry Cornwall comes again; not himself, but in the person of his own daughter, who suddenly takes her place, and claims to be, and is, recognized among the poets.

The father lives again in the child. The same delicious purity of thought and melody of words; the same delicacy of outline; the same winning tenderness of expression that make us all love the father, characterize the LAYS AND LEGENDS of Miss Procter. A few of them have been seen heretofore as fugitives without maternity, but the most of them are new and fresh—eminently fresh and heart-reaching. We extract:

A WOMAN'S QUESTION.

Before I trust my fate to thee,
 Or place my hand in thine;
Before I let thy future give
 Color and form to mine,
Before I peril all for thee, question thy soul to-night for me.

I break all slighter bonds, nor feel
 A shadow of regret;
Is there one link within the past
 That holds thy spirit yet;
Or is thy faith as clear and free as that which I can pledge to thee?

Does there within thy dimmest dreams
 A possible future shine,
Wherein thy life could henceforth breathe,
 Untouched, unshared by mine?
If so, at any pain or cost, oh, tell me before all is lost.

Look deeper still. If thou canst feel
 Within thy inmost soul
That thou hast kept a portion back,
 While I have staked the whole,
Let no false pity spare the blow, but, in true mercy, tell me so.

Is there within thy heart a need
 That mine can not fulfill?
One chord that any other hand
 Could better wake or still?
Speak now—lest at some future day my whole life wither and decay.

Lives there within thy nature hid
 The demon-spirit Change,
Shedding a passing glory still
 On all things new and strange?
It may not be thy fault alone—but shield my heart against thy own.

Couldst thou withdraw thy hand one day
 And answer to my claim,
That Fate, and that to-day's mistake—
 Not thou—had been to blame;
Some soothe their conscience thus; but thou—oh, surely thou wilt warn me now.

Nay, answer not—I dare not hear—
 The words would come too late;
Yet I would spare thee all remorse,
 So comfort thee, my Fate:
Whatever on my heart may fall—remember, I would risk it all.

Our space is small; but we can not lay the book aside without one more extract, which illustrates what we have found one of the pleasantest characteristics of Miss Procter's poetry, that she appreciates and admires the beauties of her father. Barry Cornwall himself might have written this:

HUSH!

"I can scarcely hear," she murmured,
 "For my heart beats loud and fast,
But surely, in the far, far distance,
 I can hear a sound at last."
 "It is only the reapers singing,
 As they carry home their sheaves;
 And the evening breeze has risen,
 And rustles the dying leaves."

"Listen! there are voices talking."
 Calmly still she strove to speak,
Yet her voice grew faint and trembling,
 And the red flushed in her cheek.
 "It is only the children playing
 Below now their work is done,
 And they laugh that their eyes are dazzled
 By the rays of the setting sun."

Fainter grew her voice, and weaker
 As, with anxious eyes, she cried,
"Down the avenue of chestnuts
 I can hear a horseman ride."
 "It was only the deer that were feeding
 In a herd on the clover grass;
 They were startled and fled to the thicket
 As they saw the reapers pass."

Now the night arose in silence,
 Birds lay in their leafy nest,
And the deer couched in the forest,
 And the children were at rest
 There was only a sound of weeping
 From watchers around a bed,
 But rest to the weary spirit,
 Peace to the quiet dead!

Ticknor & Fields will reprint Miss Procter's book.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

OUR RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

MR. FORSYTH, in his dispatches, says, that while he has ceased to hold diplomatic intercourse with the Government of Zuloaga, he deemed it better to remain in Mexico to afford protection to American citizens if needed, and until he could learn the views of his Government as to his course. While the Administration views the action of the Zuloaga Government, with regard to the forced contributions, as an impolitic stretch of power, and injurious to American citizens, it has not yet decided if it be a violation of treaties. Attorney-General Black has the matter under consideration, and will soon submit his views to the President. We have a treaty with Mexico, based on the treaty made by that republic previously with England, forbidding the imposition of a forced loan or contribution. The question for the Attorney-General to decide, then, is this: Is a forced loan against the terms of the treaty?

MR. BERNHISEL ON THE UTAH WAR.

The following card appears in the papers:

"Upon the advice of experienced friends, I have carefully avoided presenting my name in print. The most obnoxious individual, however, is, by popular custom, entitled to ask for himself and for others, when malice is busy against them, what is termed a suspension of public opinion.

"I would most respectfully ask my fellow-citizens to distrust the letters with which the journals now abound, coming or purporting to come from the station of the army of Utah, and which are composed without any regard to truth of statement, by those whose personal interests will be promoted by our country's persevering in the wicked enterprise denominated the Mormon War.

"Why are you told by these cruel and mercenary persons, that there is reason to doubt the sincerity of the Mormons' desire for peace? Why did the Press at their command deny the authenticity of the dispatches of Governor A. Cumming to the commander at Camp Scott and the President? Can they hope, after we have entirely abandoned our plans and sacrificed all our preparations for defense—after we have opened a way into Utah to troops whose existence no one reasonable man will doubt was at our mercy; do they still hope to bring on a war by following after our flying people so closely that the conduct of a licentious soldiery will compel our citizens to defend themselves from their outrages by force?

"I do not understand it. My advices show that four months have passed since we were invited by the President of the United States, or by a gentleman who claimed to have his confidence and represent his views, to receive the assurance of his own and the nation's good-will, and to welcome peace and free intercourse again with the forgetfulness of all past differences. Four months have elapsed since that gentleman came among us with his message of peace, and upon our national faith we felt safe to call back our troops who were upon a hostile march, and salute the flag which should protect every American citizen who has a right to gaze upon it. But the hostile preparations against us still continue, the armed men at the camp still threaten to pursue our families and flocks.

"They even write of their success in prejudicing against us the minds of the two gentlemen who have lately reached them bearing the title of Commissioners of Peace.

"With all these evidences of dark plotting, I still have the hope that they will not be able to cover up the truth with fire and blood. I will not yet place the National Administration with those who are striving to destroy us. I believe the President to be a man from whom the truth may be kept by court intrigue; but I trust in him as one in every case incapable of perfidy.

"I think it enough for me to beg a suspension of public opinion. Very respectfully your obedient servant,

"JOHN M. BERNHISEL.
"Delegate from Utah."

MORE OF THE MURUAGA AFFAIR.

A Washington correspondent gives the following account of the last rencontre between M. Muruaga and the banker Corcoran:

"M. Muruaga, Spanish Secretary of Legation, who, it will be remembered, had a difficulty, about two months ago, with Mr. Corcoran, the banker, about a love affair with Corcoran's daughter, yesterday took satisfaction for the insult he believed he had received by throwing his glove in Corcoran's face. The facts are, Mr. Corcoran objected to the attentions of Muruaga to his daughter. Meeting on the street, about two months ago, such language was used that M. Muruaga felt bound to challenge Mr. Corcoran. During several days pending the challenge, Miss Corcoran, it is said, in her anxiety to prevent a collision, and hoping to prevent it by influencing Muruaga, requested an interview. During the interview, in Corcoran's house, servants, who, it appears, were watching, informed their master of Muruaga's presence. Corcoran, accompanied by Senator Bright and the servants, ejected Muruaga from the house—he and the servants handling very roughly and wounding the Secretary. Upon this Corcoran refused Muruaga's challenge, upon the ground of his unwarrantable presence on his (Corcoran's) premises. Muruaga, feeling the sting of wounded honor, applied to his Government for conge, for the purpose of obtaining satisfaction without compromising the legation. Upon obtaining it he announced to Mr. Corcoran, by letter, the termination of the truce, stating that he had been prevented by his official position from seeking reparation before. When Muruaga threw his glove in Corcoran's face, Corcoran drew his pistol, but did not fire. Muruaga stood in an attitude to receive the fire, having his hand on a pistol in his pocket to return the compliment, if not mortally wounded. This has caused great excitement in fashionable circles, though every effort has been made to prevent and suppress it."

THE VETERANS OF 1812.

A correspondent of the Baltimore Sun gives the following interesting incidents of the visit of the old soldiers of the war of 1812 to the President, on Monday, 5th inst:

"Colonel Seaton then took his stand by the side of the President, and, as each of the veterans passed, was introduced by name to the Chief Magistrate, who shook hands with each, and exchanged a pleasant remark. Of one of them the President inquired, 'How long have you lived in Washington?' He said, 'Sixty-eight years.' 'Why,' said the President, 'that was before there was a house here?' 'Yes,' said the old man. 'I helped to carry the chains of the surveyors who ran the lines of the city through the woods.' As the soldiers passed along, the President repeated to another a similar inquiry, when he received for reply, 'I worked, Sir, on the old Capitol—my boy, fifty-four years old, is now employed on the new.'

"Colonel Seaton introduced Mr. John Sessford as the 'father of the city.' 'How long have you resided here?' asked the President. 'I came,' said the venerable man, 'before the Government; I entered the office of the National Intelligencer in 1800.'"

KILLED IN A COAL-PIT.

The Pottsville Miners' Journal tells the following terrible story "About noon on Tuesday last five men and two boys ascended the shaft at the Thomastown colliery, in a car resting on a cage. When within a few inches of the top, a pin upon which the cage rests when it reaches the top, was pulled out too soon, and the car was not on a level with the platform sufficiently to permit it to be rolled off the cage. In this position two of the wheels of the car were rolled off the cage; but it was found impossible to get the other wheels off. A signal was then given to the engineer, who could not see the position of the cage, to hoist it a little. Unfortunately it was hoisted too high; the car tilted, was freed entirely from the cage, and the next instant, with its freight of precious lives, consisting of four men and two boys, was dashed down the shaft, a perpendicular depth of two hundred and forty feet. The remains of the unfortunate men and boys were, after the occurrence, removed to the surface in a shockingly mutilated condition. Two of the men killed, named Sullivan and Kenwich, leave families. The other two, one of whom was named Brennan, were unmarried."

FORTUNATE RESCUE OF A YOUNG GIRL.

A Newport paper has the following: "During the visit of Tourniare & Whitby's National Circus to this city, a short time since, an attempt was made to abduct, with her own connivance, a girl of about fourteen years of age from her friends. The girl is an orphan, living out in a family, and conceived a strong notion of traveling with a circus company. Accordingly, on the last day of the stay of the above circus here, she arranged with them to go off in their company, they secreting her for the purpose. The fact coming to the knowledge of his Honor the Mayor, on Friday evening he proceeded immediately to the circus for the purpose of rescuing the child from her impending fate. Thrice was he repulsed and ordered to leave the tent, in his endeavors to gain access to Watson, the guilty party, once after his errand and official station had been made known. It was then that he ordered the arrest of Watson in the ring, made known to him the case, and ordered him to produce the girl. Watson did not deny any thing, but attempted to turn the thing off as a harmless joke. The end of the matter was, that Mayor Cranston pushed boldly into one of the dressing-rooms, attended only by a child who saw what passed between Watson and the girl, to identify her, found the poor creature secreted, and restored her to her anxious friends. The child had been drugged, for what fiendish purpose the reader can imagine."

RARE TROUT-FISHING.

A letter from the White Mountains says: "A day's sojourn at the Profile House, with a visit to the 'Old Man of the Mountains,' yet looking out in most solemn and solitary grandeur over his domains, to the oft-described Flume, Pool, Basin, and Echo Lake, with trout-fishing, closed our hill-work. One gentleman caught out of Profile Lake one hundred and fifty-eight trout in six hours. Think of that, Isaak Walton! In the evening our stage-driver brought over from Lincoln a brook-trout weighing four and a half pounds, and nearly two feet long."

A YOUNG LADY SHOT BY MISTAKE.

The Grand Rapids (Michigan) Eagle says that a young couple of Newaygo, who were to have been married on Monday of last week, walked out on Saturday and seated themselves upon a log in the shade of the wood, a short distance out of the village of Newaygo, and while thus seated the young lady was shot through the abdomen by a rifle-ball, and expired in three hours thereafter.

The perpetrator of this melancholy deed claims that he was out hunting, and when he saw her through the bushes he thought her a deer, and instantaneously drew his rifle and shot. The lady wore a red dress, and was flirting a white handkerchief to keep away the mosquitoes, which facts fortify the claim of the hunter. The names of the parties are not given.

A CHILD SWEARING AWAY ITS FATHER'S LIFE.

A most bloody and brutal murder was discovered on on 3d inst. at Chicago, which must have been committed on the day previous. The murdered person is a woman, named Jane M'Namee.

The murdered woman had by her husband two children, a little girl and a boy. The boy, four years old, was called as a witness and gave testimony as follows:

Previous to the swearing of the last witness, the little boy was brought in and told his story. He is a very intelligent little lad, and told his tale with an artlessness and sincerity that carried conviction to the hearts of every one that heard it. In the morning he had been asked by the coroner if his father had whipped his mother, and replied, "No." He afterward told Mrs. Cullom that "he daren't tell that man, for he would tell his father." After he was brought in, his attention was first drawn to his playthings, until his timidity being overcome, he told in his childish, lisping prattle, how his father struck his mother, and she fell down; how the blood ran and she was "very sick;" how he stamped upon her after she lay upon the floor, at the same time imitating, with his tiny foot, the motion; how his mother lay in a dark room, and was "so bloody;" how his father drew her forth by the hair of the head, and suiting the action to the word, he grasped both hands in the hair; how his mother tried to get up but could not, swinging his little body to imitate the mother; how he had no dinner in the day time, for his mother was asleep on the bed, but his father got him some after dark; that his father put him to bed; that his mother was in the bed at the time, all bloody by the nose; how she lay on the "boards" (the floor) with blood all round her; how his father wiped up the blood with a dish-cloth and put it in the pan; how he didn't see why she didn't die before, for his father did it very often. And finally, when asked if his mother was drunk, he distinctly said "No, but fader was." It was a scene long to be remembered by all who heard him, in the innocence of his childish confidence, tell his tale, which not a hearer could doubt; not yet old enough to realize his loss, or the danger in which he was placing his only remaining parent.

After listening to the testimony, the jury, with a very few moments' consultation, returned a verdict that the woman came to her death from blows inflicted by her husband, and he was accordingly committed to stand his trial for the awful crime.

STRANGE SCENE IN A CHURCH.

The Palmyra, New York, Courier gives the particulars of a novel suit which came off on Tuesday of last week, before Justice Fuller, of Ontario, Wayne County. It appears that the Episcopalians and Methodists of Putneyville occupy one and the same church, alternately. Two Sundays ago, rumor says, the right of use of said church, as per agreement, was with the Episcopalians, and the Sabbath school of that congregation proceeded to occupy the same. But, whether from misunderstanding or otherwise, the Methodist clergyman persisted in holding a meeting at the same time, and as the young ladies conducting the Episcopal Sabbath school would not withdraw, some little confusion ensued. The result was that on Monday following, at the instance of the Methodist clergyman, the young ladies were arrested for disturbing a religious meeting.

A WESTERN JOKE.

Near the mouth of the Ohio are two rival cities, which sometimes manage to keep their heads above water. The editors of both towns have been telling some queer stories about the late submerge. The Mound City Emporium is responsible for the subjoined dry joke on a wet subject: "The steamer Manchester has been engaged inside the levees at Cairo, during a considerable portion of the past week, towing houses from one point to another, and getting drift out of the town. The report that she tore part of her bottom off by running over the top of the Taylor House is without foundation."

PERSONAL.

Among the passengers by the Persia on Wednesday, was the Hon. H. J. Raymond, editor of The New York Times. Miss Charlotte Cushman, Mr. John Duncan, Mr. John Van Buren, M. Felix Belly, Mr. L. W. Jerome, and Mr. Mure, H. B. M. Consul at New Orleans, also went out in the Persia.

City Marshal Beard, of Lexington, Kentucky, was murdered on 10th inst. by a man named Barker, while endeavoring to arrest him. A crowd collected, and hung the murderer a few hours afterward.

Mr. Benjamin H. Miles, brother of John Miles and Franklin Miles, of Rochester, was killed in a duel at Teuson, Arizona Territory, on the 27th of April last. The circumstances of the affair appear to be, that Edward Miles, a brother of the deceased, got into a difficulty with a man named Curry, and challenged him. Curry refused to meet Edward, for some reason or other, when Benjamin took up the quarrel, and Curry, not having the same objection to him, a hostile meeting took place. The weapons were rifles, and the distance twenty paces. Miles fired in the air, but Curry, incapable of imitating his generosity, deliberately shot him dead. Mr. Miles was buried with Masonic honors.

The Philadelphia Ledger says: "We regret to learn that Colonel R. M. Hoe, the ingenious inventor of the "Last Fast" rotary steam printing-press, has met with an accident at Brightside, which will confine him to his house for a couple of weeks. He was experimenting with an improved washing machine and boiler, and had turned off the steam from the boiler; but without waiting for it to condense, he commenced to raise the lid, and had only succeeded in withdrawing the pin which held it down, when the iron cover flew off, the steam, hot suds, and wet clothes, flew into his face with sufficient force to knock him down. His face and arms were scalded severely—but fortunately his eyes were uninjured. From the elbows to the hand the skin was taken off. The accident occurred on the 21st ult., and he probably will be confined to the house for a week or eight days longer."

The health of Bishop M'Ilvaine is such as to give much concern to his friends. While presiding at a recent convention, he stated in substance that a very peculiar sensation had come over him, accompanied by a remarkable lapse of memory. He desired the business to proceed, called Rev. Dr. Burr to the chair, and retired. In about half an hour he came back, resumed his post, but it was some time before he could readily call the names of members wishing to address the House. He had a similar attack while recently at the East, and while going home from church on Sunday he had another. He did not return to church in the afternoon, but was there at night, and spoke with remarkable clearness and energy. After church, he replied cheerfully to all inquiries about his health, and expressed himself as feeling in no way uncomfortable. He rested well that night, and left Newark next day in apparently good health.

Lord Napier is at the Nahant Hotel with his family.

Hon. Jefferson Davis arrived in Boston, in the steamer Joseph Whitney, from Baltimore, on the 5th inst.

Thomas F. Meagher has returned from the Central American States, where he has been sojourning for several months on a literary and artistic tour, accompanied by his friend Ramon Paez, son of the late President of Venezuela.

The Taunton Gazette says there are four sisters in that town, weighing nine hundred and thirty-five pounds. The shortest, being about five feet high, weighs two hundred and fifty-six.

In describing the Fifth of July celebration at Ogdensburg, the Republican says:

"Madame Vespucci, we hear, threw open her house and grounds to the free ingress and egress of spectators, and thousands visited her gardens and beautiful walks, and very many made her acquaintance and partook of her hospitalities. These gardens and grounds have been laid out, cultivated, and ornamented entirely under her direction and guidance, and they combine in themselves a degree of comprehensiveness, ingenuity, and refined taste which is seldom, if ever, surpassed in this country."

Madame Vespucci, who resides in Ogdensburg, is the descendant of Amerigo Vespucci, from whom the American continent takes its name.

Of Dyer Ames, the New York broker and Connecticut banker, whose drowning we recorded last week, at Yonkers, the Winsted Herald says:

"His personal habits and his family were, however, expensive. To support them, ordinary salaries were insufficient, and Mr. Ames embarked in various speculative operations—at one time visiting Europe in their prosecution. Success still eluded his grasp, and embarrassments followed him with the fidelity of fate, till, at the time of his melancholy end, he had established himself as the keeper of a boarding-house at Yonkers. Disappointment preyed upon him: hope no longer allured him; resort to crime or meaner practices he would not, and on Sunday last he resigned a life which had been unhappy. We would have refrained from these remarks, but the moral of so sad an event should not be lost. It is simply this—he lived too fast. Mr. Ames had never filled any prominent political position, though, perhaps, many of our readers will more readily recall him as a somewhat prominent member in the last Congressional Convention at New Milford. He was a man of warm and generous feelings, and leaves many friends to deplore his untimely end."

Hume, the American medium, was to be married in a few days at St. Petersburg. His bride is Miss Kroll, sister-in-law of the Count Konchelef Besborodo, one of the richest of Russian noblemen, from whom she gets a large fortune.

The case of Mrs. Macready, the reader of Shakspeare, against the City of Alton, Ill., for injuries received in the Spring of 1857, by falling off a side-walk, for which she claimed $20,000 damages, was brought to a close on Wednesday. She obtained a verdict for $300.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT—THE SLAVE-TRADE.

On the 24th ult., in the House of Lords, the Earl of Malmesbury read the official account received from the French Government in reference to the murder of the crew of the "free-labor" ship Regina Cœli, off the Coast of Africa, and the subsequent capture of the vessel by the British Mail-steamer Ethiope. It appeared that the vessel was not taken possession of by the Ethiope from any sympathy toward the negroes on board, but from a feeling that the crew had been murdered, and that the emigrants on board were pirates. The only difficulty that had arisen had been whether the French captain, who was on shore when the emigrants rose on the rest of the crew, and who had all along declined to assent to the capture of the vessel by the Ethiope, was liable to pay salvage. He had distinctly refused, and in the end two French men-of-war removed the vessel from the Siberian waters, where the dispute arose. Lord Brougham protested against the negroes on board the ship, who were proved to have been taken on board in manacles, being regarded as emigrants. He trusted that a French and an English, or an American officer would be commissioned to inquire into the whole circumstances of the case. After a few words from Earl Grey, in denunciation of the "free-emigrant" movement, the subject was dropped.——On the 25th, in the House of Lords, the Earl of Carnarvon stated, in reply to a question from the Bishop of Oxford, that Government was considering a measure to prevent abuses in the exportation of Coolies.

THE NEW INDIA BILL.

In the House of Commons, Lord Stanley moved the second reading of the new bill to amend the Government of India. He explained its provisions, which have already been published in full, and submitted the bill to the candid consideration of the House, as a measure of reform which would gradually lead to other reforms; and as a substitute for a provisional form of government to a more permanent and valuable form of administration, under the direct responsibility of a Minister of the Crown. Mr. Bright made a lengthy speech on Indian affairs in general, and stated that, although he considered the bill failed in one or two points, he would not oppose the second reading. He thought that the Governor-Generalship should be abolished—the position of that officer being too high and his power too great—and that India should be divided into five or six presidencies, with Presidents of equal rank, each division being entirely independent of the others. He urged that India should be governed for Indian interests, and recommended Government, the moment the bill passed, to issue a proclamation offering a general amnesty as the first act done by the Queen, as the Sovereign of India. Mr. Bright made sundry other propositions, and concluded his speech amidst loud cheers. Mr. Whiteside thought some of Mr. Bright's suggestions were quite impracticable, but, at the same time, he had no doubt the principles he advocated would be realized under the plan proposed by Lord Stanley. The bill was read a second time. On the following day the India bill was debated in Committee of the Whole. Several amendments were proposed, but in each case they were rejected by large majorities in favor of the Government. One of the amendments, for a reduction of the number of the Council, was proposed by Lord Palmerston, but it was rejected by sixty-two majority.

THE LAST OF NAPOLEON'S ATTEMPTS TO DICTATE TO ENGLAND.

The trial of Edward Truelove, bookseller, for publishing a libel on the Emperor of the French, came on in the Queen's Bench on the 22d ult. before Lord Campbell and a special jury. The case excited very little interest. There were four counsel on each side. The Attorney-General, who conducted the prosecution, said he rejoiced to announce that the jury would not be called upon to try the indictment. He understood that the defendant was prepared to state that he never intended to countenance the crime of assassination, and to express his regret that any such misconstruction should have been put upon his publication, and that the publication of the work had ceased. This was confirmed by the defendant's counsel. Lord Campbell approved of the course adopted, and a verdict of "Not guilty" was taken. The prosecution against Tchorzewski was disposed of in the same manner.

THE YOUTHFUL FREDAINES OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

The Times correspondent says: "The Prince of Wales, although only seventeen years old, bids fair to become a worthy successor to the last Prince of Wales—the very fast George IV. The Prince, it is reported, to the horror of his mother the Queen, has been detected in an intrigue with one of the ladies-in-waiting to her Majesty. The result was the immediate sending of the precocious youth on a visit of penitence into Ireland. This incident will perhaps delay the establishment of the young Prince in his own house—a measure to which her Majesty had given consent, and which was soon to be realized."

JENNY LIND IN ENGLAND.

Madame Jenny Lind-Goldschmidt resolved, as is well known, a long time ago, after she had given up her projected journey to Russia, to leave her present residence—Dresden—and settle in England. This intention she has now carried out. After all her furniture in Dresden had been disposed of, no inconsiderable number of packages, with articles of value, etc., have been forwarded via Hamburg, to England. Madame Lind-Goldschmidt, with her husband and two children, a son and daughter, and domestics, have taken possession of a neat villa, called "Roehampton Lodge," situated near to the south side of Barnes Common, and about a mile from Putney. The house is in a retired position, and in the immediate vicinity of Putney Common and the picturesque village of Roehampton.

THE AMERICAN CHESS CHAMPION IN ENGLAND.

The American chess champion, Mr. P. Morphy, of New Orleans, has arrived in London to follow up his challenge to play the English champion, Mr. H. Staunton. Mr. Morphy is a marvel of memory and skill, having, it is said, sustained no fewer than seven games simultaneously without sight of the boards. He will attend the annual meeting of the chess savans, in August next, at Birmingham. Mr. Morphy has played with some of the members of the St. George's Chess Club, and exhibited wonderful power.

RAREY THE HORSE-TAMER.

The following letter from Rarey the horse-tamer, to his nephew in this country, is published in the Southern papers:

"Liverpool, Friday Evening, April 23, 1858.

"My Dear Nephew,—I wrote you two sheets this morning, but was called away before I had quite finished, and now I have just got through with the day and had my tea, I will hurry to finish your letter before any one calls. There is no rest for the wicked, and no accomplishment without great labor. I have just had a very hard day, and between the hurrahs, the rush of the people, the lecture, the breaking of these very bad horses (one so as to be shod), the excitement, and the perfect volley of all manner of questions, I feel very much like leaning back in my chair and taking a quiet snooze.

"They tried to bring some horses to-day to defeat me, but they couldn't come it, and I, as usual, came off victorious, amidst the loud cheers of a class of about one hundred scholars.

"I wish you could be here just one day to see how enthusiastic the people are. This morning when I stepped into the school and took off my hat, they set up such a cheering and clapping of hands that made every thing ring, so animating me that I was full of eloquence, and addressed them with as much enthusiasm as though I was a second Kossuth. The streets outside of the building were crowded, and when I rode out on the back of a vicious stallion that no man had been able to mount for three years, they too set up a loud hurrah for the great American, that they think I am. They don't know that I am nobody but your Uncle Jack, that used to break horses in the little town of Groveport.

"Well, the name American sounds well, and I think I would be justifiable in being proud of the name, if I am not of myself. I wouldn't like to be called the great Frenchman or the great Englishman. Nothing carries with it so much music as the name of American, etc., etc.

"As ever, your friend and uncle,

"J. S. Rarey."

FRANCE.

POLITICAL CONDITION OF THE EMPIRE.

The Herald correspondent writes: "I have been told by parties capable of gleaning their information from the most authentic sources, that never, since the last revolution, was the public mind so diseased; that men seem waiting, anticipating, not to say laying plans, for a great crash, and that they seem to be firmly persuaded that without it there is no hope for them. I have heard that private lists of proprietors' names are registered and passed from one to the other, who will be offered up as a holocaust to popular vengeance in case of the long-expected casualty befalling the Emperor. It is said that the form of government is already arranged, and that the day of retribution will be terrible. The Emperor is known, in fact, to be seriously uneasy. His contemplated journey to Plombieres is for the moment postponed, and day after day he is employed in receiving at St. Cloud deputations from various departments of commerce, and doing all in his power to allay an excitement beyond his control. In all public securities heaviness continues to be the prominent characteristic of the market. The removal of the truculent General Espinasse and the substitution of M. Delangle has, as I predicted, done little or nothing to restore public confidence at home or abroad, and many do not scruple to say that the tide of the Emperor's fortune is fast ebbing."

WILL OF THE DUCHESS OF ORLEANS.

The Echo de l'Est, a journal of the Haut-Rhin, gave the following as an analysis of the will of the late Duchess of Orleans:

"Her Royal Highness places her two children under the protection of the Queen Maria Amelie and their uncles; expresses a wish that the Comte de Paris shall be declared of age, and prays the Queen to be the guardian of the Duke de Chartres. Addressing her sons, the Duchess exhorts them to take for their model the prudence of their grandfather and the chivalrous virtues of their father, and expresses a hope that they will never abandon the political principles of their house, which their grandfather maintained during the eighteen years he was on the throne, and which their father, as proved by his will, energetically professed. After a few touching words of adieu to France, the Princess divides the bulk of her fortune equally between her two sons. Her Royal Highness also leaves legacies to members of her family in Germany, and pensions to old servants."

IMPERIAL ALBUMS.

"I have had an opportunity," says the Paris correspondent of the Express, "of seeing one of forty albums, which have been ordered by the Emperor as presents from him to forty generals who were with his Majesty at the Châlons camp last year. Each album contains full-length portraits of the forty generals, executed in the very best style of M. Legray, the celebrated photographer, and also a great many interesting camp scenes. The pictures, which probably form the most perfect specimens of the photographic art ever published, are bound in a magnificent folio volume, green and gold. On the cover of each volume is inscribed the words 'Souvenirs du camp de Châlons,' followed by the name of the general to whom that particular copy is given. The value of this very costly present is greatly enhanced by a portrait of the Emperor himself, taken by M. Legray in his Majesty's tent at Châlons. It is the most faithful likeness of the Emperor that has ever been seen, and differs very materially in the expression of the countenance from the numberless portraits which are touched up for exhibition in the shops. The eyes and lower jaw in particular are represented with a fidelity of which only those who have had opportunities of closely scrutinizing the countenance of this remarkable man can form any idea. The public will not, for the present at least, be able to study this wonderful 'sun picture,' as the strictest orders have been given that no copy of it shall be made beyond the forty ordered for the generals."

THE CENSORSHIP IN FRANCE.

The London Times Paris correspondent gives one a tolerably good notion of the French censorship, in the following extract from one of his recent letters:

"The 'Lionnes Pauvres' of M. Emile Augier has just been published. It is dedicated to Prince Napoleon, without whose intervention it would never have been performed, and it is preceded by a preface which makes some amusing revelations respecting the dramatic censorship. Among other things, it is said that the author made a femme de chambre say to Madame Pommeau, the lionne pauvre, 'I hear Monsieur Pommeau: run to amuse him;' and the censorship wrote in the margin: 'This is indecent.' After the phrase 'Ask for a week's delay—there is no Englishman so much an Arab as—,' the censorship wrote: 'An attack on the alliance.' After the phrase 'These turpitudes are no secret to Punch,' was written the remark 'Bad taste.' 'At all the stages of society' they wrote 'Dangerous.' M. Augier adds, 'I ask pardon of the censors for violating the secret of the deliberations, but they have set the example by not keeping it themselves. One of them even amused himself by going about, proclaiming every where that our piece was a turpitude!'"

WHAT IT COSTS TO SPEAK ILL OF THE EMPEROR.

A man named Ferré, describing himself as a "carpenter and poet," has been sentenced to one year's imprisonment for singing in the streets one of his own effusions, entitled "Confession of the Emperor to the archbishop," of a grossly offensive character to his Majesty. On the 12th ult. an individual named Dassaud de Nevrejó, belonging to the unfortunate category of "pardoned political offenders," was sentenced to six months' imprisonment and a fine of 500 francs for speaking evil of the Emperor.

SENATOR SUMNER'S TREATMENT.

A letter from Paris, on the subject of Senator Sumner's medical treatment, enters into the following details: "Dr. Brown-Sequard agrees with Dr. Hayward as to the necessity of an active treatment, doubting very much whether any degree of care or lapse of time, unless the morbid condition of the system be directly acted upon, would not always leave the patient exposed to a relapse. He proceeded, therefore, at once to apply fire to the back of the neck and along the spine. Now, fire is fire, and the quality of it is to burn, as surely as the 'property of rain is to wet.' And here I can not do better than to quote entire a note I have just received from M. Sequard: 'I think you will like to be able to say that I have told you that I have applied six moxas to Senator Sumner's neck and back, and that he has borne these exceedingly painful applications with the greatest courage and patience. You know that a moxa is a burning of the skin with inflamed agaric (amadou), cotton wool or some other very combustible substance. I had never seen a man bearing with such a fortitude as Mr. Sumner has shown the extremely violent pain of this kind of burning.' So you see the morale is sound. In his memorandum, the Doctor speaks cautiously but hopefully of the final result. He says: 'I am in hopes that an active treatment will produce the absorption of the excess of fluid effused about the brain, and diminish the congestion of the membranes of this organ. As regards the condition of the spine, which is quite distinct from that of the head, though due to the same primary cause, and by a sort of contre coup, an active treatment may diminish the degree of pain, if not altogether render the sensibility normal, so as to allow walking and other movements to take place without pain.'"

Mr. Sumner's general health has almost entirely rallied from the original shock.

HOW THE PARISIANS MANAGE IN HOT WEATHER.

The intense heat of the weather has had the effect of inducing many Parisians to convert night into day, in order to enjoy the more moderate temperature of that portion of the twenty-four hours. The Bois de Boulogne is crowded with carriages of all descriptions, from nine in the evening till two in the morning. The boatmen on the lake are actively employed during the same period. The thermometer marked ninety-four degrees Fahrenheit in a very shady position at three on Wednesday afternoon, the 16th ult.

A LUCKY ACTRESS.

They say that a windfall has come to the Baroness Vigier, late Sophie Cruvelli, by the death of Ahmed Pacha, recently drowned in Egypt. The Pacha, who resided for some time in Paris, it seems, was seized with a real true Egyptian exclusive admiration for the fair cantatrice, and made the most handsome overtures of settlement if she would consent to abandon her theatrical career and wander to Egypt with him. His passion, increased by refusal on the lady's part, grew so fierce at last that the Pacha even went to the extent of offering not only his heart and fortune, but his hand, with the life presidency of his harem, if she would but agree to give up and follow him. But nothing could avail, and the poor Pacha left Paris in despair. But though lost to him it appears the fair syren was not forgotten, for by his will he has left her, some say a million of francs, besides jewels to a large amount, among which the famous emerald bracelet worn by Mehemet Ali, and considered of immense value, is said to be included.

TERRIBLE SCENE AT A FIRE.

A fire in the Church of the Madeleine, at Liegé, has caused the entire destruction of the edifice, with the exception of the walls. The tower, which fell in with a tremendous crash after the conflagration had raged for some time, was principally constructed of wood. The fire commenced in a heap of straw collected in a small shop which was built close to the church. The boys, who were under the Fils de la Doctrine Chretienne, escaped easily, but the girls had some difficulty in getting out. Their school-room opens into a long corridor, and when the alarm of fire was given, this corridor was full of thick smoke, as was also a stair-case at the end of it. Some of the girls, however, rushed along it, but, exhausted by the smoke, they, on reaching the stairs, fell down one over the other; the remainder of the children crowded the windows, and, extending their arms, shrieked for help to the people in the street. Some of the townspeople, at the risk of their lives, penetrated into the edifice, and rescued the children one by one. Many of the latter were half dead from suffocation and terror, and clung desperately to each other. When, as was thought, all the children had been rescued, loud shrieks and cries were heard in a distant room in the upper part of the edifice, and it turned out that ten little girls and a teacher had been forgotten there. Flames were rapidly approaching the room, but, nevertheless, some courageous persons went to it, and, as it was impossible to make the children leave it by the corridor and the stair-case, they let them down into the street by means of ladders and ropes—afterward descending themselves in the same way. While all this was going on, the fathers and mothers of the children assembled, and gave way to the most violent demonstrations of alarm—it was even not without difficulty that some of the mothers were prevented from rushing into the midst of the smoke and flame to seek for their children. The whole scene was affecting in the extreme. It has been reported that between thirty and forty children were burned to death, but, according to Galignani, not one perished, nor was the life of any adult lost, though several men were more or less injured. The superior of the girl's school, a Sister of Charity, did not leave the burning edifice until she knew that every one of the children had been saved. The church which has just been destroyed was built in 1664, on the site of one constructed in 959.

GERMANY.

HOOPS PROSCRIBED IN VIENNA.

The fashion of hoops has received a severe check in Vienna, where the actresses of the Carl Theatre have been prohibited from wearing them. This measure was rendered necessary by the fact of an actress who, in the character of an orphan, was to have fainted away and fallen to the ground, found it impossible to realize the latter idea with any thing like nature, from being so strongly cased in her steel-bound frame-work.

RUSSIA.

LIBERALISM OF THE EMPEROR.

Letters from St. Petersburg state that the Emperor is gathering about him every day men belonging to the progressive party. The Cabinet is impressed with the necessity of approaching Western civilization, and the next generation will not find any trace of slavery in Russia. This policy is opposed by the old Russian party, headed by Prince Menschikoff. The old German party, headed by Prince Nesselrode, has not much influence. Russia is on the very worst terms with Austria, and on the very best with France. England is by no means popular, and Russia threatens to make any alliance hostile to Great Britain. Russia is very active in Turkey, not to create any actual revolt, but to gain the feelings of the Christians.

RAISING THE RUSSIAN VESSELS AT SEBASTOPOL.

Letters have been received in Boston, dated Sebastopol, May 24, by which the Boston papers learn that the work of raising the sunken Russian fleet progresses rapidly and with remarkable success. They make the following extract:

"We have raised whole the 16-gun vessel-of-war Swelya, and brought her down to the Admiralty, slung between the caissons, last night. She had over three hundred tons of mud in her hold and on her decks, besides all her rigging, iron tanks, pig-iron ballast, etc., etc. She lay up the South Bay, and as the rains wash the steep banks that comprise the sides of the bay, the soil being quite alluvial, it constantly keeps the water in a riled state, depositing the sediment upon the decks and in the hatches. This, however, is not the case in the main harbor, and we only tried this vessel to test the machinery before going to work at raising the heavier vessels. The caissons operated as well as we expected, and at no time did we use over one-fifth of their power. This, of course, demonstrates the entire feasibility of raising any and every ship in the harbor of Sebastopol. We shall undoubtedly raise the whole fleet this summer. Next week we shall raise a steamer whole, and shall follow with raising all that are worth the labor, whole, and blast with submarine charges the balance."

TURKEY.

MARRIAGE OF THE SULTAN'S DAUGHTERS.

The Sultan has given two of his daughters away in marriage; the expenses of this double marriage are valued at 14,000,000 francs. It is the custom on such occasions for the Sultan to keep open table for all his Mussulman subjects for fifteen days. It must not be supposed that these banquets are distinguished for their delicacy; herds of sheep broiled rather than roasted, rice, and raw cucumbers, compose the bill of fare offered by the greatest potentate of the East to his subjects. In the present state of the Turkish finances this expenditure of 14,000,000 francs for the benefit of a ragged crowd betrays great penetration.

THE PRINCIPALITIES.

DIVINITY STUDENTS IN TROUBLE.

A number of the students of the Metropolitan School of Divinity, at Bucharest, having complained of their food, one of the authorities struck a student, who was the spokesman on that occasion; whereupon all the boys defended their companion. The police were called in, and the rebellious schoolboys were marched off to prison; later, they were stripped of their gowns and publicly flogged. This event has produced much agitation and indignation.

SYRIA.

ANOTHER OUTRAGE ON AN AMERICAN MISSIONARY.

The correspondent of the Daily News says: "Some six months ago an American missionary of the Presbyterian Church took up his residence at Zahleh, with the intention of learning the Arabic language, and also of seeing whether, in time, schools could not be established in the place. The people themselves were glad to see this gentleman, as all over Syria the American schools have a first-rate name; but the priests were exceedingly angry at his presumption for coming among their flock, and several times wrote him letters warning him to leave the place. The missionary—whose name, by the way, is Dod—replied that he was in his own right in living where he liked; that he was not aware of having given any body any offense; and that, with all due deference to the indignant ecclesiastics, he would remain where he was. For a time he was left unmolested; but upon his concluding a bargain for the hire of a house, which he engaged for a term of seven years, the storm burst out again. One of the chief Greek Catholic priests visited him at the small hotel where he was living, and said that unless he took his departure forthwith the people of the town would rise and stone him out of the place. Mr. Dod answered that he did not think that likely, for the inhabitants of Zahleh had always shown themselves kind toward him. A few days afterward (only a fortnight ago), some ten or a dozen of the same order of priests, together with one of the French Jesuits, came to his house, and brought with them mules, upon which they said he must pack up his baggage and be off. They were not accompanied by any of the townspeople; but they said they were acting under the orders of the bishop. Mr. Dod said to them that if forced to go he could not help himself, but declared he would never move from what he considered his post of duty of his own accord. Upon this these gentle ministers of the Gospel, with their own sacred hands, threw out of the windows all his books, clothes, and furniture, as also all that belonged to his wife and child—the latter an infant in arms. The French Jesuit took no active part in the proceedings; but he did not prevent—which he might have done by a word, as the native priests in Syria have the greatest fear and reverence for all European monks, and more particularly for those of his Order—the others acting as they did. The woman—an old Italian, who keeps the small inn at Zahleh, where Mr. Dod was living—remonstrated with them for treating her lodger as they did; but all she made by her move was to be beaten by them very severely. They were then proceeding to eject Mr. Dod and his wife; but as the former did not wish to expose a lady to the hands of these fellows, he volunteered to move off at once. One would have thought that in a lonely, far-off place like Zahleh, and, above all, under the circumstances I have mentioned, an establishment composed of European men of education—more particularly men who professed to be ministers of the Gospel, and who call their Order by the name of our common Saviour—would have offered Mr. Dod some assistance—some shelter, at least, until he could make arrangements for his departure. But not so. The Jesuits of the place never so much as made him the slightest offer of assistance, in any way whatever; and under a burning Syrian sun, at a moment's notice, was this gentleman obliged to move off over the mountains with his wife and young child, on a journey of eight hours, to the house of a brother missionary who lives at Bhamdoon."

INDIA.

LATEST NEWS.

Important news from India has been received in England via telegraph from Malta.

Sir Hugh Rose had captured Calpee, after having been twice ineffectually attacked by the rebels. Rapid pursuit was made of the enemy, resulting in the capture of a large amount of stores, of guns, gunpowder, elephants and ammunition.

Serious disturbances had occurred in the Bombay Presidency, where a political agent, with his escort, had been murdered by a band of 800 rebels.

Fort Copal had been taken by assault.

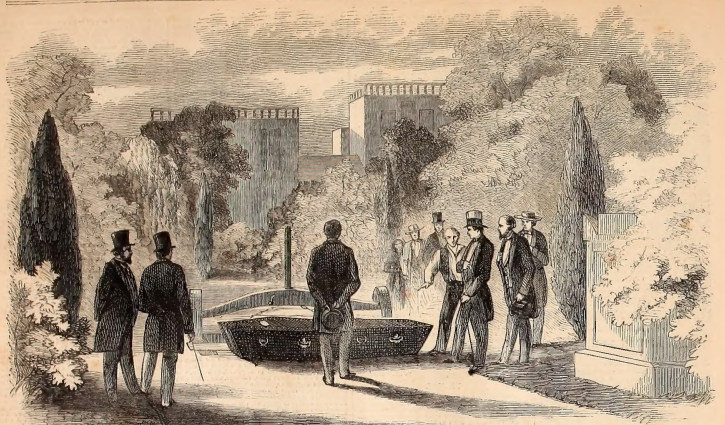
New-Goond had also been stormed and taken.

The Nizam's country was much disturbed by Arabs and Rohillas.

Sir Colin Campbell had driven the rebels back from Shahjehanpore and captured Mohundee.

Oude was still in a state of rebellion.

The rebels were approaching Lucknow, but the city was fully defended and garrisoned, and no alarm was felt for its safety.



Sir E. Lugard had defeated the rebels at Jugdespore, killing great numbers of them.

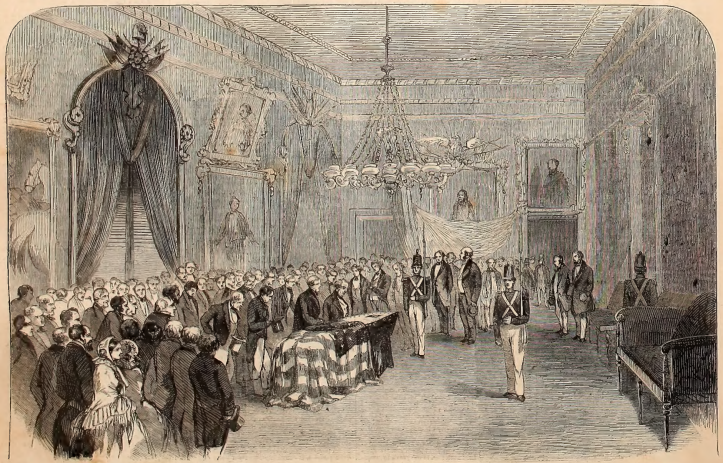
Gwalior had been attacked and plundered by the rebels.

GALLANTRY OF THE SIKHS.

An officer of the Naval Brigade gives the following account of the late disaster at Jugdispore:

"Our men advanced two miles into a very thick jungle, till they were unable to work the two large guns they had along with them (two 12-pound howitzers), and then they were surrounded in every direction but the rear. The rebels were about eight or ten thousand in number, and owing to the difficulties in a jungle, the burning sun over their heads, and the great odds against them, a great number of them being cavalry, our brave fellows had to retreat, and they were followed close up by the cavalry; and when one of our men fell by the sun, the cavalry jumped off their horses, and the next minute his head was rolling on the road-side. They had to retreat in this manner for twenty miles, and not a thing to eat or drink from the time they left us but the one dram of grog. Out of one hundred and fifty soldiers only forty-six came back, and out of our fifty we lost twenty men. Out of one hundred and fifty Sikhs they lost eight or ten only, and if it had not been for the Sikhs not a man of the soldiers or our squad would have returned. They rallied again and again, and every shot they fired told well. They are splendid marksmen, and they tried to cheer up our poor fellows greatly. There were a good number of the Sikhs wounded, and it would do you good to see how bravely they bore it. One poor fellow had a bullet sent right through his thigh, and there he was lying in the hospital, with a smile on his face, trying to cheer up a poor soldier lying next to him. The captain in command was killed, also the doctor of the regiment. Only two officers out of five came back, and the captain of the Sikhs was wounded; he is an Englishman, and is greatly loved by the Sikhs."

EXHUMING THE REMAINS OF PRESIDENT MONROE IN THE SECOND STREET CEMETERY.



THE MONROE OBSEQUIES.

We place upon record this week an account, with four illustrations by an artist who accompanied the expedition, of the most prominent scenes in the late transfer of the remains of the venerated James Monroe from New York to Richmond.

Mr. Monroe was born of an old and well-known Virginia family, in Westmoreland County, in the Old Dominion, in the year 1758. He studied at William and Mary College, with the ultimate intention of entering the legal profession; but upon the breaking out of the Revolutionary War quitted his books to serve his country, and in 1776, in the eighteenth year of his age, entered the Revolutionary army, joining Colonel Mercer's regiment as a cadet. In his eloquent address at Richmond, Governor Wise gave a rapid summary of Mr. Monroe's career, which we can not do better than avail ourselves of here:

"He was severely wounded before he rose to a higher rank than that of a captain, and never rose higher in the line of the military. In the staff of Lord Stirling he was an aid-de-camp, and acquired the title of colonel of a regiment of Virginia which was never raised. He was a Commissioner of Virginia to the northern camp; a legislator of Virginia; a member of the Continental Congress; a member of the Convention of Virginia to adopt the Federal Constitution; Senator of Virginia in Congress; Minister to France; twice Governor of Virginia; again Minister to France, to England, and to Spain, and again to England; Secretary of State; and in the war of free trade and sailors' rights, for which he had contended as early as 1807, Secretary of War. He was twice elected President of the United States—once almost unanimously; and from the height of the chief magistracy of the nation he again descended to the ranks of the people, and became a magistrate of the quorum of gentleman justices of the peace. And lastly, in the year 1829-'30, he was President of the first Convention of Virginia to reform the Constitution of the State. This last post infirmity and old age compelled him to resign; and then, in 1830, his course run, good fight fought, full of life and vigor, full of years, and full of honors, the great and good old man retired to the bosom of his family in the State of his adoption." He died in New York, full of years as of honors, on July 4, 1831, aged seventy-four years.

During his Presidency he inaugurated that pol-

LYING IN STATE AT THE CITY HALL, NEW YORK.

THE LANDING AT RICHMOND.

THE CEREMONY AT THE GRAVE, IN HOLLYWOOD CEMETERY, RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.

ley now known as the "Monroe doctrine." He aided essentially in promoting the purchase of Louisiana and the acquisition of Florida; and was the first to give Executive sanction to the cause of African colonization. During fifty-three years, from his eighteenth to his seventy-third, he was almost continually engaged in the service of his country; and yet, to his honor be it said, he died poor. "It is because involved in debt by pledging his private means for the defence of the country in the war of 1812, and died before a grateful country had made."

The venerable ex-President died at the residence of his son-in-law, Mr. Samuel L. Gouverneur; was buried first in what was known as the Old Marble Cemetery, from which the body was afterward removed to the Gouverneur family vault, in the Second Street Cemetery.

The present year—the one hundredth anniversary of Mr. Monroe's birth—was a fitting time to remove the remains from the place of their first burial in the twenty-seven years, to their final resting-place, in the capital of the State which gave him birth. Proper action having been taken in the matter at the last session of the Virginian Legislature, the preliminary arrangements for the removal were intrusted to a committee of Virginians, consisting of Major Mumford and Mr. J. C. Rives. The objects of the committee were assisted by the official action of the New York city government, and it was determined to make the solemn event of kindly and fraternal meeting between the authorities and volunteer soldiery of New York and those of the State of Virginia. That nothing might be lacking toward the dignified carrying out of the project, the Secretary of the Treasury offered the Committee of Virginians the use of the new revenue cutter Harriet Lane to bear the remains from the city of Richmond, which offer came too late, the steamer Jamestown having been chartered for this purpose some time before.

All being arranged, it was determined to exhume the body of the ex-President early on the morning of Friday, July 2. From motives of respect to the feelings of the relatives of the interred it was not decided that the exhumation should be conducted quietly and without ceremony. So carefully was this decision carried out that the Committee were at last a few when it was desirable to have present. The hour of five A.M. was fixed upon as being likely to attract attention; and at that time deputations from the Common Council Committee, the Committee of Virginians, the surviving members of the deceased, and several others, arrived at the cemetery. The undertaker had prepared the vault for the removal; and shortly after five the hearse arrived, with a new coffin, which was to contain the old one, and the little company proceeded silently to the spot. The little wrought-iron, which had so long served as almost the only thing to mark the spot, still stood there, and the little birds fluttered about at being thus unwontedly disturbed. The coffin of the ex-President, which was of mahogany, covering an inner case of lead, was found to be but slightly injured, though the pitch had run over the mountings and the brightness of the malagany were, of course, tarnished. The following inscription could be plainly read on the silver plate:

JAMES MONROE, OF VIRGINIA.
Died July 4, 1831,
Aged 74.

The body was taken to the Church of the Annunciation, in Fourteenth Street, where it was placed on a raised platform prepared for the event, and left in charge of two policemen until the afternoon, when the remains were escorted to the City Hall by one of the largest and most magnificent military and civic processions the citizens of New York have ever witnessed. The remains were left under the guard of the Eighth Regiment during the night, preparatory to their removal on the morrow on board the steamer. During the night-watch the excursion the bells were tolled, the flags in the port were at half-mast, and minute-guns were fired.

On Saturday morning the remains were escorted to the steamer Jamestown by the Seventh Regiment, and there formally delivered to the Committee of Virginians. The Seventh Regiment then embarked on the steamer Ericsson, which they escorted to the city of Richmond. The Committee of Virginians and the Common Council, and a guard of twenty of the Seventh Regiment, under command of Lieutenant W. K. Harrison, accompanied the remains on the Jamestown.

The body of the ex-President was located in the gentlemen's sitting-room, on the upper deck of the Jamestown, which was appropriately draped in black and white muslin festoons and rosettes for the occasion. The remains had originally, on the steamer arrived without accident at Norfolk, on Sunday, July 4, where a procession was ready to receive, and for a short time conveyed them on board. At eight o'clock Sunday evening the steamer arrived at Richmond, and was met early on Monday morning, the Ericsson's company arriving shortly after. Numerous flags were flying at half-mast, and as the Jamestown passed by what she was saluted with guns, and received with a Virginia whoop by the crowds of men and boys. The military, city, and other dignitaries had already passed the wharf, and were drawn up ready to receive the guests, Governor Wise and the other principal personages being introduced to the committees as soon as the boat was made fast.

As the Jamestown's company was landing a rainstorm burst upon the crowd. After the occasion the body was placed in the hearse, and the whole procession moved toward the cemetery where Governor Wise delivered a brief but impressive address, alluding to the incidents of Monroe's life and his services to the country in terms of the highest eloquence, after which Rev. Mr. Read, of Petersburg, delivered an appropriate prayer. The body was now lowered into the grave, the troops forming upon their arms. The procession thereupon moved off, without music.

The military of Richmond had provided a sumptuous collation at the gigantic Warwick Mill, within or the whole corps of the Seventh Regiment and their hosts repaired immediately. The building is 16 feet long by 100 broad, and nine stories high. The collation was spread on the fourth floor, with seats for over a thousand guests. After the collation was partaken of, a number of toasts were drunk, in answer to several of which Hon. John Cochrane, Governor Wise, Colonel Rogers, and others made short but pertinent addresses. This ended the ceremonies, during the whole of which the utmost good feeling prevailed.

A BROADWAY LYRIC.

FANCY-FREE was the maiden's heart,
As she went down Broadway;
Just-as-cool-as was the maiden's heart,
As she went up Broadway.

Thus it befell the maiden's heart,
Upon a summer's day,
That freedom left it and depart
As she went down Broadway.

When freedom left the maiden's heart,
As she went down Broadway,
Love crept in to the maiden's heart
And set its chords at play.

The morning sun had shone upon
A happy heart that day:
So, why did that bold morning sun
Allure her down Broadway?

She had enough to eat and drink,
And lived from day to day
So well that surely all would think
She might be always gay.

But something moved the maiden's heart
As she went down Broadway.
And in that heart a something beat
Set bitter thoughts at play.

The dart that rankled in her heart
Upon that fatal day,
Was a love-dart the maiden's part
As she went up Broadway.

For "a red love of a bonnet,"
Which she saw down Broadway,
With gold on it, and gauze upon it
M'Flimsey wore that day!"

But alas! for the maiden's heart,
As she went up Broadway,
For she lacked "the tin" to get—
She lacked "the tin" to pay!

MR. GREEN'S CLIENT.

BY JOHN ESTEN COOKE, OF VIRGINIA.

CHAPTER I.

In 1853 I was studying law in the office of Mr. Josiah Green, My father, who had died several years before, had left me a competent estate, and I had duly gone through my collegiate course, and "enjoyed life;" but growing weary, at the age of twenty-six, of doing nothing, I had resolutely determined to apply myself to the law.

One morning I was studying in the outer of the two offices when a gentleman entered and rang the door. A lady with her veil down, and accompanied by a child of eight or ten, issued from it, and entering the office, asked if Mr. Green was there, and I replied in the affirmative, and ushered the visitor into the inner room, where I found my uncle at his case politely and offered the lady and her companion seats. The door was closed, and I resumed my labors in Mr. Green's Compiled Annotations.

Very soon, however, I found my thoughts wandering, in spite of myself, to the lady and her visitor. I had not seen her face through the heavy green veil; but two large, blue eyes, full of expression, had looked out from it at me once, and I remembered their expression. The voice, too, was sweet and plaintive, and I found myself, as to the lady's apparel, it was tasteful and simple, elegant in fabric and adaptation to her slender figure. The jewels had not belonged to her, a cursory glance told me, but the dress was her own.

Such was my opinion, as I have said, at the time, and it was natural that these details should impress me. We did not have such visitors often in our dusty office, and when such a thing did occur, I found myself wandering from my law-books, and trying to form a conjecture of the lovely, mysterious creature in the adjoining room.

The lady shut me out for an hour, and then came forth attended by good Mr. Green, who politely and courtesies backward and forward in his hands, and escorted to the outer door.

"To-morrow, at half past two, then, Miss Ellenborough," he said. "I can not promise you success, for the will seems regular, but I will exert my best abilities in your service."

The lady thanked him, and touched her head gratefully, to the carriage, and for an instant the small, glorious eyes looked out from the low-toned word of thanks, and the vehicle drove away. I returned to the office. Mr. Green was musing and shaking his head in an abstracted manner at the ceiling. He was an excellent-hearted old gentleman, and never could conceive that gallantry implied indifference in business which characterizes many lawyers.

He must have seen from my expression that I was curious to know the nature of his client's business; and in reply to his question to that effect, I said that I should regard his confidence as a high proof of regard.

"Well, Mr. Wadsworth," he said, "I shall not withhold it. I can very safely confide in you. You are a prudent man, not a light-headed boy. Perhaps you may suggest some course of action in a matter which, I confess, moves me greatly, and perplexes me as greatly."

He led the way into the inner room, and when we were seated thus resumed:

"The young lady who has just gone is Miss Ellenborough, a young cousin of the late James Ellenborough of 'Hockley.' He died, leaving a will which I drew up myself, all his real and personal estate, with the exception of a legacy of a few hundred dollars, goes to Mr. Joel Wescot, of Middletown, a distant relative. The trifling legacy is in favor of Miss Ellenborough—and here lies the mystery. Mr. Ellenborough and her little sister have lived with the deceased since the death of their parents many years ago, and have grown fond-erties with him. She assures me that he often declared herself and her sister his sole heirs, and mentioned the existence of his will to that effect. After his death no such will was found; that which was discovered was the will I have said, the will of the fine estate at 'Hockley' to Mr. Joel Wescot, for whom Mr. Ellenborough never professed any great regard. Now, this gentleman was at Hockley during the last illness of Mr. Ellenborough, and has put it into his head that the deceased man never expressed any liking for him; and the execution of the will in his favor is incomprehensible. Possession could not, however, be denied Wescot, and he now resides at Hockley; Miss Ellenborough and her younger sister having been reluctantly accepted the kind offer of a home from one of the neighborhood friends of Mr. Ellenborough's. The sense of dependence, however, evidently preys upon her mind; and by the advice of friends she has come to me to consult on the question of the possibility of breaking the will. I confess I am somewhat puzzled upon that item but shall feel play in the matter, but what possible proof can we bring? The young lady's statement affords no sort of ground to proceed upon—the will is perfectly regular—and yet—something must be—something must be done."

And excellent Mr. Green looked very much perplexed and out of spirits. We had a long consultation, and in the end it was determined that I had made up my mind that the will was a forgery, and that the old gentleman's eyes, as he signed it, were blinded by the machinations of Wescot, and his fatal ignorance of the provisions of the will. I was to call at Hockley on the next day, I should not play in the matter, but what possible proof can we bring? The young lady's statement affords no sort of ground to proceed upon—the will is perfectly regular—and yet—something must be—something must be done."

And excellent Mr. Green looked very much perplexed and out of spirits. We had a long consultation, and in the end it was determined that I had made up my mind that the will was a forgery, and that the old gentleman's eyes, as he signed it, were blinded by the machinations of Wescot, and his fatal ignorance of the provisions of the will. I was to call at Hockley on the next day, I should not play in the matter, but would be introduced as a friend of Mr. Green's, and see what I could discover.

On the next day Miss Ellenborough called at the appointed hour, and this time I was included in the conference. She raised her veil, and I saw one of the loveliest countenances upon which I had ever had the honor to look. Her complexion was a brunette's, and her features possessed the deep blue eyes which I had noticed in the preceding instance: in fine, the appearance of the young lady was calculated to powerfully enlist the sympathies of a much colder and more elderly man than myself. No one fact appeared, Mr. Green's examination of the will had resulted in his finding no flaw. All now depended upon such discoveries as I could make during my survey of Hockley.

With this slender encouragement Miss Ellenborough was prepared to return to her home in the country. On the next morning I took my fowling-piece and hunting accoutrements—put a pair of pistols in my pocket—entered the "dog-cart," bade, drawn by a fast trotter, and set off for the small village of Hockley, some fifteen distant, near which lay the estate of "Hockley."

CHAPTER II.

In three hours, over a miserable road, I reached the end of my journey. As announced at the door of the village tavern I gave a bill, partly, man, and partly horse, and, ordering my dinner, and mount a side horse left by a servant.

I was in the neighborhood of Hockley, and I was not mistaken, as I soon discovered from the landlord. A single glance told me that I had to deal with a man of Cooper's Ensign Spanker type. Fraud and treachery were written on his features in unmistakable characters—his restless eyes, furtive and lowering brows, and that rascally expression which I have never known to deceive.

"Mr. Wescot, Hockley," I added to my first private remark, "assumes all your airs to your customers. I am not to be deceived by them."

As to my course of proceeding I had no sort of scruples. Conscious was not called for in trying to circumvent a villain who had robbed two helpless girls, one of whom was a mere child. To have left the Hockley village attorney with an announcement of my purpose, would simply have put the enemy on their guard. I "swore in my heart" that Mr. Wescot and the village lay my secret short of personal dishonor, I would feel it.

In the afternoon I rode to Hockley, asked the landlord if there was any shooting in the neighborhood; if there was, I might remain with him some days. He replied that there was plenty of game, but particularly dropped, procured a very favorable account of the neighborhood, and concluded by having thus supplied Boniface with materials for a full justification of my presence at the tavern, I mounted the horse and rode off.

My first object was to discover the residences of Joel Wescot and Mr. Hockley, whose names were signed to the will exhibited by Miss Ellenborough —that under which Wescot held. These worthies had agreed to be witnesses of the instrument in the presence of each other." A wayfaring man, of the most unsophisticated appearance and demeanor, around me, directed me to the houses. The witnesses were small land-owners, who sold vegetables in the village market. They lived within a stone's-throw of each other.

A single glance, as in the case of Wescot, told me that these low-browed men were capable of the crime of which I believed them guilty. I was convinced that they were parties to the forgery of the will, for which they had been rewarded. Their shallowish brows and low confusion, passing on, I learned from one of their neighbors that they were in a few days to "leave the country." My suspicion was confirmed by this circumstance—the latter was removing the accomplices of his fraud.

I did not accost these men, fearing to excite suspicion. I inquired the way to the humble dwelling of an old negro who had been set free by Mr. Ellenborough some years before his death, as Miss E. had informed me, but had been frequently at the Hockley House during his master's last illness. Old Isaac, I had been notified, could be thoroughly trusted; and this I found the case. He lived on a small farm, and I made the mention of his "old master" his whole countenance lit up, and at the name of Wescot this expression as suddenly changed to a set of sullen contempt. I no longer hesitated. I told the old man the purpose of my visit, and impressed upon him the importance of recalling all which he had witnessed at the hall.

Then he understood that the interests of his young mistress were involved, old Isaac's countenance lit up again with earnest attention. He declared that he knew something which had long weighed on him, but he had been afraid of Wescot, and wanted to tell. With a cautious survey of the premises, and after carefully closing the door, I listened to his communication.

It was briefly to this effect: His master had never liked Wescot; and the visit of that personage during his last illness had been received by him in the light of an intrusion, though a sentiment of courtesy prevented him from showing it. Wescot had remained, however; and Isaac had heard him, more than once, importune the dying man to make up his will, not leaving the portion of the large property. Mr. Ellenborough had insisted upon making his own arrangements, and at last requested that the subject should not be again mentioned. Wescot, however, still lingered. Isaac had heard him urge that he had been the great hall of the house, surveying the rich furniture with covetous eyes; and at times the old negro, with tears, from the portico, upon the finely-cultivated fields and great woods. When he was accosted at the door by a servant of Wescot, he would suddenly start, and look hurriedly over his shoulder. "I was afraid of 'scheming out," old Isaac believed, his final villainy.

At last Mr. Ellenborough's final moments approached. He called for his will, which was read to him. Fanny to him, and talked with them a great deal. They cried very much; but the old gentleman made them dry their tears; he was ready to go, and they would want nothing after his death. He, Isaac, was to be the agent for all things in the shorter until his master died. As he came out he saw Wescot and another man leave the library—Mr. Ellenborough's favorite apartment, while in health—with a paper in his hand, which he hastily thrust into his pocket on seeing the old negro's eyes fixed on him. On the next day search was made for a will. It was not there; Mr. Ellenborough's private drawers, strange to say, could nowhere be found. They were forced open; and the will, bearing his signature, found in one of them.

This was Isaac's story. He was perfectly convinced, he said, that the real will was that which Wescot, who had gotten possession of his master's keys, and a forged one substituted. "But the will was signed, by Wescot, Hockley, and Slatter," I asked, "were they sober at the hall?" Isaac replied that they had been there to eat the rest of their small treats about twelve months before Mr. Ellenborough's death, but not afterward. I took from my pocket a copy of the will, as it was dated just as the time mentioned by Isaac. Wescot and Hockley witnessed it.

I bade the old servant keep perfectly quiet, and mention my visit to no one. I then took my way to Hockley House. The lawn, through which I drove, I lamented the scarcity of game in the neighborhood to the landlord, opened and entered the dining-chamber. The door once closed, I sat down, and reflected long and profoundly, with knit brows, upon the facts which I had learned.

There was no longer any doubt in my mind, if there had ever been any, that the most unscrupulous piece of villainy had been perfected, depriving two children, as they might be called, of their fortune. The property had passed into the hands of bribery, had been the proceedings and means made use of to bring about such a result. I felt, with the most truth on the face of it, had made this perfectly evident. Wescot had stolen Mr. Ellenborough's private keys, had forged a will, and had had placed in the drawer a forged paper, attested by the names of the witnesses. Hockley, a gentleman of a high brite, placed their names as witnesses signing "in presence of the testator, and in presence of each other." Mr. Ellenborough will could be found—no proof of the perjury on the part of the witnesses could be produced. The whole fabric to have been at the hall at the time; what was to be done?

I stopped at the words, no other will could be found. I was not certain that the real paper could not be found—that it had not been secreted. It increased this doubt upon two grounds. First, that at this period the destruction of a will was felony; and secondly, that the forger of a will could scarcely commit forgery upon the paper, to be used subsequently in any secret negotiation, and in an attempt to recover the property from his master's relatives.

These same slender grounds indeed, however, and the result of my meditations was not inspiriting. I reflected that I was encountering a sort of sullen indignation, upon the result of this crime —the poverty visited upon Miss Ellenborough and her little sister, and I think if Wescot had been near at the moment I should have forgotten the attorney searching for evidence, and obeyed only the dictates of my outraged feelings. What could be done? Isaac's testimony could not be received in a court of justice, nor the witness of my servant. I was in despair.

At last, with a gesture sullen and indignant caution than before, I rose from my seat, and, going to the window, looked in the direction of the Hockley House. Its broad roof was visible some miles away on a lofty hill, half hidden by heavy foliage. "And this now must be the home of the future Lord Arborough!" I muttered. "Three green fields and five old forests, and this noble hall, would all in turn be lost for the knavery of a villain, a cheat, a common forger! I'll go there," I said, "if it is only to tell him my opinion of him!"

In a transport of indignation I ordered my vehicle, put a pair of travelling cloaks in my pocket, and set out for the residence of Wescot.

CHAPTER III.

A QUARTER of a mile from the village I stopped my horse in a little wood, and, for the first time, seriously realized the step I was about to take.

I was being carried away by a natural indignation, and, simply to gratify this access of rage, was the commission of an act which might have the most fatal effect upon the interests of Miss Ellenborough. What was I about to do? I was going to say to the man who had on his possession, no doubt, the real will, "I am not a villain, a forger, a subornor, a felon!" That is my opinion of you, Sir!" I was going to afford my indignant feelings that genial felicity; after which, Wescot was not what I believed him—a coward—I would come away triumphant, with the supreme glory that I had relieved my pent-up anger, and, by relieving it, done what? Why, destroyed the young lady's prospect of recovering the property completely! After such an interview, Wescot's first step, beyond doubt, would be to destroy the will; and then we might whistle for the property. He would send to foreign countries the two accomplices of his villainy, or, if they remained, he had to prove perjury on them. He would stand secure upon his title, and the young girl's real interests dependents all their lives—Messrs. Green and Wallworth be sued for defamation, perhaps. This was the pretty little state of affairs I was just about to create. My anger did not cool, but I regained my coolness of mind. I would set to work more shrewdly than that.

The resolution I came to was a desperate one, but it was the only course I could follow, unless the affair was entirely abandoned. I determined to go to Mr. Harvard, Miss Ellenborough's friend and protector, and a magistrate—to charge Wescot with felony—to procure a warrant of arrest and a search warrant, and have him and his house seized and Bright at once taken into custody. The step was almost hopeless in view of the difficulty of proof, and was apt to be somewhat serious in its consequences to myself; but I resolved to take the responsibility. I would procure the arrest of Wescot with the officer myself to "Hockley," be present, and, if necessary, would break the servant and the search. It was neck or nothing; but two blue eyes, which I had never lost sight of, shone on me—the not, brother face of a young girl rose before me, and I did not hesitate.

In an hour I was at Mr. Harvard's, closeted with him in his library. When I briefly, and in the calmest way, announced the object of my visit, he almost started from his seat. "Sir," he said, coldest, but very cautious and prudent man, almost linked to the insanity of turning such a rough and extraordinary a proceeding, against one of the wealthiest and most vindictive gentlemen in the county, into his study, "you are mad!"

"My dear Sir!" cried the good man, gazing at me with distended eyes, "you are mad indeed! How can you have for such an extreme proceeding? I grant you that Mr. Ellenborough's will was a very extraordinary one under the circumstances; but what imaginable proof have you of such a grave, such a very grave charge against Mr. Wescot? You are not a particular admirer of that gentleman, indeed, I have more than once been disposed to think the will might be set aside upon the ground of mental disability in the testator—but really—to grant a warrant to arrest Mr. Wescot on a charge of forgery!—"

The good man stood, out of breath, and then spoke. I told him of my visit to Isaac, and what I had seen of Bright and Holtz—called to his memory the circumstances attending the last hours of Mr. Ellenborough, and laid before him the desperate state of this case. It was all in vain: the misunderstanding was fatal. He even "doubted if he should be willing for me to take any such steps." I rose, bowed to him, and without asking for Miss Ellenborough, set out for the residence of another magistrate near by. I was more than ever determined. This time I expected success less difficulty. I had found a personage who did not particularly admire Wescot, and would be listed him with fervor; and he granted me the warrants.

I set off with them at once, and returned rapidly to the village. The shades of night were descending, however, and it was too late to carry out any thing that day. I had my powder mine prepared for the morrow, however; and I retired, worn out with the events of the day.

On the next morning when I rose, a servant handed me the following note, which had been brought at a late hour on the night before:

"Miss Ellenborough earnestly requests Mr. Wallworth to be here in the morning, before going to Hockley. They do not fail."

With a gloomy anticipation of the young lady's wish in the matter, I ordered my carriage and repaired to Mr. Harvard's.

CHAPTER IV.

I FOUND Louisa alone in the drawing-room. I think I smiled, with a melancholy air, at the absence of her protector. He had found me made of stubborn material on the previous evening, and evidently had no objection to impose the task of changing my resolution upon the young lady.

As she gave me her hand with such sadness and hoped me to be seated, I thought her a thousand times more beautiful than she had appeared before. I remember to this day the very dress she wore. It was a simple habit of dove-colored stuff, fitting tightly to the graceful figure, and admirably adapted, by its subdued and modest tint, to the character of her beauty. Her eyes and lips were full of the same pathetic sweetness; and when she had spoken my hand I thought her own trembled slightly.

I had not been mistaken in my surmises. Her object was to abandon me from the scheme which I was about to take. I recognized the identical arrangements which had been explained by Mr. Harvard on the previous evening, and saw at once that the young lady had been first frightened, then thrilled to her part. I was to be kept entirely out in the matter, as I had intended, all hazards; and the former communication between her and Mr. Harvard was to be resumed. When I reached the village I was perfectly wretched.

Then came the recollection of Wescot to put the finishing stroke to my misery and confusion. As I had triumphed in the thought that I would make him disgrace his fraudulent wealth! How I had thrilled with the idea that, in open court, before the whole district, I would charge him with forgery and perjury! Now, even if Miss Ellenborough did not regain her property, I would brand the miserable knave with the ineffaceable mark of public scorn and loathing!

And now I was punished. He was secure—the secret I had confided was taken from my keeping as triumphed, and the opium children would feel again the sweet property. He was rolling in wealth and luxury! The thought stung me to madness. I could not leave the country without seeing him once more. I took the first train to town. I ordered my carriage again, and determined to go to his house.

I do not know what special providence made me think of passing the quarter of an hour necessary to harness up a carriage in examining the will of Wescot in the clerk's office of the county. The thought came into my mind by chance, and I went thither and requested the official to show me the paper. He very obligingly complied, and I read it from beginning to end. It was written in a hand with every thing was perfectly regular. It was in plain and intelligible business-like language—free of commonplace, as of an unlearned person who had written it from dictation. I was about to return it to the clerk, when suddenly my eyes were riveted upon the upper left-hand corner of the paper. Then my glance closed to the clerk—a sort of tremor passed over my frame—I think my face must have observed my emotion. Stubbing everything down with my foot, I went into the passage, strolled out of the court-house, went to the tavern, and ordered my cabriolet. Gathering my reins, I set off toward Hockley at a furious gallop. Boniface must have given up all hopes of ever receiving his account. But I did not think of trifles. I glowed with vague triumph. In ten minutes more I was at the house of Wescot.

He received me in the library. His keen and sinister eye took in every detail of my person, and read, I doubt not, what business brought me there.

"I will first tell you my name, Sir," I said, with concentrated calmness, "as I must found upon the presence of the forger; "it is Wallworth. I represent Mr. Selah Green of ——, counsel for Miss Ellenborough."

I saw a slight pallor invade his cheek.

"Well, Sir," he answered, "proceed."

"It relates to the will of the late Mr. Ellenborough; and yesterday I obtained the requisite permission to examine the proceedings. The character of the proposed proceedings will probably surprise you."

"What proceedings, Sir!" he said, in a blustering tone; "and what do you mean? Miss Ellenborough has nothing to set up her claim, and has not. So she's not content with the charity bestowed on her by my generosity—has dared to lay hands on his property after his death, must she! You and your employer—this Green—must have a pleasant time of it, must he bent up these papers and prosecute their impudent claim!"

I looked him with indignation as he thus spoke of Miss Ellenborough, but I remained cool. I saw that he had deliberately adopted a blustering tone to conceal his fears.

"And as to your 'papers to institute proceedings,'" he went on, "I have no taudient and bullying taste, "you and your pettifogging employer may make what you can of them! You and your client may do your worst! She first disinherits by trudled on my deceased relatives, and now aims at juggling me out of his estate!"

I set my teeth close, and, looking the speaker straight in the eyes, said:

"Is this the character of the papers I procured yesterday, Sir?"

"Some your spect! I neither know nor care!"

"Still, I beg leave to inform you, Sir," I said, growing colder and more resolute as the interview proceeded, "that papers in question were a mere warrant to search this house for the true will of the late Mr. Ellenborough, and a warrant of arrest to be executed on your person as a forger and subornor—as the forger of Mr. Ellenborough's name at the foot of the instrument submitted to probate, and the accomplice of the men Holtz and Bright, who perjured themselves."

The bold stroke him full in front. For a moment it seemed to paralyze him. Then, with a desperate attempt to cow me, he caught a pistol from a case on the table, and with trembling fingers sprung the cock. I calmly put my hand into my breast-pocket, and drew forth its fellow, which I cocked and presented to his breast. The weapon dropped from his hand, and I believed him to be from the first, an object coward.

"Lay down that weapon," I said, coldly; "and do not think, with your vaporing, to frighten me. It will be time thrown away, Sir!"

His face turned as pale as death, and he did not sustain my look. Still, he made a last effort to support his tone of bluster.

"And this is the way you practice law, is it, Sir?" he said; "you come armed to gentlemen's houses to search them. You could you expect me to acknowledge what you wish—to get a statement from me—as to my intentions—"

The air of sarcasm was badly affected. The speaker became pale.

"No, Sir," I replied, "I did not come to ask questions; but, as you suggest it, I will ask a single one: Where is your will?"

"Where is my will!" he answered, with the keen which you opened Mr. Ellenborough's drawers on the day of his death?"

A deep silence sixth time before invaded his countenance; but suddenly his cheeks flushed. I read his whole history in my soul. He had resentered that no one but Isaac saw him, and that this testimony was inadmissible. For a long time he remained silent, reflecting. I saw that he regain his courage. At last he said, with an assumption of deranged quiet and dignity:

"I shall make no reply to your insinuations, Sir. You have chosen to come here and insult me, and I resign my age and position to considerations when you choose. I defy you! Yes, Sir, I defy you to bring any proof of the slander you utter! Just take care, Sir! I will take steps in form; and unless you act to provoke me. As to the will, Sir, I only say that it is the most thoroughly regular that—"

I prepared my last and decisive blow.

"I confess it is drawn up with great skill," I returned; "the signature is well executed, and all is in form. There is but one error—"

"What error?" he said, eagerly.

"Why, that of the date," I answered. The document this morning, and that the name of the super-numerary in "C. S. Wadsworth & Co., Seven Mills, Surrey," not Soy, Sir, C. S. Wadsworth happens to be a relative of mine, and his initials were established just one month before my date of Mr. Ellenborough's death. The will filed in the clerk's office is dated one year before the death of the testator's death—dated one year before my paper with the mark 'C. S. Wadsworth & Co.' was in existence. Now, Mr. Wallworth, you see!"

I added, looking the forger straight in the eyes.

I saw that the blow called aid. His face turned deep white, and he sank into a chair. Suddenly Then, rising, he went with a faltering step to a desk, and presented out some papers. They were the draft, without date, at a single gulp. When he resumed his seat, I said, in the calmest business manner:

"Now, Sir, where is the real will?"

I shrunk from describing the dreadful the scene which followed this demand on my part. The forger was like a wild beast driven to bay. He threatened, supplicated, and finally I gave me from my purpose. First, he denied every thing; then he confessed all; then he acknowledged that the will was in his possession, and offered to give it up for a bribe; then he caught up his pistols and shattered; finally, he took out the true record, opened a closet in the wall, and produced the paper. I took it from his hand, and immediately counted in due form, leaving the Hockley estate to Miss Louisa, and Fanny Ellenborough, and naming guardians.

Half an hour afterward I left the house with the will in my pocket. All I had stipulated was that no steps should be taken against the criminal without me consent of Miss Ellenborough. On the next day it was rumored in the village that Wescot had disappeared. The rumor proved true. Having packed up all the valuables he could lay his hands on, he had fled, leaving behind him debts which made his departure for years afterward. His career was an extraordinary one, and it is possible that a criminal is almost always a coward. It is that the consciousness of his own guilt is a terror-ceful; but it did not bring home to him, except in the moment of discovery, the forgery. Still, he feared to risk the contest. He disappeared.

The right end here; but a word or two may be added. The real will was dated subsequent to the false one, and the young ladies were enabled to gain possession of the property without raising the question of forgery.

Courtney and Bright were prosecuted. I had taken of Miss Ellenborough was not a final one. I went to see the latter in the cell in my prefect, and frequently thereafter for a year. At the end of that time I commenced issuing her every day. In fact, we were married. I do not think that she has ever repented the act; or that the morning was at all unlucky for me when, passing over the first the law-book in our dusty old town office, I saw for the first time Mr. Green's Client.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

Being but one of the coincidents passes in a long journey—supposed entirely absolute fiction.

CHAPTER VIII.

COLONEL MORLEY found Mr. Poole at home, just returned from his office; he staid with that gentleman about half an hour, and then went straight to Darrell. As the time appointed to meet the French acquaintance, who depended on his hospitalities for a dinner, was now nearly arrived, Alban's conference with his English friend was necessarily brief and hurried, though long enough to confirm one fact in Mr. Poole's statement, which had been unknown to the Colonel before that day, and the admission of which was to Guy Darrell a pang as sharp as ever wounded ambition from that day to the present in the cells of the Inquisition. On returning from Greenwich, and depositing his Frenchman in some melancholy theatre, time enough for that resentful foreigner to witness theft and murder committed upon an injured country-man's sensibilities, Albina hastened again to Carlton Gardens. He found Darrell alone, pacing his floor to and fro, in the habit he had acquired in earlier life, perhaps when meditating some complicated law-case, or wrestling with himself against some secret sorrow. There are men of quick nerves who require a certain action of the body for the clear composure of their thoughts. I tell was one of them.

During these restless movements, alternated by abrupt pauses, usually inharmonious to the supreme quiet which characterized his listener's tastes and habits, the haughty pleasure of the burdened himself of at least one of the secrets which he had hitherto guarded from his friend. But as that secret connects itself with the history of a Person about whom it is well that the reader should now learn more than was known to Darrell himself, we will assume our privilege to be ourselves the confidants, and, for the cost of such dramatic vivacity as may belong to dialogue, but with the gain to the reader of clearer insight into those portions of the story which the occasion permits us to reveal—we will weave into something like method the more imperfect and desultory communications by which Guy Darrell added to Alban Morley's disturbed catalogue of painful subjects. The reader will allow, perhaps, that we thus evince a desire to gratify curiosity, with some due, but not of Arabella Crane, Darrell spoke but in one brief and angry sentence, and that not by the name in which the reader as yet has come to know her; and it is with the antecedents of Arabella Crane that our explanation will tranquilly commence.

CHAPTER IX.

Gris Arabella Crane.

Once on a time there lived a merchant named Fossett, a widower with three children, of whom a daughter, Arabella, was by some years the eldest. He was much respected, though a warm man, and a safe—attended diligently to his business—efficient to partner, no favorite, to-day, to-ate or intermeddle—liked his comforts, but made no pretense to fashion. His villa was at Clapham, not a showy but a solid edifice, with lodge, lawn, and gardens, chiefly notable for what is technically called pleasure-ground, a range of glass-houses on the most improved principles, the heaviest pines, the earliest pineapples, "I'm no judge of flowers," quoth Mr. Fossett meekly. "Give me a plain lawn, provided it be shaven close. But I say to my gardener, 'Forcing is my hobby—a cucumber with my fish all the year round!'" Such was the response Mr. Fossett sometimes—quite the reverse. He would no more ruin himself for the sake of dazzling others than he would for the sake of saving them. He liked a warm house, spacious rooms, good living, old wine, but nothing ostentatious. He raved not to parade them to publish envy. When he dined alone, or with a single favored guest, his host Ladifer, the valet shewhat!—when extending the rites of miscellaneous hospitality to acquaintances, relations, and their shy acquaintances—for Ladifer, Jutien; and for shy, Capel—Tun not provoking vanity, no craving notice, Mr. Fossett was content on the ecstasy, and seemed without a care. Formal was his manner, formal his household, formal even the stout cob that bore him from Chenpside to Clapham, from Clapham to Chenpside. That cob could not even prick up its ears, for if it wished so shy—its ears were cropped, so were its mane and its tail.

Arabella early gave promise of beauty, and more than ordinary power of intellect and character. Her fairness developed to the full advantage of education. She was sent to a select boarding-school of the highest respectability; the strictest discipline, the best masters, the longest bills. At the age of seventeen she left the school more pupil than seminary. Friends were ordered somewhat why the prim merchant took such pains to look on his daughter's wonderful accomplishments which seemed to give him no pleasure, and of which he never spoke with pride. But certainly, if she was so clever—unfortunate musician, exquisite artist, accomplished linguist, "it was very nice in her father's heart it so meekly, never crying her up, nor showing her off to his fastidious friends—very nice in him—good sense—greatness of mind."

"Arabella," said the worthy man, one day, a little time after she had left school for good, "Arabella," said he, "Mrs. ——," naming the head teacher in that famous school, "has written a very high compliment in a letter I received from her this morning. She says it is a pity you are not a poor man's daughter, that you are so steady and so clever that you could make a fortune for yourself as a governess."

Arabella at that age could smile gayly, and gayly she smiled at the notion conveyed in the compliment.

"No one can guess," resumed the father, striking his thumbs and twiddling his forefingers of his nose, "the ups and downs in this mortal sphere of trial, especially in the mercantile community. For, when I'm dead and buried, your vicissitudes will be very few, and your fortune, with economy, will be ample, and your education, and take care of your little brother and sister, who are both—stupid!"

These doleful words did not make much impression on Arabella, uttered as they were in a handsome drawing-room, opening on the meadshaven lawn it took three gardeners to shave, with a glittering side-view of three galleries of glass in which strawberries were ripe at Christmas, and cucumbers never failed to fish. Time went on. Arabella was now thoroughly domestic, very fine girl, with a decided manner—much accepted by her uncle, her drawing, her books, and her fancies. Fancies—for, like most girls with very active heads and idle hearts, she had a vague yearning for of the unknown and from the monotonous routine of a young lady's life; and the latent force of her nature inclined her to admire whatever was out of the beaten track —whatever was wild and daring. She had received two or three offers from young gentlemen in the same mercantile community as that which surrounded her father in the City—offers such as they did not please her; and she believed her father when he said that they only courted her under the idea that they could succeed with something handsome; "whereas," said the merchant, "I hope you will marry a man who will like you for yourself, and wait for your fortune till my will is read. As King Lear observes, 'Nothing will come of nothing, child,' I don't mean to strip till I go to bed."

One night, at a ball to Chenpside, Arabella saw the man who was destined to exercise so baleful an influence over her existence. Lionel Jasper had been brought to ball by a young fellow-clerk in the same commercial house as Fossett; and there in all the splendor of early and specious beauty, to which the minister Arabella had placed before his eyes so many years after-ward did not fade parties, could not be conceived that he encountered on himself the adoring gaze of the unworldly, and was not younger than Arabella; but, what with the height of his stature and the self-confidence of his bold, free bearing, he seemed older. Certainly, in so far as the distance from childhood was measured by the time which separates, Jasper might have been any age! He was told that old Fossett's daughter would have a very fine fortune; that she was a strong-minded, sensible lady, who governed her father, and would choose for herself; and accordingly he was formally introduced to Arabella the whole of the evening. The effect produced on the mind of this ill-fated woman by the dazzling splendor of the maiden is it proved to be lasting. There was a strange charm in the very contrast between the sensuous audacity and the bashful formalities of the genius who had hitherto wooed her, as if she frightened him. Nor was the charm less because of her less than that vital energy and power about the whole brain, which, as we have seemed the elements of heroic character, though but the attributes of riotous spirits, magnificent forms, form, flashing vanity, and boundless energy. She was as a bird gazing spell-bound on a gay young humming-bird, which, having ceased to bough, stunning its brilliant hues, and showing off all its beauty, just before it takes the bird of Paradise.

When they parted that night their intimacy had made so much progress that acquaintances had been made for its continuance. Arabella had an instinctive foreboding that her father would not like Jasper, and that Jasper would like Arabella's fortune better than Arabella. Lionel Jasper; that, if Jasper were presented to him, he would coldly receive him. But the acquaintance with a young clerk, however superb his outward appearance, was not the first that Arabella had made. She had a maiden aunt by the mother's side, who lived in Bloomsbury, gave and went to small parties, to which she was not easily persuaded, to strawberries, pines, cucumbers, and fish. Arabella was delighted by a turn, whenever it was convenient, a spare room. She had whatever amusements were to be had parties, and the innocent flirtations incidental thereto, could bestow. Arabella said nothing to her father about Jasper's visits, but to her aunt's she went. Arabella saw Jasper very often; their passion ripened apace; they changed vows and love-tokens, locks of hair, etc. Jasper, already much troubled by dun, became desperate. Arabella's aunt was poor, and Arabella's supposed fortune. Arabella at last summoned courage, and spoke to her father. After her delighted surprise, Mr. Fossett, after some moralizing, more on the uncertainty of life in general than on that of his daughter's lover in particular, agreed to see Mr. Jasper. Lovely, and lovelier than ever, Arabella, with sparkling eyes, a bottle of Lafitte, in an exceedingly plain but exceedingly weighty silver jug, which made Jasper's mouth water, and a dish of fish. Arabella's suggested with that somewhat coarse though well-saying of the Duke of Wellington, with which he had before edified his daughter, assured Jasper that he gave his full consent to the proposed marriage, and that Arabella, provided Jasper or his relations would maintain her in a style suitable to her fortune, (for that fortune till his (Fossett's) will was read. What that fortune would be, Mr. Fossett declined even to hint. Jasper was, however, much reconciled. Still the engagement went on. The lovers were not allowed to meet, because the relations maintain a wife! Preposterous idea! It would take a Clan of relations and a Zenana to maintain in that style. Arabella and Jasper deemed himself entitled—Jasper himself! But yet as he was not rich, and Arabella refused to compromise with old Fossett, by which he would agree to wait till the will was read, the counsels, advantages, provided Fossett, in his turn, would agree in the mean while to afford lodging and board, with a trifle for pocket-money, to Arabella and himself, in the Clapham Villa, which, though belonging to rural scenery, Jasper preferred, on the whole, to a second floor in the city—old Fossett fell ill, took to his bed; was unable to attend to his business, none one else attended to it; and the consequence was, that the house stopped payment, and was discovered to have been insolvent for the last ten years. Not a discreditable bankruptcy. There would, perhaps, be a few shillings in the pound ultimately paid, and not more than forty families irretrievably ruined. Old Fossett, safe in his bed, bore the affliction with philosophical composure; observed to Arabella that he had a vague yearning for of the quiet and down in the sphere of trial; referred again with pride to her first-case education; commanded again to her care Tom and Biddy; and, declaring that he died in charity with all men, resigned himself to his last slumber.

Arabella at first sought a refuge with her maiden aunt. But that lady, though not a bad pocket by her brother-in-law's failure, was more vehement against his memory than his most irritable creditor. Arabella was also deemed herself unjustly defrauded of the pines, strawberries, and spring chickens by which she had been enabled to give small parties at small cost, though with ample show, but that she was deemed by her companion she had hitherto declined from the supposed expectations of her niece. In short, the aunt was no home for Arabella, and her condolences so cutting, that Arabella quitted her door with a solemn determination never again to enter it.

And now the nobler qualities of the husband Arabella had chosen, at once into full play. Jasper was not penniless, he received by her own exertions to support and to rear her young brother and sister. The second school to which she had been the ornament willingly received her as a teacher, on the most moderate terms. She took a private family, and with a salary worthy of her talents and accomplishments, could be found. In the afternoons to which Jasper became necessarily superseded. She had the generosity to write, offering to relieve him from his engagement. Jasper considered himself fully released without that letter; but he was touched, and wrote to assure her discreet to say so. Arabella might obtain a situation with larger salary than she could possibly make by teaching whereof either of them might undertake to invest. Her aunt had evidently relented, as she had no children, and have nothing to give. In fine, Arabella, if not rich enough for a wife, might be often rich enough for a friend at need; and as for him, he was engaged to her for life, it must be not more than three days before he was in a state to live. Besides, independently of these prudent that though not ardent motives for declaring an attachable kind, Jasper, at last time really did entertain what he called love for the brilliant young woman—fastened on one of her attainments so superior to all the girls he had ever known should be so proud even less of its affection for than her own ambition for his welfare. Thus the engagement lasted—interviews more—letters more—Jasper, always hard, looking to the future; Jasper worked as little as possible, and was very much bored by the project.

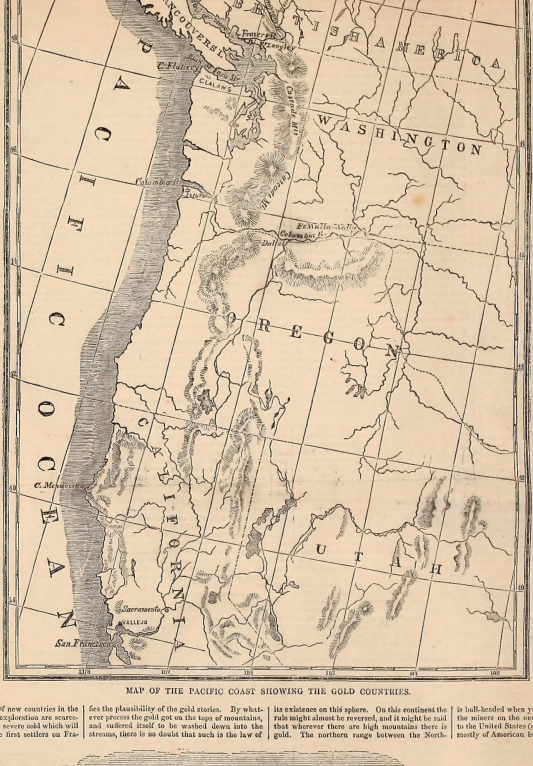
Unhappily, as it turned out, so great a sympathy, not only among the teachers, but among the pupils of Arabella's school, was felt for Arabella's reverse—her character for steadiness as well as her talents, that many of the parents undertook no evocation to her resolution to maintain her self-supporting position. Her aunt's refusal was made to procure her a livelihood much more lucrative, and more independent, than she could possibly have found as governess. She would take a small house of her own, live there with her fellow-orphans, and give lessons at home by the hour? Several families at once agreed so to engage her, and an income adequate to all her wants was secured. Arabella announced this plan to her friends; Bridget Greggs, the nurse of her infant sister, and the only servant left in that house, stealthily in the shades of evening, glided Jasper Lonely. She could not struggle against the temptation to see her lover to receive his visits—he was so poor—in such scraps of—and pretended herself to be so unhappy. There now became some one else to toil for, besides the little brother and sister. But what was Jasper's attitude to a man who so nobly grambled! Not officious smote her. A confidence between them, and a sympathy acknowledged her little brother caught it; her little sister sickened the next day; in less than a week two more children came home from the same house to Black Horses—borne to that plot of sunny turf in the prety churchyard—consecrated ever since the last earnings made for the little ones by the mother-like sister—Motherless, lone survivor! Jasper made Arabella a present of a watch. Did Arabella a present of a watch. Did Arabella grieve? Alas! alas! the truly dangerous Woman is not that Woman who can weep over Death and Laughter. Sorrow, and that sense of solitude which makes us welcome a footstep as a friend's, and a friend's as a lover's, prepared the entrance of light—weaken the outworks of female virtue more than all the fiercer forms of birth, or the flatteries which follow the path of Beauty through the crowd. Alas, and alas! Arabella's love for Jasper.

Jasper Lonely has still more solemnly sworn to Arabella that he will marry her soon. When they are rich enough. She feels as her spirit was gone—as if she could work on for him, for ever, for any unacknowledged—to whom love can console for shame. She had been greatly deceived up; her own self-esteem lucrative was keen; her remorse was noiseless, and it was stern. Harassments of a more vulgar nature began to rise and thicken upon her sources of income; she had contracted debts for the sake of Jasper. Rather than be compelled, yet bis no father. Pin creditors pressed him; he told her that he must hide. One winter's day he thus departed: she saw him no more for a year. She heard, a few days after he left her, of his father's crime and committal. Jasper was sent abroad by his maternal uncle, at his father's prayer; sent to a commercial house in France, in which the uncle obtained him a situation. In fact, the young man had been the favorite of his uncle, and that uncle, in order to save him from the obloquy which his father had brought upon his own.

Soon came William Losely's trial and sentence. Arabella felt the disgrace acutely—felt how much it must affect the unacknowledged Jasper; did not wonder that he forebore to write to her. She conceived him loved by shame, but she was buoyed up by her conviction that they should meet again. For good or for ill, she held herself bound to him for life. But meanwhile the debts she had incurred on his account came upon her. She was forced to remove from her house; and at this time Mrs. Lyndsay, looking out for some first-rate superior governess for Matilda's education, was urged by others to try and secure for that post Arabella Fossett. The highest testimonials from the school at which she had been reared, from the most eminent professional teachers, from the families at which she had recently taught, for Arabella ought to bear upon Mr. Darrell, be authorized Mrs. Lyndsay to propose such a step. She could not fail to secure a teacher of such rare qualifications. And thus Arabella became governess to Miss Darrell.

There is a kind of young lady of whom her nearest relations will say, "I don't make her a girl out." Matilda Darrell was that kind of young lady. She talked little; she moved with composure; she seemed to regard education as a secret which she had solemnly sworn not to let out. She had been steeped in slyness from her early infancy by a shy mother. Mrs. Darrell was a woman who had always something to conceal. There was always some one to be thrust out of sight; some visit not to be spoken of; something to be done that there was no need to say account to mention to Papa.

Thus Miss Darrell did not, as a child, was still contained to view her father as a person against whom prudence demanded that she should constantly on her guard. It was not that she was exactly afraid of him—he was very fond of her, and very kind to her—but his royal nature was antipathetic to hers. She had no sympathy with him. How could she have sympathy with him? She had no knowledge that those thoughts were not such as could be communicated to her. Yet, though reserved, unconversing, undemonstrative, she appeared docile and docile. Her reserve was ascribed to constitutional timidity. Timid she was not personally secured; yet, when you thought you had solved the problem, that she was timid because she was determined, that you were forced again to exclaim, "I can't make that girl out!" She was not sullen, she was not shy, she was not timid in your mind that she was dull, when, by a chance remark, you were startled to find that she was very much a keenly observant, when you had fancied her fast asleep. She had seemed, since her mother's death, more than ever to like Bridget and Caroline than of say other human beings —always appeared when one or both of them when they were absent; yet she confided to them no more than she did to her father. You would have thought that Matilda's mother would require no blinding in those with whom she lived. Such was the very secretiveness of her nature—attraction—a puzzle always creates some interest. Then her face, though neither handsome nor plain, was of a kind that is remembered as undoubted, depressed expression. A kind observer would not have said that it was unhappy. It might be a good deal of heart in that girl, if one could but—make her out.



Such seemed to take at once to Arabella, more than she had taken to Mrs. Lyndsay, or Mrs. Lyndsay to Matilda, with whom she had been brought up as a sister, but who, then joyous and quick and innocently fearless—with her soul not yet locked up—had never had the least to be deceiving.

But this stranger, of accomplishments so rare, of demeanor so calm, with a cheerful gleam on her lip, a gathered care on her brow—they was a mystery to study, and study she did, and soon she felt a sympathy; for she detected at once that Arabella was also a secret.

Mrs. Darrell, absorbed in her own reflections, gave to Matilda but the mechanical attention which a governess receives who comes on an ordinary pupil. But an interest in Matilda sprung up in her breast, in proportion as she observed the interest which Arabella evinced. He was aware of the pomp and circumstance which had surrounded her in her childhood. As he expected the creditable energy with which she had devoted her talents to the support of the young children confided to her care. Her manner donated her bereavement of those little fellow-orphans for whom she had earned and expended and he strove, by a kindness of forethought and a delicacy of attention, which were the more prized in a governess who could not be supposed to make her forget that she was a salaried servant, to make her valued by her pupil as a matter of course, in the position of gentlewoman, guest, and friend. Recognizing in her a certain vigor of mind, which, under her former home's accomplishments, he would flatter her scholastic pride, by referring to her opinion in some question of reading, or consulting her judgment on some point of critical taste. She, in return, touched by his thoughtful kindness to the depth of a nature that, though already seriously wounded by misanthropy and scorn, was not like Jasper's, retained that capacity of gratitude, the loss of which is humanity's best desperation.

Not this alone: Arabella was startled by the intellect and character of Darrell into that kind of homage which a woman, who has hitherto met but her own intellectual inferiors, renders to the first distinguished personage in whom she recognizes, half with humility and half with awe, an understanding and a culture to which she cannot aspire. But the first distinguished man she had ever knowledge but the forced ex-

THE NEW EL DORADO IN BRITISH AMERICA.

MAP OF THE PACIFIC COAST SHOWING THE GOLD COUNTRIES.

As there seems to be little room for doubting the truth of the accounts which are extensively circulated about the recent gold discoveries on the shores of Fraser's and Thompson's rivers, in the territories of the Hudson's Bay Company, on the western coast of North America, we have thought that the reader might desire to see a map of the country. We give, also, a picture of the Hudson's Bay Company's fort on Vancouver's Island, from a sketch made some time since. At the rate things are progressing in that part of the world, our picture will soon be out of date.

The precise spot on which the gold has been found is the point at which Thompson's River falls into Fraser's River. The latter is a river of limited pretensions, navigable only for some twenty-five miles from its mouth, in the Gulf of Georgia. At the head of its navigable waters the Hudson's Bay Company have a fort—Fort Langley—where a good business has been done in furs, and some land opened to cultivation. From thence to the junction of the two rivers—a distance of 120 to 140 miles—the river is full of rapids, rocks, and falls. With skillful management, a loaded canoe can creep its way nearly the whole distance; but at several points there are portages which are calculated to try very severely the temper and endurance of explorers. It need hardly be said that the climate is severe, lying many miles to the north of the most northerly civilized settlement on the continent, the future El Dorado will resemble more closely the northern gold-fields of the Ural Mountains than any that have been worked in California or Australia. The climate has seconded the efforts which the Hudson's Bay Company has made to preserve a monopoly of the country. There are no settlements of to near Fraser's River save the Company's trading posts. A few rare individuals—mostly retired servants of the Company —have obtained Land and licenses to cultivate on the splendid soil of Vancouver's Island. But the shores of Fraser's River are an unknown country, and though the mellow preserves the traveler from the intolerable tropical fevers and the ever-growing tropical ague which are the bane of new countries in the South, these drawbacks to exploration are scarcely more formidable than the severe cold which will impede the exertions of the first settlers on Fraser's River. For at least six months of the year they will find themselves fully occupied in keeping themselves warm and duly supplied with food; and during a great portion of the remainder of the year the spring freshets will so swell the rivers as to render gold-seeking impossible. We understand that the Californians who have gone North do not expect to commence operations in earnest before the middle of the present month.

A glance at the map will largely aid the reader in believing the accounts of the gold discoveries. The range of hills in which the auriferous range of California is found extends, in almost unbroken line, thro' the Hudson's Bay territory. It bears various names. But that the mountain range in the terms from the Sacramento to Fraser's River, one can readily perceive. Analogy, therefore, justifies the plausibility of the gold stories. By whatever process the gold got on the tops of mountains, and sufficed itself to be washed down into the streams, there is no doubt that such is the law of its existence on this sphere. On this continent the rule might almost be reversed, and it might be said that wherever there are high mountains there is gold. The northern range between the Northeastern States and Canada is full of gold—which, however, has never yet been found in sufficient quantity to justify very extensive mining operations. The range running north and south, and forming the background of Virginia, the Carolinas, and Georgia, is also highly auriferous, and gives profitable employment to thousands of miners at the present day. Gold is also found on the slopes of the hills which inclose Lake Superior. Lastly, the great range against which California leans has been for nearly ten years the great gold-field of the world, and the "tail-end" of that range which sweeps round and pursues an easterly course just on the boundary-line between the United States and Mexico is now also known to be highly prominent with gold. There is, therefore, not only no reason for considering the accounts from Fraser's River improbable, but, on the contrary, it would be exceptional and surprising if the mountain range which that stream waters were not as auriferous as the rest of the range of which it forms a part.

It must be painful to the conventional Jonathan to reflect that these new gold-fields are in a foreign country. It is not worth while stopping to comment on the petty tyrannies of the obsolete association which claims dominion over them; the Hudson's Bay Company's hours are numbered; and their territories—with all the furs, and all the ice, and all the gold they contain—will soon pass under the control of the British Government or one of its colonial dependencies. Just to the typical American—the man of destiny and of filibusterism, the youthful hero who looks forward calmly to the acquisition of China, Russia, and subsequently South America and little Europe—it must be dolorous to reflect that these new gold-fields, which, if the Californian miners are to be believed, surpass the richest diggings in the Golden State, are in a foreign country. Nor can he hope, as he may reasonably do in reference to Arizona and its mines, that all that is worth having in the land of the foreigner will soon pass under the talon of the American eagle. If Fraser's River be worth keeping, John Bull will keep it. There is that, at least, about John—he is bull-headed when you try to bully him; and if the miners on the new placers go for annexation to the United States (as being, mostly of American breed), he will spend millions rather than let them go.

Ah! what a blunder it was to make such a fuss about "54° 40' or fight," and then to be satisfied after all with 49°.

We have made arrangements for illustrating, from time to time, the progress which may be made in the development of this new gold territory, so far as it may be developed. The public may soon learn that it deserves additional attention from the probability of its becoming the terminus of the first Pacific railroad. A party of British engineers have already been detailed for the survey. It would be characteristic of the British Government to build the road at the national expense, while we are haggling and making Buncombe speeches about our routes. And notwithstanding the disadvantages of climate under which they labor in the north, the thing may be done.

VANCOUVER'S ISLAND.

Miscellany.

—Mr. Elliot, in his "Scenes of Clerical Life," speaks thus sensibly of the true character of

The World's Working Men:

The blessed work of helping the world forward happily does not wait to be done by perfect men; and I should imagine that neither Luther nor John Bunyan, for example, would have satisfied the modern demand for an ideal hero, who believes nothing but what is true, feels nothing but what is exalted, and does nothing but what is graceful. The real heroes, of God's making, are quite different: they have their natural heritage of love and conscience which they drew in with their mother's milk; they know one or two of those deep spiritual truths which are only to be won by long wrestling with their own sins and their own sorrows; they have earned faith and strength so far as they have done genuine work; but the rest is dry, barren theory, blank prejudice, vague hearsay. Their insight is blended with mere opinion; their sympathy is perhaps confined in narrow conduits of doctrine, instead of flowing forth with the freedom of a stream that blesses every weed in its course; obstinacy or self-assertion will often interfuse itself with their grandest impulses; and their very deeds of self-sacrifice are sometimes only the rebound of a passionate egotism.

—A queer document, of the olden time, is this;

Hangman's Bill:

A Dutch journal recounts that at the beginning of the last century the city of Amsterdam was in the habit of employing the Haarlem executioner, and that with a view to save traveling expenses it was usually contrived that a good many executions should be fixed for the same day. The following bill, showing the amount earned by this fortunate and painstaking functionary on December 17, 1712, is preserved in the archives of Amsterdam: "To beheading a man, 15 fl.; to hanging another, 6 fl.; to breaking a man on the wheel, 9 blows, at 3 fl. the blow, 27 fl.; to hanging the same individual afterward, 6 fl.; to hanging two others, with swords stuck in their heads, 18 fl.; to hanging four more, at 6 fl. each, 24 fl.; to hanging a youth, 3 fl.; to hanging three men and placarding their breasts (N.B. The placards appear to have cost nothing), 12 fl.; to flogging 24 persons, at 3 fl. each, 27 fl.; to, flogging three others, and fixing swords on their heads, 9 fl.; to putting a man in the pillery, 6 fl.; to branding a man in the back, 6 fl.; sundries, 24 fl.; for my assistants, 12 fl.; for ropes, etc., 276 fl."

—Philosophers have often speculated on the intimate connection subsisting between

Soul and Body,

but none so effectually as Sydney Smith. Let lovers of the table take warning from his words:

The longer I live the more I am convinced that the apothecary is of more importance than Seneca, and that half the unhappiness in the world proceeds from little stoppages, from a duct choked up, from food pressing in the wrong place, from a vexed duodenum, or an agitated pylorus. The deception, as practiced upon human creatures, is curious and entertaining. My friend sups late; he eats some strong soup, then a lobster, then some tart, and he dilutes these excellent varieties with wine. The next day I call upon him. He is going to sell his house in London, and to retire into the country. He is alarmed for his eldest daughter's health. His expenses are hourly increasing, and nothing but a timely retreat can save him from ruin. All this is the lobster. And when overexcited nature has had time to manage this testaceous encumbrance, the daughter recovers, the finances are in good order, and every rural idea effectually excluded from the mind. In the same manner, old friendships are destroyed by toasted cheese; and hard salted meat has led to suicide. Unpleasant feelings of the body produce correspondent sensations in the mind, and a great scene of wretchedness is sketched out by a morsel of indigestible and misguided food. Of such infinite consequence to happiness is it to study the body.

Hearts

are of several kinds, and of widely different natures. First, there are walled-up hearts; and these are of two kinds: about one kind the wall is high and strong, and to surmount it is a work of extreme difficulty; but if you can get inside you have entered Eden. Fragrant, and sweet, and fair, as the visions seen in dreams, is that inclosed garden; and it is worth hard labor to gain admission there. The other has a wall as high and strong, and full as hard to get over; and when at last, with torn flesh and dislocated joints, you have scaled it, you wish you hadn't, for there is nothing inside but rocks and cold water. The trouble with these two descriptions of hearts is, that 'tis impossible to distinguish the one from the other until you have almost worn yourself out in mounting the walls. Another kind of heart is that which, having nothing to fence it in, lies open to the passage of all men and cattle—a waste, unfruitful field, of no use to any body, and less to its owner. But there is another kind of heart—a rare creation, but a real one—whose wall is low and almost hid by flowers. The birds make their nests in it, and sing as they swing upon its swaying twigs and festooning vines. Beyond the wall, itself a thing of fragrance, beauty, and joy, lie the enchanting gardens. Delightful bowers invite the wayworn traveler to enter and repose. Spirits of love and beauty beckon the sad and lonely ones to the feast of souls, and a charmed light and glory hover in the whole joyous air. This is the true type of heart.

—In the Barbary States, as well as in India, there are Snake-Charmers.

Mr. Hay relates that, while in Tunis, he met a party of Eisowy, or snake-charmers: they consisted of four Soosys, or natives of the province of Soos; three of whom were musicians, their instruments being long rude canes, resembling in form a flute, but open at both ends, into one of which the performer blew, producing melancholy but pleasing notes.

We invited the Eisowy to exhibit their snakes: to this they readily assented. They commenced by raising up their hands as if they were holding a book, muttering in unison a prayer addressed to the Deity, and calling upon Seedna Eiser, who in Morocco is held as the patron saint of snake-charmers. Having concluded this invocation the music struck up, and the snake-charmer danced in rapid whirls, which no Strauss could have kept time to, around the basket containing the reptiles. This basket was made of cane-work covered with goat's skin. Stopping suddenly, the snake-charmer thrust his bare arm into the basket, and pulled out a large black cobra capella, or hooded snake. This he handled as if it had been his turban, and proceeded to twine it around his head, dancing as before, while the reptile seemed to obey his wishes by preserving its position on his head. The cobra was then placed on the ground, and, standing erect on its tail, moved its head to and fro, apparently keeping time to the music. Now whirling round in circles still more rapidly than before, the Eisowy again put his hand into the basket, and pulled out successively and placed on the ground two very poisonous species of serpents, natives of the desert of Soos, called leffa. They were of a mottled color, with black spots; were thick in the body, and not above two feet and a half or three feet long. These reptiles proved more active and less docile than the cobra; for, half-coiled, and holding their heads in a slanting position ready for an attack, they watched with sparkling eyes the movements of the charmer, darting at him with open jaws every now and then, as he ventured within their reach, and throwing forward their body with amazing velocity, while their tail appeared to remain on the same spot, and then recoiling back again. The Eisowy warded off with his long haik the attacks which they made upon his bare legs, and the leffas seemed to expend their venom upon the garment.

The Snakes bite.

Now, calling on Seedan Eiser, he seized hold of one of the two serpents by the nape of the neck, and danced round with it; then opening its jaws with a small stick, he displayed to the spectators the fangs, from which there oosed a white and oily substance. He then put the leffa to his arm, which it immediately seized with its teeth, while the man, making hideous contortions, as if in pain, whirled rapidly around, calling on his patron saint. The reptile continued its bite until the Eisowy took it off, and showed us the blood which it had drawn.

Having laid the leffa down, he then put the bitten part of his arm into his mouth, and pressing it with his teeth, danced for several minutes, while the music played more rapidly than ever, till, apparently being quite exhausted, he again halted.

Conceiving that the whole was a trick—that the leffa had been bereft of its poison, and that its bite consequently would be as harmless as that of a rat, I requested to be allowed to handle the serpent.

"Are you an Eisowy?" said the man of Soos, "or have you steady faith in the power of our saint?"

I replied in the negative.

"Then," said he, "if the snake bites you, your hour is come! Bring me a fowl or any animal, and I will give you sure proof ere you attempt to touch a leffa."

A fowl was brought, and part of the feathers having been plucked, the serpent was again taken up by the charmer, and allowed to bite the fowl for an instant. The bird was put on the ground, and after running around as if in a fit for about a minute, tottered and fell dead. Its flesh became shortly afterward of a bluish hue. It is needless to say, that after this I declined handling the leffa.

The only way that I can account for the Eisowy escaping unharmed from the bite of the snake is, that either he prevents the leffa, when in the act of seizing his arm, from using its fangs, and that the blood seen is drawn by the teeth only of the reptile, which are distinct from its fangs; or else that the Eisowy possesses an antidote to the poison, and that he puts it into his mouth, and applies it to the bitten part during the dance.

WHENCE CAME THE FLOWERS?

Whence came the pleasant flowers,
Those beautiful and ever-welcome things?
Were they in Eden's bowers,
Born of the dewy showers,
The angels scatter'd from their radiant wings?
So when the Deluge came, and Nature bow'd
Before the deeps that like a vasty shroud
Inclosed together all that round us lies,
The seeds of Adam's happy Paradise
Mingled with those of our impurer earth,
And thus the flowers had universal birth.

A Child

is a man in a small letter, yet the best copy of Adam before he tasted of Eve or the apple; and he is happy whose small practice in the world can only write his character. He is Nature's fresh picture newly drawn in oil, which time and much handling dims and defaces. His soul is yet a white paper unscribbled with observations of the world, wherewith, at length, it becomes a blurred note-book. He is purely happy because he knows no evil, nor hath made means by sin to be acquainted with misery. He arrives not at the mischief of being wise, nor endures evils to come, by foreseeing them. He kisses and loves all, and, when the smart of the rod is past, smiles on his beater. Nature and his parents alike dandle him, and tice him on with a bait of sugar to a draught of wormwood. He plays yet, like a young prentice the first day, and is not come to his task of melancholy. We laugh at his foolish sports, but his game is our earnest; and his drums, rattles, and hobby-horses but the emblems and mocking of man's business. His father hath writ him as his own little story, wherein he reads those days of his life that he can not remember, and sighs to see what innocence he hath outlived. The older he grows, he is a stair lower from God; and, like his first father, much worse in his breeches. He is the Christian's example, and the old man's relapse; the one imitates his pureness, and the other falls into his simplicity. Could he put off his body with his little coat, he had got eternity without a burden, and exchanged but one heaven for another.

Odd Thoughts.

—Every man has in his own life follies enough; in his own mind troubles enough; in the performance of his duties deficiencies enough, without being curious about the affairs of others.

Round dealing is the honor of man's nature; and a mixture of falsehood is like alloy in gold and silver, which may make the metal work the better, but it debaseth it.—Bacon.

Sleep—Death's younger brother, and so like him that I never dare trust myself with him without saying my prayers.—Sir Thomas Browne.

Reason and Christianity.—You have studied some instrumental sciences, some Latin and Greek; have acquired some notions of natural philosophy and mathematics; have read fragments of ancient and modern history; perused with pleasure treatises, more or less ingenious, against Christianity; and with this little baggage, borne by your five-and-twenty years, you stand up before Jesus Christ and His Church, to tell them that you put them under the ban of human reason! Do you not think that Christianity—which is certainly older than you—has read more, seen more, and lived more with mankind than you have? Do you not think it would have as much right to put you under the ban of reason?—Lacoydaire.

Extreme self-lovers will set a man's house on fire, though it were but to roast their eggs.—Bacon.

He who feels his own deficiencies will be a charitable man for his own sake.

Riches are the baggage of virtue; they can not be spared nor left behind, but they hinder the march.—Bacon.

An application to any study that tends neither directly nor indirectly to make us better men nor better citizens, is at best but a specious and ingenious sort of idleness, to use an expression of Tillotson; and the knowledge we acquire by it is a creditable kind of ignorance: nothing more.—Bolingbroke.

You may extract fire from most things, but from ashes never.

If a man will begin in certainties, he shall end in doubts; but if he will be content to begin with doubts, he shall end in certainties.—Bacon.

What Anacharsis said of the vine may aptly enough be said of prosperity. She bears the three grapes of drunkenness, pleasure, and sorrow; and happy is it if the last can cure the mischief which the former work. When afflictions fail to have their due effect, the case is desperate.—Bolingbroke.

Half the logic of misgovernment lies in this one sophistical dilemma: If the people are turbulent, they are unfit for liberty; if they are quiet, they are unfit for liberty.—Macaulay.

A man can not paint portraits till he has seen faces.—Marmontel.

Whoever has sixpence is sovereign over all men—to the extent of sixpence: commands cooks to feed him, philosophers to teach him, kings to mount guard over him—to the extent of sixpence.—Carlyle.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

The following "sentence," pronounced by the Judge of one of the judicial districts of Iowa, is published in the city where the execution is to take place. How coolly, and in what grammatical terms the Judge condemns the "Sheriff of Lee County" to be "privately hanged" for a murder of which two other men had been convicted! "You, Daniel Reddout and Phillip Nash, convicted of the murder of T. A. Harrison, by a jury of your countrymen, shall be taken from hence to the county jail, there confined till Friday the 23d day of July, 1858, and on that day, the Sheriff of Lee County shall take you to some convenient place within the limits of the city of Keokuk, between the hours of twelve o'clock, m., and three o'clock, p.m., and be privately hanged by the neck till you are dead, dead, dead! and may God have mercy on your souls."

A lady asked a noted doctor if he did not think the small bonnets the ladies wore had a tendency to produce congestion of the brain. "Oh no," replied he, "ladies who have brains won't wear them."

"In the wilds of Georgia," writes a correspondent, "we have a class of people (animals of the genus homo), known vulgarly as 'crackers.' Various explanations of this sobriquet have been attempted, but rather unsatisfactorily. They are, in my opinion, the lineal descendants of the original prison-settlers from the penal colonies of England. A glance at them will but confirm this opinion, knowing them, as I do, in almost every relation in life by my professional intercourse. I can say candidly, just such a class can nowhere else be found. But enough; I am verging on a field too prolific for these hasty lines.—I have had in attendance, professionally, a family known among the fraternity as a 'real poor-pay case' for some five years, as usual the most clamorous for their rights—reckless as to night calls—glorying in being able to bring the 'Doc' at any time through mud, thunder, and lightning. Thinking it politic to continue my attentions, I let them have their own way, determining to avenge myself when time and opportunity offered. Fortuitous circumstances brought about the wished-for day. Mrs. F——, a few weeks ago, became the mother of a pair of twins, and I requested the honor of naming them. She replied, 'Well, Doc, ef you will promise me to call 'em Skriptur names you kin do it jest as soon as you like.' No sooner said than done. I dubbed one Belteshazzar and the other Beelzebub; and, said I, call one Bel and the other Bub for short. 'Bell which said she?' 'Belteshazzar,' said I; 'real "true and true" 'Scripture name.' The grandmother having been summoned had just arrived, and approaching Mrs. F——'s bedside said, 'Well, Mary! you have gone and dun it, and has got twins, hain't ye? And what are you agwine to call 'em?' Mrs. F—— replied, pointing to me, 'the Doc thar has jest gin 'em names you will like powerful well—a Scriptur name, but I can't remember, so get him to write 'em down.' I put down the names in a fly-leaf of a Jayne's Family Almanac, about the only thing in the shape of a book in the establishment which was visible, and read them out to the old lady. The old soul, with her eyes turned up and her hands raised in an attitude of thanksgiving, replied with the deepest pathos, 'Well, Mary, if these children will only be as good as them they is named arter, hit is all I will ax.'"

EAGLE THE FIRST.

By Alfred Tennyson.

He clasps the crag with crooked hands,
Close to the sun, in lonely lands.
Ringed with the azure world he stands.
The wrinkled sea beneath him crawls,
He watches from his mountain walls,
And like a thunder-bolt he falls.

EAGLE YE SECOND.

By G. Whillikins.

With hooked claws he clasps ye fence,
Close by ye hen-roost; gazing thence
He spies a mice, what's got no sense.
Ye mice beneath can't well see him;
He watcheth from his lofty limb,
Then jumpeth down and grabbeth him.

P.S.—The difference, though only faint,
'Twixt that and this I now will paint;
His eagle's wild, my eagle ain't.

"The Ruling Passion strong in Death."—Old Uncle John Jones, who lived in Cincinnati a few years ago, was excessively fond of mint. So fond was Jones of this weed that he would be sure to obtain the first mint of the season, and proceed at once to have it manufactured into a "julep," which luxury seemed to be his only glory in the drinking line. Jones would indulge in as many as twenty-five or thirty drinks a day during the julep season. In the spring of 1855 Jones did not make his appearance as usual, and the proprietors of the saloons and restaurants, whom he had become quite familiar with, felt anxious as to the whereabouts of their bountiful customer. Upon inquiring, they found that Jones had come to his death during one of the winter months, and, feeling as if they owed a little respect to their departed friend, they proceeded to his grave, where, to their surprise, they found the mint had grown all about it to the immense height of from a foot to eighteen inches.

When poor Spoon failed he was very much "down at the heel;" and his friends came round him to comfort him, as Job's did when he was boiling over with affliction.

"Don't mind it," said Eliakim, the wooden head, "don't mind it; thank Heaven, they don't hang a man in this country for debt, though they do every thing else to him;" and Spoon, lifting up his voice, replied, "That's so!"

An attorney before a bench of magistrates, a short time ago, told the bench, with great gravity, that he had two witnesses in court, in behalf of his client, and they would be sure to speak the truth, for he had no opportunity to communicate with them!

How to Tell a Lady's Age.—The following table will do it. Just hand the table to the lady and ask her to tell you in which of its columns her age is contained. Then add together the figures at the top of the columns designated, and you have the great secret. Suppose an age to be seventeen. You will find the number seventeen only in two columns, viz., the first and fifth; and the first figures at the head of these columns make seventeen. Here is the magic table:

1st.	2d.	3d.	4th.	5th.	6th.
1	2	4	8	16	32
3	3	5	9	17	33
5	6	6	10	18	34
7	7	7	11	19	35
9	10	12	12	20	36
11	11	13	13	21	37
13	14	14	14	22	38
15	15	15	15	23	39
17	18	20	24	24	40
19	19	21	25	25	41
21	22	22	26	26	42
23	23	23	27	27	43
25	26	28	28	28	44
27	27	29	29	29	45
29	30	30	30	30	46
31	31	31	31	31	47
33	34	36	40	48	48
35	35	37	41	49	49
37	38	38	42	50	50
39	39	39	43	51	51
41	42	44	44	52	52
43	43	45	45	53	53
45	46	46	46	54	54
47	47	47	47	55	55
49	50	52	56	56	56
51	51	53	57	57	57
53	54	54	58	58	58
55	55	55	59	59	59
57	58	60	60	60	60
59	59	61	61	61	61
61	62	62	62	62	62
63	63	63	63	63	63

"You've destroyed my peace of mind," said a desponding lover to a truant lass. "It can't do you much harm, John, for 'twas an amazing small piece you had, any way!" was the quick reply.

"Mr. Jenkins, will it suit you to settle that old account of yours?"

"No, Sir; you are mistaken in the man. I am not one of the old settlers."

While an officer was bowing a cannon-ball passed over his head and decapitated a soldier who stood behind him. "You see," said the officer to those who stood near him, "that a man never loses any thing by politeness."

A traitor is good fruit to hang from the boughs of the tree of liberty."

It is not work that kills men; it is worry. Work is healthy; you can hardly put more upon a man than he can bear. Worry is rust upon the blade. It is not the revolution that destroys the machinery, but the friction. Fear secretes acids; but love and truth are sweet juices.

"I say, Jack, how do dem taters turn out dis year?"

"Well, Cuff, da am very much like the long hair gemmen—all top, and not the least bit bottom."

"Sir," said an irascible man to his opponent, "I believe you are either a deist or an atheist."

"Wrong, Sir," was the rejoinder; "I am a dentist." This was throwing the thing right into his teeth.

Plutarch says, in his Life of Alexander, that the Babylonians used, during the dog-days, to sleep on skins filled with water. The Boston Times adds, that in these days men sleep on skins filled with bad rum.

It is scarcely credible that a child but four years old could perpetrate so perfect a pun as the one alleged in the following incident; but its truth is certified to us by a Philadelphia correspondent. The author of it was a little girl. She was playing with her doll by the side of her mother, when, after some consideration, she said, "Mother, I wish my doll was realized." "Why, what do you mean?" her mother replied. "Why," she said, "you see she has only glass eyes; I want her to have real eyes."

"What is that dog barking at?" asked a fop, whose boots were more polished than his ideas. "Why," replied a by-stander, "because he sees another puppy in your boots."

"What," asked Margarita of Cecilia, "what, dearest, do you think is really the food of Cupid?" And Cecilia answered, "Arrow-root."

The tombstone of a sweet girl, blind from her birth, bears the appropriate inscription, "There is no night there!" The tombstone of a child who died at the age of three years has inscribed upon it the befitting words, "Went in the morning."

No man can tell whether he is rich or poor by turning to his ledger. It is the heart that makes a man rich. He is rich or poor, according to what he is, not according to what he has.

Louis XIII., coming from the Council with Richelieu, whose opinions had just overruled those of the King, the latter stood aside to let the monarch pass. "Are you not the master here?" said the King, pushing him angrily. "Go before me." "I can only do so," replied the adroit courtier, taking a torch from one of the pages, "by assuming the duties of the humblest of your servants."

Among other clever stories, an Iowa correspondent sends us this:

A green-looking chap from the Green Mountain State went over the line and on to Montreal, "to look reound a leetle." Going into a large and handsome dry-goods store, his verdancy attracted the attention of the proprietor, who attempted to quiz him; but unhappily having an im-p-p-p-pediment in his speech, he had to give it up, and his head-clerk came forward to speak for him.

The clerk began. "Mr. Bull wishes to know if you can tell him why Balaam's ass spoke?"

"Wa'al," says Jonathan, "I rayther guess as how that Balaam was a stutterin' man, and his ass had to speak for him!"

Good for Jonathan.

Wind-mills are machines which are only kept going by being perpetually puffed; wherein, Jones suggests, they bear a pointed resemblance to some authors. With this difference, however, the reader will perceive, that while the latter raise the wind by increasing their sale, the former diminish their sail as the wind increases.

Marriage, says an enthusiastic votary of Hymen, is a state of which it is unnecessary to describe the happiness, for two reasons: first, because it would be superfluous to those who are in the enjoyment of its blessings; and, secondly, because it would be impossible to those who are not.

A saw is a sort of dumb alderman, which gets through a great deal by the activity of its teeth. N.B. A bona fide alderman is not one of the "wise saws" mentioned by Shakspeare; at least in "modern instances."

When flowers are full of heaven-descended dews, they always hang their heads; but men hold theirs the higher the more they receive, getting proud as they get full.

Francis, Duke of Luxembourg, was a celebrated French general, and much deformed. His uniform success, when contending with William III. of England, rendered him an object of jealousy to that prince, who once, in the bitterness of his heart, called him "humpback."

"What does he know of my back?" said the Marshal; "he never saw it."

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, July 12, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets have been moderately supplied with Flour, for which there has been a fair inquiry, chiefly for home use, at essentially unchanged prices. Wheat and Corn of prime quality have been sparingly offered, and have been in request. Inferior and unsound lots have been plenty and depressed, having been in slack demand. Oats were salable and buoyant....A better inquiry prevailed for Cotton, Coffee, Sugars, Molasses, Naval Stores, Linseed Oil, and Provisions at strengthening prices....Hay was in fair request, at steady rates....Hops were more active but less firm....Rice was pretty freely dealt in at former quotations....Tobacco and Wool were moderately sought after at unaltered prices....The Dry Goods trade is generally inactive at present. The Dry Goods imports during the week amounted to $736,221, against $4,433,000 the corresponding week of last year. The value of the imports since January 1 reached $23,306,540, against $50,219,712 the same week last year....The movements in other commodities were moderate, and unproductive of any remarkable alterations....We append a revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

Ordinary to extra State Flour, per bbl.	$3 80	@	$4 05
Superfine to fancy Western do. "	3 80	@	4 10
Extra Western Flour, per barrel	4 10	@	7 00
Fancy to extra Genesee, per barrel	4 30	@	6 50
Super to Extra Canadian, per barrel	4 20	@	5 20
Mixed to Extra Southern, per barrel	4 50	@	7 50
Fine to Superfine Rye Flour, per bbl.	3 00	@	3 50
Corn Meal, per barrel	3 50	@	4 00
White Wheat, per bushel	1 00	@	1 32½
Red Wheat, per bushel	68	@	1 10
Corn, per bushel	74	@	88
Rye, per bushel	68	@	70
Barley, per bushel	58	@	65
Western Oats, per bushel	47	@	—
State Oats, per bushel	46	@	47
Jersey and Penn. Oats, per bushel	41	@	44
Southern Oats, per bushel	35	@	41
Cotton, middlings, per pound	12¼	@	12½
Mess Pork, per barrel	16 65	@	16 75
Prime Pork, per barrel	13 65	@	13 75
Country Mess Beef, per barrel	10 75	@	11 50
Prime Mess Beef, per tierce	18 00	@	22 00
Beef Hams, per barrel	15 00	@	17 00
Cut Meats, per pound	5½	@	8
Lard, per pound	11	@	11½
State Butter, per pound	12	@	22
Western Butter, per pound	10	@	16
Cheese, per pound	3	@	7½
Rice, per 100 pounds	3 00	@	3 75
Rio Coffee, per pound	9¾	@	11½
Cuba Sugar, per pound	5½	@	7¾
Cuba Molasses, per gallon	23	@	30
New Orleans Sugar, per pound	5½	@	8
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon	—	@	40
Hyson Teas, per pound	27	@	55
Oolong Teas, per pound	27	@	60
Domestic Whisky, per gallon	22½	@	23
Hops, per pound	5½	@	7½
Hay, per 100 pounds	40	@	70
Tallow, per pound	—	@	9½
Crude Turpentine, per 280 pounds	3 56¼	@	3 62½
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon	44½	@	45
Tar, per barrel	1 75	@	2 00
Common Rosin, per 310 pounds	1 62½	@	1 70
Linseed Oil, per gallon	70	@	—
Kentucky Tobacco, per pound	6½	@	15

Stocks of several Articles in New York, July 1.

	1857.	1858.
Dyewoods, tons	611	2,873
Hemp, tons	185	498
Hemp, bales	8,366	18,481
Lead, tons	1,050	1,700
Leather, Sole, sides	61,700	109,800
Rice, tierces	4,044	6,311
Rice, bags	1,510	—
Tobacco, Manufactured, pkgs.	54,632	38,031

Freights were somewhat brisker. For Liverpool—Cotton, 5-32d. @ 3-16d. per pound; Flour, 1s. 4½d. @ 1s. 6d. per barrel; Grain, 4d. @ 5d. per bushel; Rosin, 1s. 6d. @ 1s. 9d. per barrel; Beef, 3s. @ 3s. 6d. per tierce; and Heavy Goods, 15s. @ 20s. per ton. For other ports proportionate rates. The total number of vessels of all classes in port on Saturday was 747.

The Live Stock Markets last Wednesday were not very freely supplied with Beeves, yet, in the absence of an active inquiry, prices were unchanged save for the best quality, which advanced slightly....Milch Cows were scarce, and were in limited request....Veal Calves, as also Sheep and Lambs, were less abundant, yet not active....Swine continued quiet....The reported receipts of Live Stock during each of the last two weeks compares as follows:

	Week ending June 30.	Week ending July 7.
Beeves	2,941	3,324
Milch Cows	194	183
Veal Calves	879	731
Sheep and Lambs	10,229	8,061
Swine	4,450	3,193

Of the Forty-fourth Street Market supply of Beeves last Wednesday, there were received from

Illinois	1578	Indiana	370
Ohio	657	Kentucky	199

The range of prices according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday was as follows:

Poor to premium Beeves, per pound	$ 6¼	@	$ 9¼
Common to ex. Milch Cows, per head	25 00	@	65 00
Veal Calves, per pound	4	@	6½
Sheep and Lambs, per head	2 50	@	8 00
" " per pound	3½	@	8
Live Swine, per pound	4	@	4½
Dressed " "	4½	@	5½
Roasting Pigs, each	1 00	@	2 00

The Country Produce Markets are rather more active, especially for Fruit. Strawberries have generally disappeared. Raspberries, Blackberries, and Huckleberries are plenty, as are also Gooseberries, Currants, and Cherries. New Apples, Peaches, and Plums are more freely offered....The Potatoes now arriving from Norfolk and Long Island are of a much better quality than the early receipts. Old Potatoes are generally neglected. Cabbages are not as freely offered as they are needed. Cauliflowers have nearly disappeared. Those in market are of a very poor quality. Turnips, Beets, Onions, Tomatoes (chiefly from Norfolk), Beans and Cucumbers are cheaper. Green Peas and Spinach have advanced slightly. Green Corn is in from Charleston. Squashes have appeared from Long Island....Poultry has not varied during the week. Supply, moderate; demand, limited. Woodcock, being much plentier, are decidedly cheaper. Snipe are expected to reappear in market in a few weeks.

WHOLESALE PRICES OBTAINED BY PRODUCERS AT WASHINGTON MARKET.

Gooseberries, per bushel	$1 25	@	$1 75
Cherries, per pound	5	@	10
Currants, per pound	3	@	9
Raspberries, per 100 baskets	3 00	@	9 00
Blackberries, per quart	12	@	15
Huckleberries, per bushel	4 00	@	5 00
Apples, new, per barrel	2 50	@	3 50
Peaches, per bushel	3 00	@	6 00
Plums, per box	4 00	@	5 00
String Beans, per bushel	75	@	1 00
Beans, per bushel	1 00	@	1 75
Potatoes, new, per barrel	3 00	@	5 00
Onions, new, per barrel	2 50	@	3 00
" " per 100 bunches	3 00	@	3 50
Turnips, new, per 100 bunches	1 75	@	2 50
Beets, new, per 100 bunches	2 00	@	4 00
New Carrots, per 100 bunches	2 50	@	3 50
Cabbage, new, per 100	2 00	@	6 00
Squashes, per barrel	2 00	@	2 50
Cauliflowers, per dozen	50	@	2 00
Radishes, per 100 bunches	37	@	62
Green Peas, per bushel	37	@	62
Green Corn, per 100 ears	2 75	@	3 00
Watermelons, per 100	30 00	@	40 00
Nutmeg Melons, per 100	8 00	@	12 00
Tomatoes, per bushel	3 00	@	4 00
Cucumbers, per barrel	3 00	@	4 00
Eggs, per dozen	10½	@	13
Chickens, per pair	50	@	1 25
Fowls, per pound	11	@	14
Fowls, per pair	75	@	1 25
Ducks, per pair	62	@	1 25
Spring Geese, each	1 00	@	1 50
Turkeys, per pound	15	@	—
Pigeons, per dozen	62	@	2 25
Woodcock, per dozen	1 50	@	3 00

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, July 12, 1858.

THE foreign trade of the port for the past week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending July 10, 1858	$2,456,860....	$1,286,382
Corresponding week, 1857	9,215,537....	1,112,879
Increase	....	$173,503
Decrease	$6,758,677

The corresponding week last year was the first clear week after the new tariff went into operation; hence the unusual import entry.

The movement of specie was an export of some $563,000. But, as part of this came out of the Sub-Treasury, it is quite likely that the banks will show little or no falling off to-night; as some parcels of gold came from Boston. The Sub-Treasury balance is five millions and a quarter; the banks showed last week over thirty-three millions and three quarters; total specie—thirty-nine millions.

The course of the stock exchange has been toward increased activity and buoyancy. Toward the close of the week especially this feature was apparent. The following table shows the movement during the week:

New York Central	82¾@84½@85
New York and Erie	17@18¼@19
Reading	44½@46½@46½
Rock Island	73¾@75½@76½
Michigan Southern	21½@22½@22¾
Preferred	42½@44½@44¾
Illinois Central	78@75½@77½
Panama	102@104½@105½
Pacific Mail	77½@78@78¾
Hudson	26¾@27½@28½
Galena	85¾@88@88
Missouris	85@84½@85
Virginias	92½@93@93½
Tennessees	91½@91½@92
La Crosse Land Grants	33½@33@32¾
Toledo	32½@34½@34¾
Delaware and Hudson	98¾@98½@98½
Michigan Central	52@59½@60

ADVERTISEMENTS.

IMPORTANT TO THE LADIES.
THE ONLY EXPANSION SKIRT
TO BE DEPENDED UPON
IN TIMES OF PRESSURE!
THE GREAT ANNOYANCES OVERCOME,
LADIES CHARMED!
GENTLEMEN DELIGHTED!!
CHILDREN IN ECSTACIES!!!
The perils attendant upon wearing the rigid
STEEL HOOP SKIRT,
(By not permitting the garments to be compressed) in case of ACCIDENT BY FIRE, as well as the many difficulties, inconveniences, and too often inelegant displacement of dress, is ENTIRELY OBVIATED
By the use of
WOODWARD'S
PATENT COLUMBIAN SKIRTS AND EXTENDERS.
LADIES WEARING THEM
may, with confidence,
ENTER THE MOST CROWDED ASSEMBLY,
CHURCH, CARRIAGE,
RAILROAD CAR, OR OMNIBUS,
WITHOUT MORTIFICATION TO THEMSELVES OR INCONVENIENCE TO OTHERS.

They may be compressed into the smallest space without breaking or injuring the expansive powers of the springs, while they afford an easy and graceful fall to the drapery in a sitting position, and upon rising immediately resume their wonted shape and beauty, being every way pliable, very COMPRESSIBLE, EXPANSIVE, AND DURABLE.

They are peculiarly adapted for misses' skirts; and, without exception, they form the most reliable and desirable
PROMENADE AND TRAVELING SKIRT
in the world. For sale at his store, No. 329 Broadway, opposite the Broadway theatre, and at his manufactory, No. 196 Fulton Street, New York.

A BOOK FOR THE COUNTRY.

THE FARM; A NEW POCKET MANUAL OF PRACTICAL AGRICULTURE. By the author of "The Garden." Price, paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

This is a manual of both the theory and practice of farming, giving in a concise but clear and simple manner the fundamental principles of Agricultural Science as well as practical directions for cultivating all the common field crops. It contains an exposition of the nature and action of SOILS AND MANURES;
the principles of
ROTATION IN CROPPING;
directions for
IRRIGATION; FENCING;
DRAINING; PLANTING HEDGES; AND SUBSOILING; CULTIVATING THE SOIL.
A Chapter on FARM IMPLEMENTS;
HOW TO PLANT AND CULTIVATE
ALL THE FIELD CROPS, FRUITS, ETC., together with
J. J. THOMAS' INVALUABLE PRIZE ESSAY ON FARM MANAGEMENT,
Revised by the Author.

It is adapted to all sections of the country, and comes within the means as well as the comprehension of everybody. No farmer, and especially no young farmer, should be without it.

The Series of four "Rural Hand-Books" to which this belongs—"The House," "The Garden," "The Farm," and "Domestic Animals"—will be furnished to subscribers ordering them all at the same time for $1. Address
FOWLER AND WELLS, 308 Broadway, New York.

JUST RECEIVED,
PER "PERSIA," JUST RECEIVED,
PIESSE & LUBIN,
HUNGARY WATER.

The specific virtues of Eau de la Reine de Congrie has rendered it justly celebrated in all parts of the world. It was originally distilled, A.D. 1650, by Paracelsus Piesse, the Alchymist and Physician of Transylvania. For two centuries its reputation has steadily advanced, till, at the present time, it has fairly eclipsed all other odorant waters, and that simply from the fact that Hungary Water contains a small portion of Rosemarinus, of which its fragrant competitors are destitute. Now, as it is certain that Rosemary has the power to increase the Memory and invigorate the Brain, as noted by the Bard of Avon,
"There's Rosemary, that's for Remembrance,"
we can not be surprised to learn that Orators, Clergymen, Lecturers, Authors, Poets, give it the preference.
EUGENE DUPUY, Agent, 609 Broadway.

THE "OLD DOMINION" COFFEE POT.

Thousands of this new Coffee Pot have already been sold, and the demand from all parts of the United States is rapidly on the increase. Wherever introduced, it has given the most complete satisfaction.

THE OLD DOMINION COFFEE POT
Makes better coffee than it is possible to obtain in any other way, because, by an ingenious but simple arrangement, the housekeeper may boil her coffee for any length of time without loss of aroma, thus securing all the elements of the coffee in their natural and proportional combinations.

THE OLD DOMINION COFFEE POT
Is manufactured under the patent for the United States by
ARTHUR, BURNHAM & GILROY,
117 & 119 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia.
☞ Also, manufacturers for the United States of ARTHUR'S CELEBRATED PATENT AIR-TIGHT SELF-SEALING CANS AND JARS.
For sale by Dealers in Housekeeping Articles, and Storekeepers generally.

DR. MUNDE'S WATER-CURE AT FLORENCE, MASS. (Three miles from the Northampton Depot). Price for Patients $12 per week.

GODFREY'S EXTRACT OF ELDER FLOWERS.
The sweetest and really the most perfect
BEAUTIFIER IN NATURE.

This admirable preparation of Elder Flowers is very fragrant as a perfume. Elder Flowers have, from the earliest ages, been esteemed as a mild and harmless, yet most perfect beautifier of the Skin. Tan, Sun-burns, Freckles, Redness, &c., it will speedily and completely remove.

CHILDREN.—It is singularly beneficial and perfectly innocuous even to the youngest infant.

SHAVING.—It is valuable beyond any thing, annihilating every pimple and all roughness, rendering the skin soft and firm, preparing it so completely for the razor.

FAMILY LOTION.—Godfrey's Extract of Elder Flowers will be found beyond all praise, and needs only a trial to be approved.
EUGENE DUPUY, Family Chemist,
609 Broadway, N. Y.

A NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE of HARPER & BROTHERS' PUBLICATIONS, with an Index and Classified Table of Contents, is now ready for distribution, and may be obtained gratuitously on application to the Publishers personally, or by letter inclosing SIX CENTS in Postage Stamps.

The attention of gentlemen, in town or country, designing to form Libraries or enrich their literary collections, is respectfully invited to this Catalogue, which will be found to comprise a large proportion of the standard and most esteemed works in English Literature—COMPREHENDING MORE THAN TWO THOUSAND VOLUMES—which are offered, in most instances, at less than one half the cost of similar productions in England.

To Librarians and others connected with Colleges, Schools, &c., who may not have access to a reliable guide in forming the true estimate of literary productions, it is believed this Catalogue will prove especially valuable as a manual of reference.

To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, whenever books can not be obtained through any bookseller or local agent, applications with remittance should be addressed direct to the Publishers, which will be promptly attended to.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, New York.

LEAF AND FLOWER PICTURES, AND HOW TO MAKE THEM. With 8 Colored Illustrations, $1 25.
Containing full directions for the beautiful Art.
ANSON D. F. RANDOLPH,
683 Broadway, N. Y.
Sent by Mail, on receipt of the price.

THE ETERNAL PERFUME,
FROM THE HOLY CITY.
"Oh! could I but catch that fragrance,
I would ask no other fame,
Than that those sweet-scented flowers
Should be coupled with my name!"
Beware of Imitations.
Frangipanni, the Perfume, Frangipanni, the Sachet,
Frangipanni Soap, Frangipanni Oil.
Sole Agent for the United States,
EUGENE DUPUY,
Importer,
609 Broadway.
Sold every where.

KISS-ME-QUICK,
THE FAVORITE PERFUME,
Distilled from Fragrant
——TULIPS——
Kiss-me-quick, the Perfume,
Kiss-me-quick, the Sachet,
Kiss-me-quick Soap.
EUGENE DUPUY, Chemist and Family Druggist,
609 Broadway.

TO ADVERTISERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A MAGNIFICENTLY ILLUSTRATED PAPER,
CIRCULATING IN EVERY SECTION OF THE UNION,
Offers unusual inducements to those who desire to bring their business prominently before the community.

1. Only a limited space is devoted to Advertisements.
2. The character and diffusion of the circulation are unequaled.
3. The Paper is generally preserved for Binding.
4. The Advertising Pages are rendered attractive, and can not escape the attention of the reader.
5. None but the most respectable class of Advertisements are admitted.
6. The charges are not as large, proportionally, as those of any other Weekly or Daily Paper.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for Three Months or more.

TERMS.—Fifty Cents a Line.
HARPER & BROTHERS.

BARNES'S NOTES ON THE NEW TESTAMENT. For Bible Classes and Sunday Schools. Maps and Engravings. 11 vols. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents per Volume. The Volumes sold separately.
On the Four Gospels. 2 vols., $1 50.
On the Acts of the Apostles. 75 cents.
On the Epistle to the Romans. 75 cents.
On the First Epistle to the Corinthians. 75 cents.
On the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, and the Epistle to the Galatians. 75 cents.
On the Epistles to the Ephesians, the Colossians, and the Philippians. 75 cents.
On the Epistles to the Thessalonians, Timothy, Titus, and Philemon. 75 cents.
On the Epistle to the Hebrews. 75 cents.
On the General Epistles of James, Peter, John, and Jude. 75 cents.
On the Revelation. 75 cents.

These valuable Commentaries combine a just proportion of the devotional with the critical. The first rank among Biblical critics has been assigned to Albert Barnes. His fame has become European. "I know of no Commentary," says the Rev. Dr. Cumming of England, "so succinct, full, and impartial. It is fitted to instruct the preacher no less than the Sunday-school teacher. It seems to be his grand effort to unveil solely what 'the Spirit saith to the churches.' I venture to predict that his faithful and lucid comments will find a response in the minds, hearts, and consciences of most Christian readers."

QUESTIONS ON BARNES'S NOTES. 18mo, Muslin, 15 cents per Volume. As follows: VOL. I. On Matthew; II. On Mark and Luke; III. On John; IV. On Acts; V. On Romans; VI. On First Corinthians; VII. On Hebrews.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.—For purifying the blood.—In all cases where the impoverished and depraved condition of the blood is evidenced by eruptions, blotches, or sores, its operation will be found in the highest degree salutary.
Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, No. 100 Fulton Street, cor. William, New York.
Sold also by all respectable Druggists.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

MR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL, "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous Illustrations by the Author, was commenced in the DECEMBER Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. It is printed from early sheets—received from the Author in advance of publication in England—for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.

BULWER'S BRILLIANT ROMANCE, entitled "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?" pronounced to be the masterpiece of this polished, witty, and learned novelist, by special arrangement with the Author, appears in HARPER'S WEEKLY simultaneously with its publication in England.

TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.
One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.
One Copy for Twenty Weeks $1 00
One Copy for One Year 2 50
One Copy for Two Years 4 00
Five Copies for One Year 9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year 20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year . . . 40 00
An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

Volume I. of "HARPER'S WEEKLY," handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $3 50, is now ready.

Muslin Covers are furnished to those who wish their Numbers bound, at Fifty Cents each. TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT. DISCOUNT allowed to Bookbinders and the Trade.

"HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY," when taken together, are supplied at FOUR DOLLARS a year.

Numbers from the commencement of both the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY can still be supplied. Specimen copies furnished gatuitously. Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest Club rates.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" must be paid at the Office where they are received. When prepaid quarterly in advance, the Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty-six Cents a year on the WEEKLY.

Persons residing in the British Provinces will remit, in addition to their Subscription, Thirty-six Cents on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty-six Cents on the WEEKLY, for the American postage.

 Persons living in the City of New York wishing "Harper's Weekly" left at their houses, will please send their names and residences, with the subscription money, to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

NEW YORK SHADE TREES.

J. BULL, JR., Inq. "But, my dear fellow, you know Indeed, it's useless for you to advocate the idea that such specimens of Shade Trees are both useful and ornamental. Now, you know, in Old Hinglund, we've—— UNCLE SAM, JR. 'Look'e here now, Mister! Suppose them Trees had regular leaves, &c., on. It uit take 40 Policemen to each Tree to keep the People from sitting around under 'em. You don't suppose, I hope, that our city authorities are going to hire half a million Officers to watch the Trees, do you? No Sir-ee. Can't stand the expense. Let 'em go to Hoboken, or some other place, if they want to loaf around in the shade."

SCENE AT FASHIONABLE BATHING PLACE.

Mr. SOBDES, having read the advertisement setting forth "That this place of resort is unequaled on the coast for its magnificent Shade Trees," &c., is very much disappointed and disgusted to find they are nothing but dead Hemlocks, or some other kind of bushes, stuck in Tubs, and always current into the Hotel o'nights to prevent the neighbors from stealing them for kindling wood to roast Clams with. Leaves immediately for the tall timber.

IMITATION IS PERHAPS THE TRUEST FORM OF FLATTERY

In a fit of inspiration Mr. Swellington conceives the brilliant idea of adopting the new Flounce-Suspending Fashion to his Trousers; and thus, he says, becomes quite independent of the Crossing-Sweepers.

A HAPPY NOTION.

JOHNNY "Oh, I say, Granma! S'pose you pretend being a little Pony, and I ride about on your back round the Square!" (R. B. Granma feels the heat a good deal!

ADVERTISEMENTS.

GIFTS! GIFTS! GIFTS! GIFTS!—EVANS & CO'S

D. W. EVANS, J. F. PERRYON

GIFT BOOK ESTABLISHMENT.

LAFARGE HOUSE, BUILDING, 671 BROADWAY,

NEW YORK CITY.

FOURTH YEAR OF THE ENTERPRISE.

THE ORIGINATORS OF THE GIFT SYSTEM

Offer to purchasers their Extensive Stock of Books, with RARE INDUCEMENTS.

With every Book a Gift will be presented, ranging in value from twenty-five cents to one hundred dollars. ☞ Seven hundred and fifty dollars worth of Presents, in retail goods, with every thousand dollars worth of Books.

A New Descriptive Catalogue, sixty pages, octavo, just issued—containing all works in request, in every department of History, Biography, Fiction, Philosophy, the Science, Theology, Belles Letters, and Miscellaneous Literature.

SEND FOR A CATALOGUE,

In which will be found a full explanation of the business, liberal inducements to Agents, full list of Books and Gifts. Mailed free to any address.

Orders solicited from the United States and Canadas.

Address EVANS & CO.

677 BROADWAY, New York City.

SINGER'S NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINES.—No other sewing machine for family use ever attained this extent of popularity because of the machine or the perfection and variety of its work. Call and examine it.

I. M. SINGER & CO., 455 Broadway, New York.

THE NEW BOOKS.

Just Out.

LECTURES OF LOLA MONTEZ.

Including her "Autobiography," "Wits and Women of Paris," "Comic Aspect of Love," "Beautiful Women," "Gallantry," &c. Muslin, steel portrait. Price $1.

SECOND.

WOMAN'S THOUGHTS ABOUT WOMEN.

The latest and best work, by the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "Agatha's Husband," "The Ogilvies," "Olive," &c. Issued in muslin. Price $1.

THIRD.

FOLLOWING THE DRUM:

Or, GLIMPSES OF FRONTIER LIFE. Being brilliant Sketches of Recruiting Incidents on the Rio Grande, &c. By Mrs. ELIZABETH L. VIRUS. Muslin. Price $1.

FOURTH.

WHOLE LOVE NEVER DID RUN SMOOTH.

An Eastern Tale in Verse. By THOMAS HARRY ALDRICH, author of "Baby Bell." Elegantly printed, and bound in muslin. Illustrated. Price 50 cents.

Any of these books will be sent by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

RUDD & CARLETON, Publishers and Booksellers,

No. 310 Broadway, New York.

WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES,

345 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Received the highest Premiums awarded, 1857, by the American Institute, N. Y.; Maryland Institute, Baltimore; and at the Maine, Connecticut, Illinois, and Michigan State Fairs.

Send for a Circular, containing Editorial and Scientific opinions, Testimonials from persons of the highest social position, &c.

NAHANT HOUSE.

Located on the Promontory of Nahant, in Massachusetts Bay, within a biscuit toss of the Ocean.

THE MOST HEALTHY POINT IN AMERICA.

This popular establishment, containing accommodations for nearly 1000 guests, is conducted upon a liberal scale in all respects, combining the comforts and sumptuous entertainment with the genuine comforts of a quiet home. NAHANT is conceded to be the most delightful and on the New England Coast, being constantly fanned by a pure ocean breeze, and families desiring a cool retreat from the heat of the city will find every desirable attraction for a pleasant summer home.

HEALTHY SEA SIDE RESORT

N. B.—Gentlemen having business in Boston can take a morning boat to the City, and return to enjoy their evenings on the cool beach without fear of Mosquitoes or blue devils.

Ample facilities provided for sailing, fishing, bathing, and every other desirable recreation and amusement.

Orders by mail or telegraph will receive prompt attention.

J. E. P. STEVENS, Proprietor.

☞ A New York Correspondent, referring to "Nahant," says: "There is no spot along our coast, between the Cape Sables of Nova Scotia and Florida, that will compare with 'Nahant' as a summer retreat. 'Nahant,' as our Bostonitics all know, is a delightful promontory in Massachusetts Bay, within a short sail of Boston, and is consequently favored by a pure sea breeze. Here, within a biscuit toss of the foaming Ocean, is located the celebrated 'Nahant House,' a spacious and elegant hotel, which, under the popular management of that princely caterman, Mr. J. E. P. Stevens, has received the endorsement of the elite of the land. In brief, the 'Nahant' is the summer hotel, par excellence, of the western continent, and therefore pleasure as well as comfort seekers should not fail to make a note of it in their summer note-book."

SINGER'S IMPROVED SEWING MACHINES.—CHECK for all noncombining purposes.—To ascertain the immense superiority of SINGER'S machines, it is only necessary to call at the warerooms and examine a sample which may be seen at any of SINGER & CO.'S Agencies, which will be supplied gratis. In giver full information on the subject.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,

No. 455 Broadway, New York City.

INVENTORS—PATENTS—PATENTEES.

PERSONS desiring to secure patents in the United States or Europe can receive full assistance, free of charge, by addressing MUNN & CO., Editors of the SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN, New York City.

FAMILY SEWING MACHINE DEPOT.

FIFTEEN and FIFTY dollars

SEWING MACHINES.

The Fifteen Dollar Sewing Machine is the best cheap machine ever offered to the Public. Fifteen minutes only required to understand it. The FIFTY Dollar Machine is warranted to excel all other family sewing machines. We challenge the world to produce its equal. WM. THOMAS & CO., 499 Broadway, N. Y.

☞ Agents wanted.

GENTLEMEN THAT SHAVE, wanting a superior article, should use DROUGLISS'S WALNUT OIL MILITARY SHAVING SOAP. Sold by Druggists. JOHN R. VROOM, 75 Cherry St., N. Y.

GODRICH'S BRITISH ELOQUENCE; Select British Eloquence; embracing the best Speeches of the most eminent Orators of Great Britain for the last two Centuries; with sketches of their Lives, an Estimate of their Genius, and Notes, Critical and Explanatory. By CHARLES A. GOODRICH, D. D., Professor in Yale College. 8vo. Muslin, $3.50; Sheep extra, $3 75; Half Calf, $4 50.

In this carefully prepared volume, we have an important contribution to rhetorical literature. Containing the speeches of the great British orators, which are regarded as the masterpieces of their respective authors; a history of the occasions which called forth the events of his public life, and the distinctive characteristics of his oratory; an historical introduction to each of the speeches, explaining the circumstances of the case; the merits of parties, and the exact point at issue; an analysis of the longer speeches in side notes; and a large body of critical and explanatory notes, together with remarks of the passages quoted from foreign historians, critics, and orators, we have the best book of the period to lead forensic eloquence of Great Britain. The copious and valuable annotations and criticisms by the editor make this here a compilation then an original work. The manner in which he has performed his task is a model of accuracy and thorough editorship. He has omitted nothing which the most critical student could demand for the elucidation of the subject in hand, whilst he has never tempted to indulge in superfluous detail. A great deal of valuable matter has been presented in a style, and arranged in a manner, strength, and elegance. It is merry that so much profound philosophy, sound judgment, refined taste, and rigorous exposition, are devoted to the critical preparation for the press of the standard productions of other writers.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid, to any distance in the United States under 3000 miles, on receipt of the Money.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. II.—No. 82.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 24, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

CONTENTS.

I. DR. JOHN W. FRANCIS, WITH A PORTRAIT.
II. EUROPE AGAIN.
III. EMIGRAVIA.
IV. THE LOCOMOTIVE.
V. THE CITY AND COUNTRY HORSE, WITH TWO FINE ILLUSTRATIONS.
VI. TRAVEL NOTES IN BIBLE LANDS, WITH TWO ILLUSTRATIONS.
VII. LITERARY.
VIII. DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.
IX. FOREIGN NEWS.
X. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, OF CINCINNATI, AND THE VINEYARDS OF OHIO, WITH PORTRAIT AND FOUR FINE ILLUSTRATIONS.
XI. MY FIRST AND LAST NOTE.
XII. DULWER'S "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?"—CONCLUDED.
XIII. THE UNITED STATES BLOOD-OF-WAR "MACEDONIAN," WITH AN ILLUSTRATION.
XIV. THE TOMB OF THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON, WITH AN ILLUSTRATION.
XV. MAGGIE GRAY.
XVI. MISCELLANY.
XVII. THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.
XVIII. MARKET AND FINANCIAL REPORTS.
XIX. CORRELATIVES.

DR. JOHN W. FRANCIS.

THE portrait which we present to our readers this week is that of DR. JOHN W. FRANCIS, [DR. whose no resident of the city of New York is, or deserves to be, better known. Dr. Francis has become in some sort an institution—a Knickerbocker institution.

His parents were Germans. His father, Melchior Francis, emigrated from Germany to the United States about the time of the Revolution. The son was born on the 17th November, 1789. As he has said himself, "with the arrival of the news of the French Revolution" he "made his first appearance on this planet." He remembers the arrival of Citizen Genet in the city, and believes that he sang "Ia Carmagnole" before he could command a decent vocabulary of his own tongue. He grew up in the midst of that Franco-American fervor which was the leading feature of American society in the early period of the Republic. Genet, on whom he had gazed with rapture as a child, he subsequently knew intimately as a man; so intimately that to him the French enthusiast confided his vain hope of justification by future ages, and his private passion for the piano.

As an early age young Francis entered upon the usual course of studies at Columbia College, New York. He must have displayed very unusual ability and promise; for shortly after his release from college he was admitted into a partnership with the well-known David Hosack, who was at that time the chief of the medical profession in this city. Partly from this connection, and partly from his own associations, he obtained the entry of the most distinguished society in New York. He stood by the death-bed of Paine, and mourned over the weakness which disgraced the last hours of that eminent man. He had access to the household of Burr and Hamilton, and knew more about their mutual relations and their fatal rencontre than most of the historians who have undertaken to write about them. With the great clergymen of that day he was very intimate. A sincere Christian, Dr. Francis has never been a sectarian: he has made it his business to hear and to know the leaders of religion as well as the leaders of politics, without regard to sect or party. He is as proud of the part he took in throwing open the medical lecture-room to the pioneer of Unitarianism, Dr. Ellery Channing, as he is of his labors on behalf of the Erie Railway. Clergymen, politicians, doctors of medicine, lawyers, and actors—all were welcome acquaintances to Dr. Francis, if they evinced superiority to the rank and file of mankind. He was as great a favorite with the famous clergyman Mason as with the actor Cooke; he went to hear Lorenzo Dow in a backyard with as much pleasure as he attended the performances of Charles Matthews; he sat at the feet of Dr. Mitchell with as much humility as he displayed when he listened to Kean reading the burial-service in the Anglican Liturgy.

He was, has been, and is, in fact, the type of a popular man. There is this in the medical profession above all others: if a doctor wants to make friends, he can do so more easily than a member of any other profession. Sick men open their hearts to their medical adviser. A pain here, there, or elsewhere, expands the mental pores, and quenches for the time the desire to assume unnatural airs. Men who will conceal the truth from banker, lawyer, and parson, will, under the agonizing influence of intestinal contractions or cerebral agitation, think aloud to their medical adviser, if he have the least human sympathy in his composition.

Dr. Francis was the man above all others to avail himself of this professional opportunity. Endowed with a genial many-sided nature, he had sympathy to lecture on the distressed, whatever was their walk in life, and whatever their aim. He knew enough to talk intelligently on science, literature, the fine arts, law, theology, the stage, medicine, and scandal; and his conversation was so engaging—he possessed so thoroughly that soft-dovetying art which is the key to the confidence of one's conversational acquaintance—that every one who knew him regarded him as a personal friend.

For nearly fifty years Dr. John W. Francis has been practicing as a physician in the city of New York. His youthful association with Dr. Hosack introduced him at his first start in life into the very best society, and the acquaintance of the most distinguished men of the time. He has preserved the position which chance allotted to him. For nearly half a century it may be said that no man who was worth knowing has been unknown to Dr. Francis. At a time when most of those who read these lines were unborn, Dr. Francis was so well known, and so universally esteemed, that the first wish of strangers was to make his acquaintance. For a quarter of a century eminent men in every walk of life—foreigners as well as native—have esteemed it a privilege to enjoy a brief conversation with him.

And now, when honors and years have been laden on his shoulders, Dr. Francis obtains and deserves the same homage. He touches upon his seventieth year; but New York contains no young man more sprightly in conversation, quicker in the use of the perceptives, more apt to take, and more prompt to return a jest. In information and anecdote he is unrivaled among us. One needs but to glance at the work which he has just published on the early history of New York to see what a mass of reminiscences he has at command. Of all the eventful scenes through which he has passed, and of all the great men whom he has known, he has forgotten nothing: he can transport us, if he chooses, to the times which are fast passing into oblivion, and make us forget the age of steamboats and railroads by telling us of his attendance upon the long, lank, tire-eyed Fulton, or by recounting the arguments which induced the Common Council of New York, nearly half a century ago, to build the north wall of the City Hall of red stone, because "nobody would be likely to live on that side of the building."

It is pleasant to know that Dr. Francis has been rewarded for his professional labors. Like Lord Jeffrey, he has prosecuted literature and archæology with marked success, but he never suffered either to interfere with his professional pursuits. Though he has been conspicuous in the establishment of almost every literary and scientific institution of which New York can boast, he never neglected a patient for the sake of his beloved recreations; and though, when he is dead, he shall be honored as one of the earliest, most discriminating, and most faithful patrons of art, letters, and history in the country, he will be as gratefully remembered by his own profession for his treatises on obstetrics, croup, and deaths by lightning.

Kind and gentle—the type of the Christian philosopher, as Kane was the type of the Christian knight—Dr. Francis stands alone, almost the sole survivor of that choice band of great men who fashioned and shaped the American mind before the present working generation was born. One realizes Benjamin Franklin in hearing him converse. He would say himself that he represents that very notorious individual—the oldest inhabitant.

Latterly, Dr. Francis has been indispensable to every public occasion in this city. One naturally looks for his tawby head and good-humored face on the platform on every occasion of municipal festivity, and at every literary or scientific celebration. To do him justice, he is seldom locked for in vain on these occasions. He is as patient a listener as he is a willing and amusing speaker; his applause is generally the first which strikes the ear of a young orator, his compliment the most gratifying that he receives. We can say of Dr. Francis, what perhaps can not be said of any other prominent man in the country, that, though he talks much, well, and wittily, no unkind speech has ever been quoted against him. May he long live to remind us of the great men of other days, and to set a noble example of liberal scholarship, solidity of mind, and simplicity of heart to the young men of our own!

DR. JOHN W. FRANCIS.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

JENNY'S CRADLE.

BY FREDERICK LOCKER.

AY, here is your cradle! Why surely, my Jenny,
Such slender dimensions go somewhat to show
You were an exceedingly small pic-a-ninny
Some nineteen or twenty short summers ago.

Your baby-days flow'd in a much-troubled channel;
I see you as then in your impotent strife—
A tight little bundle of wailing and flannel,
Perplex'd with that newly-found fardel called life.

To hint at an infantine frailty's a scandal;
All by-gones are by-gones—and somebody knows
It was bliss such a baby to dance and to dandle,
Your cheeks were so velvet—so rosy your toes.

Ay, here is your cradle! and Hope, a bright spirit,
With Love now is watching beside it, I know;
They guard o'er the nest you yourself did inherit
Some nineteen or twenty short summers ago.

It is Hope gilds the future, Love welcomes it smiling;
Thus wags this old world, therefore stay not to ask,
"My future bids fair, is my future beguiling?"
If mask'd, still it pleases, then raise not its mask.

Is life a poor coil some would gladly be doffing?
He is riding post-haste who their wrongs will adjust;
For at most 'tis a footstep from cradle to coffin—
From a spoonful of pap to a mouthful of dust.

Then smile as your future is smiling, my Jenny!
I see you, except for that infantine woe,
Scarce changed since you were but a small pic-a-ninny:
Your cheek is still velvet—pray what is your toe?

Ay, here is your cradle! much, much to my liking,
Though nineteen or twenty long winters have sped;
But, hark! as I'm talking there's six o'clock striking,
It is time JENNY'S BABY should be in its bed!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 24, 1858.

THE FRAZER'S RIVER GOLD-FIELDS.

THE latest advices from California confirm the accounts previously received of the richness of the gold-fields in the Hudson's Bay territory, on the Gulf of Georgia, of which we gave in our last number an illustrated description. It seems that, after a certain amount of labor, miners in that region can count upon realizing some $40 @ $50 a day by gold-digging; and this with very imperfect apparatus and machinery. Men who have not delved in the beds of streams, but who have merely dug in the soft earth by their borders, have made $10 @ $12 a day without difficulty. With the improved machinery which has been contrived in California this yield would, undoubtedly, be largely increased. Under the circumstances, one can understand the furor which has seized upon the mining population of California, and which, we are told, is inducing every fourth male in that State to emigrate to the new gold-fields.

New Caledonia, the district in which the new gold discoveries have been made, is a tract of country but little known to geographers. It forms the western portion of the Hudson's Bay Company's territory, and lies between the Gulf of Georgia and the Cascade Mountains. The Frazer River, its principal stream, rises in the Rocky Mountains, near the sources of the Canoe River, a branch of the Columbia, between latitude 55° and 56° N., and runs in a southerly and westerly direction toward the Gulf of Georgia, receiving on the way the waters of the Stuart's, Chilcotin, Pinklitsa, Thompson's, and Quesnel's rivers—tributaries which drain some of the many lakes with which the interior country abounds. In latitude 49° the Frazer River breaks through the Cascade hills, and here are formed a succession of rapids, which impede navigation. From these rapids to the river's mouth is a distance of seventy miles. The entire length of the river is four hundred miles. The country adjoining the lower section of the river is hilly, the shores being, however, low and marshy. The soil of this part is thin and poor; making tolerable pasture land, but not fitted for profitable tillage. Beyond the Cascades the entire region is very much broken up, and full of marshes, small lakes, and insignificant streams. Ross states that the attempts of traders to raise vegetables and fruits on the shores of the Frazer River invariably failed. Numerous berries are found growing wild; and on these, and salmon, which abound in the river at certain seasons, the Indians chiefly subsist. The country is known to contain coal in considerable quantities, and of good quality, cropping out of the hills, and easily attainable; cobalt, iron, marcasites of a gold color, and a fine black marble.

The fauna of this region are very limited. The rein-deer, red-deer, and jumping-deer; a marmot, beaver, bears, lynxes, foxes and rabbits comprise the whole. The Indian dogs are of the Esquimaux species.

The Indians are divided into various small tribes; are of middle size, with good features; but are hopelessly lazy and dirty, great thieves and liars, and treacherous and inhuman to the last degree. They persecute and torture widows and widowers, making them slaves for a term of three or four years; and have a singular custom, verging on cannibalism. Their medicine-men spend several weeks in each year in a secluded wood, fasting, and on their return to the camps are permitted to satisfy their frantic hunger by tearing pieces of flesh from the bodies of living members of their tribes. Ross saw many unfortunates who had been maimed for life by this horrible practice.

Ross and Dunn state that April and May are two delightful months; in June, there are incessant rains; in July and August, intolerable heats; in September, fogs so dense that nothing can be done out-doors before ten o'clock, and the inhabitants suffer much, in consequence, from colds and rheumatism; in October, the heavy frosts begin; and by November the lakes and streams are frozen over for the season—that is, until next April. The mercury, however, rarely falls lower than 15° below zero of Fahrenheit; and the cold is stated to be much more endurable than would be supposed. The snow is seldom over twenty-four inches deep on the ground. The season for salmon-fishing extends from the middle of July to October. Other edible animals and wild fowl are very scarce; and for that reason this season is a grand holiday for the Indians.

Such is the country into which the ardent gold-seekers of California are rushing by thousands. It is clear that the precious dust must exist in considerable quantities, and of easy access, before the miners can be satisfactorily repaid for their labors in so inhospitable a clime.

As for means of access to the new gold-fields, those who start from San Francisco will probably make the tedious voyage through the straits of Fuca. Those going by way of Oregon have a shorter cut. They can proceed in boats up the Cowlitz, which empties into the Columbia at Monticello. From the head of the Cowlitz to Fort Nisqually, at the bottom of Puget's Sound, there is a very tolerable portage road of seventy miles, which has been already some years in use. This course cuts off a great distance, and will save much time to anxious miners.

The Hudson's Bay Company perseveres in its assertion of its exclusive right to trading in that region. It suffers and encourages emigration; but it reserves to itself the right of supplying the miners with all the necessaries of life. According to the terms of its charter—which, it need hardly be said, contemplated nothing beyond a trade with the Indians for furs—all trade and commerce within the territory of the Company must be carried on by the Company, and by none others. The officials at Vancouver's Island are making the most of this privilege. If they have time enough, they will turn the trade in gold, and the means of getting it, into as close a monopoly as the trade in peltries. Unfortunately for them, the British Government is also awake to the importance of the new discoveries. While a British ship of war has gone to Vancouver's Island to strengthen the hands of the Hudson's Bay Company's Governor, the British Government are now decided not to renew the Company's charter, but to resume possession of the gold country.

CLOSE OF THE UTAH WAR.

WE have news from Salt Lake City confirming the rumors of the desertion of the Mormons. By this time it is in possession of the United States army under General Johnston, and the flock of Brigham Young are scattered throughout the settlements of the South, from Provo downward. There is no fighting to be done; all the military preparations of the Latter Day Saints are thrown away. Our army must resign itself to a postponement of the glory that might have resulted from a successful onslaught on the Mormons; General Johnston must be content with his Brevet Brigadier-Generalship.

Two facts remain. The first, the cost of the expedition; the second, the ultimate disposal of the Mormons.

Let us thank Providence that the Mormons have been more cheaply disposed of than the Seminoles. Forty millions the latter cost the people of the United States, making no allowance for the valuable lives lost in the everglades and swamps of Florida. Less than half that sum, say seventy-five cents per head for the entire white population of the country, or something like four dollars for each adult white male, will probably free us from the Mormons. The country is so prosperous, and we are all so ready to part with our money, that the tax may not be severely felt. As, however, it will have to be paid, and as people generally would rather not throw away even four dollars if they could help it, it will be well for the Government to consider the expediency of preventing the recurrence of such accidents as this Mormon rebellion. Every body understands that the Mormon resistance to the United States authorities was simply an incident of, and a pretext for, the quarrel. The real issue between the United States and the Mormon people turned on the institutions of the latter. Had they been Christians, there would have been no trouble; had we recognized Mormonism and polygamy as lawful institutions, we should have sent no army across the plains. Disguise it as we may, the fact is undoubted that the United States made war upon the Mormons because their domestic institutions were deemed inconsistent with the organization of the confederacy, and the wholesome growth of self-governing communities on United States territory. The lesson is clear; it is for the General Government, and for the leading politicians of the country, to profit by it.

What is to be the destination of the Mormons? They have gone south, we are told. How far south? If they are still in United States territory, the work is but half done. Their abandonment of Salt Lake City proves that they do not intend to relinquish their principles. They have not recanted Mormonism, one of the essential doctrines of which is a system of theocratic governance utterly at variance with the rules of the United States respecting Territorial Governments. So long as they remain on the soil of the United States, and remain firm in their faith, the question at issue will remain unsettled. Even if they cross the frontier and settle in the northern regions of Mexico, the quarrel will be revived at an early day. Arizona and Sonora are destined to as sudden and as thorough a development as California received. There is reason to believe that the auriferous and argentiferous range which lies on the frontier of the United States and Mexico, toward the Pacific, far surpasses any thing yet discovered either in California or Australia. Some day its treasures will suddenly come to light, and there will be a rush of population thither. That all the territory worth having—in Mexico—will be speedily annexed, is too clear to need demonstration. What if the Mormons happen to be settled there?

The real question between the Mormons and ourselves is, Whether a theocratic government and polygamy can be domiciled on United States territory? Till that question is settled, all compromises will prove illusory. It is cheapest policy for our people to take the bull by the horns at once, and settle the question one way or the other.

A NEW YORK INSTITUTION.

WITHIN the past week the public of this city have been amazed by the disclosures which have followed the arrest of one Dawson, the keeper of one of the vilest resorts of the vilest characters in the city. We can not enter into all the details which have been published in the daily papers respecting this Dawson, his abode, and his practices. Suffice it to say that it was established on the preliminary inquiry before the Mayor that this fellow's den realized the most terrible stories of ogres which we have all read in our youth; that the unhappy girls who served to attract customers to his bar were close prisoners, were never suffered to go out of his house, and, when they expressed a wish for fresh air, were brutally beaten and kicked by Dawson.

When this monster was arrested, it is said that he made light of the affair. He had, he confessed, several dance-houses in various parts of the city, all of which were conducted on his peculiar principles. He had money in the bank, and real estate in good localities. He knew what it was to be arrested—having suffered that fate on twenty odd occasions, and he was not in the least disconcerted. He regarded the accident as one of the necessary inconveniences of his lucrative calling. So, having engaged counsel (ex-Judge Phillips), he prepared himself with due philosophy to abide the result; promising himself to resume his avocation with renewed vigor when he should have got over his present little scrape.

No comment is necessary; but it is well that some memorandum of such "institutions" should be placed on record.

HOW MUCH IT COSTS TO FLOG A WOMAN.

THE captain of a steamboat plying on the Mississippi was lately arrested at the suit of a woman, who charged him with whipping her with a whip. It appeared on the trial, that the woman had been the mistress of the captain; that he had seduced her when he was a married man; that his wife having died, he married again, in spite of the remonstrances of his mistress, and in the teeth of her threats, openly expressed to the lady who became his second wife, that she would leave her no peace; that this mistress, having borne him a child, was in the habit of calling on him for money for its support; finally, that, having called on him, as usual, with her infant in her arms, he went out, called for a whip, was brought a carriage whip, and with this flogged the woman and child away from his door, leaving the marks of the weapon on their bodies. For this the magistrate at Cincinnati, where the scene occurred, sentenced the captain to pay a fine of EIGHT DOLLARS!

We thus learn the market value of brutality at Cincinnati. In the dark ages which preceded the Reformation the priests were in the habit of selling absolution for sins past and future, and had tariffs in their churches on which the price of each sin was regularly quoted. For so much one could insult a young girl; for so much rob a house; for so much kill a troublesome neighbor. We have none of these price-currents at hand; but we will venture to say, that the cheapest among them charged more for brutality and ruffianism than seems to be the market cost of these luxuries in the West.

The most curious feature in this decision is its inconsistency with the spirit of our legislation and the administration of criminal justice in the United States. The laws in this country for the protection of the female are, in general, more stringent than those of any other country in the world. In most States seduction and adultery are criminal offenses, exposing the offender to indictment by a Grand Jury. This is not the case in most European countries. We have felt, here, that the destroyer of female virtue was a public enemy. But public sentiment has not been satisfied with the severity of the written code, and the jury system has largely increased the safeguards which surround the domestic circle. Experience has proved that the injured husband or father may, on discovery of his wrong, wreak his vengeance on the wrong-doer in his own way—to any extent. Throughout the length and breadth of the land there is not a jury that will find a bill against a man who avenges the wrong of his wife, sister, or daughter, by taking the life of the seducer. Recent cases in New York, Pennsylvania, and Louisiana, place the matter beyond dispute; the seducer's life is at the mercy of the nearest male relative of the woman he has wronged. Such being the state of public feeling, the decision at Cincinnati seems actually astonishing.

It was urged on behalf of the Mississippi captain that his cast-off mistress had wearied him with her importunities. She had a right to do so. She had ruined herself for him; the annoyance of her repeated visits was small in comparison with what she suffered—ignominy, disgrace, blighted prospects, a life of inevitable obscurity, toil, and sorrow. If she had called every day on the captain, and daily exposed him to the reproaches of his wife and the jeers of his friends, his suffering would have been infinitesimally small in comparison with hers. And why should he seek to throw the entire burden of their mutual crime on her?

It is to be hoped that this unfortunate woman may secure the aid of some lawyer who shall obtain from a higher court a reversal of the iniquitous decision to which we have referred. It is of special moment that the pains and penalties of loose indulgence of the passions should be clear and inevitable. The whole country is interested in their certainty and severity. The freedom which our young men enjoy is shared by their sisters; if seduction is to go unpunished, there is no safety for any circle of society. We must either adopt the French plan of locking up unmarried girls, or pursue our own method, of letting men pursue their own inclinations at their own cost. So far as appears, the temper of the public at the present time is in favor of the latter alternative; even the most conservative and law-abiding men justify the homicide of the seducer or adulterer; and, by parity of reason, vindicate the persecution of either by the unhappy woman who has been their victim.

CANCEMI'S CASE.

CANCEMI, the murderer of policeman Anderson, who has twice been found guilty and twice been sentenced to death, will probably be saved once more by the Court of Appeals. On his trial, as every body will recollect, a juror was withdrawn, and the case proceeded, and a verdict was found by eleven jurors. The law requires that a man who is sentenced to capital punishment shall have been found guilty by the unanimous verdict of twelve jurors. If Cancemi, therefore, should be executed under his present sentence, it would be murder.

He must, therefore, be tried again—at what risk to justice, and what expense to the State, can easily be imagined. Under the circumstances, does it not devolve on the Courts to take some measures with regard to the counsel whose intercourse with the discharged juryman, and whose silence on the subject thereof when the jury was impanneled, were the direct cause of this last failure of justice?

THE New York Times the other day accused us, rather discourteously, of "forging a pretended quotation" from the Times. In reply, we gave the date of the paper from which our quotation was taken, and republished the passage somewhat more at length. We ventured to improve the occasion by recommending the gentlemen who are conducting the Times in Mr. Raymond's absence to read their own paper.

The Times is, however, unrepentant. It says that our quotation is > "an extract from the letter of an 'Occasional Correspondent,' writing from Washington, who, among other oddities, expressed certain extraordinary opinions about the editor of the Herald, which were allowed to pass for what they were worth."

We are very sorry to use such language in reference to the New York Times; but this is disingenuous and untrue. The "letter of an Occasional Correspondent" was written by one of the regular writers for the Times, in the discharge of his salaried duties, was submitted to, and received the sanction of the editor-in-chief. To pretend that the Times's responsibility for such an article could be evaded by printing at its head "Washington, D. C.," is rather a good joke. It resembles the defense of the thief who, having directed his son to pick a pocket, pleaded on his trial that he had given the order in so low a voice that he was surprised the boy heard him.

THE LOUNGER.

THE DUDLEY OBSERVATORY.

(In a difference like the one now pending between the Trustees and the Scientific Council of the Dudley Observatory there may very fairly be different opinions; and as the Weekly desires in all questions to be perfectly impartial, although it has expressed its own view of the disputes very frankly, the Lounger willingly inserts the following letter, evidently written before a perusal of the Weekly's leader of last week.)

DEAR LOUNGER,—Two years ago Mr. Everett made one of his most elaborate speeches at the inauguration of the Astronomical Library. The American Association for the Advancement of Sciences were engaged at the time in their annual dinners, suppers, and excursions, and created among that pleasant old Dutch town. A wealthy lady had given $10,000 to aid the research in astronomy. Other liberal Albanians gave of their superfluity. They ordered meridian circles and transit instruments. Professor Gould, in his forceful and excellent remarks presiding the oration of Mr. Everett, stated, for instance, that the Treasury, by advice of the Council, "had given to that new and exquisitely beautiful meridian circle the honored name of Olcott." * * * Not that the name needed the chisel, but that the Trustees felt it due to themselves to find some outlet for their overflowing admiration and respect." The accord between the Scientific Council and the Trustees was perfect. The gentleman of the "honored name of Olcott" declared that he and his fellow-trustees were willing "to take or serve with a library, a Library, a Bache, and a Gould, as the only chance of immortal suffering ourselves in this world." Five thousand people assembled to applaud Mr. Everett's oration. The day was auspicious—the promise of success was brilliant—it was a feast of reason. It has become immediately the fashion for patriotic citizens wishing to do good privately to appear in print as donors of odd thousands of dollars to the Dudley Observatory. American Science smiled as the Future promised to remove the skepticism that clouded its fame.

Ohimè! exclaimed the ancient Romans upon occasions of unlucky surprises. Ohimè! exclaim we tout cela! cry the modern French. The golden lips drip no more honey of eloquence; the "honored name of Olcott" is threatened with ill-starred eclipse; and the shock of battle between the financial and scientific guardians of the Observatory resounds through the land.

It seems that the Trustees of the honored name supposed that the meridian circle to which his name was given was a kind of improved telescope, and he "pointed" for the moment to the star. The astronomer-in-chief, should look through it and give new worlds to Albany as Galileo once said to have done to Castile and Leon. But Dr. Gould being one of the most accomplished of living astronomers—having studied with profound application under the most eminent scientific men of Europe—returning to be employed upon our Coast Survey—establishing at his own risk an astronomical journal of the highest character and excellence, which has become a standard—and finally, by scientific men selected in all America to prove the results of Lieutenant Gillis's Chili Expedition—being, in fact, the person best fitted in every way for the position of chief astronomer, Dr. Gould went to work like a man of science, and understands that in an observatory precision and accuracy are the Alpha and Omega—went to work in a way to give the Dudley Observatory a permanent place among the best observatories of the world—and declined to contemplate the Bache and through the meridian circle, declaring that it would defeat the essential purpose of the institution to turn it into a nursery and lounging-room for amateur gentlemen and ladies who wished to look at the moon through a big window.

Thence arose "differences" and "charges"—until the whole country is interested in the debate. The citizens of Albany have held a meeting to express their confidence in Dr. Gould, and their surprise at the treatment he has received. The scientific and personal character have been assailed. His manner and general conduct have been declared offensive—and the Trustees of the honored name, who panted for the celestial sights that were to be seen through the meridian circle, and who wished to arrest at least seven of the eight clocks needed in scientific observation and calculation—as "coram populo," publicly rebuked the unpleasant capacity of Dr. Gould!

Now there may be an honest difference of opinion as to the uses of an observatory between scientific men and gentlemen who know nothing of science. The latter may very reasonably and very decidedly desire to make up little picnic parties to cheer the loneliness of the astronomer at his work and to look through the telescopes or the meridian circles at their pleasure. But, on the other hand, how would they like to have select parties of scientific gentlemen, with their friends, strolling into their consulting-room and asking to see the last results of absurd questions, at the very closing hour of the day? Do they think that business requires constitude, silence, and privacy, or does it not? Why, then, should they not naturally suppose that as they probably understand a thousand times better than scientific men the necessary methods and requirements of the consulting-house, so these men better comprehend the proper conditions of an observatory?

The breach is apparently irreparable. Either the Trustees who differ with the Scientific Council must resign, and give their places to be filled by others, or they must persist in their removal of the Scientific Council. But before they do the latter, ought they not well to consider that in Professors Henry, Bache, Peirce, and Gould they have the best men eminent in their departments upon this continent? Have they a moral right to sacrifice the scientific reputation of the country to a point of personal difference which has nothing to do with science? Respectfully, X.

LECTURERS.

The Superior Court of Ohio has lately decided that public lecture fees are taxable, and that it is due it all their own way. The patience of the public is gradually worn out in matter of lectures. They are thrust upon it every winter, and it bears and bears the infliction wonderfully. It actually seems to enjoy them, as it does war. It has been borne to lay traps in the hottest days of summer to catch lectures to be consumed on the coldest winter nights. Every autumn, newspapers of an extreme sagacity declare that the thing has about run out, and that the suffering public has had enough. The sagacious journals compliment the public, and congratulate it upon having had the privilege to get all made up out of encyclopedias and reviews. But, despite these mortifying truths, the public is insatiable, and the lecturer is undaunted.

The purveyors for the public, however, consult that appetite they serve very carefully. They understand that the great gourmand must have its morsels luxurious and fresh. It doesn't wish to see the joint that the cook expected to be eaten for a month. No old vegetables are welcome. Last year's bones are sent with confidence to the ear of lectures to the palate of the carnivore.

A popular lecture was engaged by the Cincinnati Mercantile Library Association for the winter season, on the 19th of last January, for one hundred dollars, and on the 20th, 21st, and 22d of the previous November he came to the city and delivered lectures. When, therefore, the 19th of January arrived, the Association was ready to hear the lecture or to pay for it. The lecturer sued for the amount of his fee. The famous orator, "Tom Corwin," was retained by the Mercantile Library. They did not deny the contract, but they submitted it to a jury. The jury, unassisting to an understanding, between the Lyceum and the lecturer, that he will not injure the success of their enterprise by delivering the same lecture nearly, and spoiling the market. The lecturer denied this—and lost his suit.

Such an understanding, under certain limits, seems undoubtedly exist. But still, it is clear that a lecturer might engage to deliver a discourse in a city without prejudice to his right to engage also with another, provided he has not expressly contracted. Of course the understanding would prevent his delivering the same lecture, except by well understood engagement, in the immediate vicinity of the actually settled outside the courts. We believe it is the fixed practice of the Lyceum that it has come to open legal debate.

There is another question in the ethics of lectures which has been often discussed by courtesans. When a lecturer starts in good season to fulfill his engagements, and comes to a morning-train, or flood, or some other insurmountable delay interferes, so that he arrives but an arrive—is he to receive nothing because he arrives after the hour? This would seem to be a fair case of compromise, and has been generally so decided.

However, as we shall soon be told that the lecture-fever has almost died out, why should we agitate such questions?

THE POET.

(What the young man said to the young woman who asked him if he liked poetry.)

WHEN the leaf says in the wood,
What the water says in the sea—
The song of the summer solitude,
The song of the free—

The secret of heaven's bliss,
Thought that to mortals belong,
Hopes that make each day new,
Are nothing to me.

I caught his long and fat:
I said, Shall we meet at last?
Art thou a wingèd thing?
Or a meaner blasting past?

Give me a sign, I said,
To hang my hope upon—
They showed me their pot-lead,
With a laurel crown.

THE ILLINOIS RICHMONDS.

A POLITICAL spectacle, such as has been very rarely presented, is now offered to the country in Illinois. The two Democratic parties in the candidates of their respective parties for the United States Senate, and they have canvassed nearly the whole State. Slumping is common enough; but a standard candidate never stumps; and the point of the present matter is, that these two men, both of them of unquestionable ability, propose to discuss the most important and fundamental political principles before the people of the State.

This would can to more genuinely democratic than this. Nothing can be more undemocratic than the spirit of our institutions. Such a course fully accords with the principles of the people and with the very foundations of all republican government. Why should not candidates for office discuss them in a course? Candidates for high offices are not always speakers; but when they are so, they can not represent the people too thoroughly with their views. And the more all primary political movements are made directly by the people, the more truly democratic and satisfactory our government will be found. Such a course disturbs the despotic usurpation of caucuses, conventions, "wire-pulling and grog-shop; but it restores the rule to the people.

* "The children of Alice call Bartram father."—ELIA.

Already the debate is commenced in Illinois. Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Douglas have each addressed thousands of people in Chicago. Their speeches will go over the land. They speak not for themselves and for their own State only, but for all intelligent American citizens; and as the discussion goes on through the summer all these intelligent citizens will cry, "God speed the right!"

A PEER FOR TOADS.

"SIR,—I should like to know whether you mean me by your scurrilous and uncalled-for remarks upon toadeaters? Because, if you do, I shall be compelled to call out an English gentleman who comes to see us. Can't you find a subject to write about without insulting me in a new paper? Sir, you're useless.

"Yours, respectfully,
"THOMAS WEBSTER."

MR. WEBSTER,—In the same steamer came two other English gentlemen with those you have in mind. Both of them like their countries better than they like ours. Both of them like their wives best in their own country, and were taken to see the curiosities. It is all right and pleasant. It is also very desirable there should be many a foreign Englishman who is titled. But when, out of all the gentlemen arriving, so introduced, so wined and dined and fêted, you single out the one who is not a gentleman, most modest, and entirely undistinguished, and are selected by publicly announcing as being taken here, as introduced there, and a thousand times worse else, it is for the simple reason that they are the Lords. And you were equally unprincipled and merely Misters, nothing of the kind would be said. You would be suffered to travel quietly like other gentlemen.

You may be as polite as you please, Mr. Webster, and that politeness will shortly look as and admire your graceful suavity, and learn to repeat it. But it will not be the manner that you think, however large and pulpy, he will publicly call attention to the fact; because toad-eating is a poisonous business, and no wise community ought to be warned.

Good-morning, Mr. Thomas Webster.

AGIOGCHOOSH.

WHOEVER is going to the White Mountains, of which the above crappy word is the descriptive, Indian name, will find the "White Mountain Guide," published by Mr. Eastman, in Concord, New Hampshire, one of the best of traveling companions. It is not only tells you where to go, and how to go, and what to see, but it contains some admirable descriptions from picturesque poets, and is so compact as to be easily slipped into the coat pocket. The White Mountains are our most frequented sensation resort, and although the scenery sometimes crave a more awful attitude, that the mind may have the frisson of mountains, of which Byron and Scott have made us familiar, comparable from bare, eternally snowy, and cloudcapped ranges, yet the White Hills are very beautiful as picturesque, and as accessible, that the traveler may well go to them to rehearse Switzerland.

DICKINS.

ALMOST at the same time with the circulation in this country of the report that Mrs. Charles Dickens is separated from her husband on account of his injury in the railway accident, there came a card from Mr. Dickens himself, stating that the society of the separation were known only to his family. He said:

"Some domestic trouble of mine, of long standing—to which I will make no further remark than that it claims to be respected as being of a sacredly private nature—has lately been brought to an arrangement, which involves no question of right of any kind, and the whole origin, progress, and surrounding circumstances of which have been, throughout, within the knowledge of my children. It is amicably composed, and its details have now but to be carried into execution in confidence.

For any honest mind ought that not to be sufficient? A domestic tragedy has befallen a man whose name every door to the world—discussions gossips invent circumstances and reasons—he is tortured and driven to speak of the matter to the public, and he does so, saying that the affair is scrupulously private and has been composed amicably, without anything to tell. For once people read honestly and eat avowal his seemed to stop the mouth of rumor. But no sooner was the fresh explanations have been volunteered by newspaper correspondents, who, of course, are fully informed of the whole matter, than to whom Mr. Dickens has undoubtedly repaired, to make a full confession of the circumstances. And now he says that he says all that a man could say to any but his most intimate friends. But what is all that, compared with the probability of his repeating now the lessons of foreign correspondents, and pouring his story into their ears?

The last story of these broken friends of Mr. Dickens, who—as one of his own characters would say—"has got the best of the title reversed"—is that he kept in a London chop-house—oh no, certainly not—is, in fact, the head of a large intellectual establishment, but that he had very much injured his reputation by the separation.

Now, we are ready for such gossip, except in the writer's or speaker's sense of honor. The secret of the tragedy is known to the private circle concerned. It is most sternly none of our business: and it did not need the card of Dickens to prove it. Nobody has ever thought personally, but in his books—that whatever has been done has been done calmly and wisely, however reluctantly and painfully: and his influence, therefore, will be as little affected by this separation as it would have been by any other grievous misfortune.

APOLOGIES FOR SLANDER.

LAST week the Lounger spoke of the unjustifiable use of names made by committees and others in public meetings. Since then, Mr. Bellew, who lately had an illustration of a much more serious and disastrous license. The name of a clergyman was printed in some of the most respectable newspapers in the city as a hypocrite and villain. There was no proof. "It is rumored," and "it is said," were the grounds upon which the calumny was published. It was the most wanton and melancholy injury to a man whose life, upon investigation, turns out to be entirely innocent.

The usual dodges to half-escape express their regrets. So they might if the editor had shot a man in the street. But suppose some journal should state that some reputable citizen—say that name—had been detected stealing in his neighbor's house, and that it was known to be a habit or a check, and it should prove to be an utter fabrication. How satisfactory an apology would it be, and suppose the gentleman sues for slander—suppose he recovers damages—every lady knows that a certain stain changes to half-mourning. And for every reason that the public knows nothing about the case, the public will be sure to think that there couldn't have been so much smoke without some fire.

If a paper should print in the largest type that there were unpleasant rumors afloat in Washington, to the effect that President Buchanan had been seen picking General Cass's pocket, it would be the President no harm, because nobody would believe it. But when the only hope of the public lies of a person is that he is accused of forgery, or of a love-affair, or of the association of the person's name and the imputed crime, that it might be—and not overthy the situation of journals whether an apology were the equivalent for suggesting the suspicion to the public.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

"DEAR LOUNGER,—At the arrives in the August Number of the Knickerbocker, I find a letter from the Women of Homer, by the author of 'The Potipher Papers.'

—No. It is by Professor North, of Hamilton College, New York.

"DEAR LOUNGER,—At Nothing to Wear first appeared in Boston, and really, you must positively inform me whether Miss Peck is the author of Mr. Brown's new poem, which I intend to advertised as following. Your obedient servant,

"SUSAN'S BOSOM."

—The Lounger is unhappily not the only confidence of the poet. He can only refer his correspondent to the lady who is engaged in the arduous task of determining what were Shakespeare; and hopes sincerely that Mr. Butler will not fall into the lack of which Mr. Smith attended the advent of his first celebrated poem.

—J. S. M. sends the Lounger three sheets full. Why did he not consider the enemies before he did it? Let him look upon the Sphinx. Let him reflect upon those observations which the Lounger must make upon topics of current and general interest, and then ask himself—Should I like to put his brute—to bother his thinks he ought to have three hundred-dollar prizes—giving vacation—and if he went to see Judge Peter Pawerpay, and the Judge's daughter, and he put the Lounger—or his works with clever and—in the paper.

"Your representative I carefully put up into a prepossession rat, and, as you know, I was too much enough to inject your fine look. I would not crash you into a Democratic paper, but I am sure about to put you in my street-coat pocket, and I was sure you would come, and make your short stay there rather a retirement of pleasure than temporary confinement. Take this pretty little six hundredth which Miss — presented me with, and I replied to you as soon as my eyes are called in it; now you are in a palace that a king might envy, and what more can I do for gentlemen to avoid knock in vain."

Proceeding in a frame of mind which bears "a gentle breeze sighing among the trees," he reaches the Judge's residence. He is a gentleman who sings—as Lowell says of the other day—

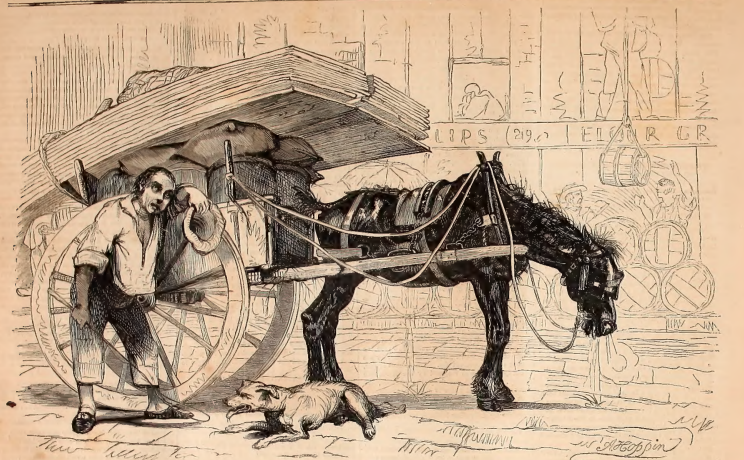
"Freedom's dearer to my heart
Than any thing I know,
Except, may be, my little girl
Whenever I may go."

It seems that he has a "partisan" but a poet, and a puter. His daughter, Miss Polly, desired her father to send his poetry to the Lounger before she left home. She left. For some reason Polly, and what is the offspring of such likely to be?

SMILING MORN.

BY CHARLES PETER MORNPAY.

O'er the mountain tops the first golden rays of morning
Are softly shining,
The merry singing lark still is soaring in the sky,
The gentle breezes through the trees are playing,
Dropping dew pearls from their lips without a sigh;
All is around us fresh, and even the trees is purpling,
Purely bid from view with a flowery veil,
And near a mountain stream are the rocks is leaping
To its tuneful murmur where the fishes play.



Smiling morn, smiling morn, we greet thee,
With you thoughts of beauty are born;
Oh, smiling morn, we greet thee,
Smiling morn, smiling morn, smiling morn!

"Smiling morn" is a good title, as Touchstone says, but there may be too much, etc.

—V. DE V. it is not poetry. It is simply prose chopped into lines, and those not rhythmical or musical. Why will you be failing it against the very well told. You would be sorry to see it in print.

—AMIGOS, who writes from "Scrimption City, New South Wales, at the fall of the moon, 1126," ought to remember that Universities are of slow growth, and that the glory of Commencement is to brief an intoxication that he should not add to the misery of the subsequent headaches by any poetic criticism. Think how the fresh Ash's would feel if they were subjected to print a communication of which the following is one of the mild sentences:

"The name of Peter-sture is known to be advanced by these public exercise."

THE CITY HORSE.

THE HORSE IN CITY AND COUNTRY.

On behalf of the horse, we beg to appeal to the sympathy of the public. The accompanying pictures tell so vividly the story of the sufferings of the town horse, and the delightful career of his country brother, that we need add to them but a very few words.

Horses need recreation and fresh air as much as men. They suffer as severely from excessive heat. They are as sensitive to overwork. Yet it is no uncommon sight to see a poor animal dragging an enormous load through the sweltering streets of New York in our dog-days; a load which, in cold, bracing weather, the poor brute could hardly move, and to yoke him to which, with the thermometer at 100°, is shameful brutality. Who has not witnessed such a scene as the one depicted above? Who has not heard the crack of the whip on the poor broken-down animal's sides? Ah! we stand in sad need of a law for the prevention of cruelty to animals.

True, as Beeswax says, business is business, whether the weather be hot or cold; and sugar, flour, and dry goods must be moved, whatever the thermometer says; but, good Beeswax, might they not be moved at daybreak or sunset as well as noonday? Could you not suggest to your carman to drive a team when the load is evidently killing his single horse?

HORSES IN THE COUNTRY.

But Beeswax says we know nothing about such matters. Well, let us look at the other picture. That every body can understand. See how thoroughly those noble animals are enjoying the ride; how they snuff the fresh breeze, and revel in the cool shade of these fine trees! Not even the lovers who are riding them are happier than they; one can fancy them telling each other how gloriously they are enjoying themselves, and how they pity the poor brutes who are doomed to the cobble-stones.

If you keep a horse, friend reader, let him have country air as well as yourself; the experiment will pay.

TRAVEL NOTES IN BIBLE LANDS.

No. XXXV.

Pergamos.—Moonlight on the old Church.—A Vision of John, and the Angel of the Church.—An Eastern Wife.—She runs away, and is caught and huntinadced.—A painful Scene.—What shall we do with her?

It was the last hour of the week when we arrived at Pergamos, city of old fame as well as Christian interest. The cattle were tired, for the ride had been long. I was myself nearly exhausted, for a feeling of weariness that I have never before experienced has been oppressing me now for several days, and on our arrival here I rejoiced with much joy to find the tents pitched close by the ruins which the people call the ruins of the old church of St. John. I have never entered my tent with more willingness. I could scarcely wait to take off my clothes before I threw myself on my bed and fell into a deep sleep.

Selim woke me to say that dinner was ready, but I only turned over and bade him tell them not to wait for me, and I slept again profoundly.

It was midnight when I woke again, and now I woke so that I could not think of sleeping. A sudden restlessness had taken the place of my torpor. Rising, I threw my cloak around me, and walked out in as white a moonlight as ever shone on ruin, and making my way up among the fallen stones of the old building, I sat down on a prominent part of the wall and watched the stars in their courses.

Silence reigned in the places which were once vocal with praises. For in past years I think it possible this old ruin has rung to the voices of priests and nuns, brave knights of Holy Cross, and followers of the banner of the Sepulchre.

It would have been natural for me at such an hour to people the aisles in imagination with the former worshipers: to recall the forms which had knelt there; look into the faces which had grown bright or sad there; see the eyes which had wept there. All this would have been natural, but for some reason—I can not say what—I did not. My imagination took a strange turn. It called into the old church at Pergamos the forms I have been most familiar with in America, and I saw them all standing and kneeling in this old ruin.

First of all, there was the old man who was the fifty-second successor of John of Patmos, and somehow, as I so old man went slowly up, with floating white locks on his shoulders, and countenances of serene splendor, as he went up to the altar and knelt, I saw him slowly transformed and he became in my view the beloved disciple himself. So he stood up, and the rest approached him one by one.

TELLING A STORY FROM THE ARABIAN NIGHTS.

Ah, how beautiful, how radiant, was she who knelt first at his feet, and received his blessing! Long ago she was one of the white-robed of Sardis. Long ago she lay on the bosom that John so often lay upon.

Once, on a Sunday afternoon in the village, I, coming late to church, did not go up the aisle to the family pew, but sat down under the gallery close by the door. It was a summer day, and there came up a storm, and the air grew dark, and the thunder muttered lower than the deepest notes of the organ; and in the last hymn, while they were singing it, there came a blinding light, and a loud crash of thunder that shook the building and seemed to rock the world. It was brief, and then all was stillness. The terror of that thunder-bolt silenced all in the house—all save one. The organist fell from his seat, the congregation were silent; only when the thunder ceased there was one calm, sweet voice, pure, clear, seraphic in its melody, that did not seem to know that the others had ceased, but floated up, up in the old church, up in the hushed air out of the church, up into the very courts of the heaven of God. How it thrilled my soul! Even so calm, so perfect, so unshaken was her faith (for it was her voice), and in the awful silence on which it floated I wondered if the dead who lay in their graves around the house could not hear that note of the hymns of the redeemed. These were the words she was singing:

"I asked them whence their victory came;
They, with united breath,
Ascribed their conquest to the Lamb,
Their victory to His death.

"They marked the footsteps that he trod,
His zeal inspired their breast;
And following their incarnate God,
Possessed the promised rest!"

It was just at the close of this last verse that the crash came, but she heard it not, or heeded it not, and sang steadfastly to the close.

You are wondering why I write this story at Pergamos. Well, I will make it brief. She died not long after that; and last night she was here, before the altar of St. John; and as she came to the feet of her old friend she, too, was transformed, and—will you believe me?—she grew into beauty till my imagination made her the angel of the Church in Pergamos.

Then came elders, and old men, and matrons, and children, and—in short, I saw the villagers of that dear little village all here; and when John Stanburger came to look for me, he says he found me on my back, with my eyes closed, breathing heavily; nor could he, without great difficulty, persuade me to wake and go back to the tent.

This Sunday morning was brilliant; for perhaps it may explain this letter to you if I say that it is written on Sunday evening in my tent door, by the last rays of a declining sun, which saddens the glory of the old city.

We walked into the streets of the town. Ruins abound here, and these very magnificent. I will speak of them hereafter. We paused a while at the door of a house, where an Eastern story-teller was relating to a crowd of attentive listeners a tale out of the inexhaustible Thousand Nights.

As we approached the heart of the city we heard the loud cries of contending people, and at length arrived at a spot where justice was administered after the Eastern fashion.

The resident Governor was holding court, with the Khadi for his counsel. At the moment of our arrival a curious case, and one somewhat unusual in Turkish countries, was on trial.

It appeared that Hulil Bessmed had two wives; and Hulil lived in peace at Sensa, some five or seven hours from Pergamos. The first wife, a lady of twenty-one or two, became highly indignant at the introduction of the second; and after numberless family quarrels, she at length solaced herself by an intrigue with young Ali Achmika, a wealthy inhabitant of Pergamos.

In this she was detected, but her husband forgave her. His forgiveness proved a mistaken kindness, for a week afterward she stained and destroyed all her rival's dresses, poisoned her coffee, stole the diamond mouth-piece and ruby rose-snap of her husband, and escaped to her lover in Pergamos.

Hulil, elderly and fat, had not pursued her very rapidly, but, having caught her, he now demanded public justice. The coffee had not killed the favorite, or her life would have been the forfeit; but, as it was, she must be publicly whipped to satisfy her angry lord. And whipped she was, just as we arrived to see it.

I have seen brutal scenes, but never one like that. She was young, delicate, pretty, and sinful, but she did not deserve that.

Two rough fellows bound her hands behind her, and then they laid her down with her face in the lap, and held firmly by the knees, of a stout man. One man held her body down with main force while others tied her feet to a pole, and held them up, and took off her small embroidered slippers and her yellow under-slippers, exposing as beautiful and white a pair of little feet as ever trod the sand at Cape May or Newport.

OLD CHURCH OF ST. JOHN, AT PERGAMOS.

Then came the whip on the soft soles, and the girl wailed and shrieked. I looked in vain for any sign of emotion in Halil's face. He smoked, puff by puff, and seemed—as did the Governor—to enjoy the scene.

The victim writhed, and pierced the air with her cries. She nearly denuded herself, tearing her clothes in her struggles, and exposing first one and then another white shoulder, and then her deathly-pale face, with the blood streaming from her bitten lips.

I could not stand it, but sprang forward to the side of the poor girl, and bade the executioner stop while I spoke to the representative of the Sultan. Halil rose in a fury at the interruption, but a shout announced that the woman had fainted.

"Then cast her loose!" said the Governor; and as they untied her the sitting broke up and the crowd separated, leaving us with the body of the woman. No Moslem of them remained. A woman, who proved to be a Christian, approached; and, with her help and our men, we carried her down to the tents; and here she is, unable to set foot on the ground or speak an intelligible word. What to do with her we don't know, but in the evening we expect Ali, her betrayer, here; and John Steenburger says he shall marry her (for her husband has divorced her), or he (John) will shoot him.

"A pretty business, John! to fight a duel for a Pergamos town-girl."

"A pretty business for you to bring such a girl here! What did you interfere for, if you didn't intend to see it out?"

I rather think John is right.

LITERARY.

WE have recently called the attention of our readers to the fact that the season for preparing and stocking aquaria is now at hand, and we mentioned one or two books which contained instructions. The increasing interest which the public take in this very curious and instructive art (for art it may well be called) is evinced by the constant succession of new books treating thereof.

We have incidentally referred to LIFE BENEATH THE WATERS, by Mr. Edwards, published by H. Bailliere, as an excellent text-book. We have since examined it, and find it well worth our recommendation. It might be more minute and full in its directions, but these will be found abundant for the use of any intelligent collector who thinks for himself. The particular value of the book is in its accounts of American water inhabitants.

Another work of the same sort is THE FAMILY AQUARIUM, published by Dick & Fitzgerald, prepared by H. D. Butler. It appears to be a sensible, practical book, not large, but well suited to the use of the collector. It is a pity Mr. Butler has not looked up from St. Paul's Church to the "aquaria" transparency on the Museum, and heard some of the fun that it has provoked. He would have been more cautious in telling us "what an aquaria is." "The grand aquaria," says Mr. Butler, "at the American (Barnum's) Museum, New York, has no competitor whatever in the Western hemisphere, and is beyond dispute the largest, most costly," etc.

He who desires to stock an aquarium will do well to procure both these books, and then, with one of Hammet's tanks, and careful study of the habits of his plants and animals, he will be able to possess a collection worth a summer's labor.

THE LIFE OF THOMAS JEFFERSON, by Henry S. Randall, LL.D., the third volume of which completes the work, is published by Derby & Jackson, and is one of the most interesting and important contributions to American biographical and historical literature. It is very true that a contemporaneous history can not be impartial; nor would one be worth much if it were so. We sometimes prefer partial histories and biographies. No man lives who can assume the judicial mind, and sit in unbiased judgment upon the character of a contemporary whom he has carefully studied and tried, except such men as by their very stolidity (or stupidity) of character are incompetent to appreciate, and insensible to the true points and force of the characters they are judging. Mr. Randall's biography is not impartial. The friends and admirers of Mr. Jefferson need have no apprehension that this is a lukewarm, milk-and-water, literary breakfast at the great man's expense, nor will his enemies and haters be provoked to constant anger by insufficient glossings over of faults and errors, such as are the usual characteristics of impartial biographies.

This is bold and enthusiastic, and therefore readable and fair. It is frank and hearty; such a book as a man's worst enemy would, notwithstanding his enmity, like to see written of him.

Mr. Randall's study has been careful, and its results may in general be relied on. The historical character of the book is one of its chief recommendations. No American needs to be reminded of the events in which the sage of Monticello bore so conspicuous a part. From the first outbreak of the Revolution to his retirement from the Presidential chair, Mr. Jefferson was constantly and most intimately connected with every important event in the progress of the country.

But it is in the personal rather than the political life of Mr. Jefferson that we find Mr. Randall's volumes most interesting. The court gossip of Washington, in the early part of the century, was full of amusing matter, and here we find not a little of it. There is a very pleasant reminiscence of Mr. Jefferson's acquaintance with Moore, the poet, and his cool treatment of the young Englishman (twenty-four, and a cockney). Moore, of course, lampooned him, and Jefferson laughed at it. Years afterward he took up a volume of Moore, and, reading it, exclaimed, "Why, he is a poet!" and after that Moore was with him a great favorite.

We find a sketch of the famous Merry difficulty. Mr. Merry was the English Minister. Mr. Jefferson took Mrs. Madison out to dinner instead of Mrs. Merry, whereat the Englisher was furious, and a demand for explanation from the Home Government was thought imminent. But Monroe was then Embassador at London, and Mrs. Monroe had been treated in a similar way a few days before. Monroe was delighted at the prospect of a correspondence that promised him so much personal fun; but he unfortunately hinted to some one the advantage he should have, and the world was saved that little imbroglio.

Mr. Randall's work is well done, as by one who loves his subject; and we place the volumes on our shelves among the most valuable books of modern biography.

From Randolph we have a book which is one of the curiosities of the day, being Mr. Noel Humphreys' BUTTERFLY VIVARIUM, OR INSECTS' HOME. Mr. Humphreys is well known to keepers of aquaria. He has devoted himself to the study of life in its various developments, and to the perfection of the means of prosecuting his studies. Hence he has made great improvements in the aquarium, and he has now built a cage for the accommodation of butterflies, moths, and all the brilliant and curious animals whose life is from the worm to the chrysalis and then the fly. The book before us contains his observations on the best method of constructing the Vivarium, which is now offered for sale at the English factories, and which, we have no doubt, some American will soon produce. It does not appear that Mr. Humphreys has yet put a Vivarium into successful operation, except on the small scale which many of us have tried, namely, in a perforated tin box. The chief value of the book, however, is in the instruction he gives on the general subject of insect life. This is, of course, an inexhaustible theme of interest. The examination of insect life is full of remarkable results, as a glance over these pages will show. There is a caterpillar which grows so large that its weight is increased to 72,000 times its first weight. The silk worm devours 62,000 times its own weight in thirty days. Common house flies increase 140 to 200 times their original weight within twenty-four hours after hatching. There is a caterpillar well known to collectors, which makes its cocoon but only for the benefit of others. A little fly has pierced his skin and deposited numerous eggs, which hatch out after the cocoon is made, first devour the caterpillar and then open their own cocoons and fill the vacant room of their victim till their own increase bursts the shell. A thousand points of interest like these are the results of Mr. Humphreys' studies, and will repay all who will devote time and attention to the same. The book is finely illustrated with colored plates.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

END OF THE MORMON WAR.

THE conditions agreed upon at the conference between Governor Cumming, the Peace Commissioners, and the heads of the Mormon Church, are, that the troops shall enter the city without opposition; that the civil officers shall be permitted to perform their duties without interruption, and that unconditional obedience shall be paid to the laws of the land; while, on the other hand, past offenses are to be forgiven, as was stated in the President's proclamation.

All the houses in the city had been closed against both civil officers and strangers, except one, which was occupied by the Governor and his family. Every body else were obliged to sleep in their wagons or on the ground.

WHAT THE TERMS OF PEACE ARE.

The following is an extract from the official dispatch of the Peace Commissioners:

"We are pleased to state that we have settled the unfortunate difficulties existing between the Government of the United States and the people of Utah. We are informed by the people and chief men of the Territory that they will cheerfully yield obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States. They cheerfully consent that the civil officers of the Territory shall enter upon the discharge of their respective duties. They will make no resistance to the army of the United States in its march to the valley of Salt Lake or elsewhere. We have their assurance that no resistance will be made to the officers, civil or military, of the United States, in the exercise of their various functions in the Territory of Utah.

"The people have abandoned all the settlements north of this, and all the families have left the city, only about 1500 persons remaining here to take charge of the property, and to burn it if the difficulties had not been settled. The people from this city and north of it have gone south to Provo, fifty miles south of this, and to points beyond. We will visit Provo and the settlements south in a day or two, and see and confer with the people, and inform them that the difficulties have been settled, and thus induce them to return to their homes."

OUR RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

The letter from Minister Forsyth, asking an opinion relative to the levy of the Zuloaga Government on the property of American citizens, having been laid before Attorney-General Black, the subject has by him been thoroughly examined in connection with the official decree and the treaties between the Mexican and other governments—our own being placed on a footing with the most favored nations. While it is understood that a general tax may be imposed, according to the usual form, for legitimate purposes, yet taking all the data into consideration, and looking to the present condition of that country, the collection of money in the manner proposed is in the nature of a forced contribution. Thus the position of Minister Forsyth is sustained, and of this fact he will be duly advised.

Latest advices from Mexico state that the application of the forced loan to foreigners has been abandoned by the Government.

ARMY MOVEMENTS TOWARD THE NEW GOLD COUNTRIES.

A Washington correspondent says: "It is understood that General Scott has issued preparatory orders for all the available troops on the Atlantic sea-board to be ready to reinforce the army in Washington Territory. A detachment of four hundred men will sail from New York on the 20th inst., in a special steamer, for Aspinwall. These movements are consequent upon the defeat of Colonel Steptoe's command."

A PRESIDENTIAL PUN.

The Buffalo Republic tells the following at the expense of Mr. Butts of the Rochester Advertiser:

"BUT.—This little conjunction is a terrible intermeddler with results. During the late visitation of would-be postmasters from this State at Washington, a little scene occurred at the White House that confirms the effect of this fearful little spoil-sport. The candidates for the different offices did not rely upon themselves alone for success, but brought with them influential men from their respective cities, as aids to lead the forlorn hopes and sap the fortress of Executive patronage. Among them came several gentlemen from Rochester, who were advocating the claims of a Democratic editor to the Post-Office in that city. Our editor appeared to be sanguine of the appointment, but to clinch the matter, he sent a well-known politician to call on Mr. Buchanan, and conclude the matter beyond a peradventure. Politician called, and was received very politely; broached the subject, and talked very eloquently in favor of the editor. Mr. Buchanan heard him through quietly, and when he had finished, said the appointment had already been decided upon. And was it his friend? inquired the politician. Mr. Buchanan solemnly shook his head. The astonished politician immediately began recapitulating the editor's services, when Mr. Buchanan politely begged to be excused at present, as several gentlemen were waiting to see him on important business. "Should be happy to see you again," said the President, "or any of my friends from Rochester." "But—but," expostulated the chagrined politician. "Oh, I beg of you, but me NO BUTTS, Sir," said the President, with a smile, "good-morning." With how much Paine these conjunctions were exchanged, time has shown.

GOVERNOR WISE ON MUD SILLS.

In addressing the New York volunteers who accompanied Monroe's remains to Virginia, Governor Wise is reported to have said: "It is time that Virginia was turning her attention to manufactories, mechanics, mining, and foreign commerce. No country, no State can live upon one only of the five cardinal powers of production. She must resort to all the five combined, and she is doing it. Go, before you leave here, my friends from New York, and look at the iron factories that are growing up around this noble scenery. I say that labor is not the 'mud sill' of society; and I thank God that the old Colonial aristocracy of Virginia, which despised mechanical and manual labor, is nearly run out. Thank God that we are beginning to raise miners, mechanics, and manufacturers, that will help to raise what is left of that aristocracy up to the middle ground of respectability. [Laughter and applause.] Look at the iron factory here; look at the tobacco factory here—that factory is every day stealing my life away with the very weed of luxury." [The Governor chews tobacco freely.]

ANOTHER COMET DISCOVERED BY A LADY.

The Nantucket Inquirer, July 9, says that a faint telescope comet was discovered by Miss M. Mitchell, of that town, on the evening of the 1st instant, in the constellation of Leo. It was also seen on the 4th, 5th, and 6th. Its position is so low that she is unable to obtain such measurements as will prove it to be a new one, or show that it is one heretofore seen.

JOHN P. HALE ON WOMAN'S RIGHTS.

Hon. John P. Hale has lately made a speech to the Abbott Female Academy, in which he said: A lady friend had asked him what she should do, as she was deprived of the right of voting, and he told her to go and unite her fortunes with one whose right to vote was unquestioned [laughter], and thereupon she had told him that was the meanest thing he had ever said. Those unfortunate females who were always complaining of their limited spheres, would be found to be those who had not the courage, and faith, and energy to do what was even in that limited sphere for them. No one had a right to complain so long as in the sphere of their influence they had left a single duty unperformed. Not until we had done what we could should we sit down with Alexander and cry that there were no more worlds to conquer. We should not complain while a single case of human wretchedness existed which we had not done what we could to alleviate by sympathy or aid.

In addressing young ladies he could not present the same motives which were usual in addressing boys; but he could assure them that every one could obtain all the good in life which they deserved. In concluding, Mr. Hale told a story of a young girl who said she had two things settled in her own mind; first, she would never marry a minister; second, she would never live in the town of B——. Yet she eventually married a minister of B——. "So it will be with you, my young friends," said Mr. Hale to the young ladies, at which great laughter and clapping ensued. "I perceive," continued he, "that it is the theological students that are clapping, because they think you will all marry ministers."

PRACTICAL USE OF KANSAS SHRIEKING.

The Cincinnati Inquirer says:

"There is a law in the Old Dominion by which the creditor can lock up in jail any poor editor who happens to be in that peculiarly editorial condition courteously denominated 'short of change.' It is said that a particularly lean knight of the quill, living in one of the southwestern counties, was arrested a short time ago by a physician to whom he owed a balance on account. The jail is rather a primitive affair, not very well 'chinked,' and immediately adjoining the sleeping apartment of the jailor and his wife. The guilty man naturally asked permission to carry in his papers, scissors, and pen, that he might prepare some 'copy' for a future day. Among his documents he fortunately took with him a long speech on the Kansas question. About nine o'clock in the evening he placed himself in the attitude of a Senator, and repeated, in a loud and husky voice, and with great deliberation, the entire document. The jailer and his family, who had never been used to such exhibitions, were horrified and kept awake all night. The editor slept a portion of the next day to recruit his strength and lungs, and in the evening began to deliver to the naked walls the same 'summing up' which he had pronounced twenty-four hours before. He had uttered but a few paragraphs when the jailer appeared, and politely requested him to lower his voice. In answer, he assured the guardian of the public morals that he expected to go to Congress in a few years, and was in the habit of reading one of these efforts every evening to his family 'to keep himself in practice.'

"'And do you mean to read that speech every night in my hearing?'

"'I do, Sir.'

"'How much do you owe that doctor?'

"'Thirteen dollars, Sir!'—(with Congressional emphasis).

"'Will you refrain from keeping my family awake until I can make out the papers necessary for your discharge?'

"'I will, Sir.'

"In a short time the jailer returned, and assuring him he had paid his debt, requested him to give his note, payable in six months, and then, as an especial favor, to depart from his premises. The editor went on his way rejoicing, and the jailer will, no doubt, at the end of six months, renew the note rather than accept the alternative of harboring a Kansas man on his property."

TWO RUM FISHES.

The Port Elizabeth Mercury records the capture of two fishes of a rare species: "About three weeks ago the manager of the Watering Company's tank-boat, Mr. Thoroughgood, observing that two immense fish had got over a sand-bar into shallow water, rushed into the sea with a knife, without waiting for assistance, and managed, after a severe struggle, to kill them both. Upon examination they proved to be a bull and cow of a most singular fish. Having cut the heads off to preserve them for the novelty of their appearance, the carcasses were sold to Mr. John Stock for £9, who succeeded getting about fifty-one gallons of oil. Unfortunately none thought of securing any other part of the bodies. The back-bone and fins were thus permitted to be washed away to sea by the returning tide. The head had all the appearance of having an elongated snout not unlike the beak of a cormorant attached to a fish's body. The jaw, which extended about a foot and a half from the tip to the throat, opened a foot wide, and was entirely deprived of teeth. One of the fish was twenty-feet in length and the other eighteen feet. The dorsal fin was about six feet from the head, with two small fins at a corresponding distance underneath. The tail was placed horizontally, and measured fully three feet from fan to fan. The stoutest part of the body was about nine feet in circumference. For the sake of science we consider it a great misfortune that no scientific person was called in to examine it."

KISSES SWEETER THAN JEWELS.

The New Orleans Delta tells the following story: "A night or two ago, a fair, sweet girl, residing on Race, rear of Fourth Street, was partially awakened from her slumbers by a man in her chamber; but not fully aroused, she lay with closed lips for a minute, when, the sound being repeated, she started up, and saw, by the light of the little jet upon the gas-burner, a man's form disappearing through the window. She screamed involuntarily, and her father, armed with a revolver, was in her room in a few moments, greatly agitated and alarmed, questioning his lovely daughter as to the cause of her fear. She told him what had frightened her, and he ran to the open window, looked out upon the balcony and into the yard, but could see nothing of the terrible man, the midnight robber, and disturber of the dove-eyed darling's rest. The parent was disposed to think his daughter had been dreaming; that her imagination had painted what was not real; but on returning to her apartment she assured him she was wide awake, and that she had seen all she had stated. Her father was still incredulous, when, in looking around, he observed upon his daughter's dressing bureau, where a beautiful enameled watch, a pair of heavy bracelets, a diamond ring, and a necklace were lying, a slip of paper, on which was written:

"'FAIREST, DEAREST GIRL,—I came here to rob, but your beauty has made me honest for the time. I saw these jewels, but believing them yours, I could not take them. I have stolen what I value more—three delicious kisses from your unconscious lips. Do not be offended; they were gentle and innocent.

"'AN UNKNOWN LOVER.'

"This story sounds romantic, we are aware, and perhaps some of our matter-of-fact readers will be skeptical in relation thereto; but we are assured, upon the best authority, that it is strictly veracious, and we publish it as an evidence that the age of gallantry and sentiment is not at an end; that the race of Rinaldo Rinaldini is not extinct."

HOW THE BLOOMERS DRESS.

A correspondent of the Davenport Gazette, writing from Cortlandville, Cortland County, New York, June 30, says: "Last Thursday and Friday the National Dress Reform Association held its third annual convention in this place. There were about one hundred and fifty women present in Bloomer costume, and lawyers, doctors, professors, editors, etc., participated in the doings. I believe some eight or ten different States were represented. Just think of it—one hundred and fifty 'Bloomers' together! They were of every age—from childhood to gray hairs—homely, handsome; smart, stupid; tall, short; enthusiastic, deliberate; tasty, slovenly. There seemed to be three leading patterns of the Bloomer pants: one style was loose, in the sailor fashion; another was the full Turkish style, gathered into a ruffle about the ankle; and still another was close, tight legs, like some your Shanghai dandies occasionally get on. The length of skirts ranged from two or three inches above the ankle to as much above the knee; and there was just as much variety in the materials, trimmings, and tasteful arrangement of the entire dress as you would find in any gathering of women. Silks, calicoes, velvets, lawns, linens, delaines, alpaccas, ginghams—in fact, almost every fabric and every figure of fabric might be found there. Nearly all of them wore their hair cut short about the neck, like school girls, with various styles of hat, trimmed to the wearer's taste, and walked in gaiters, slippers, boots, kips, etc., as the case might be."

BATHING AT OLD POINT COMFORT.

A Petersburger, writing from the Hygeia at Old Point Comfort, to the Intelligencer, says: "The bathing here is peculiar. A stockade is built out in the water, into which you enter and enjoy yourself as well as you can, considering the warmth and shallowness of the water. Hard by, another stockade is erected for the ladies. This is the misery of the thing! A few paces off you hear the most delightful shrieks and screams, and the most musical laughter. You know that fun is going on. But where you are there is naught save a melancholy 'sloshing around' of bilious and hideous males. The contrast between the two stockades—the fun, the frolic, and the females in the one, and the dull masculine splashing in the other—is horrid, horrid!"

SARAH LITTLES AT SING SING.

The Rochester Union says: "The Sheriff and party who attended Sarah Littles to Sing Sing have returned to this city, and report that she has assumed the attire of a convict and begun her labor for the State. The fact has already been alluded to by one of the papers, that she was attended to the dépôt at the time of her departure by certain persons, among them Ann Mack, a female who has figured in our courts as the keeper of a house of ill repute. We are told that this woman took a lively interest in the case of Mrs. Littles and the Stout family when they were first arrested, and has from time to time attended to their wants and supplied some of their necessities. Ann has expended upward of fifty dollars since last fall for clothing and other purposes, in assisting Mrs. Littles, who was, we understand, a stranger to her before the arrest. What the motives are for this course we know not—perhaps it is benevolence purely, and perhaps not. Mrs. Littles may be pardoned in a few months, and may repay fourfold the kindness she has received. When Sarah Littles was taken to the cars on Tuesday night, to go to Sing Sing, Ann Mack and some of her associates from the Cornhill suburbs appeared there. A man from Albany, who appeared to be an old acquaintance of Mack, procured a bottle of Champagne, took it into the car, and with it the three, including Sarah Littles, pledged their mutual health. When the cars left, Ann remained on board and attended Sarah to Sing Sing, and remained there as long as she was permitted to do so. We believe this statement is correct, and it is here made because there has been considerable talk about the affair, and a portion of the public desire to know what did take place at the time of her departure. Sundry respectable citizens, including married men, had been charged with furnishing that bottle of wine, and with other indiscretions, some of which they may be guilty of; but we believe the wine was purchased by an Albany man."

ACCIDENT ON THE ERIE ROAD.

A terrible and distressing accident took place on the New York and Erie Railroad on Thursday night about nine o'clock, by which which six persons were instantly killed and nearly forty more wounded. The night express train encountered a broken rail at Glen Hollow, about five miles from Port Jervis, when two cars were thrown off the track down the embankment, which at this point is nearly thirty feet high and very steep. The sufferers were removed as soon as practicable to Port Jervis, where the wounded received medical aid, and are attended to by the citizens of the town.

PERSONAL.

A Washington correspondent says: "The great labor of the State Department and the oppressive weather seem to bear heavily upon our veteran Secretary of State. General Cass has been quite indisposed, though not seriously ill. He complains of rush of blood to the head. He performs the duties of his office at his residence. The President has visited him."

A silly letter-writer says: "President Buchanan drinks nothing stimulating except old rye whiskey. I told him that you used to have the best that was distilled in our region, and he made me promise to see you and get him some if you had it. Could you let me have a barrel, or even a half a barrel, of the best you ever made? Write me. I will send a keg of it to the old chief if I can get it."

We find the following in a Washington correspondence; "The members of the Cabinet are flying off in all directions. Secretaries Floyd and Thompson are now absent, and Secretary Toucey and Postmaster-General Brown leave to-day for their respective homes. Attorney-General Black contemplates a flying visit to his family (now in Pennsylvania), of only a week. Mr. Cobb will remain, and watch the ebb and flow of the public revenue. General Cass is heavily pressed with the cares of State, and does most of his work at his private residence, where he steadily refuses to see any visitors, under any pretext whatever."

The Portlanders gave Senator Davis of Mississippi a grand serenade on the 9th, and received a handsome speech in reply, which was cheered. We are glad that Jefferson Davis has got a peep at New England. It will do him good, and those who listen to him no harm.

Senator Ball is in Washington, where he is a housekeeper. Senator A. G. Brown, of Mississippi, has returned to Washington from a pleasant visit to Canada. Trumbull, of Illinois, is also in Washington, where he keeps house. Secretary Floyd left Washington to-day for a short visit to Cincinnati.

Ex-President Comonfort, of Mexico, and his brother, paid a visit to Brooklyn last week, and called upon Mayor Powell. They were shown about the City Hall. The visitors expressed themselves delighted with the police telegraph, the workings of which were explained to his Excellency.

The Secretary of the Interior, says the Washington Star, left the capital on Friday, accompanied by his family, for a short visit to his home in Mississippi. Since his accession to his present position, in March, 1857, Mr. Thompson has not before been absent for an hour from his post, except on one occasion, when he went to New York, and was away two days. He is expected to be absent from Washington for three weeks.

Ex-President Pierce and wife were to leave Madeira on the 1st of June for Lisbon; thence avoiding the larger European cities, for Vevay, in Switzerland, where he will spend the summer. Mr. Nathaniel Hawthorne and Mr. John Howard March will be with him in Switzerland.

The Boston Courier recommends that when Mount Vernon shall have come into the possession of the nation, a statue of bronze or marble, in some appropriate part of the domain, be erected of the orator by whose efforts it has been secured.

The Boston Transcript says: "Mr. Albert Sumner, of Newport, Rhode Island, his wife and child, some time since were shipwrecked, and all undoubtedly perished. By the presumption of the law, the wife and child died first, and the husband became entitled to the property. Mrs. Sumner was a daughter of the late Walter Channing, of this city, and enjoyed the income of a large estate. Under these circumstances more than $30,000 became legally vested in the late Mr. Sumner, and through him came to his mother, sister, and his two brothers—Charles Sumner, our Senator, and George Sumner, Esq. The estate was administered upon by Mr. George Sumner, and, with the consent of all these heirs, the whole of this property, which the deceased had derived from his wife, has been surrendered to her relations."

The "Rarey family" consists of four brothers, who have been raised from boyhood in Groveport, Ohio. Their father was of German descent, a farmer and raiser of stock, and all of the boys were brought up on the farm, and they have followed that pursuit, more or less, to the present time. They are all, however, in possession of the art of "horse-taming."

The oldest is William H., who made the first discovery of the principles of the nature of the horse that led to the perfection of the system which is now astonishing the world. The second is Charles W., who is now teaching the system in the western part of Ohio. The third is Frederick, who now lives on his farm, about two miles from Groveport. The fourth, and youngest, is John S., who, together with his oldest brother, William H., has devoted his life to the study of the horse, and is now teaching the nobility of Europe the results of his experience.

Ex-Rev. J. S. Kalloch attended a religious meeting in Rockland, Maine, a week ago Sunday evening, and took part in the proceedings. He got into a sharp discussion with Deacon Wilson, who was a prominent witness in the famous Kalloch trial, and Elder J. Baker, a Baptist preacher. Mr. Kalloch took offense at some remarks of Elder Baker, which he understood to apply to him. The discussion and meeting were at length ended by the gas being turned off, leaving the audience in darkness.

Ex-President Millard Fillmore is suffering from inflammation of the eyes, and is obliged to forego reading.

Mr. Stoeckl is going to Russia on leave of absence, and will take his Yankee wife along, to show Alexander how diplomatic relations may be cemented by domestic ties. He was a long time Secretary of Legation under Bodisco, who, Jew as he was, lived here for a quarter of a century, making a fortune, and winning not only golden opinions from all sorts of people, but the fairest bride that has blushed for many a day on the banks of the Potomac. The moral force of good example was well illustrated by his faithful Secretary, who, according to a letter in the Tribune, was prompt to adopt the hint contained in a suggestion made by the Minister of Foreign Affairs after Bodisco's death, when, speaking of Stoeckl—then a bachelor—he remarked he was glad to hear he had taken an American wife. In a few months after he removed the only obstacle to promotion, and the full mission followed as a natural consequence. We have done a good deal to Americanize foreign diplomacy by such tender connections, and with more credit than by grafting un-counted adventurers upon respectable households through the weak minds of fast young women, or the ambitious infirmities of half-cracked mammas.

A letter from Florence (June 20) says: "Mr. Hawthorne and family are among our present American visitors. Mr. Bryant and his family have passed on to Venice, after a few days' sojourn. The season is unusually sultry, and many of our foreign visitors are seeking relief at the Baths of Lucca."

Edwin Stevens, Esq., of Hoboken, was brought home to his residence at Castle Point from Princeton, a few days since, in a very weak and exhausted condition. It is hardly possible that he can survive many days. He was brought home in the Hoboken ferry steamer Phenix, and conveyed from the wharf to his residence on a litter.

The Syracuse Journal, wishing to tell the editor of the Albany Knickerbocker that he lies, avoids that vulgarity by the severer method of a Scriptural reference, and assures the Albany man that "he is perfectly well aware that he is guilty of the sin for which Ananias was struck down by an indignant Deity."

Some wag, writing from Cairo, Illinois, since the subsiding of the flood, says there are now in that city 452 distinct and different smells, and several wards yet to hear from!

The Malta (Mediterranean) Times says: "Among the passengers last brought by the Madina, from Tunis, was Lady Franklin, widow of the celebrated Arctic navigator. Her ladyship's health being impaired, she is revisiting on these shores friends and scenes endeared to her by reminiscences of the time when Sir John Franklin was in command of a ship-of-war attached to the station. Lady Franklin left for Athens on the third day after her arrival."

The Penobscot Indians are now doing a smashing business in manufacturing hoops for ladies' dresses out of basket stuff. The red ladies have also adopted the fashion in its greatest amplitude.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT.—THE LORDS BACKING DOWN ON THE JEW QUESTION.

On the 1st inst., in the House of Lords, the question of the admission of Jews into Parliament was taken up. Lord Derby receded from his opposition to the measure. He believed it was impossible to maintain inviolate the principles for which their lordships had so long contended, without bringing themselves into collision with the House of Commons. Therefore he felt it was the duty of the House to consider whether there was any possibility of satisfactorily settling all differences. He believed that the suggestion of Lord Lucan—that the Commons should be allowed to dispense, by resolution, with the words "on the true faith of a Christian," when a member of the Jewish persuasion applied to take his seat—afforded the only solution of the difficulty; and therefore, though with great regret, he was prepared to accept the measure.

Lord Lyndhurst consented to postpone his bill, and Lord Lucan, in moving the second reading of his measure, explained that it gave the House of Commons the power of omitting the words, "on the true faith of a Christian," by resolution, but required that any member of the Jewish persuasion should present himself, in the first instance, at the table of the House, and state his objections to the oath in the form in which it now stood.

After some debate the second reading was carried by 143 to 97.

NEWS FROM THE TELEGRAPH FLEET.

Through the kindness of Captain Joseph Cummings, of the ship Alice Munroe, from Liverpool, arrived off Boston, the Associated Press has received the following:

"At sea, Sunday, June 27, 1858, latitude 52·5 north, longitude 33·15 west, wind west and light, and weather hazy, saw two ships heading to the eastward. On looking with a glass, found them to be the United States steam frigate Niagara and her Majesty's ship Gorgon, of the Telegraph Squadron; and as they were lying still, I at once tacked ship and stood toward them.

"At eleven A.M. was boarded by Cyrus W. Field, Esq., and a lieutenant from the Niagara, from whom we received a letter-bag and the following communication, viz., that the squadron had experienced very bad weather from its leaving port, and were sixteen days reaching their destination, and that they had made two unsuccessful attempts to lay the cable. On the second attempt, the 26th, they succeeded in laying upward of forty miles, and were going along finely, when the communication suddenly ceased, at 12·55 Sunday morning, the 27th of June. The ships then returned to the starting-point, and were waiting the return of the Agamemnon and Valorous, and as soon as they met a splice would be made, and another attempt made to lay the cable.

"We lost sight of the Niagara at 3·30 P.M., and as the fog set in soon after, I do not think the squadron met before the 28th. The weather since for some days has been foggy and unsettled.

"Mr. Field seemed to be in good spirits, and thought that they should yet succeed in laying the cable. The stormy weather had interfered much with the success of the enterprise.

"One of the ships had sustained slight injury—a coal-bunker breaking loose, by which one sailor had his leg broken, and another his arm.

"All were well on board the Niagara. Her machinery worked well, and the ship performed well."

THE FIRST TRANSATLANTIC MESSAGE.

In the event of the success of the transatlantic telegraph, the London Observer says the first message which will be sent along the wires will be, as we stated on a previous occasion, one addressed by her Majesty to the President of the United States. The message, carefully sealed, has been sent to the United States Legation, and will not be opened until the telegraph is perfectly ready for its transmission. It would, of course, be idle to speculate on the nature of the message, but we may confidently state that it will not be that very inappropriate one which our transatlantic contemporaries announced it to be last year, namely, "What God hath joined together let no man put asunder." It is not exactly a message which the first lady in England might be expected to send to a gentleman in the United States, and it would be, besides, singularly infelicitous when applied to a work such as an Atlantic telegraph.

DICKENS'S HOUSEHOLD TROUBLE.

The London correspondent of the Springfield Republican, writing on the 26th of June, gives the following explanation of the incompatibility between Dickens and his wife:

"In the literary world very little is stirring, except the gossip on the domestic affairs of Charles Dickens. Probably his explanatory letter, published a month ago, and full of mysterious allusions, has excited as much curiosity in America as here. The facts dimly alluded to are these: About twenty-two years ago, Mr. Dickens, then a clerk, married a very pretty and amiable young girl (whose parents opposed the match as far beneath her), and took her home to obscure lodgings in Furnival's Inn. For some years they lived very happily together; but Mr. Dickens having become a great man, flattered and courted, finds that his domestic felicity is not as great as could be desired.

"Two or three years ago he gave a dinner to his literary friends on the anniversary of his wedding-day, and, in proposing his wife's health, stated that he had never seen a shade of ill-temper over her in his life. This equability of disposition does not satisfy him. She is not intellectual. He reads his works to her, and she, absorbed in needle-work, inquires abstractedly what he means by some of his most brilliant passages. In short, she is not a companion to him, so the brilliant novelist and actor separates on the ground of 'incompatibility,' from her whom he vowed before God to love and to cherish, and from henceforth their lives have separate ends. The oldest child, a youth of twenty-one, has chosen to follow the fortunes of his mother, while the daughters remain with their father. To make the affair still more notorious, a young lady, Mrs. Dickens's sister, has undertaken to 'keep house' for Mr. Dickens and his daughters. The whole affair is very repugnant to our ideas of matrimonial constancy, and has not enlarged the circle of Mr. Dickens's admirers."

HOW YOUNG WOMEN WORK IN LONDON.

The London Weekly Times says that the young milliners and dressmakers of that city are condemned to sixteen, seventeen, or eighteen hours of toil out of the twenty-four in each day and night. Their work is carried on in crowded, unventilated rooms, where their frames are kept bent at their labor until their eyes ache and their limbs refuse to perform their duty. They have a short and painful life and an early grave. In a recent speech, Lord Shaftesbury said that many of these young women had been trained gently and tenderly, in delicate and happy homes, possessing all the virtues and tenderness that belong to the female sex, and rendered by those very characteristics more obedient, more unmurmuring, more slavishly subject to the authority and tyranny of those who are put over them. His lordship adds, that they have no alternative between submission and the street door; and then asks, "Is the condition of such a young woman one whit better than the condition of the most wretched slave in the Southern States of America?"

FRANCE.

RUSSIAN PRODIGALITY IN PARIS.

A letter-writer says: "Some singular traits of French character came to light recently on a suit brought against Prince Youssoupouff by a painter. The artist had engaged the Prince to purchase some of his works, and pretended the Prince had engaged to take every painting he produced! Prince Youssoupouff appeared personally before the court, and stated that his time and attention were engrossed resisting demands made upon his purse. He said that he had, from Russia, engaged a hotel in the Rue de l'Université; to his surprise, he found, when he reached Paris, the mansion filled with butlers, stewards, ushers, cooks, ostlers, secretaries, and the like, who all pretended they were engaged by him, who lived for three months before his arrival on the credit of his name, presented him with bills for their services, laid at the most enormous rates of remuneration, and could not be made to quit his mansion until he had procured a decree of court and secured the services of a squadron of policemen! Did you ever hear of such insolence? There is a Russian family named De Gusbourg, who occupy the whole 'first floor' (that is what you would call the third floor, as it is above the ground floor and the entresol) of the furnished house called L'Hôtel des Trois Empereurs—a house on the opposite side of the Place du Palais Royale from the Hôtel du Louvre, and which extends from the Rue de Rivoli to the Rue St. Honoré. This family pays $48,000 a year for their rooms on the first floor, thanks to the impudence of their landlord! Once a week they assemble all, or at least several hundreds, of the beggars in Paris in the court-yard of the hotel, and distribute money to them. A more disgusting sight than this congregation of chiffonniers, chiffonnieres, egoutiers, vidangers, and decayed lorettes, I have rarely witnessed. And I suspect if the donors could overhear, as I overheard, some of their beneficiaries comment on their largesses, I think they would soon tire of this folly."

MR. HUME'S MARRIAGE AND FUTURE CAREER.

We gave some time since in this journal a portrait of Mr. Hume, the famous spiritualist. We have also stated that he is to marry, on the 19th of this month, at St. Petersburg, Mlle. Kroll, sister-in-law of the rich and magnificent Count of Kouchelef-Besborodko, who will give his sister-in-law a dowry worthy the magnificence of a Potemkin. They speak of a million of roubles, and of lots of peasants endowed with extraordinary quantities of spirituality.

Count Kouchelef, Hume, and Alexander Dumas, who accompanies them and who will be Hume's witness, have left Paris for Russia. After his marriage, Mr. Hume is going to found at Paris a grand establishment of supernatural communications—a sort of Spiritualistic Exchange.

To this establishment there will be joined a school of Fluidism, where the rich will be initiated in that great mystery—requiring a sacrifice proportioned to their wealth. This school will be divided into three classes. The first will be a sort of gymnasium, purely mechanical, where will be shown the methods of disengaging the fluid by exercises at once physical and intellectual.

In the second class, the fluid being developed, awakened, and active, they will show how to direct it by faith and by will. It is not sufficient to have the fluid, it must also be known how to use it.

The mode of using it is, then, what they will teach in the second class. In leaving this class the adepts will know how to turn tables, to summon spirits, to question them, to receive answers, and, in fact, to place themselves in communication with the other world. This is the class of Reception.

But when this is known, all is not yet done. This is only to be in communication with the spiritual world—it remains yet to learn how to profit by these communications. They must not be regarded as useless play, as a series of curious but unfruitful experiments. We must learn all that the spirits know more than we do; we must use them to elevate ourselves, to make us better, richer, and more powerful.

This is what will be learned in the third class.

ABSINTHE AS A FRENCH INSTITUTION.

A Paris correspondent of the Boston Courier says: "A little detail may serve to show what is the education of the gentlemen of the French army. When, in the first instance, the two sous-lieutenants went to the Figaro to ask for M. de Pène, in order to settle a hostile meeting with him, they addressed the person they spoke to thus: 'Where is M. de Pène to be found? Where is the café he frequents?' As no answer beyond a stare of astonishment was awarded to this, they added; 'But at what hour and where does he take his absinthe?' Now this requires explanation, and illustrates the habits and manners of French garrisons. The home of a French officer is the café he chooses to adopt; thither he and his comrades repair to play dominos, drink, and smoke, and their usual life is diversified by no more serious or intellectual occupation. But the 'absinthe' is even worse. It is the fashion now of far too many Frenchmen of a certain class—but especially of the military men—to doze themselves with this most pernicious liquor, the most celebrated victim whereof, and the most undeniable one, was Alfred de Musset, the poet. There are certain hours when the persons I speak of repair to their café, or to one of the brandy shops now so widely spread over French towns, to drink their absinthe. It seemed, therefore, impossible to these gentlemen of the rapier that any man should pass his life more respectably than they themselves did, and, accordingly, they inquired 'when and where M. de Pène took his absinthe?'"

AN ARM-CHAIR STUFFED WITH BANK-NOTES.

The papers lately published an account of an old miser who had a habit of concealing his money and valuables in the covering of an ancient arm-chair, in which, invalided and unable to move, he passed his life. After his death this piece of furniture, worn with age, together with other household articles, was sold at auction for almost nothing, but subsequently was discovered by the lucky purchaser to contain upward of twenty thousand francs in good, clean notes of the Bank of France! What a soft, pleasant chair, to be sure! How delicious must have been the repose it afforded!

THE MYSTERY OF A LACE HANDKERCHIEF.

Some time since a charity ball took place at the Paris grand opera, and among the incidents upon that occasion occurred the following: A marine officer discovered upon the floor near the buffet a richly-embroidered handkerchief, edged with Valenciennes lace of great price. He proclaimed aloud his discovery, but nobody appearing to claim the valuable chiffon, he tied it to the handle of his sword, and, thus decorated, promenaded the foyer. His idea was a happy one, apparently, for soon a monsieur of most respectable appearance approached, and said the handkerchief belonged to a lady dressed in yellow silk, also of highly respectable appearance, whom he designated, seated upon a divan. The officer, of course, restored the article, and received the thanks of the monsieur, whom he saw soon after deliver it to the lady, after which both departed. But the next day what was his astonishment at receiving from the Baronne de V——, with whom he was very slightly acquainted, a billet, thus conceived:

"MY DEAR CAPTAIN,—You found, I am told, at the ball last evening, a handkerchief which I had the misfortune to lose. Be kind enough to deliver it to my valet de chambre, who brings you this note. I am happy that this handkerchief fell into your hands, as it belongs to my corbeille de mariage, and I should have been desolated at its loss. A thousand grateful thanks.

"BARONNE DE V——."

The worthy mariner comprehended at once that he had been the victim, the night previous, either of an error or a robbery. What to do? Try and find the respectable monsieur and the lady in yellow silk, or conduct himself like a perfect gentleman toward the charming reclaimer, who addressed him as "my dear captain?" He chose the latter course, and commenced by giving the liveried domestic a Louis, from whom, by avowing the case, he succeeded in obtaining the address of the fine-linen establishment where the marriage articles had been purchased. It was in the Rue de la Paix, and thither he hastened. The valet, who accompanied him, selected from among the many handkerchiefs presented by the officious clerks one which nearly resembled the object lost. The gallant captain paid four hundred francs for the luxurious trifle, remitted it to the Baronne by the domestic, and immediately sought relief in tobacco and a stroll for his pecuniary suffering. Four hundred francs! But oh! the wickedness of human nature! It was not the pretty Baronne who had written to the officer, for she had not even been to the ball, much less lost a handkerchief! It was dropped by the wife of a foreign minister, who reclaimed nothing, and the mariner, innocent in worldly matters, had been twice duped by the same parties! This is the same young man who is about to marry the pretty glove merchantess of the Faubourg Montmartre.

NEW FASHIONS FOR SUICIDES.

A Paris letter says: "In one day this week there were five suicides! One man drowned himself in the Seine—his first bath for many years and his last; another, a member of the National Guard, tired of defending his country, and wishing to be a patriot no longer, shot himself through the heart with his musket, curious to see if he could fire a gun accurately; a third delivered up his spirit by the aid of burning charcoal, dying happily of suffocation by gas; a fourth took a flying leap out of a fifth story window, distributing his brains on the pavements, free to be picked by any more deficient than himself; and a fifth—how do you imagine he did his business? He blew off his head with gunpowder! As a kind of opening mixture—a species of Seidlitz powder—he placed a packet of gunpowder in his mouth, lighted it by means of a fuse, and so smoked himself completely out! His mouth was so enlarged that with difficulty his friends could recognize him, and they are not certain yet whether it is himself or some acquaintance of the family!"

KILLING ONE'S SELF IN SPORT.

"There is a furnished hotel in the Quartier St. Denis," says the Droit, "which is principally occupied by junior clerks. There is a large room in common for them, where those who happen to be without employment pass their time in playing cards or talking. A few days since, one of them, Emile D——, said to his companions, in a jocular way, that it was so hot, and he was so out of spirits, that he had a strong inclination to blow his brains out. One of the young men present said he would make a bet against his doing such a thing. 'What will you bet?' replied Emile, still in the same laughing tone. 'A bottle of beer.' 'Done,' said the other; 'but order the beer at once, for as, to gain the wager, I must shoot myself, I should like to drink my share of it first.' The beer was ordered and drunk, when Emile rose up to leave the room. 'Where are you going?' said the others. 'To shoot myself,' was the reply, which was received with a burst of laughter from all present. Their merriment was, however, immediately put an end to by the report of a pistol in an adjoining room, and on running to the spot they found the young man lying dead on the floor. As no clew to his family could be found, the body was conveyed to the Morgue."

SPAIN.

THE NEW MINISTRY.

A telegraphic dispatch gives the following as the new appointments in Spain:

Minister of Foreign Affairs and of War, O'Donnell; Minister of Justice, Nagrette; Minister of Finances, Salaverra; Minister of the Interior, Daherra; Minister of Marine, Noedda.

DEATH OF THE BLIND GUIDE AT THE ESCURIAL.

La Cronica of the 12th ult. has the following:

"Letters from the Escurial announce the death of Cornelio, the famous blind guide. Cornelio was of himself, as it were, an additional wonder to admire at the Escurial, because of his excellent memory and his skill in leading travelers, explaining to them with minuteness the merits and history of all the master-pieces of art contained in one of the most celebrated edifices of the world. His original character has struck more than one foreigner, and even led to the taking of his portrait. This poor blind man lived upon the presents given to him by the visitors to the monastery, and whom he served as cicerone. It seems he will be replaced by the shepherd Alvarez, who became so noted for his great memory, and whom her Majesty placed for that purpose in this royal edifice."

ITALY.

THE VERAZZANI FAMILY.

A correspondent of the Newark Advertiser says: "It is rather remarkable that no Italian power ever had the slightest possession on the (American) continent, though its first four discoverers (including Verazzano, a Florentine) were all Italians; a significant historic illustration of the course of empire. The family of Americus, who was himself never married, is still represented in this city by the worthy descendants of an uncle. The present head of the family, a gallant young antiquary of noble presence, is in honorable employment under the Government. One of the sisters is, I believe, less honorably associated somewhere in the United States. The original family residence is here carefully preserved, and an authentic bust of the navigator adorns the public museum. A fine portrait, by a distinguished contemporary master, was confided to Mr. J. Edwards Lester some years ago, as a present to the Government of the United States, though, it is said, the trust has never been fulfilled."

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA.

THE FRAZER'S RIVER GOLD-MINES.

A San Francisco correspondent thus describes the rush to Frazer's River: "Not since the discovery of gold in California, ten years ago, has there been any thing to equal it in the United States. Every steamer and sailing vessel that leaves here is choked up with passengers, and the tide of emigration appears only to have just set in. The excitement rages with the utmost fury, and nothing is thought or spoken of save the richness and extent of the new El Dorado. Politics, the Utah war, and every thing that could interest, have been forgotten in the almost universal desire to reach the bleak, but supposed auriferous fields of the Hudson Bay Company's territory. Old and young, married and unmarried, merchant and mechanic, all are going to the new diggings. Our population, made up as it is of adventurers, reckless, and many disappointed men, yields its thousands to the stream that sets toward the north, and it would seem we are only at the commencement of the exodus. There is no use denying that the fever has reached a high point, and there are sufficient grounds for the belief that unless something occurs to lessen its violence, California will lose at a low calculation one-third of its male inhabitants within the next six months. The boats and stages from the interior arrive daily, freighted with their hundreds of anxious gold seekers, eager to reach the scene of the new discoveries. The crowd cannot be stayed for a moment—they go determined to discover the value of the mines, as to which, it is well here to say, some doubts are expressed. The spirit of adventure that moves the people, and the hope of acquiring wealth by a month's labor, are levers it is useless to attempt to counteract."

EXPERIENCE OF A MINING PARTY.

A California paper says: "Six men who have just returned from the mines state, about six weeks ago they left this city on the steamer Commodore, and took a whaleboat with them, in which they performed the remainder of the trip from Victoria to Hills Bar, 150 miles above the mouth of Frazer River, and two miles below Fort Yale. They mined for ten days in the Bar, until compelled to desist from the rise in the river, in which time they took out $1340. They used but one rocker, and have no doubt but they could have done much better with proper appliances. There were from sixty to seventy white men at work on Hill's Bar, and from four hundred to five hundred Indians, men, women, and children. The Indians are divided in opinion with regard to Americans, the more numerous party, headed by Pollock, a chief, are disposed to receive them favorably because they obtain more money for their labor from the "Bostons" than from "King George's men," as they style the English. They have learned the full value of their labor, and instead of one dollar a day, or an old shirt, for guiding and helping to work a boat up river, they now charge from five to eight dollars per day. Another portion of the Indians are in favor of driving off the "Bostons," being fearful of having their country overrun by them. Provisions were exceedingly dear and scarce, flour selling for eighty dollars the barrel, bacon at seventy-five cents a pound, and butter at one dollar a pound. They reached Hill's Bar in twenty-one days from San Francisco, and recommend the Victoria route as the most favorable."

ANOTHER EXPERIENCE.

"Among the mass of narrations," says a San Francisco paper, "with which we have been favored, relative to the Frazer River mines, since the arrival of the Panama, we select the subjoined account from Mr. Henry Ettling, a young gentleman of this city, who has been for some time mining on that river, at Hill's Bar, one hundred and sixty miles above the mouth, and the same place known by some persons here as Kennison's Bar. There were about seventy American miners on the Bar, and, previous to the late rise in the river, they were averaging one ounce a day to the hand; but, since the freshet, they have not made more than two dollars and a half to the hand daily. Mr. Ettling and his partner had never mined before, and were, consequently, green at the business; nevertheless, they realized together, six ounces in five days. Being unsupplied with a rocker they cut down a tree, made a rough substitute for a rocker, and perforated the holes with an iron spoon. The miners on the river appeared to be well satisfied with their operations. Mr. Ettling and his partner purchased a canoe at Port Townsend for $50, and navigated from there to Hill's Bar in it. He was three days from Port Townsend to the mouth of the river, and seven days from thence to Hill's Bar, 106 miles above. Wild ducks and geese were plentiful at the mouth, but no game had been seen beyond that point. Salmon, however, was abundant in the river, and were easily taken. Boots, shoes, clothing, tea, coffee, sugar, rice, etc., could be purchased at Forts Langley and Hope, but no meat. In returning he came from Hill's Bar to within five miles of the river's mouth, in one and one-half days, showing the great rapidity of the current. He saw two men weigh the proceeds of one day's labor, and it amounted to $42 50. The British war steamer Satellite was anchored off the mouth of Frazer River, and no canoe was allowed to land any where that had liquor on board.

NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, ESQ., OF CINCINNATI, AND THE VINEYARDS OF OHIO.

NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, ESQ.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY FORTER, OF CINCINNATI.]

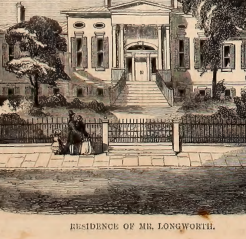
THE name of Nicholas Longworth has been so often before the public, and is so widely known in connection with the interest he has taken, during a period of thirty years, in the cultivation of the strawberry and the grape, and the making of native wine, that we have thought we could both entertain and instruct our readers by giving them some idea of the man, and a brief history of the origin and progress of the particular branch of American industry to which he has so perseveringly devoted his attention.

Mr. Longworth is a very peculiar specimen of a fine old American gentleman—self-made, self-informed, and self-directed. He is strong and decided in his opinions, liberal in his sentiments, warm in his friendships, and generous in his charities. But all these sentiments and affections must be manifested in his own time, and in accordance with his own plans and principles. His charities are regulated, and he will never give when he does not fully understand the case. He seldom refuses work to those who ask for it, deeming it for the occasion when he really has none waiting, and furnishing the necessary implements to those who have none of their own. The class to which he has been accustomed to give work, chiefly of the sort requiring picks and shovels, and garden tools, are not always of the most honest description, and he relates numerous instances in which his spades and hoes, and similar implements—new, sickness, and must not—have been carried off, at the close of the day, by those to whom he had loaned them to enable them to earn what he paid them for their day's work. The chief objects of his usual charities are those utterly destitute, and the least likely to obtain assistance from any body else. He has a whimsical theory that those whom every body will help are not entitled to any aid from him, and that he will confine his donations to the worthless and wretched vagabonds that every one else turns away from. That he does not strictly adhere to the rule, however, many worthy recipients of his bounty are ready to attest. A committee of Mormons, on a begging expedition, was once sent to him by a friend, with a note intimating that, as these people were not Christians, and seemed to be abandoned by every body that professed to be, they probably came within his rule, and he could consistently assist them. He did so without hesitation.

Over his immense wine-cellars, which will presently be described, he erected a large four-story building of brick, for the accommodation of poor laborers of both sexes. This different floors are reached by separate stairs and galleries, and each is divided into four-teen good-sized apartments, suitable for a man and his family, or two or three women. These rooms are generally all occupied, and those who are unable to pay are charged no rent. The building is well known among those for whose use it was built as the barracks. Notwithstanding the really charitable design of this construction, its tenants are the most ungrateful and troublesome of any he has to deal with. They annoy him incessantly, and have frequently broken into the wine-vaults below and stolen his choicest wine.

Another of Mr. Longworth's permanent and quiet charities is the weekly distribution at his house, every Monday morning, of three to eight hundred ten-cent loaves of bread to whoever will call for them. Once, when flour was high, and the bakers reduced the size of their loaves, Mr. Longworth thought he would be doing his beneficiaries a good turn by having them made partly of rye, and thus considerably enlarging their size. His customers, however, as soon as they found it out, raised such a clamor, and called him so many disparaging names, and annoyed him so much with their threats and complaints, that he was glad to order a return to the pure wheat. So crosses and ingratitude of this kind, of which he daily encounters his share, can weary the kindness of his heart, or distress him half so much as the sight of destitution and suffering, to alleviate which is one of the most generous and unostentatious impulses of his nature. Indeed, it is the ever-present concern of his life how to save those with whom he is thrown in contact from suffering and want. To contribute to the comfort or necessity of another, no matter how utterly degraded, he will deprive himself of any personal gratification at any moment.

It was stated by one of the daily papers of Cincinnati, during the war with Mexico, that Mr. Longworth had offered a contribution of ten thousand dollars toward the pay and equipment of a company of Ohio volunteers. A friend met him the following day, and congratulated him on his liberality and public spirit. "But it isn't exactly true," said Mr. Longworth; "you must first understand my proposition. I will give the ten thousand dollars, but only on condition that I have the selection of the persons that shall join the regiment; and I think I should make money by the operation."



When Professor Mitchell took in hand the establishment of an Astronomical Observatory, and went about soliciting popular subscriptions for the purpose, application was made to Mr. Longworth to know whether he would part with his Mount Adams property, and on what terms, as a site for the proposed Observatory. He at once made a donation for the purpose of four acres of ground on the top of the hill, conditioned only that it should be only used for the contemplated object, forever. After the erection of the building some cynical and captious person asserted, in an article published in the Cincinnati papers, that Mr. Longworth deserved very little credit for doing a thing that served so greatly to enhance his own contiguous property. As the writer of the article was known to be possessed of property quite as well suited for observatory purposes, Mr. Longworth immediately replied that if the objecter would donate to the Astronomical Society the same amount of land, he would erect upon it, at his own expense, a building equal to the one just completed by the Society, and convey the spot formerly given by himself to the city, as a place of public resort and promenade; suggesting to the writer that he might thus secure to himself all the advantages such an improvement would be to his adjacent property, and at the same time confer a lasting favor on the citizens of Cincinnati. This, of course, put an end to the discussion.

Mr. Longworth is small of stature, his height being about five feet and an inch, an evident stoop in his figure making him appear shorter than he really is. His hair, which is only partially gray, is thin, and scattered over the sides and back of his head. He was always regular and temperate in his habits, and is still vigorous and active, and gives daily personal attention to his business, spending much of his time with strings and pruning-knife in his grapery and garden. He was always a patient and willing worker, and age does not seem to reduce his activity, or weaken his interest in the labors and enjoyments of life. He answers himself all questions in relation to his vast property, and personally inspects the varied branches of his business. His maxim is, that no one who has work to do, and health and ability to do it, has any just cause of complaint; and often refers, with great satisfaction, to the time when he raised money for his own boyish expenses by selling about the streets the first newspaper published in his native town.

In all these transactions he is quick and decided, and dispatches them all in the fewest possible words; demanding equal conciseness and brevity from all who converse with him. He will not control his uneasiness if you annoy him with long speeches, and do not come directly to the point of your business. Until a few years since, when a stroke of disease somewhat impaired the facility, he was possessed of a remarkably comprehensive and tenacious memory, forgetting nothing he ever knew and nothing he ever told. He repeats his quotations and tells his stories, of which he has a varied and endless store, always in the same invariable words. Of late years he finds frequent occasion to complain, when at a loss for a noun or a date, that "Old Longworth is getting so forgetful." A stranger, however, would scarcely notice the defect. He has the memory in matters relating to his business and his daily engagements, he usually carries a miscellaneous assortment of papers in the crown of his hat, and a small paper memorandum pinned upon his coat-sleeve.

Mr. Longworth is exceedingly talkative and companionable, perfectly sincere, and in his hospitality knows no distinction of persons. He is sharp and sarcastic in repartee, thoroughly informed in his facts facetious and cheerful in his humor, which is one of his most characteristic traits, and abounding in quizzes and anecdotes of the most enlivening and laughable description. He is particularly fond of banter, and of speaking of himself in the third person—most commonly as "Old Longworth."

"Longworth ought to have a lasting to-day," he will say, "for forgetting that appointment." "These are very hard times, Sir," said a friend to him the other day, excusing himself for not being able to make a

RESIDENCE OF MR. LONGWORTH.

MR. LONGWORTH'S WINE-CELLARS—THE WINE-PRESS.

MR. LONGWORTH'S VINEYARD, NEAR CINCINNATI.

MR. LONGWORTH'S WINE-CELLARS—CORKING THE BOTTLES.

payment, "very hard times, Sir." "Yes," he quickly replied; "but don't you know they are just as hard for Old Longworth as any body else?" A man applied to him not long since for two hundred and fifty dollars, to aid him in making a working model of a new machine he had invented, which was to perform unheard-of wonders. "I don't know any thing about your machine," said Mr. Longworth, "but I will give you the money if you will bring me the testimony of three competent persons of this city that it will do what you say it will." Mr. Longworth then named several persons whose approval would be satisfactory, and the man went off. The next day he returned with the information that Mr. G——, one of the gentlemen named by Mr. Longworth, and one of the first machinists of the city, had examined his invention, and pronounced it fully equal to all he had claimed for it. "I don't know how to believe that story," said Mr. Longworth; "for Mr. G—— wouldn't have recommended your machine unless he had believed what you said of it; and if he believed it was as good a thing as you said it was, he wouldn't have sent you back to Old Longworth at all; he wouldn't have let Longworth have any thing to do with it. I must have his approval in writing, Sir, or it won't answer."

Of personal pride Mr. Longworth has not a trace. It is to him a matter of thorough indifference whether his clothes are new or in any possible resemblance to style and fit; and if they should be somewhat overworn, or soiled by labor in his garden, or here and there torn a bit, it is to him no matter. He may, when the dilapidation is a little excessive, and the company more elegant than he expected, get off a sly joke or two about his appearance in such fashionable company, and say that his wife would scold him for not brushing up a little when he was going out among gentlemen; but he will feel not the slightest personal concern about it, and the very consciousness of it will pass away with the quizzical smile with which his apology will be accompanied. He boasts of being a Democrat in the strict technical meaning of the term. "You have never," said one to him while passing the fine façade of the new Opera House, "you have never interested yourself, Mr. Longworth, in elegant blocks and costly buildings?" "No, Sir," he replied; "I have had too much to do putting up houses for the Democrats; the aristocrats can put up their own." His own house is a plain but capacious and home-looking building, and its fine locality and beautiful garden and surrounding grounds render it the most popularly attractive spot in the city. As "Mr. Longworth's Garden" it is known throughout the Western country; and it is freely used, by citizens and strangers, as a place of visit and promenade. In it are several fine conservatories, well filled with exotic and rare plants, a grape-house for foreign vines, and an experimental forcing-house for new varieties of strawberries and other plants. In one of the hot-houses is a large basin, in which is growing a fine specimen of the Victoria Regia. A cactus-house, containing the largest collection of cacti in the United States, was destroyed by fire a few years ago.

Mr. Longworth is a native of Newark, New Jersey. After making a trial of mercantile business in the State of South Carolina for a couple of years, he went, in 1804, the year of his majority, to Cincinnati, and entered the office of Judge Jacob Burnet as a law student. He pursued his studies about six months, and then dashed into the practice of his hastily acquired profession in the rough and irregular way peculiar to that primitive period. He foresaw, at an early period of his residence in the West, the future greatness of the then insignificant village of Cincinnati; and though unsustained in his opinions by those of his fellow-settlers in the new community, took advantage of their unbelief, and began a series of systematic investment of every thing he could make by his services as lawyer and land-agent in the well-wooded acres surrounding the original clearing of Fort Washington and Losantiville. He bought for trifling sums whatever was rejected by every body else, and thus acquired the title, which he retains to this day, to some of the most valuable portions of the present city and its immediate suburbs. By this means he accumulated, in the course of a few years, an amount of property that, in 1830, rendered him the wealthiest man of the city; and he then gave up his profession that he might devote himself to the management and improvement of his estate.

But his attention was not wholly occupied by the care of his real property. He always manifested a fondness for the cultivation of fruits and flowers, and at an early period astonished the Western people by the beauty and extent of his garden. He took much pains to gather from all parts of the West the most valuable and interesting of our native vegetable productions, and placed them in circumstances to test their susceptibility to improvement by aid of the best systems of garden and green-house culture then known. Many of our beautiful native plants, now familiarly known as favorite florists' flowers, are indebted to him for their introduction into cultivated society, their native home being the forests and prairies of the Western States. He was always curious after new and interesting things of Nature's producing. It was the remark of an old citizen of Cincinnati that, if Mr. Longworth was to be suddenly thrown, neck and heels, into the Ohio River, he would come to the surface with a new variety of fish in each hand. His chief interest in horticultural matters, however, has been expended upon the strawberry and the grape. The perfection of variety and culture to which he has, by his experiments and labors, brought these two important fruits of the country, have established their extensive and systematic cultivation in all parts of the West.

It is with the grape, however, as a wine producer, that Mr. Longworth's labors have been most assiduous and most successful; and, with a notice of his operations in this regard, we shall close our present sketch. It will not, of course, be inferred from what we have said that Mr. Longworth is the inventor of native wine, or the originator of the Catawba grape, from which it is chiefly made. The Catawba, it must now be generally known, is a native of North Carolina, having been first brought into public notice as a wine-grape by Major Adlum, of Washington; and the knowledge of the fact that wine, in an experimental way, had been made from its fruit, induced Mr. Longworth to enter systematically upon its cultivation, and to take measures for manufacturing the wine on a scale extensive enough to encourage the establishment of numerous vineyards, and to afford a market on his own premises for all the Must that could be made and delivered to him in a circuit of fifty miles. At the same time he offered a reward of five hundred dollars to whoever should discover a better variety. It proved a great stimulus to the growth of the Catawba vine in the neighborhood of Cincinnati, to know that a man of Mr. Longworth's means stood ready to pay cash, at the rate of from a dollar to a dollar and a quarter a gallon, for all the grape juice that might be brought to him, without reference to the quantity. It was in this way, and by urgent popular appeals through the columns of the newspapers, that he succeeded, after many failures, and against the depressing influence of much doubt and indifference, in bringing the enterprise up to its present high and staple position. When he took the matter in hand there was much to discourage any one not possessed of the traits of constancy of purpose and perseverance peculiar to Mr. Longworth. Many had tried the manufacture of wine, and had failed to give it any economical or commercial importance. It was not believed, until Mr. Longworth practically demonstrated it, after many long and patient trials of many valued varieties from France and Madeira, none of which gave any promise of success, that a native grape was the only one upon which any hope could be placed, and that of the native grapes, of which he had experimented upon every known variety, the Catawba offered the most assured promise of success, and was the one upon which all vine-growers might with confidence depend. It took years of unremitted care, multiplied and wide-spread investigations, and the expenditure of large sums of money, to establish this fact, and bring the agricultural community to accept it and act under its guidance. The success attained by Mr. Longworth soon induced other gentlemen resident in the vicinity of Cincinnati, and favorably situated for the purpose, to undertake the culture of the Catawba, and several of them are now regularly and extensively engaged in the manufacture of wine. The impetus and encouragement thus given to the business soon led the German citizens of Hamilton County to perceive its advantages, and under their thrifty management thousands of acres, stretching up from the banks of the Ohio, are now covered with luxuriant and profitable vineyards, rivaling in profusion and beauty the vine-clad hills of Italy and France. The oldest vineyard in the County of Hamilton is of Mr. Longworth's planting. The annual product of these vineyards may be set down at between five and six hundred thousand gallons, worth at present from one and a half to two dollars a gallon; but the price, owing to the rapidity of the consumption, will probably advance rather than decline. It is the prophecy of Mr. Flagg, Mr. Longworth's son-in-law, the gentleman who has charge of the commercial department of his wine business, that, in the course of comparatively few years, the annual product of the Sparkling Catawba will be counted by millions of bottles, while that of the still sorts will be estimated by its millions of gallons. Mr. Longworth alone bottles annually over 150,000 bottles, and has now in his cellars a ripening stock of 300,000 bottles. These cellars are situated on the declivity of East Sixth Street on the road to Observatory Hill. They occupy a space ninety feet by one hundred and twenty-five, and consist of two tiers of massive stone vaults, the lower of which is twenty-five feet below the surface of the ground. Here are carried on all the various processes of wine-making, the mashing, pressing, fining, racking, bottling, labeling, and boxing; and beneath the arches and along the walls are the wine butts, arranged and numbered in the order of the several vintages; piles of bottles stand about, ready for the bottlers.

Mr. Longworth has for some years been laboring to encourage the more extended growth of the Herbemont grape, having great confidence in its wine-making qualities. So far, however, the results of these efforts have not been very encouraging, though his estimate of the value of this grape for wine purposes still remains undiminished. The Isabella, which in the earlier years of vine-growing was largely planted, soon fell into disfavor, and was very generally cast out of Western vineyards, as unworthy of attention as a wine-making grape. Mr. Longworth's discovery of its excellent qualities in the manufacture of sparkling wines, in which he was the first successful experimenter in this country, and his undertaking—as in the case of the Catawba—to pay cash for all the raw juice that should be brought to him, has rallied its culture, and it is now recovering its good standing as a useful and profitable product.

Another object that has long engaged Mr. Longworth's attention, and toward the accomplishment of which he has already made many encouraging experiments, with numerous varieties of native and hybrid black and dark-skinned grapes, is the production of an agreeable, light-bodied, cool, tonic red wine, similar to the genuine Burgundy and the pure clarets of Europe. Red wines have been made in this country, but none that have fulfilled all the required conditions, or that promise much economical importance. Mr. Longworth is still extending his inquiries, and pushing his experiments, in full confidence that this desirable end will yet be attained; and still prophesies the day when a profitable, palatable, and wholesome red wine will be added to the native products of the Mississippi Valley; completely verifying the poetic and cheerful vision of Mr. Flagg, Mr. Longworth's friend and assistant.

MY FIRST AND LAST NOVEL.

PART I.

You asked me once if I had ever had a secret from my husband.

Answering "Yes," I promised some day to tell you all about it: I will do so now.

When we were first married, and for a time afterward, we were poor; neither of us were used to poverty. I was the youngest, and had been the pet, of a large family; I was inexperienced in every way, and somewhat spoiled by indulgence. Kenelm, my husband, was several years older than his little wife; he was good, grave, and wise; there was something in his character that made people afraid of him; when he courted me, my sisters held him in awe; yet, strangely enough, I, coward as I was in most respects, felt nothing of this awe till afterward, but treated him with girlish audacity and tyranny. I knew my power.

I must not allow myself to tell you of our happiness during the first months after our marriage; that has nothing to do with this story; for then I had not the ghost of a secret from my husband. It is true that I was forced to be very quiet during the earlier part of the day, when the scratching of Kenelm's pen was almost the only sound to be heard in our house; but I indemnified myself in the evening for the morning's silence.

We had married in the early spring; the following winter Kenelm fell ill, very ill. Necessarily his illness increased our expenses; and I, without any regard to cost, or any thought of whose labor must pay for all, procured every thing that I fancied might please him or do him good. When he was convalescent, the doctor ordered him not to write for months to come. I understood his smile as he listened to this decree; it smote me with sharp, sudden pain; I remember I ran away to weep.

"I must write, my child; we are in debt—we want money." This was all his answer to my tearful remonstrance, when long, long before he was strong, I saw him settle down to work.

For the first time I shrank away from his mild glance; for the first time the deep tenderness of his tone sounded to me as a reproach.

I went from his study into the garden. It was spring; but I paid no heed to the loveliness of the sunny morning. To-day I was too miserable to weep, for the first time in my life perhaps. I stood, leaning my head against a tree, absorbed in self-reproachful thought—knowing, for the first time, how dreadful a thing it was to want money.

I had one friend living near; she had been Kenelm's friend for years and years, but now she was especially mine. It chanced that she passed our gate that morning, and, seeing me, came in for a few moments.

"You, Minnie, of all women in the world, to look upon this sweet day with so sad a face! What ails you, dear? Kenelm is getting well."

"But he will be ill again. The doctor says he should have change and perfect rest, and—he is at work. I have been extravagant—we want money." She was grave immediately.

"Poor dear!" she said; "no wonder you are not merry. Oh, that money!" She softly stroked my hand, and fell into meditative silence.

Presently she cried, quite abruptly, "Minnie, you shall write a novel!"

I started, and blushed as if she had proposed to me to commit a crime.

"Yes," she repeated, "you shall write a novel. I have a little leisure—nothing else, alas!—at your service. You write; I will revise and manage all besides."

"But—Kenelm—"

"Would he not like it? Ah! perhaps not. I had forgotten. Good, almost perfect as he is, he has his prejudices."

"But if I could write a book! If I could earn enough money to take him to the sea-side—I would risk the rest. I will not be afraid; I will try and write a novel; only he shall never know unless I succeed."

"Is it well to have a secret from your husband?"

"Just this one. I must try. It would be so glorious if I were to succeed."

"You should know best. But, Minnie, I had rather you told him."

"No, no, no; not unless I succeed. What makes you think that I can write a book?"

"I have seen little attempts of yours—do not blush—and bits, only bits, of your letters to Kenelm. If Mrs. Kenelm Cameron writes her book as simply and fervently as Minnie Grey wrote her love-letters, it will do—always provided that, before she begins it, she quite makes up her mind what it is to be about."

"That is the puzzle."

"It will not long remain so, if the book is destined to be written."

I took leave of her absently, already pondering what my book was to be about.

For three days and three nights I continued to ponder this matter. When Kenelm asked of what I was thinking, I blushed, giving the stupid answer, "Nothing particular." He looked surprised, but said nothing further.

Now, in all that follows, it may seem to you that if I had given the matter a playful turn, and if my husband had trusted me as he ought to have done, no unhappiness would have ensued. It was not in my power to think of my secret lightly—directly I had a secret from my husband, I turned coward, and became morbidly timid in his presence. And he—he did not suspect me of wrong-doing; it was my want of confidence toward him that he mourned. I think I have heard Kenelm say that it is in the natures acted upon, not in the acts themselves, that the elements of Tragedy and Comedy are contained. I suppose we each acted as it was our nature to act.

When these three days and nights of meditation had proved fruitless, I drowned my hope in tears. I had found no subject of which I felt competent to treat, no cause to advocate, and I utterly despaired.

A day or two afterward an acquaintance sent us tickets for a concert: in the evening she called for us. My husband was not well enough to go—I hated to go without him; but he sent me, because he thought that I was beginning to pine in a too quiet life. I felt very ungrateful toward the friend who carried me off so sorely against my will.

It was a "classical" concert of instrumental music: I loved such music. Yet by-and-by I found that I was not listening to it. I was writing—nay, rather contemplating—my book! It did not suggest itself to me bit by bit, but I seemed to grasp it all—plot, purpose, incident—at once. I literally hugged myself under cover of my little white cloak, and said, "This will do."

I let myself into the house. I had made Kenelm promise not to sit up, and had ordered Ann to go to bed. How glad I was of this!

The lamp and the fire burned in the parlor, and the little supper-tray stood ready.

I had made no noise. I stole up to my room, found Kenelm asleep, looking very wan and worn; I bent down and kissed him lightly, then ran away.

In the parlor I sat down to write, and I wrote—hour after hour. When the lamp went out, I looked up in consternation—it was growing light.

Very carefully I gathered together my precious sheets; I put them within a book (a cookery-book, I remember), and hid that at the bottom of my work-table. I crept to bed cold, tired, and happy, but did not fall asleep till broad daylight.

When I woke, Kenelm stood by my bedside with my breakfast upon a tray. "Is it late?" I asked, starting up.

"Nearly eleven, love."

How I was to manage to write in the day-time, was the problem that occupied me while I dressed. We had an unfurnished room in our house. I was soon locked into that. I spread my paper on a box, a box that had gone with us on our wedding journey, and crouched upon the floor to write. I left off just in time to prepare for dinner—to smoothe my hair, dip my hot brow in water, and wash the ink-stains off my fingers.

"I wanted you to stitch up my manuscript, Minnie," Kenelm said; "but as I didn't find you in the house, I contrived to do it myself. I suppose you have been working in the garden—too hard, I think; you look flushed."

"My face is rather hot. Now, where shall we walk this evening?" I asked, and began to talk hurriedly of primroses, violets, blue-bells, and the probability of our finding them in the fields around.

That was an exquisite evening. As we wandered about the lanes and meadows, Kenelm sometimes leaned on me, I sometimes on him; and I said to myself, "So it should be in life; why should my husband work always, and I sit idle all my days?"

Kenelm told me next day that he must go into town, and should not get home till evening. He had not incurred this fatigue since his illness, and was not fit for it. I did not think of this then; I did not offer to go for him, or beg to go with him; I thought joyfully of the long day before me. He left home at ten, to return at seven.

I told Ann to say that I was engaged if any one should call, and I locked myself into the empty chamber. I uttered a cry of joy as I began my work—I had such delight in it.

I left off to pretend to dine, but I had no appetite, and soon recommenced.

Toward the end of the afternoon I found I could go on no longer. My temples burned, and yet I felt as if numbed by excessive cold, and my head began to ache intensely.

Kenelm was late; it was getting dusky when he came, and I shunned what little light there was. He was tired, and after tea lay upon the couch; I sat beside him on a low seat, and rested my aching head on his breast.

By-and-by Ann came in with the lamp, and then Kenelm asked me to read to him. I rose with some difficulty, I felt so weak and weary. Unwittingly I turned my face full to the light as I opened the new book he had brought home, and his eyes were upon me as they generally were, as I had formerly loved to have them.

"Minnie!" he exclaimed; then started up and came to me. He took my hands, and gazed into my face. This time I was not sorry to feel thick blushes covering my pallor.

Somewhat pettishly I cried, "You startle me, Kenelm," and I tried to turn away. He would not let me.

"You look wretchedly ill, Minnie. You have been crying much again—so soon! What is it that troubles you? My poor child must tell me!"

"I have nothing to tell you. You are foolish—nothing troubles me!" But he continued to gaze at me so tenderly, so sorrowfully, that I could not bear it. To convince him that nothing was the matter, I burst into tears and sobbed upon his bosom, for he folded me in his arms.

I thought that all was over—that my secret would out, or my heart would break; but he questioned me no more; only soothed and caressed me.

Next morning I rejoiced that my secret was still in my keeping.

When I went down into the parlor Kenelm held a visiting-card in his hand, at which he was looking with surprise.

"My friend Ashtower here yesterday, and you did not tell me! You asked him to come again, I hope? You are well aware that I have long desired to see him."

I paused at the door, with a face expressing blank consternation. "I—did not know," I faltered.

Yes; I was afraid of Kenelm. His eyes perused my face keenly.

"You did not know? It was Ann's fault, then. This is very vexatious!" He was about to ring the bell.

"Stay!" I cried; "it was not her fault. I told her, if any body came, to say I was engaged. Of course she did not know that I would have seen your friend! Till this moment I did not know he had been here."

"And why, my dear wife, would you see nobody yesterday?"

"Don't say 'my dear wife' in that horrid way. I suppose I was not in the humor for company, as you had left me alone!" I took refuge in a kind of petulant naughtiness, pouted, and made an unnecessary noise with the cups and saucers.

My husband did not speak for some time. Then he said, with a nettled fretfulness that I well understood, "I think, Minnie, that you owe me an explicit explanation. I trust that your good sense will tell you to offer me such. As I am conscious that my wife can not act in a way of which she has need to be ashamed, I do not understand her having any mystery."

I had heard people say that sometimes my husband appeared to hide an iron hand within his velvet glove. I recalled the saying now, and asked myself indignantly if he meant to make me feel the smooth inflexibility of his character. I was angry with him.

I offered no word of apology, but remained silent. I could not cut; the first mouthful seemed like to choke me. This made me seem all the more sullen.

No wonder that my noble, high-minded husband looked grieved to the heart at such an sign of childish perversity.

When, after breakfast, I sought the bare room, and locked myself in, I trembled, taking home the moral that was evolving, without conscious effort of mine, from the adventure. I was angry with—a Wife's Secret."

I felt the possibility of my little troubles dominating and widening terribly. I cried, passionately, to "I will persevere; but I must finish noon—I can not bear this long."

I had taken it for granted that Kenelm had work to do; but when I had finished my duties, just before dinner-time, I saw him lying on our little sofa, to look beside him.

"He is angry," I thought. "This is the first holiday on which he has done without me. I'm sorry. There was surely no serious staggering by the way in my book. I wrote in desperate haste to have finished it.

PART II.

WITH Kenelm's many letters one morning came a letter for me. I received it from him, and, blushed as I thought of its late presence in his hand, was from my friend in answer to a note I had sent her almost my book.

By this time I had become morbidly nervous. I was haunted by a vague sense of wrong-doing, and a cruel being driven to tell a direct falsehood. I had had more than one terrible alarm of detection.

After pocketing my letter I carefully avoided looking toward my husband.

"Read this, Minnie," he said, presently, putting one of the letters he had received before me.

I obeyed.

"What shall you do, Kenelm? Shall you go?"

I asked, when I had finished. It was from one of my husband's brothers, begging for his attendance at the stern old father, who had been bitterly offended—how, does not concern the reader.

"I shall we go, you surely mean, Minnie?"

I dropped my head; my work was nearly completed; my husband's book was to be out in a week. We had been so estranged lately, my longing to have done with this and every other task was very great: if I were left alone a day or two, it could be safely completed.

"Perhaps you are right, and I ought to go alone," Kenelm said, after a painful silence.

"I think you should. It is an imperative journey; your father does not like me, and"— "I feel rather my self with had been thus eager that we should not separate. You have been angry with your self, but—you are changed, Mary." He rose as he spoke.

"Do not say I am changed! Do not speak so! I can not bear it!" I spoke passionately. He came to my side, sat down by me, and took my hand.

"If I am to be of any use, I should go to-day—alone," he began. "The last few weeks, Minnie, something has divided us. Shall we not be one again before we part?"

I was silent; I did not raise my eyes. Perhaps in the struggle to appear unmoved I looked obstinate and cross, for Kenelm's tone changed.

"That letter—remember, Mary, that I do not cease to suspect you of wrong; it is simply your want of confidence that I deplore."

"Suspect me of wrong indeed!" I cried, again taking refuge in that petulant unreasonableness which husbands men sorely. "It is you, Kenelm, who have no confidence in me! I am not to be trusted—if the were a mere child."

"If the time is gone by when she believed to be so trusted—when she made me her conscience-keeper, telling them all—I must painfully learn how this changed wife desires that I should treat her."

I was only by looking back afterward that I could understand how much change he found in me now—how many signs he saw that my nature was at war with itself, or even chiefly, his—besides reading that in my often altered face. I was, in fact, so much absorbed in my neglected, or performed by Ann; many minute cares for Kenelm omitted during those seven weeks.

As I used my husband's clothes I shed some tears over them. When he was away from me, I was a most painfully calm leave-taking, I felt utterly miserable; I spent the day between crying and sleeping, and only thought of my book with disgust and loathing.

Next morning brought me a confidential few kind lines from Kenelm, written the night before, from the resting-place which was half-way toward his father's end.

Having further stimulated my courage by reperusing my friend's note, which told me of the favorable arrangements she hoped to make for the immediate publication of my book, I set to work.

The misery of my heroine was approaching its climax; I was even with her, shaken by her fears, torn by her passions, transported by her hope.

Highly-wrought excitement kept me up. While Kenelm was away, I did not go into the garden; I could not eat, and I hardly slept.

One night—I had heard Ann go to bed long before, and there was no sound or stir in the silent house—my self-possession, my sense of my own importance, my toughness of nerve, failed.

I crouched upon the bare floor in the bare room. I had locked myself in myself from the woes into which I had plunged "the wife" by my invention. I could not—intense emotion overpowered me. Sick with anguish, I cried out, "Kenelm, husband! Good God! this is more than I can bear!"

I covered my face; that cry had startled me back to myself, and great terror came over me; I dared not open my face lest I should see—what.

As I continued to crouch there, covering my face, I became aware that something stirred in the room, that chill breath fanned my neck and cheek.

I raised my head, seeking light.

A dull red light burned out; I was alone in stirring darkness—the thick darkness of a close-shut room. I strained my eyes into it; I seemed to be chained to the spot.

Suddenly my excited fancy made my husband present to me, standing in the air and looking down regarding me. He was pale; his expression was unspeakably sad, unspeakably spectral.

I spread out my arms toward him; my senses failed me, my last consciousness being of a blow and a flash of pain.

Daylight was streaming through all cracks and crevices when I recovered. I found myself lying with my face upon the floor. I sat up, feeling very cold, and turned sick and dizzy when I saw a pool of blood close to me. I had fallen, and the lip-and-lay I managed to get to my bedroom, and, after washing my drained brow, discovered a small but deep wound on my left temple. I had fallen against a sharp iron-bound corner of the box which was a flash of pain.

I did not distinctly recall what had frightened me. I felt myself weak, and lay on my bed quite still for several hours. Then I rose, dressed, ordered Ann to bring me some coffee into my room. She was in some darkness, for I could not bear to see her nothing particular in my appearance. I told her I was not very well, and did not wish to be disturbed.

The hot, strong coffee revived me wonderfully, and my self-control returned to my all but finished work.

My book was not a tragedy; it was to end quietly, peacefully, perfectly, in a happy manner-day. I laughed softly over the happiness of my heroine, and wept over the tears that blinded me from my eyes. I sat close to the open window on that lovely day, in a deliciously subdued and sympathetic mood, and wrote the last few pages of my chapters.

Then one brief interruption only I continued to write till late in the afternoon. I no longer wrote with fervor and passion, but, as I remember, with a quiet sense of happiness.

I had finished. I said "Thank God!"

My heroine was safe; my task was almost crowned like happiness clamorously. "Make haste and come home, Kenelm," I cried.

I went down stairs to wait for string, wax, and stamps, my book must be immediately sent off.

I was startled to find a letter from my husband. How long had it lain there unopened? I pressed it to my lips and to my bosom before I read it.

It said he would be home next evening. What happiness! This evening at seven, it said; what could I wish for more?

Even as I wondered, our clock struck—seven. There I stood in my loose, tumbled white dressing-gown, my hair wildly disordered, my hands stained with ink, and my cheeks with tears. I could not open the door like a dreadful nightmare dream.

My head began to ache maddeningly. I thought how none of my intended preparations for Kenelm's return were made; and I—was I fit to meet him? I pressed my hand to my head, and unwittingly displaced the plaster upon my wound, from which the blood began to flow.

I would have gone to bed at once, but to recall one hour then.

I heard the garden-gate. I saw Kenelm come up the path, and still I could not move.

The room-door opened and admitted my husband.

He paused in sad amazement.

His face was white as death. I had seen in my vision, which now vividly returned to me. I recollected and believed that I was a vision too. His form seemed to waver and flicker, and I sank with a moan upon my feet.

I heard the garden-gate. I saw Kenelm come up the path, and still I could not move.

The room-door opened and admitted my husband.

He paused in sad amazement.

His face was white as death. I had seen in my vision, which now vividly returned to me. I recollected and believed that I was a vision too. His form seemed to waver and flicker, and I sank with a moan upon my feet.

As I continued to crouch there, covering my face, I became aware that something stirred in the room, that chill breath fanned my neck and cheek.

I raised my head, seeking light.

A dull red light burned out; I was alone in stirring darkness—the thick darkness of a close-shut room. I strained my eyes into it; I seemed to be chained to the spot.

Suddenly my excited fancy made my husband present to me, standing in the air and looking down regarding me. He was pale; his expression was unspeakably sad, unspeakably spectral.

I spread out my arms toward him; my senses failed me, my last consciousness being of a blow and a flash of pain.

Daylight was streaming through all cracks and crevices when I recovered. I found myself lying with my face upon the floor. I sat up, feeling very cold, and turned sick and dizzy when I saw a pool of blood close to me. I had fallen, and the lip-and-lay I managed to get to my bedroom, and, after washing my drained brow, discovered a small but deep wound on my left temple. I had fallen against a sharp iron-bound corner of the box which was a flash of pain.

I did not distinctly recall what had frightened me. I felt myself weak, and lay on my bed quite still for several hours. Then I rose, dressed, ordered Ann to bring me some coffee into my room. She was in some darkness, for I could not bear to see her nothing particular in my appearance. I told her I was not very well, and did not wish to be disturbed.

The hot, strong coffee revived me wonderfully, and my self-control returned to my all but finished work.

My book was not a tragedy; it was to end quietly, peacefully, perfectly, in a happy manner-day. I laughed softly over the happiness of my heroine, and wept over the tears that blinded me from my eyes. I sat close to the open window on that lovely day, in a deliciously subdued and sympathetic mood, and wrote the last few pages of my chapters.

Then one brief interruption only I continued to write till late in the afternoon. I no longer wrote with fervor and passion, but, as I remember, with a quiet sense of happiness.

I had finished. I said "Thank God!"

My heroine was safe; my task was almost crowned like happiness clamorously. "Make haste and come home, Kenelm," I cried.

I went down stairs to wait for string, wax, and stamps, my book must be immediately sent off.

I was startled to find a letter from my husband. How long had it lain there unopened? I pressed it to my lips and to my bosom before I read it.

It said he would be home next evening. What happiness! This evening at seven, it said; what could I wish for more?

Even as I wondered, our clock struck—seven. There I stood in my loose, tumbled white dressing-gown, my hair wildly disordered, my hands stained with ink, and my cheeks with tears. I could not open the door like a dreadful nightmare dream.

My head began to ache maddeningly. I thought how none of my intended preparations for Kenelm's return were made; and I—was I fit to meet him? I pressed my hand to my head, and unwittingly displaced the plaster upon my wound, from which the blood began to flow.

I would have gone to bed at once, but to recall one hour then.

I heard the garden-gate. I saw Kenelm come up the path, and still I could not move.

The room-door opened and admitted my husband.

He paused in sad amazement.

His face was white as death. I had seen in my vision, which now vividly returned to me. I recollected and believed that I was a vision too. His form seemed to waver and flicker, and I sank with a moan upon my feet.

As I continued to crouch there, covering my face, I became aware that something stirred in the room, that chill breath fanned my neck and cheek.

I raised my head, seeking light.

A dull red light burned out; I was alone in stirring darkness—the thick darkness of a close-shut room. I strained my eyes into it; I seemed to be chained to the spot.

Suddenly my excited fancy made my husband present to me, standing in the air and looking down regarding me. He was pale; his expression was unspeakably sad, unspeakably spectral.

I spread out my arms toward him; my senses failed me, my last consciousness being of a blow and a flash of pain.

Daylight was streaming through all cracks and crevices when I recovered. I found myself lying with my face upon the floor. I sat up, feeling very cold, and turned sick and dizzy when I saw a pool of blood close to me. I had fallen, and the lip-and-lay I managed to get to my bedroom, and, after washing my drained brow, discovered a small but deep wound on my left temple. I had fallen against a sharp iron-bound corner of the box which was a flash of pain.

I did not distinctly recall what had frightened me. I felt myself weak, and lay on my bed quite still for several hours. Then I rose, dressed, ordered Ann to bring me some coffee into my room. She was in some darkness, for I could not bear to see her nothing particular in my appearance. I told her I was not very well, and did not wish to be disturbed.

The hot, strong coffee revived me wonderfully, and my self-control returned to my all but finished work.

My book was not a tragedy; it was to end quietly, peacefully, perfectly, in a happy manner-day. I laughed softly over the happiness of my heroine, and wept over the tears that blinded me from my eyes. I sat close to the open window on that lovely day, in a deliciously subdued and sympathetic mood, and wrote the last few pages of my chapters.

Then one brief interruption only I continued to write till late in the afternoon. I no longer wrote with fervor and passion, but, as I remember, with a quiet sense of happiness.

I had finished. I said "Thank God!"

My heroine was safe; my task was almost crowned like happiness clamorously. "Make haste and come home, Kenelm," I cried.

I went down stairs to wait for string, wax, and stamps, my book must be immediately sent off.

I was startled to find a letter from my husband. How long had it lain there unopened? I pressed it to my lips and to my bosom before I read it.

It said he would be home next evening. What happiness! This evening at seven, it said; what could I wish for more?

Even as I wondered, our clock struck—seven. There I stood in my loose, tumbled white dressing-gown, my hair wildly disordered, my hands stained with ink, and my cheeks with tears. I could not open the door like a dreadful nightmare dream.

My head began to ache maddeningly. I thought how none of my intended preparations for Kenelm's return were made; and I—was I fit to meet him? I pressed my hand to my head, and unwittingly displaced the plaster upon my wound, from which the blood began to flow.

I would have gone to bed at once, but to recall one hour then.

I heard the garden-gate. I saw Kenelm come up the path, and still I could not move.

The room-door opened and admitted my husband.

He paused in sad amazement.

His face was white as death. I had seen in my vision, which now vividly returned to me. I recollected and believed that I was a vision too. His form seemed to waver and flicker, and I sank with a moan upon my feet.

"I am sorry, Minnie"—he grieved, I began; "I did not expect you yet. I had only just read your letter."

"Do not talk now—rest, love. Was this just done?"

"No; I struck my head last night, and—"

"My poor wounded darling!"

"Minnie, you must not talk so sadly. He read to me till he thought I was asleep; then I knew that he watched by me until before he went away. How I longed to clasp him round the neck and tell him all my secret, but I was afraid and ashamed.

When I had heard him go down stairs and shut the parlor-door behind him, I sprang up. My illness was forgotten, I was unhocked; all my papers lay about the floor!

I rearred the key, but, as I got into bed again, it fell from my hand, and I slept.

The noise had disturbed Kenelm. I heard him coming, and buried my face in my pillow. As I clasped the key I recovered my fervent vows never again to have a secret.

Minnie, my wife, it is you who want change now," he said, next day. "You look ill, and you must be very weak to have been so much distressed as you were yesterday, merely by my sudden arrival. Would you like to go home for a little while?"

"Oh Kenelm! see much?" I knew that my face looked brightly for indeed I longed after them all, and thought that it would be a delicious rest to be at home with him.

"I will go, if thought you would like it. So you have pined for home, Minnie?"

"Indeed, I am very glad. This is my home. I will not go to my father's if you say such things."

"Well, well! do not believe I reproach you, darling. We will go forth in peace."

"Peace!"

I think it will be as well that you should go soon; for a few weeks I must work very hard, and shall be even duller company than ever."

"My poor wife! I will leave alone? Oh Kenelm, what does this mean?"

"Indeed, I can not tell," he said. "But I know that you are neither well nor happy. I know that our poverty has pressed its privations upon you. Let me give you time to plan your dull life here—"

"What more do you know?" I asked, defiantly.

He answered with mild, even-toned voice, too absolutely burning me by the urgent pressure of his eyes. "I know that in some odd way—it is my own fault, it may be—I have lost my wife's confidence; I shall regain it in time if one of the things I will learn to do without."

"What more, Sir?" I demanded, hotly.

"That is all. I love you on at home, Minnie, and I am alone again for a little while, we may each be the better for it. Be what, and how for, we have erred, and then be able to begin our married life afresh."

He spoke as if such serious danger impended—as if such utter ruin threatened our peace—that I shuddered. I could not speak, too, as if he forgot all the happy, happy months when I had been so devoted and contented with, and only remembered the last few weeks. This made me angry with the subject! He was exaggerating every thing!

"I shall not go home unless you command me, and I am sure you will not do that," I began to say, but I could not even end my sentence.

"Minnie, you are cruel and unjust!"

He spoke in a voice of trembling of rights; I was planning for your happiness, but indeed I would in the end."

"I do not see why you should call me cruel and unjust. Again I repeat, I do not stoop to suspect you of wrong; your having a secret from me is sufficient proof that you have kept it, in my only ground of displeasure. It may be that a man's character is above to blame; that I am too stern; but I have hoped that my wife loved me too well to fear me."

"I do not fear you, Kenelm, she does!" I sprang after him as he turned sadly away. But then my self-control returned, and the key of the Blue-beard chamber fell from my dress, and I stopped, his gesture of guilty confusion.

"Kenelm, I am ill. This is not the first time you have let it fall," he said, as he gave it me.

"I am ill, indeed. My last night's sleep had been feigned. It hardened my heart to think how deceitful he must believe me to be, and to remember with contempt the motive of all this long confinement.

Kenelm went to his study, as I imagined, shutting himself in there for the morning.

I felt utterly reckless. Unknown to myself, a desire to punish him was beginning to mingle with the other motives that determined me to persevere in my self-control. I felt that the lower I now sank in my husband's esteem the higher should I rise by-and-by when he knew all—when my hour of triumph came.

Once more I locked myself into the empty room, and began to write my manuscript, addressed it to my friend, and wrote a note to accompany it, passionately entreating her to let me hear soon—to do exactly as I desired. Then I put every thing carefully aside, hid my precious roll under my arm, and set out for the village.

As I walked hurriedly along beneath the lines in our lane, and then through suburban streets, my thoughts were far engrossed in planning for the disposal of the fairy fortune my book was to bring me. Suddenly my self-control left me, and turned a sharp corner; in another moment I should have met my husband, whom I had believed to be safe at home. I had been mad! I thought of the risk I had incurred before the abstraction of his look had cleared, of his recognition.

I made a little circuit—accomplished my purposes, and turned homeward.

By the garden-gate I saw my husband pacing up and down beneath the limes. He had seen me, then, and was waiting for me. The limes were in full bloom; their scent now always takes me back to that afternoon.

I met him with a smile in my eyes, and noted the pinched expression which repressed excitement had left in his face. Instantly, I braced myself up for my last and worst ordeal.

He did not speak. He locked my hand under his arm, holding me quite tightly. He led me into the house, seated me in a chair in his study, then released my hand, and addressed himself to me. I noticed that the hand he loosed upon the table quivered. I was sorry; I feared he would do himself harm by so much effort to be calm. The aspect of judicial sternness had a strange effect upon my nerves. I laughed uncontrollably. Just think how that laugh must have broken upon his highly-wrought excitement and grievous distress!

I fancy that any man less noble than my husband would have struck me. There was intense provocation in my mirth, and I was laughed my insulting, unnatural laugh. He left me.

I fell upon the ground, rested my head on Kenelm's footstool, and wept bitterly. I suppose I was thoroughly worn out, I must have slept many hours. It was dusk when the opening of the hall door and my husband's step in the passage roused me. I heard him enter every room in the house before he came into the study; this, and my not detecting the sound of a turning of a key, suggested me in a new belief that I had been locked up in my bedroom all this while.

My husband could not see me when he entered. He opened about, then hastened to the open window. "Good God! she has jumped out," he cried.

"I am here, Kenelm!" I said, rising.

"You have been here all the time I have been away?"

"I believe I fell asleep."

"Tea is waiting in the parlor—will you make it?"

I followed him. I noticed upon how haggard a face the lamp shone; but his manner was cold and expressed tenderness. He broke a painful silence by saying:

"Mary! I have made arrangements for your going home to-morrow."

An angry refusal to go rose to my lips. I restrained it.

"It is well you should let me know on what plea you send me away."

The events of the afternoon taught me that we can not live together, feeling as we now do toward each other. I will not risk again feeling toward my wife as I did when I parted from her in the year of silence, I will earnestly strive to discover where I have been wrong in my conduct as a husband."

My heart was ready to break when next day I was whirled away from my husband. He stood on the platform gazing after us. Regardless of all witnesses, I leaned out of the window, weeping, holding my face as my sister's shoulder. "Kenelm, Kenelm!" was all that was ready, and I received, through my friend, what I considered very large sum, as part payment for the work.

My husband's first and reason to think me suddenly demented. "Home, home, home! I cried. I insisted on leaving the railway very morning on which I received my friend's letter, only pretending to give them an explanation of my strange conduct before I went.

Completely rested from my terpidity now, my longing for home, for peace, and home was intense; would travel alone, too; I had had enough of travelling of which I could endure no witness.

Leaving my luggage at the station, I walked homeward across well-known fields. But the nearer I approached, the more my courage failed me. It was bright early afternoon; I was not expected to me something eerie in the wind that swept the corn-fields and hedges. If Kenelm should be ill!

I paused at the garden gate; the parlor blinds were closed, but the room was full of silent the home. I paused longer yet before I could muster up courage open the house door.

The door was closed still when I knocked at the door of my husband's study; then it beat again so violently that I had to lay my hand on it to control it. "I waited. A slow heavy step crossed the room—my husband stood before me.

"Minnie, my darling! Come back to me of her own accord?" He opened his arms wide. I threw myself upon him. I had all the buoyancy of spirit now—all expectation of rapture. "Thank God! thank God!" he whisper. In the sorrow-stricken, weighed-down aspect of my husband's face.

"Yes, Kenelm, I am come back," I answered coldly, "and I should have thought you very guilty and ashamed. "You must hear all now," I added. "It was for this." I put a bundle of bank-notes into his hand.

"My child, I do not understand." He turned them over with a perplexed air.

Tearfully and hurriedly I told him all.

When I paused, and in my dreaming had planned that I should be elapsed in his arms, and the last exclamations of delight and gratitude, he still did not speak or move. Presently he dropped the notes and hid his face.

"Kenelm, there was my beautiful triumph? I had suffered and made that for you! Why do not speak?

I took down at his feet—I laid my cheek against him, and said, "Kenelm, was I very wrong? Can you not forgive me?"

"Minnie! I shall never forgive myself." He raised me up and kissed me many times. "This is the first time I have ever felt that I was free, or such as these, you should suffer as you have done. My darling! I am glad you did so it? How could you endure so long? How could you be true even up to sternly? Dearest! there were not worth paying for!"

I saw it clearly now: I had burdened him with remorse, even before I had been reproved. I, his wife, had irreparably injured him. And when I prayed for forgiveness, he only begged me to forgive myself.

With these notes, for which I had worked and endured, I took all our fort, we made a new marriage-compact of mutual confidence and tenderness.

Ah! but I did earn a holiday for Kenelm! I was very ill after that evening of my "triumph." When I grew well, I found myself in the room in a beautiful little nook by the sea-side; there we had a sweet long rest from all the weariness of our life.

I do not think that Kenelm understood his little wife's nature, or the loss for having sent her away, and, when he had grown accustomed to the motionless face of its existence, I even fancied that I sometimes detected just a little forlorn pride in his eyes and about the corners of his mouth, when people, in my presence, spoke of A Wife's Secret."

At such times I only cared to hide my confession. Somehow, after the lapse of so many many years, I felt a reluctance to make them open to the world, when I suddenly came upon a base of newspapers and reviews which Kenelm had accumulated, and in them read the name of my book.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER X.—[Continued.]

Arabella, thus roused from her first listlessness, sought to requite Darrell's kindness by exerting every energy to render his insipid daughter an accomplished woman. So far as mere ornamental education extends, the teacher was more successful than, with all her experience, her skill, and her zeal, she had presumed to anticipate. Matilda, without ear or taste, or love for music, became a very fair mechanical musician. Without one artistic predisposition, she achieved the science of perspective—she attained even to the mixture of colors—she filled a portfolio with drawings which no young lady need have been ashamed to see circling round a drawing-room. She carried Matilda's thin mind to the farthest bound it could have reached without snapping, through an elegant range of selected histories and harmless feminine classics—through Gallic dialogues—through Tuscan themes—through Teuton verbs—yea, across the invaded bounds of astonished Science into the Elementary Ologies. And all this being done, Matilda Darrell was exactly the same creature that she was before. In all that related to character, to inclinations, to heart, even that consummate teacher could give no intelligible answer, when Mrs. Lyndsay, in her softest accents (and no accents ever were softer), sighed—"Poor, dear Matilda! can you make her out, Miss Fossett?" Miss Fossett could not make her out. But, after the most attentive study, Miss Fossett had inly decided that there was nothing to make out—that, like many other very nice girls, Matilda Darrell was a harmless nullity, what you call "a miss." White deal or willow, to which Miss Fossett had done all in the way of increasing its value as ornamental furniture, when she had veneered it over with rosewood or satin-wood, enriched its edges with ormolu, and strewed its surface with nicknacks and albums. But Arabella firmly believed Matilda Darrell to be a quiet, honest, good sort of "miss," on the whole—very fond of her, Arabella. The teacher had been several months in Darrell's family, when Caroline Lyndsay, who had been almost domesticated with Matilda (sharing the lessons bestowed on the latter, whether by Miss Fossett or visiting masters), was taken away by Mrs. Lyndsay on a visit to the old Marchioness of Montfort. Matilda, who was to come out the next year, was thus almost exclusively with Arabella, who redoubled all her pains to veneer the white deal, and protect with ormolu its feeble edges—so that, when it "came out," all should admire that thoroughly fashionable piece of furniture. It was the habit of Miss Fossett and her pupil to take a morning walk in the quiet retreats of the Green Park; and one morning as they were thus strolling, nursery-maids and children, and elderly folks, who were ordered to take early exercise, undulating round their unsuspecting way—suddenly, right upon their path (unlooked-for as the wolf that startled Horace in the Sabine wood, but infinitely more deadly than that runaway animal), came Jasper Losely! Arabella uttered a faint scream. She could not resist—had no thought of resisting—the impulse to bound forward—lay her hand on his arm. She was too agitated to perceive whether his predominant feeling was surprise or rapture. A few hurried words were exchanged, while Matilda Darrell gave one sidelong glance toward the handsome stranger, and walked quietly by them. On his part, Jasper said that he had just returned to London—that he had abandoned forever all idea of a commercial life—that his father's misfortune (he gave that gentle appellation to the incident of penal transportation) had severed him from all former friends, ties, habits—that he had dropped the name of Losely forever—entreated Arabella not to betray it—his name now was Hammond—his "prospects," he said, "fairer than they had ever been." Under the name of Hammond, as an independent gentleman, he had made friends more powerful than he could ever have made under the name of Losely as a city clerk. He blushed to think he had ever been a city clerk. No doubt he should get into some Government office; and then, oh then, with assured income, and the certainty to rise, he might claim the longed-for hand of the "best of creatures."

On Arabella's part, she hastily explained her present position. She was governess to Miss Darrell—that was Miss Darrell. Arabella must not leave her walking on by herself—she would write to him. Addresses were exchanged—Jasper gave a very neat card—"Mr. Hammond, No. ——, Duke Street, St. James's."

Arabella, with a beating heart, hastened to join her friend. At the rapid glance she had taken of her perfidious lover, she thought him, if possible, improved. His dress, always studied, was more to the fashion of polished society, more simply correct—his air more decided. Altogether he looked prosperous, and his manner had never been more seductive, in its mixture of easy self-confidence and hypocritical coaxing. In fact, Jasper had not been long in the French commercial house—to which he had been sent out of the way while his father's trial was proceeding and the shame of it fresh—before certain licenses of conduct had resulted in his dismissal. But, meanwhile, he had made many friends among young men of his own age—those loose wild viveurs who, without doing any thing the law can punish as dishonest, contrive for a few fast years to live very showily on their wits. In that strange social fermentation which still prevails in a country where an aristocracy of birth, exceedingly impoverished, and exceedingly numerous so far as the right to prefix a De to the name, or to stamp a coronet on the card, can constitute an aristocrat—is diffused among an ambitious, adventurous, restless, and not inelegant young democracy—each cemented with the other by that fiction of law called égalité; in that yet unsettled and struggling society in which so much of the old has been irretrievably destroyed, and so little of the new has been solidly constructed—there are much greater varieties, infinitely more subtle grades and distinctions, in the region of life which lies between respectability and disgrace, than can be found in a country like ours. The French novels and dramas may apply less a mirror than a magnifying-glass to the beings that move through that region. But still those French novels and dramas do not unfaithfully represent the classifications of which they exaggerate the types. Those strange combinations, into one tableau, of students and grisettes, opera-dancers, authors, viscounts, swindlers, romantic Lorettes, gamblers on the Bourse, whose pedigree dates from the Crusades; impostors, taking titles from villages in which their grandsires might have been saddlers; and if detected, the detection but a matter of laugh; delicate women living like lawless men; men making trade out of love, like dissolute women, yet with point of honor so nice, that, doubt their truth or their courage, and—piff! you are in Charon's boat, humanity in every civilized land may present single specimens, more or less, answering to each thus described. But where, save in France, find them all, if not precisely in the same salons, yet so crossing each other to and fro, as to constitute a social phase, and give color to a literature of unquestionable genius? And where, over orgies so miscellaneously Berycynthian, an atmosphere so elegantly Horatian? And where can coarseness so vanish into polished expression as in that diamond-like language—all terseness and sparkle—which, as friendly to Wit in its airiest prose, as hostile to Passion in its torrent or cloud wrack of poetry, seems invented by the Grace out of spite to the Muse?

Into circles such as those of which the dim outline is here so imperfectly sketched, Jasper Losely niched himself, as le bel Anglais. (Pleasant representative of the English nation!) Not that those circles are to have the sole credit of his corruption. No! Justice is justice! Stand we up for our native land! Le bel Anglais entered those circles a much greater knave than most of those whom he found there. But there, at least, he learned to set a yet higher value on his youth, and strength, and comeliness—on his readiness of resource—on the reckless audacity that brow-beat timid and some even valiant men—on the six feet one of faultless symmetry that captivated foolish, and some even sensible women. Gaming was, however, his vice by predilection. A month before Arabella met him he had had a rare run of luck. On the strength of it he had resolved to return to London, and (wholly oblivious of "the best of creatures" till she had thus startled him) hunt out and swoop off with an heiress. Three French friends accompanied him. Each had the same object. Each believed that London swarmed with heiresses. They were all three fine-looking men. One was a Count—at least he said so. But proud of his rank? not a bit of it: all for liberty (no man more likely to lose it)—all for fraternity (no man you would less love as a brother). And as for égalité! the son of a shoemaker who was homme de lettres, and wrote in a journal, inserted a jest on the Count's countship. "All men are equal before the pistol," said the Count; and knowing that, in that respect, he was equal to most, having practiced at poupées from the age of fourteen, he called out the son of Crispin and shot him through the lungs. Another of Jasper's traveling friends was an enfant du peuple—boasted that he was a foundling. He made verses of lugubrious strain, and taught Jasper how to shuffle at whist. The third, like Jasper had been designed for trade; and, like Jasper, he had a soul above it. In politics he was a Communist—in talk a Philanthropist. He was the cleverest man of them all, and is now at the galleys. The fate of his two compatriots—more obscure—it is not my duty to discover. In that peculiar walk of life Jasper is as much as I can possibly manage.

It need not be said that Jasper carefully abstained from reminding his old city friends of his existence. It was his object and his hope to drop all identity with that son of a convict who had been sent out of the way to escape humiliation. In this resolve he was the more confirmed because he had no old city friends out of whom any thing could be well got. His poor uncle, who alone of his relations in England had been privy to his change of name, was dead; his end hastened by grief for William Losely's disgrace, and the bad reports he had received from France of the conduct of William Losely's son. That uncle had left, in circumstances too straitened to admit the waste of a shilling, a widow of very rigid opinions; who, if ever by some miraculous turn in the wheel of fortune she could have become rich enough to slay a fatted calf, would never have given the shinbone of it to a prodigal like Jasper, even had he been her own penitent son, instead of a graceless step-nephew. Therefore, as all civilization proceeds westward, Jasper turned his face from the east; and had no more idea of recrossing Temple Bar in search of fortune, friends, or kindred, than a modern Welshman would dream of a pilgrimage to Asian shores to re-embrace those distant relatives whom Hu Gadarn left behind him countless centuries ago, when that mythical chief conducted his faithful Cymrians over the Hazy Sea to this happy Island of Honey.*

Two days after his rencontre with Arabella in the Green Park, the soi-disant Hammond, having, in the interim, learned that Darrell was immensely rich, and Matilda his only surviving child, did not fail to find himself in the Green Park again—and again—and again!

Arabella, of course, felt how wrong it was to allow him to accost her, and walk by one side of her while Miss Darrell was on the other. But she felt, also, as if it would be much more wrong to slip out and meet him alone. Not for worlds would she again have placed herself in such peril. To refuse to meet him at all?—she had not strength enough for that! Her joy at seeing him was so immense. And nothing could be more respectful than Jasper's manner and conversation. Whatever of warmer and more impassioned sentiment was exchanged between them passed in notes. Jasper had suggested to Arabella to pass him off to Matilda as some near relation. But Arabella refused all such disguise. Her sole claim to self-respect was in considering him solemnly engaged to her—the man she was to marry. And, after the second time they thus met, she said to Matilda, who had not questioned her by a word—by a look—"I was to be married to that gentleman before my father died; we are to be married as soon as we have something to live upon."

Matilda made some commonplace but kindly rejoinder. And thus she became raised into Arabella's confidence—so far as that confidence could be given, without betraying Jasper's real name, or one darker memory in herself. Luxury, indeed, it was to Arabella to find, at last, some one to whom she could speak of that betrothal in which her whole future was invested—of that affection which was her heart's sheet-anchor—of that home, humble it might be, and far off, but to which Time rarely fails to bring the Two, if never weary of the trust, to become as One. Talking thus, Arabella forgot the relationship of pupil and teacher; it was as woman to woman—girl to girl—friend to friend. Matilda seemed touched by the confidence—flattered to possess at last another's secret. Arabella was a little chafed that she did not seem to admire Jasper as much as Arabella thought the whole world must admire. Matilda excused herself. "She had scarcely noticed Mr. Hammond. Yes; she had no doubt he would be considered handsome; but she owned, though it might be bad taste, that she preferred a pale complexion, with auburn hair;" and then she sighed and looked away, as if she had, in the course of her secret life, encountered some fatal pale complexion, with never-to-be-forgotten auburn hair. Not a word was said by either Matilda or Arabella as to concealing from Mr. Darrell these meetings with Mr. Hammond. Perhaps Arabella could not stoop to ask that secrecy; but there was no necessity to ask. Matilda was always too rejoiced to have something to conceal.

Now, in these interviews, Jasper scarcely ever addressed himself to Matilda; not twenty spoken words could have passed between them; yet, in the very third interview, Matilda's sly fingers had closed on a sly note. And from that day, in each interview, Arabella walking in the centre, Jasper on one side, Matilda the other—behind Arabella's back—passed the sly fingers and the sly notes, which Matilda received and answered. Not more than twelve or fourteen times was even this interchange effected. Darrell was about to move to Fawley. All such meetings would be now suspended. Two or three mornings before that fixed for leaving London Matilda's room was found vacant. She was gone. Arabella was the first to discover her flight, the first to learn its cause. Matilda had left on her writing-table a letter for Miss Fossett. It was very short, very quietly expressed, and it rested her justification on a note from Jasper, which she inclosed—a note in which that gallant hero, ridiculing the idea that he could ever have been in love with Arabella, declared that he would destroy himself if Matilda refused to fly. She need not fear such angelic confidence in him. No! Even > "Had he a heart for falsehood framed,

> He ne'er could injure her."

Stifling each noisier cry—but panting—gasping—literally half out of her mind, Arabella rushed into Darrell's study. He, unsuspecting man, calmly bending over his dull books, was startled by her apparition. Few minutes sufficed to tell him all that it concerned him to learn. Few brief questions, few passionate answers, brought him to the very worst.

Who, and what, was this Mr. Hammond? Heaven of heavens! the son of William Losely—of a transported felon!

Arabella exulted in a reply which gave her a moment's triumph over the rival who had filched from her such a prize. Roused from his first misery and sense of abasement in this discovery, Darrell's wrath was naturally poured, not on the fugitive child, but on the frontless woman, who, buoyed up by her own rage and sense of wrong, faced him, and did not cower. She, the faithless governess, had presented to her pupil this convict's son in another name; she owned it—she had trepanned into the snares of so vile a fortune-hunter, an ignorant child—she might feign amaze—act remorse—she must have been the man's accomplice. Stung, amidst all the bewilderment of her anguish, by this charge, which, at least, she did not deserve, Arabella tore from her bosom Jasper's recent letters to herself—letters all devotion and passion—placed them before Darrell, and bade him read. Nothing thought she then of name and fame. Nothing but of her wrongs and of her woes. Compared to herself, Matilda seemed the perfidious criminal—she the injured victim. Darrell but glanced over the letters; they were signed "your loving husband."

"What is this?" he exclaimed, "are you married to the man?"

"Yes," cried Arabella, "in the eyes of Heaven!"

To Darrell's penetration there was no mistaking the significance of those words, and that look; and his wrath redoubled. Anger in him, when once roused, was terrible; he had small need of words to vent it. His eye withered, his gesture appalled. Conscious but of one burning firebrand in brain and heart—of a sense that youth, joy, and hope were for ever gone, that the world could never be the same again—Arabella left the house, her character lost, her talents useless, her very means of existence stopped. Who henceforth would take her to teach? Who henceforth place their children under her charge?

She shrank into a gloomy lodging—she shut herself up alone with her despair. Strange though it may seem, her anger against Jasper was slight as compared with the intensity of her hate to Matilda. And stranger still it may seem, that as her thoughts recovered from their first chaos, she felt more embittered against the world, more crushed by a sense of shame, and yet galled by a no less keen sense of injustice, in recalling the scorn with which Darrell had rejected all excuse for her conduct in the misery it had occasioned her, than she did by the consciousness of her own lamentable errors. As in Darrell's esteem there was something that, to those who could appreciate it, seemed invaluable, so in his contempt to those who had cherished that esteem there was a weight of ignominy, as if a judge had pronounced a sentence that outlaws the rest of life.

Arabella had not much left out of her munificent salary. What she had hitherto laid by had passed to Jasper—defraying, perhaps, the very cost of his flight with her treacherous rival. When her money was gone, she pawned the poor relics of her innocent happy girlhood, which she had been permitted to take from her father's home, and had borne with her wherever she went, like household gods,—the prize-books, the lute, the costly work-box, the very bird-cage, all which the reader will remember to have seen in her later life, the books never opened, the lute broken, the bird long, long, long vanished from the cage! Never did she think she should redeem those pledges from that Golgotha, which takes, rarely to give back, so many hallowed tokens of the dreamland called "better days"—the trinkets worn at the first ball, the ring that was given with the earliest love-vow—yea, even the very bells and coral that pleased the infant in its dainty cradle, and the very Bible in which the lips that now bargain for sixpence more, read to some gray-haired father on his bed of death!

Soon the sums thus miserably raised were as miserably doled away. With a sullen apathy the woman contemplated famine. She would make no effort to live—appeal to no relations, no friends. It was a kind of vengeance she took on others, to let herself drift on to death. She had retreated from lodging to lodging, each obscurer, more desolate than the other. Now, she could no longer pay rent for the humblest room; now, she was told to go forth—whither? She knew not—cared not—took her way toward the river, as by that instinct which, when the mind is diseased, tends toward self-destruction, scarce less involuntarily than it turns, in health, toward self-preservation. Just as she passed under the lamplight at the foot of Westminster Bridge, a well-dressed man looked at her, and seized her arm. She raised her head with a chilly, melancholy scorn, as if she had received an insult—as if she feared that the man knew the stain upon her name, and dreamed, in his folly, that the dread of death might cause her to sin again.

"Do you not know me?" said the man; "more strange that I should recognize you! Dear, dear!—and what a dress!—how you are altered! Poor thing!"

At the words "poor thing" Arabella burst into tears; and in those tears the heavy cloud on her brain seemed to melt away.

"I have been inquiring, seeking for you every where, Miss," resumed the man. "Surely you know me now! Your poor aunt's lawyer! She is no more—died last week. She has left you all she had in the world; and a very pretty income it is, too, for a single lady."

Thus it was that we find Arabella installed in the dreary comforts of Podden Place. "She exchanged," she said, "in honor to her aunt's memory, her own name for that of Crane, which her aunt had borne—her own mother's maiden name." She assumed, though still so young, that title of "Mrs." which spinsters, grown venerable, moodily adopt when they desire all mankind to know that henceforth they relinquish the vanities of tender misses—that, become mistress of themselves, they defy and spit upon our worthless sex, which, whatever its repentance, is warned that it repents in vain. Most of her aunt's property was in houses, in various districts of Bloomsbury. Arabella moved from one to the other of these tenements, till she settled for good into the dullest of all. To make it duller yet, by contrast with the past, the Golgotha for once gave up its buried treasures—broken lute, birdless cage!

Somewhere about two years after Matilda's death, Arabella happened to be in the office of the agent who collected her house-rents, when a well-dressed man entered, and, leaning over the counter, said—"There is an advertisement in to-day's Times about a lady who offers a home, education, and so forth, to any little motherless girl; terms moderate, as said lady loves children for their own sake. Advertiser refers to your office for particulars—give them!"

The agent turned to his books; and Arabella turned toward the inquirer. "For whose child do you want a home, Jasper Losely?"

Jasper started. "Arabella! Best of cre-

* Mel Ynnys—Isle of Honey. One of the poetic names given to England in the language of the ancient Britons.

tures! And can you deign to speak to such a vil—

"Hush — let us walk. Never mind the advertisement of a stranger. I may find a home for a motherless child—a home that will cost you nothing."

She drew him into the street. "But can this be the child of — of — Matilda Darrell?"

"Bella!" replied, in coaxing accents, that most execrable of lady-killers, "can I trust you?—can you be my friend in spite of my having been such a very sad dog? But money—what can one do without money in this world? Had I a heart for falsehood framed, it would never have injured you'—if I had not been so cursedly hard up! And indeed now, if you would but consecrate to forgive and forget, perhaps some day or other we may be Darby and Joan—only, you see, just at this moment I am really not worthy of such a Joan. You know, of course, that I am a widower—not inconsolable."

"Yes; I read of Mrs. Hammold's death in an old newspaper."

"And you did not read of her baby's death, too—some weeks afterward?"

"No; it is seldom that I see a newspaper. Is the infant dead?"

"Hum—you shall hear."

And Jasper entered into a recital, to which Arabella listened with attentive interest. At the close she offered to take herself the child for whom Jasper sought a home. She informed him of her change of name and address. The wretch promised to call that evening with the infant; but he sent the infant, and did not call. Nor did he present himself again to her eyes, until, several years afterward, those eyes so lavishly welcomed him to Fodden Place. But though he did not even condescend to write to her in the mean while, it is probable that Arabella contrived to learn more of his habits and mode of life at Paris than she intimated when they once more met face to face.

And now the reader knows more than Alban Morley, or Guy Darrell perhaps ever will know, of the grim woman in iron gray.

THE "MACEDONIAN."

THE cut we give herewith is an accurate representation of the United States sloop-of-war Macedonian, lately refitted at Boston, and now on her way to the Gulf of Mexico, from whence she is to proceed to the Mediterranean, which is her appointed station. The Macedonian, though ranking in the naval register as a sloop, and carrying the armament of that class of vessels, is, in fact, a razee, cut down from a frigate. She is one of the few remaining vessels in our navy which possess historic interest. She was originally a French man-of-war; was taken from the French by the English, and from them by the United States. The action in which she was taken from the British by the United States, Commodore Decatur, was, in its effects, one of the most important in the war of 1812. At the commencement of that war not only was our navy weak, but the general sentiment of the country was unfavorable to its increase. Britannia ruled the waves. It had become a proverb that, when the French launched a new ship from their yards, they were only adding another to the fleets of their enemy; and it was difficult to convince the good people of the United States that any addition to our own naval force would not have a similar result. The British, indeed, boasted that before the close of the new war they would lay their sloops alongside American frigates, and this boast found many believers among the Americans. The capture of the Guerriere by the Constitution, the first serious naval combat in the war, was hailed, therefore, with as much surprise as delight; and when the Macedonian came into port as a prize, there two hard facts began to be considered in their true light. The first was that our navy could cope successfully with the British navy; and the second was that the latter was not invincible. The capture of the Macedonian was followed by that of the Java, the Frolic, the Peacock, the Epervier, the Penguin, and the Reindeer, and by the destruction of the Chesapeake, the Essex, the Wasp, and the Hornet. The Macedonian was built at Deptford, England, in 1810, and launched in the following year. She was a ship of 1,081 tons, and carried forty guns. She was captured by the United States on the 25th October, 1812. She fought under command of Captain Jones. Proceeding up Long Island Sound, in company with the United States and Hornet, the three were chased into New London by a greatly superior British force, and there blockaded during the continuance of the war. After its close she served on various stations; was in 1836 rebuilt at Gosport navy-yard, when she was cut down to a sloop; and after serving in different parts of the world — among others, on the Japan expedition — has latterly been laid up in ordinary in Boston. She has the reputation of being a staunch vessel yet, and will probably carry the star-spangled flag into different seas for many years to come. Success to her officers and crew on her present cruise!

THE UNITED STATES SLOOP-OF-WAR "MACEDONIAN."

THE TOMB OF THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON.

FRANCE has just purchased from the British Government part of the Emperor's estate, on the island of St. Helena, containing the tomb of Napoleon Bonaparte. We give below a pretty sketch of the spot as it is at present.

It would have been a graceful act, it would seem, for the English to have made a free gift of the tomb to their faithful ally, Napoleon the Third. One can not help wondering that this did not occur to the British Government. Perhaps, however, they had adequate reasons for the course they took.

Napoleon was buried in this spot on 7th May, 1821. We take the following graphic account of the scene from Abbott's "Napoleon:"

"The morning of the 8th of May dawned with unusual brilliance. A perfect calm had succeeded the storm, and not a cloud obscured the brightness of the sun. At an early hour all the inhabitants of the island were directing their steps toward Longwood, to pay their last tribute of respect to the remains of the Emperor. At half past twelve o'clock the grenadiers placed the coffin upon the hearse. The funeral car was drawn by four horses, richly caparisoned, and each led by a groom. The faded cloak he wore at Marengo was his fitting shroud. Four of his devoted friends held the corners of the pall. Twelve grenadiers walked by the side of the hearse, to carry the coffin where the bad condition of the path along the crags prevented the wheels from advancing. The Emperor's horse, caparisoned in black, was led by a groom.

"The household of Longwood, dressed in deep mourning, followed sadly behind, weeping, with heart-rending grief, as children at the grave of a father. Next after them came the Admiral and the Governor, on horseback, accompanied by the officers of the staff. In long procession the inhabitants of the island—men, women, and children—reverently joined the funeral train. The garrison, two thousand five hundred in number, which had been stationed upon the island to guard the Emperer, fined the whole of the left side of the road from Longwood nearly to the grove. Bands of music, at appointed intervals, breathed their requiems over the crags battered in the silent sunlight. As the procession passed along, the soldiers, one by two, fell into the line, and with reversed arms solemnly paced the dead march to the grave. The rear of the scene was behind. Not a leaf trembled upon the gnarwood trees. And not a sound, save the slight sledge, fell upon the listening ear, as the burial train moved slowly amidst the blackened crags. The whole career of Napoleon passed over the wilderness which imagination can conceive. But no events during that wondrous history are more touching and solemn than the death and burial on this lone, barren island.

LONGWOOD.—THE TOMB OF THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON AT ST. HELENA.

At length the hearse stopped. Huge blocks of blackened lava, precipices, and towering crags obstructed the further advance of the wheels. Twelve generals with difficulty took up their burden, and, struggling in the heavy triple coffin of tin, lead, and mahogany, and ascended the narrow path, which had been constructed on the side of the rugged mountain, to the place of burial. The burning of minute-guns, from the admiral's ship in the harbor, reverberated from pinnacle to pinnacle of this gloomy rock, adding solemnity to sublimity to the scene. Every heart was vanquished by uncontrollable emotion. The coffin was placed on the verge of the grave. The Abbé Vignali recited the burial service. As the first was then lowered in its resting-place, the three successive volleys from a battery of fifteen cannon discharged over the grave resounded in thunder peals along the crags of St. Helena. The war was appealed to by a simultaneous discharge from the ships in the harbor and every fort upon the island. The grave was then filled in, carefully closed with masonry, and a guard of honor placed over it.

In the year 1840, under the government of Louis Philippe, the remains of the Emperor were transferred to France, and laid in the Hôtel des Invalides. It is the intention of the present Emperor to erect a monument to his uncle which shall be worthy of the man and of the Empire.

MAGGIE GRAY.

Oh! I'm in love with Maggie Gray,
Sweet Maggie with the soft blue eye;
I saw her one December day,
When winter winds went whistling by.
I, fearful, watched her cross the street
Before a heavy-laden dray,
But ere a glance, the horse's feet
Were tramping pretty Maggie Gray.

I ran and jumped, an awful jump,
And soon was trembled on my breast;
Her little cheeks, so red and plump,
Smeared mud upon my velvet vest.
I thought her face was Maggie's face,
I wiped the wet and mud away;
And as I kissed the clearest place,
Was I a raw sweet Maggie Gray.

The tale was short that Maggie told,
She only breathed her little name;
She said that she was five years old,
And brother Tom was just the same.
She spoke in a mysterious tone
Of a dear mother far away;
An angel in the Heavenly Home,
Who prayed for little Maggie Gray.

I rubbed and scraped the little one,
My cambric was an utter wreck;
And when we took way hand in hand,
I tied a ribbon on her neck.
I bade her keep the silken band,
And think of me another day.
They took her from my muddy hand,
Farewell forever, Maggie Gray!

Miscellany.

—It was lately asserted that Napoleon Bonaparte was descended from the celebrated Man-with-the-Iron-Mask. who is generally admitted to have been an elder brother of Louis XIV., and that the present Emperor of France was, therefore, rightly entitled to the throne which he now fills. This is probably one of those mystery which ambitious persons set afloat upon the ocean of newspapers. A new kind of Napoleonic myth, to add to the

Antiquities of the Bonaparte Family, we learn that the Emperor's remote ancestors were men who made themselves felt in Italy centuries ago.

We find the origin of the name well explained. There is a tradition that the early name of the family was Farra, but that on a feud arising between two branches, the younger brother obtained the Napoleon branch, Malaparte, for their name. It appears, however, that their real name was, in all cases, Malaparti, but that when the people found them generally so called they also so called them Bonaparte. We find that, in the thirteenth century, in a work on the early history of Treviso, the Bonapartes were called gens nobilis et antiqua.

It was natural that the Italians should reverence the name. If there is in their glorious annals one heroic, one national hero, it is that of Napoleon of the League of the Lombard towns. A few citizens, wearied of the exactions of the feudal sway, determined to defy the German empire, then in all its power under Frederick Barbarossa. Those citizens, with whom the peasants and soldiers soon joined, rose against their oppressor, and stood the brunt of his long and powerful attack. Again and Frederick renewed the attack with fresh armies in vain. Italy devoured his savage hordes, and the most terrible of Christian sovereigns, Frederick Barbarossa, died for peace. He yielded to a new power—the right of a people. Such was the head of this Italian national movement, among other nobles, was a Bonaparte—John L de Bonaparte, the founder of the family. He was named Rector of the League of the Lombard towns. In 1183, when the victory, after a fifteen years' war, had been decided, we find among the signatures to the Treaty of Constance, "Joannes de Bonaparte, de Trevisio Consul et Rector." Fifty-six years afterward we find a Bonaparte commanding the army of the Milanese partisans who fought Frederick at Castelfranco, commanded by Frederick the Second in person.

Centuries dreaded the name, and, in 1357, the existence of the Bonaparte was torn down from the Capitol at Rome, and, in 1360, we find it on the mysterious government of the republic. Four hundred and fifty years later a Bonaparte, at Constantinople, translated the Code of Civil Laws of Venice. We find them next at Bologna, illustrious in law and letters. In 1796 an Italian writer remarked that "there was always an illustrious writer in the family." A Bonaparte was a famous scholar, La Lodera, in 1302. In 1604 there appeared a remarkable account of the sack of Rome by the Constable de Bourbon. It was ascribed to Guicciardini, and many critics were published over it upon its true authorship. It was a Bonaparte, sub-priest of Colla, dean of the metropolis of Florence, canon of the Vatican, protonotary and apostolical prothonotary. The authorship of this pamphlet caused a literary quarrel, which lasted more than a century. In 1796 a splendid edition, edited by Napoleon Louis Bonaparte, brother to Napoleon III., appeared at Florence, and settled the question.

A Noble Devotee.

—Sir Henry Bate, a wealthy English brewer, and sometime a of a notorious lady holding a high position in her Majesty's household, has left his fortune in the manner in which he proposed to bequeath his estate, amongst the gentlemanly and fashionable devotees like unto. They did succeed, however, in tying up to right entire children of the lady.

In 1841 Sir Henry Meux's share in the great monopoly was worth £1,000,000; in 1858 it is worth £3,000,000, and this in spite of a long minority, the years' neglect of business, of hunting and racing, of French opera-boxes, Revue cities, mill Champagne, and double open-knees of bottles, mares, and dog-forests; of Epsom, Newmarket, and Ascot; eating with a spoon and jaunting about in a gold coach a year. Sir Henry Meux's father was a very busy head to no taste for business, and he only extended the brewing when the accounts were made up, thereby, up his time almost entirely to the most costly pursuits, in fashion with the nobility and chief of the aristocracy. Sir Henry's father-in-law, Lord Ernest Brace, though of old nobility, with an estate well pendent at the County seat, was obliged to appeal to a family alliance with the brewer, for the very best reasons in the world. The world was not shocked when his son-in-law bequeathed him the management of the brewery, with a salary of £5,000 a year, but rather took it to oily than otherwise. 'Tis true, Lord Ernest knew nothing about beer—probably never put it in his life—for all that, he "thought he knew how to look after the profits."

British Coolness.

The first symptom of Sir Henry's madness was manifested in his wild and extravagant love of the shot. The coolness of Englishmen was strikingly displayed in the answers of one of Sir Henry's friends: "He shot, and said nothing which it, which made me suspect something was wrong about him; because, when a man is shot by another, he rather expects something to be said." Cool, certainly.

—Poets are not generally thought to be hard-working men. Industry, who, indeed ever associated with the ruling exception to this poetical rule. A recent writer gives this account of the

Poet's Time-Tables:

In associating with Southey, not only was it necessary to abstain to refrain from disturbing his books, but various rites, ceremonies, and usages must be rigidly observed. At certain appointed hours only was he open to conversation; at the seasons which had been predestined from all eternity he had engrossed to write on his literary work; every hour of the day had its commission—every half-hour was assigned to its own peculiar, indispensable occupation. He had elaborately mapped out a detailed account of his most pains-taking life, every moment of which was filled with method and activity, by prearranged, to a certain literary Quaker lady.

Nothing at five throughout the year; from six till eight, I read Spanish; from eight to ten, one hour; Portuguese, next, for half an hour—no watch here in the hills; I write from ten to twelve; I write prose for two hours; I translate to long; I make extracts so long;" and so on the rest, until the poor fellow had hardly a quarter hour for his best again.

"And you, when dost thou think, friend?" she asked, dryly, to the great discomfiture of the future historian.

—Whatever poets we must quote this story of Wordsworth is thoroughly characteristic of his indifference to every production of modern growth but his own poetry.

When "Rob Roy" was published, some of Mr. Wordsworth's friends called to congratulate the author ment of the day was to be the new novel. He accompanied them to the appointed spot, joined them at luncheon, and then said: "Now, before you begin, I will read you a poem of my own on Rob Roy, which will increase your pleasure in the new book." Of course, every one was delighted, and he recited the well-known verses; and then resumed his volume, and said: "I will proceed. I hope you will enjoy your book;" and walked quietly off, and was seen no more all the afternoon. The very rough mode in which he handled books showed how little he cared for their style. Southey, as he let him into a fine library was like turning a bear into a tulip-garden; and De Quincey tells of his cutting open a "French-edition" of Burke with a knife he had just used to butter toast.

Hopefulness

is the most fortunate of future success. Few of the world's great men but have found themselves in a tight place, where commonplace minds would have seen no avenue for escape.

A man's heart always hopes, and has always cause to hope, because it knows the mutability of human affairs; and how slight a circumstance may change the whole current of events. Such confidence, rests upon itself; it is not confined to partial views, or to one particular object. And if, it last, all should be lost, it has saved itself—its own integrity and worth. Hope awakens courage, while despondency benumbs the mind of all its powers. The moment of good—the giving up of the battle of life in despair, is always the worst. Every passage of courage in the human soul is its best physician.

How to Buried.

There seems to be a choice in the matter. Some remain buried alive; but how are you going to induce those who thought life have not managed to earn an honest living, to earn an precedents for their resolve.

The Bactrians gave their dead to dogs kept for the purpose. In Tibet the same custom is still in highly-honored observance; and it is preferable to that of the Calatians, who piously devoured their own dead relations. Again, the Persians expose the bones at the funeral of his once martial another is a funeral of the Scythians, who strangle a horse and slain at the brink of the grave, into which he was then tumbled on the body of his old rider. This custom, however, was prohibited by a law that ordered the funeral of a German hitter, with a love of the Germans, who, as we know, have always considered its own fashion the most religious, and nothing seemed more disgusting to a Calatian who ate, or to the Tibetan Buddhists who fed upon their dead into sausage-meat and then potted them for the purpose of preserving them for future consumption. Our Christian forefathers, too, had their vagaries. No one, for instance, killed when fighting in the open field was buried within the walls of a church, unless he was slain at a tournament, because an end showed that he died "Christian gentleman," and the exception was made in favor of this gentility! A similar vagary, but of a more revolting nature, was that of the martyr of the parish church of Clifton, near Bristol, where the "Fighting Vault" was especially set apart for the interment of the heroes who had fallen in the duel.

Woman's Rights

prevail among the Vizeer, a powerful tribe occupying an extensive district in Cabul, among the mountains between Persia and India. The women choose their husbands, and use the husband's their wives. If a woman be pleased with a man, she sends the intimation that she is going to join a festival with his cap with a pin she has used to fasten her hair. The dreamer watches his opportunity, and does this in public without the women, and the man is obliged to marry her if he can pay her price to her father.

—In not this a fine example of the power of Faith?

"I can conceive," says Lord Erskine, "a distressed landsman man, surrounded by his children, looking up to him for bread, when he has none to give them, sinking under the last day's labor, and unprovided for the next, yet still supported by confidence in the hour when all tears shall be wiped away by the hands of affection; and he burden laid upon him by a mysterious Providence which he adores, and anticipating with exultation the reversed promises of his Creator, when his lot will be greater than the greatest, and happier than the happiest upon earth."

Odd Thoughts.

Benefits.—He who receives a good turn should never forget it; he who does one should never remember it.—Chamfort.

Heresy and Disputation.—No two things differ more than heresy and dispute. Heresy is the child of a weak mind, dispatch of a strong one. A weak man is office, like a squirrel in a cage, is laboring incessantly to get forward; in controversy nothing without getting on a jot; talks a great deal, but says very little; looks very much, but sees nothing; and has a hundred irons in the fire, but very few of them hot, and with those that are he only burns his fingers.—Colton.

Books.—Books are standing counselors and friends, always at hand, and always unreserved; having this advantage over oral instructors, that they are ready to repeat their lesson as often as we require.—Chambers.

"Where the Good Die Young."—It was among Wordsworth's friends a matter of amusement to hear the young at morning twilight; for as they strove to give the softest interpretation to death, so they imagined that Angels, who loved the young, took stolen them to her embrace.

Mr. Wordsworth made this sentence of the poet as a canon of my creed: that whom God loveth not, they love not suicide.—T. Moultry, 1839.

Sleep is a kind of suicide; and this is the only art which can calm the agitation of the soul and put the World to Sight.—Marie Louise.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

"The ministry have thrown me overboard," said a disappointed politician. "Have they?" was the answering remark to the utter astonishment of the speaker.

"What a nice home built!" inquired a competitive auditor.

"In the night, Sir."

"In the night! How do you make that out?"

"Why, Sir, those wasn't built in a day!"

A Palladier, direct from the sod, had got into a mess, and was knocked down.

"Arrah, now! what's the aither knitin' a man while he's down?" he inquired.

"Certainly not," said his antagonist.

"Faith, then, I guess I'll not, for I can't fill the bee."

The mind is its own place, and in itself
Can make a heaven of hell, a hell of heaven.

A FRENCH MARRIAGE.

Marriages in France are often arranged in a summary manner. Not long since, a young gentleman of fortune arrived at Marseilles, and had an interview with his notary on the subject of his marriage. He was heavily in debt, and in great despair. Sitting in the office of the notary, he said, "I am ruined—I am deeply embarrassed. A conversation ensued, and the notary finally said, "I have a young lady in my eye, who is very rich, and who would be glad to talk to you." The gentleman was struck with the young man could not think. The notary then went out, came with powdered confidence, imparted to the stranger his pecuniary embarrassments. The gentleman looked rather coldly a little, and then replied,

"Well, I see no way of relieving you from your difficulties, but by your marrying her."

"No, no," said the young man; "I am in trouble, it is true, but what would you feel at matrimony has happened to me yet."

"Indeed," urged the other, "you would not object to a wife with a million of francs?"

"A different matter, indeed."

"Then," said the notary, "I will present you to a lady who will marry you, and you will be once again happy."

The next-made friends parted, soon to meet again. The notary was presented to the lady. The interview and speaking were without blunder; he was handsome, and the lady was equally smitten. As soon as the interview had predicted, the young gentleman was possessed of a million of francs. The notary had wedding the stranger called on the bridegroom.

"Sir," said the latter, with warmth, "my dear friend, you come to congratulate me, and at the same time to insult me. What do you mean by the expression you have just made use of?"

"With much pleasure," replied he. "You have passed bills of exchange in the name of your wife's father, which bills being now in my possession, I have called to consult you, and to keep a settlement of the same. I know you were without fortune; getting you in prison would be of no service to me, but I can provide you with a fortune; and now gratitude will surely force you to render me justice."

GOOD COUNSEL.

Tutor not thyself in science: go to masters for perfection.

Also apply the thoughts alone!
Whose in the place whereunto he hath his own reflection.

Widen both ignorant and proud.

Study not in one book only: boo-like, rather, at a bunch.

Sources gather honeyed love:
Then art thou highest bird in flight, when bee nest has once been plundered,

Then can build another more.

Railroad poetry is browning a school, like that of the Lake poets. Here is a verse from a railroad conductor on a Maryland road between two bridges—one of them a long one—which he calls the "Song of the Bridges." The conductor, knowing that he would be blamed for his unpoetical notice, sent the following letter with the following statement of facts and touching appeal:

Mr. Conductor's Letter.

As the collision that happened last Sabbath morning of Union Dam curve, between four and five o'clock, has caused a great excitement in the public mind, and as I am the conductor of the train that was unfortunately of duty, or carries in the office in charge. Not knowing that I was to be called to account for the said charge they lay the blame, induces me to take this method of exonerating myself from the whole matter throughout. I am perfectly satisfied for twelve men to be impartial judges, and would be thankful if Master of Master Street or butchers or blacksmiths at Mount Clare—to be the twelve impartial men to decide, and they can conscientiously come to a conclusion that I am the guilty person, and that I deserve punishment for the loss of life, as long me as high as Human; and if not, nepair me as I deserve.

I will give below my report, which I send in to the Company, which will explain to you how I was standing on the bumper at the time coming:

POEM.

When first I saw his brazen light
Spring suddenly around the curve,
I was with horror struck to fright
To witness thus in my charge!
So in the cry I quickly went,
And found it was, in fact, my way,
To be in action quickly spent.
Then to the bridge I did depend.
Then to the deed I made a spring,
To extricate myself from harm;
In that I didn't fail to do.
Of thoughts upon my mind was borne—
First prayer—that God would me save—
My form was plunged in dark despair,
Not knowing but I was about to die,
But where every timber and alcoholic spirits were.
Then the Spirit came on me at once:
The one before—the one of woe:
Then came the spirit Divine,
And saved us from the spirit of woe.

S. S. Fabit.

Here is another Western Justice of the Peace;

th
February 17 1858 Sir

Pursuely A good James Corey before now a Justices of the Peace and Quorum for this County do not this very day and from you the lickest grain to Sean plaster of Paris

Please to inform this Day you are to be out on Friday Morning 19th of February and that boy got sticket to Greenbrier and that boy gave you a twenty dollar bill on the Southern Bank of Kentucky And you gave him change in Silver and that boy and this is one of them and that he sat you If it was good money and you said that it was good as any in the State and you gave it and it was still sold to ben Crowtwell and James Corey and that boy and sold him a silver dollar in change for her and you put this note in the store Dapper that ret and you Justices of the Peace send A. in Batesford Greenbrier Highland County ohio

A merchant of Mobile recently wrote a letter of response to a gentleman of Mississippi, and in due course of time received a letter which he opened, examined, cut out and pasted on the back of the envelope, in which the letter had been sent, the following: "Dear Sir—I received your letter some days ago and this is the first time I have had time to write you a word in reply. Business has been very good, and I have been very busy. Times are very hard, and I am afraid they will be harder. Hoping you are enjoying good health, I remain, yours truly, &c." Then, with the hope that the postmaster in Mobile might be able to do more by it than he had.

So you have had new bottoms to your parlor-chairs, I hear, Jane; how much did they cost?"

"Indeed I don't know."

"Well, that's strange; for you must have paid for them or they would not have sent them home reseated."

If you would kill game,
It is true you must shoot,
But then you must aim,
And hold steady to boot.

At a negro celebration, lately, an Irishman stood listening to a colored speaker, expatiating upon government and freedom; and as the orator came to a "period" from the highest and most poetical flights, the Irishman said,

"Bedad, he speaks well for a nagur; didn't he, now?"

Somebody said, "He isn't a negro, he is only a half negro."

"Only a half a nagur, is it? Well, if half a nagur can talk in that style, I'm thinking a whole nagur might bate the prophet Jeremiah!"

"You look," said an Irishman to a pale, haggard smoker, "as if you had got out of your grave to light your cigar, and couldn't find your way back again."

If the man who turnips cries
Cry not when his father dies,
'Tis a proof that he had rather
Have a turnip than his father.

The sight of such a phenomenon as the House of Lords laughing is due to Mr. Roundell Palmer. During the sitting of their lordships the other day, on a Committee of Privileges in the Shrewsbury Peerage case, the learned counsel was reading the will of a certain Humphrey Talbot. In this will were certain bequests of a gold chain, a suit of "tawny velvet," etc. Then followed a gift of "two Maries," which was interpreted by the advocate to mean two much-prized figures of the Virgin Mary. This was succeeded by "two foles." This was far beyond the power of the silk gown, who could only understand it as meaning "two fools," though it appeared strange that the testator should bequeath such a commodity; whereupon Lord St. Leonards exclaimed, "Two mares and foals are no doubt the true meaning." This interpretation, though obviously the correct one, was so opposed to the Dryasdust theory, that their lordships burst into an uncontrollable fit of laughter, in which they were joined by the entire auditory.

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, July 19, 1858.

THE foreign trade of the port for the past week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending July 17, 1858	$4,231,509....	$1,003,183
Corresponding week, 1857	8,131,984....	962,814
Decrease	$3,900,475
Increase		$40,369

The export of specie during the week has only been $637,000, against which there is an arrival of $1,401,713 from California. The bank statement to be made up this afternoon will therefore probably show an increase of $750,000 @ $1,000,000. The price of money is unchanged. Exchange on London vibrates between 109¼ @ 109½, at which rate, with gold bars at a discount of ⅝, specie can be exported at a small profit.

Stocks closed on Saturday about where they stood on the Saturday previous. The chief advance of the week was in Pacific Mail shares, which rose some 7 per cent. on the strength of the probable profits of the new line from San Francisco to Vancouver's Island. In the leading railway stocks there is not much speculation, and no change in market values.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, July 19, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets have been moderately active for Flour at uniform prices. Sound lots of Wheat and Corn have been scarce, and in request at full rates. Most of the available supply of each has consisted of unsound or inferior lots. The principal inquiry for Flour and Corn has been for home use. Shippers have been the heaviest purchasers of Wheat. Rye and Barley were quiet, at unchanged figures. Oats have been more freely offered than they were required by buyers, and prices have tended downward....Cotton, Coffee, Sugars, Rice, Provisions, Linseed Oil, and Tallow have been more sought after, generally at advancing rates....Hay, Hops, and Tobacco have been in fair demand at our quotations ....Naval Stores attracted less attention....Wool has been moderately inquired for....A partial revival of demand from distant country buyers for Fall Dry Goods has taken place during the week. The general anticipation is that the trade, this season, will not be as heavy as usual in late years. The Dry Goods imports during the week amounted to $2,203,843, against $5,348,103, the corresponding week of last year....The value of the imports since January 1 reached $24,042,761, against $55,567,815 the same week last year.....The movements in other commodities were moderate, and unproductive of any remarkable alterations....We append a revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

Ordinary to extra State Flour, per bbl.	$3 80	@	$4 05
Superfine to fancy Western do. "	3 80	@	4 10
Extra Western Flour, per barrel	4 10	@	7 00
Fancy to extra Genesee, per barrel	4 25	@	6 50
Super to Extra Canadian, per barrel	4 25	@	5 25
Mixed to Extra Southern, per barrel	4 45	@	7 25
Fine to Superfine Rye Flour, per bbl.	3 00	@	3 50
Corn Meal, per barrel	3 50	@	4 00
White Wheat, per bushel	1 00	@	1 43
Red Wheat, per bushel	72	@	1 25
Corn, per bushel	78	@	91
Rye, per bushel	68	@	70
Barley, per bushel	55	@	62½
Western Oats, per bushel	45½	@	46½
State Oats, per bushel	45	@	46
Jersey and Penn. Oats, per bushel	41	@	44
Southern Oats, per bushel	32	@	40
Cotton, middlings, per pound	12¼	@	13
Mess Pork, per barrel	16 70	@	17 00
Prime Pork, per barrel	13 75	@	—
Country Mess Beef, per barrel	10 75	@	11 50
Prime Mess Beef, per tierce	18 00	@	22 00
Beef Hams, per barrel	15 00	@	17 00
Cut Meats, per pound	5½	@	8
Lard, per pound	11¼	@	11¾
State Butter, per pound	12	@	22
Western Butter, per pound	10	@	16
Cheese, per pound	3	@	8
Rice, per 100 pounds	3 00	@	3 75
Rio Coffee, per pound	9¼	@	11¾
Cuba Sugar, per pound	6	@	7¼
Cuba Molasses, per gallon	23	@	32
New Orleans Sugar, per pound	5¼	@	7¾
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon	—	@	40
Hyson Teas, per pound	27	@	55
Oolong Teas, per pound	31	@	60
Domestic Whisky, per gallon	24	@	24½
Hops, per pound	5	@	7
Hay, per 100 pounds	40	@	70
Tallow, per pound	9¼	@	9½
Crude Turpentine, per 280 pounds	3 62½	@	3 68¾
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon	44	@	45
Tar, per barrel	1 75	@	2 00
Common Rosin, per 310 pounds	1 60	@	1 65
Linseed Oil, per gallon	74	@	75
Kentucky Tobacco, per pound	6½	@	15
Seed Leaf Tobacco	9	@	35
American Fleece Wool, per pound	27	@	46
" Pulled Wool	25	@	58

The Live Stock Markets last Wednesday were more freely supplied with Beeves, and, in the absence of an active inquiry, prices tended downward....Milch Cows were plentier, and in better request....Veal Calves, as also Sheep and Lambs, were less active....Swine continued quiet....The reported receipts of Live Stock during each of the last two weeks compares as follows:

	Week ending July 7.	Week ending July 14.
Beeves	3,324	3,956
Milch Cows	188	211
Veal Calves	731	913
Sheep and Lambs	8,061	13,322
Swine	3,193	3,436

Of the Forty-fourth Street Market supply of Beeves last Wednesday there were received from

Illinois	1,208	Indiana	260
Ohio	659	New York	104
Kentucky	495	Pennsylvania	89
Iowa	384	Canada	52

The range of prices according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday was as follows:

Poor to premium Beeves, per pound	$ 6	@	$ 9
Common to ex. Milch Cows, per head	25 00	@	65 00
Veal Calves, per pound	4½	@	6
Sheep and Lambs, per head	2 25	@	8 00
" " per pound	3	@	7½
Live Swine, per pound	5	@	6
Dressed " "	6	@	6½
Roasting Pigs, each	1 00	@	2 00

The Country Produce Markets have not varied much during the week....Gooseberries are advancing. Raspberries, Blackberries, and Huckleberries tend downward. Peaches remain about the same. The demand for domestic fruit is good....The new Potatoes now in come mainly from Norfolk, Long Island, and New Jersey. Green Peas are dearer. Turnips, Beets, Cucumbers, Squashes, and Salad are cheaper. Green Corn is arriving from New Jersey. Cauliflowers are nearly out of market. Some receipts of Okra are reported. The inquiry for Vegetables continues fair....Eggs continue to advance, influenced by diminished receipts....Poultry is plenty and dull. An advance on last week's prices of Woodcock, which are less plenty, and the receipt of some Snipe and Plover, form the only noticeable changes in the way of game.

WHOLESALE PRICES OBTAINED BY PRODUCERS AT WASHINGTON MARKET.

Gooseberries, per bushel	$1 25	@	$2 00
Cherries, per pound	4	@	10
Currants, per pound	3	@	9
Raspberries, per 100 baskets	3 00	@	8 00
Blackberries, per bushel	4 50	@	5 00
Huckleberries, per bushel	4 00	@	5 00
Apples, new, per barrel	2 50	@	3 00
Peaches, per 1¼ bushels	50	@	8 00
String Beans, per bushel	75	@	1 00
Potatoes, new, per barrel	3 00	@	3 50
Onions, new, per barrel	2 50	@	—
" " per 100 bunches	3 00	@	5 00
Turnips, new, per 100 bunches	1 50	@	2 00
Beets, new, per 100 bunches	2 00	@	4 00
New Carrots, per 100 bunches	2 50	@	3 50
Cabbage, new, per 100	2 00	@	5 00
Squashes, per bushel	1 50	@	2 00
Radishes, per 100 bunches	62½	@	75
Green Peas, per bushel	75	@	1 25
Green Corn, per 100 ears	1 00	@	1 25
Watermelons, per 100	25 00	@	75 00
Nutmeg Melons, per 100	8 00	@	12 00
Tomatoes, per bushel	2 00	@	3 00
Cucumbers, per barrel	2 50	@	3 00
Eggs, per dozen	11	@	15
Chickens, per pair	50	@	1 25
Fowls, per pound	11	@	14
Fowls, per pair	75	@	1 25
Ducks, per pair	62	@	1 25
Spring Geese, each	1 00	@	1 50
Turkeys, per pound	15	@	—
Pigeons, per dozen	62	@	2 25
Woodcock, per dozen	3 00	@	4 00
Snipe, Dowlcher, per dozen	1 25	@	1 75
Snipe, Ox-eyes, per dozen	25	@	50
Plover, per dozen	3 00	@	4 00

ADVERTISEMENTS.

INDISPENSABLE. — NO CORRESPONDENT, no Young Gentleman or Lady, no Public Speaker, no Teacher of Youth nor Man of Business should delay procuring these

New Hand-Books for Home Improvement—by Mail.

HOW TO WRITE; a Pocket Manual of Composition and Letter-Writing. Price, paper, 30 cents; muslin, 50 cents.

HOW TO TALK; OR, HINTS TOWARD A GRAMMATICAL AND GRACEFUL STYLE IN CONVERSATION AND DEBATE. 30 cents.

HOW TO BEHAVE; A Manual of Etiquette and Guide to Correct Personal Habits, with Rules for Debating Societies and Deliberative Assemblies. Paper, 30 cents; muslin, 50 cents.

HOW TO DO BUSINESS; A Guide to Success in Practical Life, and Hand-Book of Legal and Commercial Forms. Price 30 cents.

$1 50 will pay for the four works in one volume, in muslin. Postage prepaid by

FOWLER AND WELLS, 308 Broadway, New York.

GODFREY'S EXTRACT OF ELDER FLOWERS.

The sweetest and really the most perfect
BEAUTIFIER IN NATURE.

This admirable preparation of Elder Flowers is very fragrant as a perfume. Elder Flowers have, from the earliest ages, been esteemed as a mild and harmless, yet most perfect beautifier of the Skin. Tan, Sun-burns, Freckles, Redness, &c., it will speedily and completely remove.

CHILDREN.—It is singularly beneficial and perfectly innocuous even to the youngest infant.

SHAVING.—It is valuable beyond any thing, annihilating every pimple and all roughness, rendering the skin soft and firm, preparing it so completely for the razor.

FAMILY LOTION.—Godfrey's Extract of Elder Flowers will be found beyond all praise, and needs only a trial to be approved.

EUGENE DUPUY, Family Chemist,
609 Broadway, N. Y.

TO ADVERTISERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A MAGNIFICENTLY ILLUSTRATED PAPER,
CIRCULATING IN EVERY SECTION OF THE UNION,

Offers unusual inducements to those who desire to bring their business prominently before the community.

1. Only a limited space is devoted to Advertisements.

2. The character and diffusion of the circulation are unequaled.

3. The Paper is generally preserved for Binding.

4. The Advertising Pages are rendered attractive, and can not escape the attention of the reader.

5. None but the most respectable class of Advertisements are admitted.

6. The charges are not as large, proportionally, as those of any other Weekly or Daily Paper.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for Three Months or more.

TERMS.—Fifty Cents a Line.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

CHRISTIAN INQUIRER.

THE CHRISTIAN INQUIRER is published weekly in the City of New York, under the editorial charge of Rev. A. A. Livermore, assisted by the most eminent writers of the Unitarian denomination. It is designed to be fresh, fearless, and reverent, a family religious newspaper of liberal thought and the most advanced Christian tone. TERMS.—Delivered by carrier, $2 50, or by mail, $2 00 per annum. Address Christian Inquirer, 111 Broadway, New York.

The courteous and able organ of the Unitarian denomination in this city.—N. Y. Tribune.

A model paper.—Boston Journal.

One of the best religious newspapers published in America.—Boston Transcript.

One of the ablest Unitarian journals in the country.—N. Y. Daily News.

One of the ablest religious newspapers published in America.—Yonkers Herald.

The ably conducted organ of our Unitarian fellow Christians.—Montreal Herald.

FOR SUMMER TOURISTS.

NEW YORK AND ERIE RAILROAD GUIDE-BOOK: containing a Description of the Scenery, Rivers, Towns, Villages, and most important Works on the Road. Embellished with 136 Engravings on Wood, by LOSSING and BARRITT, from Original Sketches make expressly for the Work. 12mo, Paper, 50 cents; Muslin, 62½ cents.

EUROPEAN ACQUAINTANCE: Being Sketches of People in Europe. By J. W. DE FOREST. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

EDWARDS'S RANDOM SKETCHES. Random Sketches and Notes of European Travel in 1856. By Rev. JOHN A. EDWARDS, A.M. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

WM. C. PRIME'S BOAT LIFE. Boat Life in Egypt and Nubia. By WM. C. PRIME, Author of "The Old House by the River" and "Later Years." Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1 25.

WM. C. PRIME'S TENT LIFE. Tent Life in the Holy Land. By WM. C. PRIME, Author of "The Old House by the River," "Later Years," &c. Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1 25.

REV. DR. PRIME'S TRAVELS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST: Being Sketches and Incidents, with graphic Descriptions of Men, Places, and Things, as seen by the Author in England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Greece, Turkey, Syria, Palestine, and Egypt. By SAMUEL IRENÆUS PRIME. 2 vols. Large 12mo, Muslin, $2 00.

DORE. By a Stroller in Europe. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

JARVES'S PARISIAN SIGHTS, FIRST SERIES. Parisian Sights and French Principles seen through American Spectacles. First Series. With Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

JARVES'S PARISIAN SIGHTS, SECOND SERIES. Parisian Sights and French Principles seen through American Spectacles. Second Series. By JAMES JACKSON JARVES. Numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

JARVES'S ITALIAN SIGHTS. Italian Sights and Papal Principles seen through American Spectacles. By JAMES JACKSON JARVES. Numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

LOTUS EATING. A Summer Book. By G. W. CURTIS, Author of "Nile Notes of a Howadji," "The Howadji in Syria," &c. Beautifully Illustrated from Designs by Kensett. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

This delightful volume is a record of the summer rambles of the author, touching gracefully on many of the most interesting spots in American scenery, and giving a series of lively pictures of the celebrated places of fashionable resort. Humor, pathos, and sentiment are generally blended in its pages, its reflections are always suggestive, its narratives never pall upon the taste, its brilliant word-painting is relieved by an undercurrent of genuine feeling, and its fresh and glowing descriptions give a new charm to familiar objects.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Works by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.—Will speedily purify the blood, remove all unhealthy secretions, and simultaneously produce a healthy action of the stomach and bowels, thereby relieving many complaints arising from a derangement of the digestive functions. Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, No. 100 Fulton Street, New York.

JUST RECEIVED,
PER "PERSIA," JUST RECEIVED,
PIESSE & LUBIN,
HUNGARY WATER.

The specific virtues of Eau de la Reine de Congrie has rendered it justly celebrated in all parts of the world. It was originally distilled, A.D. 1550, by Paracelsus Piesse, the Alchymist and Physician of Transylvania. For two centuries its reputation has steadily advanced, till, at the present time, it has fairly eclipsed all other odorant waters, and that simply from the fact that Hungary Water contains a small portion of Rosemarinus, of which its fragrant competitors are destitute. Now, as it is certain that Rosemary has the power to increase the Memory and invigorate the Brain, as noted by the Bard of Avon,

"There's Rosemary, that's for Remembrance,"

we can not be surprised to learn that Orators, Clergymen, Lecturers, Authors, Poets, give it the preference.

EUGENE DUPUY, Agent, 609 Broadway.

A NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE of HARPER & BROTHERS' PUBLICATIONS, with an Index and Classified Table of Contents, is now ready for distribution, and may be obtained gratuitously on application to the Publishers personally, or by letter inclosing SIX CENTS in Postage Stamps.

The attention of gentlemen, in town or country, designing to form Libraries or enrich their literary collections, is respectfully invited to this Catalogue, which will be found to comprise a large proportion of the standard and most esteemed works in English Literature—COMPREHENDING MORE THAN TWO THOUSAND VOLUMES—which are offered, in most instances, at less than one half the cost of similar productions in England.

To Librarians and others connected with Colleges, Schools, &c., who may not have access to a reliable guide in forming the true estimate of literary productions, it is believed this Catalogue will prove especially valuable as a manual of reference.

To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, whenever books can not be obtained through any bookseller or local agent, applications with remittance should be addressed direct to the Publishers, which will be promptly attended to.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, New York.

GENTLEMEN THAT SHAVE, wanting a superior article, purchase VROOM & FOWLER'S WALNUT OIL MILITARY SHAVING SOAP. Sold by Druggists. JOHN B. VROOM, 72 Cherry St., N. Y.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS "Come Home to Men's Business and Bosoms"—in them is blended our health and affections. Their use secures our health; their use secures our lives; so our children are saved to us and we to our children. Because they open and refine from all foulness, the blood is thus purified and pain and sickness vanish. Sold at 25 cents, old style—13 cents sugar coated—at 294 Canal Street, 296 Bowery, and 241 Hudson Street, New York.

A GORGEOUS NUMBER.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR AUGUST.

CONTENTS.

A WINTER IN THE SOUTH. (Sixth Paper. Illustrated by Twenty Engravings.
THE ROMANCE OF WYOMING. Illustrated by Fifteen Engravings.
VAGABONDIZING IN BELGIUM. Illustrated by Ten Engravings.
HOW THE MONEY GOES.
OLIVE WINCHESTER WIGHT. By LOUISE CHANDLER MOULTON.
THE FREAKS OF FORTUNE, AND THEIR LESSON.
THE RED BRACELET.
MY SISTER MARGARET.
RATHER GHOSTLY.
CRITICISMS ON ITALY.
NOSES.
THE QUIET HOME.
THE VIRGINIANS. By W. M. THACKERAY.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—A Vice-Queen.—A Rencontre in Fleet Street.—Four Head-Pieces.
CHAPTER XXXIII. Contains a Soliloquy by Hester.
CHAPTER XXXIV. In which Mr. Warrington treats the Company with Tea and a Ball.
CHAPTER XXXV. Entanglements.
CHAPTER XXXVI. Which seems to mean Mischief.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERARY NOTICES. Books of the Month.
EDITOR'S TABLE.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
GUESSES AT THE TRUTH.
ILLUSTRATIONS. — Anxious Mother. — Precocious Boy.—Young Lady.—Man about Town.—Careful Housekeeper.—Romantic Maiden.—Bold Burglar.—Broadway Dandy.—Trusting Wife.—Country Cousin.—Bank Director.—Verdant Youth.—Polite Shopkeeper.—Assured Lover.—Tardy Traveler.—Foolish Tourist.
FASHIONS FOR AUGUST.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Dinner Dress.—Lace Basquine.—Under-sleeve.—Chemise.

The Publishers of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE refer to the Sixteen Volumes already issued as the best assurance that no labor or expense will be spared to render it worthy of the liberal support which it has received. They believe that the Magazine now embraces in its general plan every thing essential to an attractive literary miscellany, adapted to the wants of the American Public. Its regular circulation has not been diminished even during the unexampled financial revulsion, which has proved disastrous to so many literary and commercial enterprises; and they are assured from every quarter that the Magazine is recognized as a necessity rather than a luxury. They therefore announce no "New Features" for the future. They will continue to fill the Magazine with articles inculcating sound views in Life and Morals; leaving, as heretofore, the discussion of sectarian opinions in Religion, and sectional questions in Politics to their own appropriate organs. Wise men and true patriots agree upon points far more numerous than those upon which they differ. The object of the Magazine will be to unite rather than to separate the views and feelings of the people of different sections of our common country.

The Publishers do not find it necessary or expedient to appeal to public attention by issuing "Specimen Numbers" containing an unusual amount of matter or illustrations. They intend that every number shall prove the Magazine to be the best and cheapest periodical published. It will contain a larger amount of matter, more numerous and better illustrations, printed in a better manner, than any other Monthly Magazine; and the Publishers are confident that it will deserve and receive the same cordial appreciation and liberal patronage which have been accorded to it during the Eight Years of its publication.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

DYSPEPSIA AND FITS.
DR. O. PHELPS BROWN.

THE GREAT CURER OF CONSUMPTION, was for several years so badly afflicted by Dyspepsia, that for a part of the time he was confined to his bed. He was eventually cured by a prescription furnished him by a young clairvoyant girl. This prescription, given him by a mere child, while in a state of trance, has cured every body who has taken it, never having failed once. It is equally as sure in cases of FITS as of DYSPEPSIA. The ingredients may be found in any drug store. I will send this valuable prescription to any person on the receipt of one stamp to pay postage.

Address Dr. O. PHELPS BROWN,
No. 21 Grand Street, Jersey City, N. J.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.

BULWER'S BRILLIANT ROMANCE, entitled "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?" pronounced to be the masterpiece of this polished, witty, and learned novelist, by special arrangement with the Author, appears in HARPER'S WEEKLY simultaneously with its publication in England.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks $1 00
One Copy for One Year 2 50
One Copy for Two Years 4 00
Five Copies for One Year 9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year 20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year . . . 40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

Volume I. of "HARPER'S WEEKLY," handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $3 50, is now ready.

Muslin Covers are furnished to those who wish their Numbers bound, at Fifty Cents each. TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT. DISCOUNT allowed to Bookbinders and the Trade.

"HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY," when taken together, are supplied at FOUR DOLLARS a year.

Numbers from the commencement of both the MAGAZINE and WEEKLY can still be supplied. Specimen copies furnished gratuitously. Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest Club rates.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" and "HARPER'S WEEKLY" must be paid at the Office where they are received. When prepaid quarterly in advance, the Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty-six Cents a year on the WEEKLY.

Persons residing in the British Provinces will remit, in addition to their Subscription, Thirty-six Cents on the MAGAZINE, and Twenty-six Cents on the WEEKLY, for the American postage.

 Persons living in the City of New York wishing "Harper's Weekly" left at their houses, will please send their names and residences, with the subscription money, to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

ADVENTURES OF A GOLD HUNTER.

In view of the approaching rush to the Frazer River Diggings, we have directed our Artist to give the following Pictorial Narrative of the Adventures of our friend, JOLLY GREEN, ESQ., who, as is known, was one of the first Adventurers to California:

1. Jolly Green's portrait, from a hasty sketch made twenty-four hours before his departure for California.

2. Jolly Green discovers that he has been swindled. His first cabin ticket entitles him to the privilege of coiling himself up in a coil of rope some place in the neighborhood of the steerage.

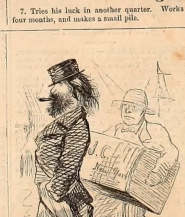
3. Becomes slightly acquainted with life at sea, and thoroughly initiated into the miseries of seasickness.

4. Arrival at Chagres; is waylaid by naked niggers, and baggage disappears.

5. Recovers baggage after paying $50 over the actual value thereof. Arrives in San Francisco during a lively mêlée between several prominent citizens, with revolvers, knives, &c.

6. Finding San Francisco too hot for him, tries the "Diggins;" jumps another man's claim, who makes him jump in return.

7. Tries his luck in another quarter. Works four months, and makes a small pile.



8. Thinks he will increase it by speculating in "poker." Loses the pile in two moments.

9. Being disgusted with "poker," and having good experience in making holes in the ground, turns his attention to getting up ready-made post holes and wells. Discovers a "nugget," and makes his fortune in two days and fourteen hours.

10. Sells his post hole for $10,000, presents his pick and shovel to a charitable institution, and decines running for Congress.

11. Returns on next steamer to the "States," a millionaire.

12. Jolly Green can be found any day at the St. Nicholas, a living evidence of the old saying, "A fool for luck," &c., &c.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

SINGER'S NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINES.—No other sewing machine for family use ever equaled this, either as respects the beauty of the work, its perfection and variety of its work. Call and examine it.
I. M. SINGER & CO., 458 Broadway, New York.

WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES,
343 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Received the highest Premiums awarded, 1857, by the American Institute, N. Y.; Maryland Institute, Baltimore; and at the Maine, Connecticut, Illinois, and Michigan State Fairs.
Send for a Circular, containing Editorial and Scientific opinions, Testimonials from persons of the highest social position, &c.

SINGER'S IMPROVED SEWING MACHINE for all kinds of family purposes.—Its mechanism commences superiority of construction, it is only necessary to inquire of any manufacturing mechanic who uses one. Send for a copy of SINGER & CO.'S Gazette, which will be supplied gratis. It gives full information on the subject.
I. M. SINGER & CO.
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

THE NEW BOOKS.
JUST
LECTURES OF LOLA MONTEZ.
Including her "Autobiography," "Wit and Women of Paris," "Comic Aspect of Love," "Beautiful Women," "Gallantry," &c. Bustin, sized portraits. Price $1.
SECOND
WOMAN'S THOUGHTS ABOUT WOMEN.
The latest and best work, by the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "Agatha's Husband," "The Ogilvies," "Olive," &c. Bound in muslin. Price $1.
THIRD
FOLLOWING THE DRUM:
Or, Glimpses of Seamy Life. Being brilliant Sketches of Bivouac Incidents on the Rio Grande, &c. By Mrs. Eugene L. Voltz. Muslin. Price $1.
FOURTH
TRUE LOVE NEVER RUD RUN SMOOTH.
An Earnest Tale in Verse. By Thomas Bailey Aldrich, author of "Babie Bell." Elegantly printed, and bound in muslin. Illustrated. Price 50 cents.
Any of these books will be sent by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.
RUDD & CARLETON, Publishers and Booksellers,
No. 310 Broadway, New York.

DR. MUNDE'S WATER-CURE AT FLORENCE, MASS., three miles from the Northampton Depot. Price for Patients $12 per week.

ATWATER'S PATENT $16 AND $25 SEWING MACHINE received the First Premium over Singer's and Wheeler & Wilson's, at the State Fair, held at Buffalo, October 7th, 1857.
The Cheapest and Best SEWING MACHINE in the market.
Office, 495 BROADWAY, New York.
Send for Descriptive Circular.
H. C. BURTMAN & CO.,
Sole Agent for the United States.

GOUPIL & CO.,
PRINT PUBLISHERS and ARTIST'S COLOURMEN,
366 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK.
Engravings, Oil Paintings, Artists' Materials, Frames, &c., &c.

FAMILY SEWING MACHINE DEPOT.
FIFTEEN and FIFTY dollar
SEWING MACHINES.
The Fifteen Dollar Sewing Machine is the best cheap machine ever offered to the Public. Fifteen minutes only required to learn to operate upon it. The Fifty Dollar Machine is warranted to excel all other family sewing machines. We challenge the world to produce its equal. C. W. THOMAS & CO., 609 Broadway, N. Y.
☞ Agents wanted.

THE ETERNAL PERFUME,
FROM THE HOLY CITY.
"Oh! could I but catch that fragrance,
I would ask no other favor,
Than that those sweet-scented flowers
Should be coupled with my name!"
Bevoir of Institutes.
Frangipanni, the Perfume, Frangipanni, the Sachet,
Frangipanni Soap, Frangipanni Oil.
Sole Agent for the United States,
EUGENE DUPUY,
Importer,
609 Broadway.
Sold every where.

INVENTORS—PATENTS—PATENTEES.
PERSONS desiring to secure patents in the United States or Europe can receive full instructions, free of charge, by addressing MUNN & CO., Editors of the Scientific American, New York City.

KISS-ME-QUICK,
THE FAVORITE PERFUME,
Distilled from Fragrant
TULIPS
Kiss-me-quick, the Perfume,
Kiss-me-quick, the Sachet,
Kiss-me-quick Soap.
EUGENE DUPUY, Chemist and Family Druggist,
609 Broadway.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. II.—No. 83.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 31, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

CONTENTS.

I. THE LYNCHING OF WILLIAM BARKER AT LEXINGTON, KENTUCKY, WITH AN ILLUSTRATION.
II. EDITORIALS.
III. THE LOUNGER.
IV. THE LATE GENERAL QUITMAN, WITH A PORTRAIT.
V. THE ERIE RAILROAD ACCIDENT, WITH TWO ILLUSTRATIONS.
VI. LITERARY.
VII. DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.
VIII. FOREIGN NEWS.
IX. THE MOON, AND HOW WE SEE IT, WITH A SPLENDID ILLUSTRATION.
X. NOTHING NEW.
XI. THE DELECTABLE STORY OF MIEL BONGON.
XII. A CHOPPY OF SORROW.
XIII. DULWER'S "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?"—Continued.
XIV. PERSIAN DANCING-GIRLS, WITH A FINE ILLUSTRATION.
XV. MISCELLANY.
XVI. THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.
XVII. MARKET AND FINANCIAL REPORTS.
XVIII. COMICALITIES.

THE LYNCHING OF WILLIAM BARKER AT LEXINGTON, KENTUCKY.

WE subjoin an excellent picture of the execution, by a mob, of William Barker the murderer, at Lexington, Kentucky, on 19th inst. The picture is from a Melainotype, taken on the spot by Mr. J. C. ELROD of that place—an artist who, we can readily imagine, ranks very high in his profession in the West.

Mr. CHARLES E. MOONEY thus writes concerning the affair:

"On the morning of the 10th instant William Barker, one of a notorious gang who have infested Lexington for some time, was engaged in an altercation with another person, and had his knife drawn as if to strike. Joseph Beard, the City Marshal, was at that time in the market-house across street, making some purchases. His attention being attracted to the fracas, he went over, and, seizing Barker by the arm, started with him to the watch-house; they had proceeded but a few steps when Barker uptripped Mr. Beard, and, as he was falling, stabbed him in the hip; the murderer then very deliberately turned his victim over and thrust his bowie-knife in his breast, drawing it forward him and twisting it around in the wound. Mr. Beard died instantly, and the assassin fled, but was arrested and placed in jail. The enraged citizens would at that time have visited summary punishment upon Barker; but it was too early in the morning, and but few were present.

"About seven o'clock A.M. the court-house and fire-bells were rung simultaneously, and in a remarkably short space of time hundreds of the best citizens had assembled at the court-house. A motion was made to proceed to the jail and take out the murderer and hang him. The proposition was received with an assenting shout; in a few moments the multitude had reached the jail, forced the keys from the jailer, and secured Barker; he was taken to the court-house, out of the second-story window of which a beam was thrust. The rope was then placed around the wretched man's neck, and the other end fastened to the beam; his hands were then tied, and he was let out of the window as gently as possible; but the rope proved too weak—it snapped, and the murderer fell to the pavement. Another rope was procured, and he was supported until it could be fastened; he was then swung off. He remained suspended for over an hour. Thus ended the fearful tragedy. That such demonstrations of popular indignation are to be deprecated all will readily admit, but that Barker deserved death no one will deny; and it is only because the people have seen for years their best citizens slaughtered, and the murderers permitted to go unwhipped of justice, that they resolved, in this instance, to show their determination not to be insulted by mock administration of law."

The following account of the same affair is by the correspondent of the Baltimore American:

"William Barker, the murderer, just discharged from prison upon a charge of theft, a notorious malefactor and rowdy, had a difficulty at early dawn with a person of the name of M'Chesney. Barker drew a knife, and made several attempts to stab M'Chesney, without serious result. Captain Beard, the murdered man, just from his home and bed, attempted to arrest Barker by clasping the arm whose hand contained the knife. The individual of the knife was possessed of a stalwart person and superior physical powers, and wrenched his arm out of Captain Beard's grasp, then grappled with him, threw him on the pavement, and, with his foot on him or leg thrown over him, raised his knife and stabbed him to the heart. Several citizens saw the deed done. Barker had previously threatened to kill Captain Beard. He was knocked down, by way of a warrant, and lugged off to jail. The bells rang, the citizens assembled, and I, with a desire to hear more of the affair, joined the rapidly accumulating throng in front of the jail.

"No question were asked; no second consideration formed a part of any person's mind present, perhaps, except my own. The purpose was to lynch him. The immense crowd, embracing citizens of great respectability, seemed to regard matters very quietly, and I looked in vain for the earnest eyes and clenched hands that to me seemed an indication of so awful a purpose.

"The tenants of the murderer's max stood silently and collectedly apart from the crowd. Like a person of honor called to the field, he seemed to have left the entire management of the vengance to his friends and fellow-townsmen.

"No desires were entertained of the result.

"The affair now began to assume an import so terribly solemn to one whom sympathies, by reason of knowing no one concerned, were not enlisted, that I bethought me of getting away until all was over. Just at this moment an immense cheer and cries of 'They've got him!' passing from mouth to mouth from the denser mass around the jail door, announced a more explicit demonstration. Forth they came by twos and threes, and now I saw the countenance of determination that I had previously looked for. Presently I had a momentary glimpse of the doomed personage, as bareheaded, with open collar, he was hurried away by the crowd to the court-house. The fascination of the occasion, which can only be explained by likening it to the serpent's charm, drew me with the rapid moving crowd. Over the fences, through the gates, came the eager assemblage, as the foremost ones hurried him from tree to tree in the court-house yard, with a rope of the consistency of a well-used bed-cord, seeking vainly for some limb sufficiently strong to sustain his guilty weight. An officer of the law made a sort of demonstration with his hat from the steps of the court-house. 'Friends, fellow-citizens!' 'Hang him, hang him!' 'My friends, I entreat—' 'Hang him!' 'No mercy, no trial—hang him!'

"During this temporary outbreak, to which attention was directed, I had a fair opportunity to observe the doomed man—a burly, healthy-looking personage, with a not unhandsome face, clear eyes, hair of dark brown, so ruffled as to give it the appearance of curls, his neck bared, and the blood flowing in little drops from the scratches inflicted by officious hands; his collar parted and thrown back, by accident, assumed a very melodramatic air, and his perfect silence and composure of demeanor gave to him very much the appearance of a theatrical personage.

THE LYNCHING OF WILLIAM BARKER AT LEXINGTON, KENTUCKY.—[FROM A MELAINOTYPE BY J. C. ELROD, OF LEXINGTON.]

"But now a hack for me has had been discovered, and was pushed out of the upper window of the court-house, and at the moment, without the previous appearance of the clouds to indicate it, the rain began falling with considerable force. It was rain, however, to change the programme of the multitudes.

"I withdrew. I am told the rope was tied around his neck, and he was pushed from the window. The rope broke, and he fell a distance of twenty feet on the pavement. It appeared to a deputy, that his sufferings here terminated by death or immediately. The stronger rope was procured and this around his neck as he lay, and he was raised to a very moderate height, and left swinging from the house.

"In the heart of this city, with all the business houses and stores all open, including the banks, and the courthouse yard. The clouds have cleared away, the sun shines, the birds sing, but he is still hanging, with little boys gazing within two feet of his suspended body."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 31, 1858.

HOW THE ENGLISH ARE GOING TO USE THEIR GOLD-MINES.

LETTERS have been received in this city from the Head Office of the Hudson's Bay Company in Canada, professing ignorance of the policy which the Company will adopt with regard to trade to Frazer's River, and referring persons who propose to send goods thither to the headquarters of the Company in London, England. Simultaneously, we have received a copy of Sir Edward B. Lytton's bill for the extension of the Hudson's Bay territory into a British colony with a territorial government.

The general opinion of those who know the Hudson's Bay Company best, is, that the direction of that body will decide not to open a promiscuous trade to Frazer's River, but will insist on the "letter of the bond," the full monopoly granted to the Company two generations ago. It is supposed that this course will be adopted, on the ground that nothing could now save the Company from confiscation, and that its best policy is evidently to make the most of its present opportunities. It is imagined that, under any circumstances, persons will flock to Frazer's River, and that, by holding the trade in its own hands, the Company may make an excellent thing by furnishing them with supplies at exorbitant prices.

This supposition may be erroneous. The Company may be inspired with a spirit of liberality, and may throw open the door to free immigration, and its natural consequence—free trade. But it is due to them to say that it should be noted, that, should the Hudson's Bay Company adopt this course, it will form a striking exception to the class of corporations of which it is a member. Of the chartered monopolies of olden time, it is safe to expect any thing but liberality and sagacity.

Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton's bill states nothing positively with regard to the future organization of the new territory, except that it is to be organized. The form and nature of the Governor most are left to the discretion of the Queen: that is to say, of the ministry for the time being. The ministry may establish a despotic government, in the shape of a Governor irresponsible to the people of the Territory; may, as used to be the Canadian practice, supply him with no other check than a Council named by him by himself; or may, according to the modern Canadian and Australian precedents, send out a Governor with a veto, but practically elected for the election of a popular Legislature. We have no clue to the designs of the Derby administration in reference to the future government to be conferred upon New Caledonia. The liberal tendency of British opinion would, however, justify a hope that the appointment of New Caledonia will approximate more closely to those of the territories of the United States than to those of the old British colonies. It must not be forgotten that no organizing act can go into effect until the Charter of the Company expires, which will be some months hence.

It is, to some degree, with this New Caledonia as with India,—while British Parliament is in session and Houses of Parliament are filling, Lucknow is burning, and twenty thousand heavy-armed and light-accoutered troops are marching to the diggings. In the face of these twenty thousand, all the Armies of Parliament in the world, and all the votes of Members, will be of no avail in behalf of smoke. If the twenty thousand are imperiled in their progress, the taste of their quality may have given in California warrant to the belief that they will overrule the impediment whatever it may be. One duly of war will not be enough to enforce the behests of Governor Douglas of Vancouver's Island. Nor would a dozen. Twenty thousand experienced Californian miners would require a regularly equipped army to keep them in check. And it will be of bad augury if the British authorities commence their administration of their new gold regions with a civil war. The only method by which the exceedingly dangerous class from which gold-seekers are recruited can be controlled, is by adopting rules of which they will admit the justice. If the authorities of Frazer's River tolerate trade under due pecuniary restrictions and conditions; if they levy a reasonable duty on goods, and, if they find them conditions accepted, they favor immigration and trade, all will go well. But if there be any such attempt as that which the Government instituted in Australia—and which led to the Ballarat riots—civilization in the New Caledonian River dependencies, will England may have to mourn over the loss of a fine territory.

THE CANVASS IN ILLINOIS.

THERE can be no question but the pending canvass in Illinois is the most important and momentous which ever took place in the political history of the United States. There are, properly speaking, three parties in Illinois—the Republicans, whose candidate is Mr. Lincoln, the Douglas Democrats, represented by Judge Douglas himself, and the Administration party.

The latter is in a peculiar position. It will go into the fight—if it enter at all—on the mere ground of public opposition to Mr. Douglas, in consequence of his disloyalty to the party on the Kansas question. On all other points it agrees with the Republicans, and if this point will be driven—like Mr. Burke's colleague in the representation of Bristol—to content himself with naming such candidates that is a mere ditto to Mr. Douglas. For, though the Senator from Illinois opposed the English compromise, he has since come to accept it as the best which can be raised by that measure. He does not propose to undo what has been done. No Democrat, however ardently wedded to the Nebraska question, could pursue a course different from that which he will adopt in the present Illinois election. For all this, if the Washington Union is to be regarded as authority, a third candidate will be run against Mr. Douglas, and will be run, on a pure and unadulterated Administration ticket.

Mr. Lincoln's ground is at all events clear and unequivocal. He is opposed to the introduction of new slave States. He is opposed to the Dred Scott decision. He is opposed to the Nebraska bill. He is opposed to the Kansas policy, that admits the right of new independent communities to prescribe their own institutions, and sanctions the principle of the Dred Scott judicial tribunal in the land. On these two points Judge Douglas takes issue with him. He will have to do battle on the Nebraska question, whatever it may decide. And he will vote for the admission of a new State which complies with the requirements of the Nebraska act, by sanction and establish slavery.

The contest will evidently be between these two. It is impossible to be the interest of the Administration, may receive the Dred-ocifers' votes, but it is equally clear that Sam will, for example, prove any thing. The question that will be decided by this issue of the Illinois conflict will be, whether that State is to recognize sovereignty and the supremacy of the courts of highest jurisdiction, or not. As such, the canvass is worthy of the closest attention.

WHOM SHOULD WE MARRY?

RECENT cases give significance to this inquiry. A secretary of a foreign legation, a man apparently unexceptionable in point of character, and of respectable family, is found to be a miserable linkeswie, falls in love with a banker's daughter, who reciprocates the attachment. The banker, unacquainted with the secret, and in his house incog., actually kicks him out; for which the secretary duly challenges him, and, after the usual forms, kills him in a duel, and runs with his glove. Hereupon general commotion in the hooped world. Whether the banker should be hung, or let off lightly, or his daughter run away, or the lover should have resigned his house—are very momentous problems indeed.

Another case. A young lady in the South (the name is not given) married very young a French adventurer and scoundrel, falls in love with another, though the scamp has a wife already, runs away with him, and then the usual difficulty ensued from his clutches—a general conspiracy of connexions, in which lawyers, doctors, bank-keepers, and every body else seemed to be implicated—contriving for a long time to baffle the indignant father and to hide the vile author of so much mischief. The end was a duel, of course, if all American girls had at eighteen the knowledge of the world possessed by men of fifty. If this could be managed, there would be an end of the matter. If Miss Blount had possessed the experience of General Cass or Mayor Tiemann, she would have disposed of her French friend in remarkably quick time. If Miss Corcoran had been equally fortunate, her lover would not have been kicked, nor her father slapped in the face. But if no process has been invented by which experience can be pumped into the mind in a concentrated form, and no system devised by which age and experience can be transfused into missing parts, what are we to do then? An agitated community is accustomed to look to Parliament for the prevention of insane attachments and foolish marriages.

It is very easy to say, as our French critics do, that our young ladies have too much liberty, and that we had for better look 'em up in convents till they are ready to come out, like a curing a dowry in one hand and a key in the other. And it is comfortably consoling to remark that the Parisian institutions were not so totally engrossed in the purchase and sale of dep-oouls and lanes, daughters and sisters would be better cared for and less likely to go astray.

But in point of fact, is it true that young girls in this country enjoy so much undue liberty? If true, the remedies are so neglectful of them? Where is the family, in real life, whose unmarried female members lead the independent existence described by our French critics? Whose daughters go out of an evening with a latchkey? There may be here and there, in the wilder and looser ladies who have emancipated themselves from parental control, and who take delight in flinging conventional hypocrisy under foot—are they not the town talk? How can they be the rule?

No doubt female education in the United States leaves much to be desired. No question but many boarding-schools realize the sentence in the litany, to confirm the wicked into the way they ought to be done, and do the things which ought not to be done. Clean as anomaly that at such establishments the girls are not taught accountancy, and practice the same in after-life to their own sorrow and others' disgrace. But how infinitesimally small is this of our young girls! Is there one in a thousand of our young women who is—not uninstructed, that is of less moment, but—perverted by defective systems of education?

In fact, you may take up the supposed cases of female depravity, one by one, and you shall find them all miserably inadequate to account for the effects. For if they do exercise the influences ascribed to them, it would be inexplicable that that influence should not be more widely felt. The young ladies who run away with fortune-hunters are rare exceptions in the wide and ille of the matters of the next generation. That great community, our young girls, are far from being what they should be; there are too many qualities which they lack, and for the want of which they suffer and ought to suffer; but the very notoriety of the occasional faux pas which do occur among them proves the soundness of the general system under which they are reared. I am sure those who imagine from recent scandals that society is on the verge of dissolution. Let them compare it as they will, American society will compare favorably with any in the world.

HOW TO KEEP COOL.

A CORRESPONDENT requests us to inform him how to keep cool in the dog-days. Nothing is easier.

In the first place: dress with care. Wear flannel next to your skin, both in order that the perspiration may be absorbed and put in a fair way of tranquil evaporation, and likewise in order that the temperature in society, which you will not be if your shirt looks as though it had just been "wrung out." Wear light clothing, linen if you can. Have one of the many gossamer stuffs which are made for summer wear. Be careful about the look of the neck. According to the present fashion, a man must wear at least twenty folds of various kinds of stuffs on the back of his neck, in the shape of coat, vest, and cravat. Cut off as many of these folds as you can possible. In all tropical countries, men wear the neck bare, or protected by a single linen covering. The back of the neck, in a sultry climate, is the key to the body; better leave waistcoat, cravat, or tie and shirt collar at home than expose it with such a handicap.

Next, avoid mental irritation and muscular exertion, if you can. Anger is to heating as a blast furnace to any range and is accompanied by a gush of perspiration. Nor is it necessary for the transaction of business that your manners should be voluble or hurried. The men who do the most work move leisurely. Haste is a bad speed; and he shall you perform your the faster for spasmodic action of the arms or legs. Do what you have to do steadily and unremittingly, but use no muscles but those whose motion is necessary.

It is a question whether the consumption of liquids is beneficial or injurious. On the one hand, it is certain that the introduction of liquids into the system promotes perspiration; but on the other, it is scarcely less certain that those who perspire the most suffer least from the heat. A few points may be laid down. The man who, on a hot day, yields to that vulgar longing for a drink, whether water or beer, will be troubled with thirst till evening; while he who abstains from liquids till two o'clock will not need them at all. And it is, in any case, fatal to drink spirituous liquors. It is known that a habitual consumer of ardent spirits will be able to sit comfortably, in winter, in a room where a temperate man would almost freeze. For the same reason the habitual "drinker" of ardent spirits will suffer acutely from heat when the abstemious man will not feel any inconvenience.

In hot weather, claret and water is the most innocuous beverage which a man can indulge in to taste. He might as well spend an hour or two in a steamer's fire-room as taste brandy or whiskey.

After all, the best preventive against suffering from excessive heat is constant occupation of the mind. People have died of heat that is enervating. Yet almost all the great exploits of which mankind boast have been performed under the scorching sun; all the battles that have been fought in the dog-days; at no season has the human intellect been so vigorous as when the heat was greatest. There is nothing enervating in heat to those who do not desire to be enervated. And the best of all ways to defy the sun's power is to devote your mind with renewed energy to some particular pursuit. Ardent labor, and unremitting attention to one particular task, divert the mind from the minor concern of the temperature. The industrious man sweats but at an evening, when he hears that the weather has been oppressive. He has not suffered, because the subject never occurred to him. He is the man who thought and who are heard calling the oldest inhabitant to witness that there never was such weather before.

POST-OFFICE IRREGULARITIES.

WE heartily concur in the general credit that Postmaster-General Brown has earned by liberal discharge of the duties of his office. It is due to him to say that there never was a time when the Post-Office was governed with greater state of efficiency. And we consider that we are aiding him in his work when we say that Harper's Magazine, mailed regularly from Philadelphia to the lower part of Delaware, for the past half year, have never reached their destination. The letters, papers and papers mailed from this city to places on the Erie Road, within two hours of New York by rail, average forty-eight hours in reaching their destination. Any further information can be supplied if necessary.

RENEWAL OF THE TELEGRAPH EXPERIMENT.

The Agamemnon has at last arrived at Queenstown; and, 2500 miles of cable remaining on board the two vessels, it has been resolved to renew the experiment. The undertaking is so noble, and its results, should it prove successful, will be so momentous to civilization and human progress, that criticism is almost disarmed. It is painful to write, painful to read any thing that may seem to censure individuals whose aims concern themselves so much, and so exalted praise, and whose work, when it is completed, will dwarf the most magnificent triumphs extant of human skill and ingenuity.

But, for the very reason that every body has the success of the telegraph so much at heart, it is most ardently to be hoped that the oversights which were partially the cause of the failure of the last, will not be repeated on the present occasion. The present attempt is the last.

It is due to truth that it should be stated that too much haste was the principal cause of the little provided for by man. Of the causes of the three breaks which took place in June, the public are ignorant. The cable gave way—that is all: there is no more to be said.

Fortune is said to favor the brave. Never had man more reason to rely upon good luck than in this instance. But we are bound to say that, unless she better herself with more than common goodwill, the Atlantic Telegraph may yet remain a remote possibility.

THE OBSERVATORY QUARREL.

WE are glad to hear that there is every prospect that Professor Mitchell, of Cincinnati, will be induced to accept the directorship of the Dudley Observatory. Without intending the least reflection on Dr. Gould, we think the institution in saying that Professor Mitchell at Albany would be the right man in the right place, and would undoubtedly do honor to himself and the country.

We notice that Dr. Gould's friends, who are all of them men of high standing with specialists of one sort or another, are very severe on the Trustees, who, poor men, being bankers, merchant tailors, and the like forth, have no power at their command. The industry with which Dr. Gould's sorrows are being heralded is amazing. It may be doubted, however, whether this newspaper war on the Trustees will hurt them or benefit their rebellious subordinate. Certainly, if Dr. Gould may in any way be identified with the vulgar and senseless gobble which is going on in the Dr. Gould's in his behalf, one can well understand the Trustees' anxiety to get rid of him.

THE LOUNGER.

NOBODY'S MURDERS.

The railways are insatiable. It is not enough that the cars should be the most dusty, noisy, and wearisome of carriages—that the health of the traveling world should be destroyed by the quality of the "refreshments" provided at stated shanties on the road, and by the quantity of time allowed to consume them—that the companies should absorb so much of the savings of honest laborers all over the land, and never return a dollar in dividends—that the mercantile morality of the community should suffer such damage from stock speculations, and apparently respectable people come to shame by their inability to resist the temptations to swindle—all this is not enough, but every man who leaves the city by a train must cast a lingering look behind, in sober sadness doubting whether the chances of a safe arrival are not entirely against him.

The recent disaster upon the Erie Railroad has received very proper attention from the press; and it will very soon be time to organize vigilance committees for the protection of human life upon our railroads, by securing the prompt punishment of the persons directly and indirectly concerned. A train thunders along a down-grade around a curve above a precipice at the rate of forty miles an hour—a rail snaps—two cars are hurled off the track down the bank, and six or seven corpses and a score or so of maimed victims are taken from the ruins—the President or some other officer "hurries to the scene of the disaster"—an inquest is held—the officers of the road swear that it was in "good enough" condition—that the rate of speed was not unusual; that the same thing had been done a hundred times before safely; and as many other absurdities as occur to them—and a jury return, of course, that nobody is to blame. Nobody ever is. Boilers are bursting all over the country—railroad bridges breaking and rails snapping—human life is sadly and foolishly squandered—but nobody is to blame. Boilers burst themselves. Rails break themselves. And it may be questioned whether the consequent slaughter of men, women, and children is not really suicide.

Take the Erie case, and look at it a moment.

Suppose you can clearly free all the officers of the road from intentional guilt, and fix the fault upon the iron rail. There is no question that there was a flaw in the rail—that it was very poor iron. Now the makers of the rail, and the purchasers, should employ competent testers. Considering the immense consequences, when rail iron is proved defective, the name of the house from which it was purchased should be widely advertised. In the present instance we learn that it was an English house. Let the public know what house, that if it be dishonest in its work it may be stigmatized; and if honest, that it may suffer the consequences of an oversight or of incapable servants. The makers of the rail are first to blame in this case, and then the buyers. What right had the Erie Railroad Company to lay a defective rail? What guarantee have the public that every mile of road upon their track is not subject to the same accident?

But it is beyond doubt that around this unprotected curve the train was absolutely leaping along. Why do the people submit to railroad accidents? Why not send representatives who shall insist that no railroad charters shall be granted except upon certain conditions of construction? Thus every road should be carefully fenced along the whole route—where, upon high embankments, fences are impossible, there should be low walls, or the rate of speed diminished to an absolutely safe point—and after rails properly selected had been laid, the whole road should be garrisoned so amply that every inch should be inspected after the passage of every train by day and night.

Of course it would be expensive—what of that? Fewer railroads might be built—what of that? Every body knows that the first object of a projected railroad is not the advantage of any region of country, but of the stock-jobbers who originate the property and speculate in it. Here is this very Erie Road running a hopeless rivalry with the New York Central. Losing money, as it probably is, its object is to do its work in the cheapest way. It is even alleged that the office in town received a dispatch asking to have some one sent to the scene of the late accident empowered to settle the demands for broken legs, arms, and necks! Why not have this tariff made out in advance? The companies state upon their tickets how much value they hold themselves responsible for in loss of luggage, why not in loss of limb?

The coroner's jury return that nobody is guilty of this last sad massacre; but common sense and public opinion hold the makers of the iron, the buyers of it, and the officers of the railroad, morally responsible for the lost lives and the untold agony of many a household.

HOW ABOUT "THE VIRGINIANS?"

"My dear Lounger,—How do you like 'The Virginians' now? Isn't it poor?—Your affectionate
"Adolphus."

If there is any where in literature a more elaborate and exquisitely finished picture of English society of a century ago, or a more masterly representation of the characters which the author undertakes to draw, the Lounger confides to Adolphus that he does not know it. If Thackeray has ever drawn the fluctuating aspects of human nature—consistent only in inconsistency—more skillfully than in "The Virginians," the Lounger does not know the book in which it is done. If he has ever described any scenes more delightful for humor and naturalness than some between the Countess and Maria, where are they? If, in fact, the reader is not transferred to the century in which the story is laid—if he does not saunter at Tunbridge, and see all the high society—if he does not know more of that England than from all the histories and memoirs and letters—if Harry Warrington is not one of the most charming figures in fiction; so perfectly boyish, yet so quaint by distance and perspective (in that differing entirely from Clive Newcome)—why, then, the reader must have been concerned about a plot, or anxious to get on.

Now there is no particular plot, and we have certainly been at Tunbridge Wells for a long time. But nobody, with Thackeray's books behind him—that is, having read them—has a right to demand plots and gettings on of a new one. Thackeray describes life and daguerreotypes character. His interest is in the people and their play upon the events immediately around them—the course of their loves and of that of others for them—ditto their hates and jealousies and suspicions—but he gives no more plot than he finds. He has no idea of busying himself with planning surprises and wonderments for his readers. At Newport, or Saratoga, or Cape May, or the Berkeley Springs, where you are passing these lovely summer days, you watch that little Lucy and the great Lieutenant Bobadil who has fascinated her; or the dexterous old Matilda, who is entrapping the lawny young clergyman; you watch, and wonder how it will turn out. And precisely the same thing is what Thackeray enables us to do in "The Virginians."

If you are insatiate for plot and gettings on, read Bulwer and James. Don't abuse a tall gentleman of fifty or so, with white hair, that he's not twenty-two, five feet ten inches, and with a curling auburn pate. If you think he is so fierce and frivolous at the same time, read the last Number, and hear what he says for himself.

Dear Adolphus, the Lounger enjoys "Guy Mannering" as well as "The Bride of Lammermoor." People sniff at "St. Ronan's Well," but it is a very toothsome novel for all that. "The Virginians" is unfinished, as yet; but is it not the costume rather than the character which puts it out of your sympathy, so that you call it "poor?"

ROBERT BROWN.

Two months ago few readers of the Lounger, perhaps, could have answered him—certainly he could not have answered himself—if he had asked, Who is the greatest living botanist? The question is answered by the announcement of the recent death of Robert Brown, in London, on the 10th June, in his eighty-fifth year.

Robert Brown was the great botanist of this era—the friend of Humboldt, who called him the undoubted King of Botanists—of Humboldt, whose name was associated with Brown's by German gratitude, which, having published Brown's botanical writings, which had been fragmentary, desultory, and inaccessible, dedicated the five volumes to "Robert Brown and Alexander von Humboldt, the dioscuri of Botany." In the beginning of the century he was sent to Australia with the exploring expedition, and brought back four thousand plants, many of them new to science. In 1841 he received a pension of two hundred pounds from Sir Robert Peel. He shared with Humboldt the grandest faith of the scholar—the great moral result of education—that the Universe, as it came from one Divine source, is perfectly harmonious in every part—that the care which does not suffer a swallow to fall unheeded is the same which controls the stars in their courses—and that the laws of man himself are most intimately related with all the laws of nature in every department.

A quiet, retired man, he has lived through great events; through the careers of men renowned in history; and dies, at length, ripe in honor and wisdom.

"O tender Death! that coverest
 The aged heads with honor white;
Thou givest glory to their rest,
 That makes thy darkness bright."

AN IDLE WISH.

["I call it idle, Mr. Lounger; but is it not natural?—Timothy Troutly."]

Sincerest stream!
Couldst thou reflect as true
The spirit's evanescent hue;
On thy bank would I build my bower,
And only know the changing hour
 By thy changed gleam.

Then thou shouldst be—
More than my friends have been—
The mirror of each mental mien;
And in thy azure, thoughts unsung,
Too delicate to trust the tongue,
 Would smile at me.

The dryads rare,
Whose faces haunt me still,
In noon-rapt glade, on wind-swept hill,
No longer from my eyes would shrink,
But, as I leaned above the brink,
 Be fashioned fair.

And chaste Dian,
Who scorned my eager quest,
When hound-like eyes toward her press'd;
Would show her cool, unvailéd face,
Superb with sympathetic grace,
 Nor flying man.

The naiads white,
With lily-coronals,
O'ershadowed by the waterfalls—
As they smile faintly through my mind,
Would exquisitely be defined
 In thy pure light.

O happy sky!
That in thy wave may see
Its humor limnéd perfectly;
Teach me how in thy glass, sweet stream,
My vaguest, cloud-like thought and dream
 I may descry.

THE HONORABLE LUCIUS O'TRIGGER.

Is honor the peculiar quality of bullies, blacklegs, and sharpers? Drunken gentlemen in barrooms wax very solicitous about their honor. "Affairs of honor" between gentlemen who empty glasses of wine in each other's faces, or who quarrel about a lady of "honor," are not altogether unknown. Honorable gentlemen in Congress have bristled frightfully during the recent session, by reason of invaded honor. Like the elaborate heel popularly attributed to the African race, this honor seems to protrude just at the point where it is infallibly sure to be trodden upon. Mr. Somebody, of some legation, thinks his honor requires him to defy to mortal combat a gentleman who, finding Mr. Somebody secreted under the piano in his drawing-room, generously kicks him into the street without examining his pockets. What was he doing in the dark under the piano? What is this "honor," that does not prevent a man from secretly entering the house of a gentleman who has forbidden the entrance?

It seems that this honor has a dignity which may not be generally known. A representative in Congress who challenged another during the late session has made a speech since his return to his constituents. Of course, as his chief act during his congressional career had been sending a challenge, which, equally of course, was arranged by honorable friends, without pinking or winging or dropping, he spoke eloquently, as a statesman should, of that performance. He declared that he challenged not because he wished to fight, but to "bring on an honorable settlement!"

"Congress has its rules and customs," says the Hon. Lucius O'Trigger; and I say to you, that "a man who takes a public, unprovoked insult without resenting it as a man of honor, might as well go home." * * "Do you wish to be represented by a man whom even the boys in the street would hiss as dishonored?"

However, Mr. O'Trigger says, cheerfully, "The code of honor is not such a bad thing, after all!" Because a man can wash out in blood the dire insult of having a booby or a bully call him a liar? No, no; spare the heroics. Because, as the Hon. Lucius most comfortingly adds, "These gentlemen (not the bellicose principals) talked the matter over and came to a decision. No muskets at ten paces ever were mentioned, for it never came to that pass." "In Washington a man must adopt this course to protect himself from insult and disgrace."

That is to say, when Smith calls Jones an ass, Jones must challenge Smith, and then resign the affair into the hands of Thompson and Jenkins, who will arrange it without allusions to ball-cartridges. If this is Washington honor, it is a pretty poor article. The only excuse at all for the silly crime of dueling is, that a man is put in bodily danger, which gives the performance a complexion of brave exposure. But Washington honor, it seems, is compatible with a mortal challenge, which is understood by all parties to mean an amicable arrangement.

All the Sir Lucius O'Triggers, the world over, always leave character, which is the only substance of true honor, out of their calculations. The Lounger will suppose a case for the edification of the honorable member who says that "a man who takes a public, unprovoked insult without resenting it as a man of honor, might as well go home. He has influence no longer."

Let us take one of the Senators from this State, Mr. Seward, and suppose any other Senator so far to forget himself as to interrupt him and call him, in a public and unprovoked manner, a liar. Mr. Seward pauses, and resumes: "My character for veracity is not dependent upon the opinion of the Senator. It is known to my friends and the country. It can not possibly be affected by any thing the Senator may choose to say. He knows perfectly well that I state in this debate what I believe to be true," and then passes to his argument. Does Sir Lucius think he might as well go home—that he will have no farther influence?

Take it the other way. The lie is given. Senator Seward finishes his speech, and at its close sends a challenge to the offending Senator. They steal out privately next morning to Bladensburg, and the telegraph informs the evening papers that "Senator Seward was killed this morning in a duel with Senator ——."

If a Senator holds his honor at the mercy of every man who chooses to prove that he is no gentleman by insulting him, he certainly "might as well go home."

MORAL DUTIES TO PRIZE-FIGHTING.

It is an occasion of public congratulation to know that arrangements have been made, after a great deal of trouble, for a prize-fight within three months between two distinguished gentlemen of the bloody nose. For this interesting intelligence we are indebted to the leading New York papers, which are nervously sensitive to the duty of supplying the public with the news. But we reiterate our demand of some months since. If it be the proper business of newspapers to give prominent publicity to such facts—to contemplated crimes of the most beastly and disgusting kind—it is no less their duty to furnish intelligence of the opening of new and beautiful groggeries, and worse resorts, which are the especial haunts of prize-fighters and the friends and spectators of prize-fights. A newspaper will often be inflexible, upon principle, in not giving an editorial notice to an innocent and instructive performance which is advertised in its columns, but seems to find no principle interfere with the conspicuous announcement of a performance which is not only not advertised, but criminal, and of not the slightest possible public interest, being one of those facts which, when they come to a man's knowledge, he ought simply to report to the police.

Gentlemen of the bloody nose pant for notoriety. They are important only as they are notorious. Is it enjoined by that vast moral obligation of telling the public the news, which rests upon all journals, that they should help that notoriety?

WANTED—A WIFE.

An enterprising gentleman in Philadelphia, who has doubtlessly attentively studied the newspapers and the current romances of Corcoran and Riviere, has determined that all other young ladies and gentlemen shall have an opportunity to secure the matrimonial felicity so conspicuously displayed in those pleasant little histories, and has therefore established "The United States Matrimonial Agency."

The advantages of such an institution are so apparent that a conscientious Lounger, to whom the wedded happiness of his fair readers is precious, can not refrain from mentioning them, especially as so many tender hearts all over the land are fluttering with sympathy and excitement by reason of the cases just cited.

It is clear that all young men of desirable characters, and persons, and property, who respect themselves and the other sex, and who know that the happiness of marriage depends upon an intimate acquaintance of the connubial "parties," will take care to enroll their names and prospects at once in the books of the Matrimonial Agency. On the other hand, it is perfectly clear that adventurers, sharpers, black-legs, and bullies, who have property and principle in equal proportions, who are looking out to entrap weak and sentimental girls, will never enter their names upon those books—will never represent themselves as calm young clergymen, with large fortunes and good tempers, seeking lovely and amiable partners for life.

A marriage is evidently an affair to be managed by agents and brokers; and in a world like ours, where duplicity and baseness are unknown, the Lounger knows no institution more likely to secure domestic felicity than a matrimonial agency. The agent himself could, of course, never be induced to become an accomplice in deceiving and insnaring the unwary. His object is not to make the most money he can in any way, but to promote the wedded happiness of his fellow-creatures.

In fact, if any innocent youth or maiden, remote from towns and ignorant of the ways of the world, wishes to make sure of a married life as enviable and satisfactory as Miss Blount would have enjoyed in a union with the interesting and handsome De Riviere, let him or her lose no time, but open a correspondence at once with "The United States Matrimonial Agency."

THE FEAST OF TOADS.

It appears by the public papers that the guests and summer residents at Nahant are enjoying the delicious dish above named in perfection. The mouths of outsiders fairly water as they read of the lickersome morsels served up on that happy peninsula. Our New England friends betray a positive passion for the luxury; and every man in the land who is fond of good living will read with sympathy and delight in a Boston paper the following artless paragraph. It does not state, however, with sufficient distinctness, whether the toads are to be classed as "mere sensuous joys," or are to rank as "a high intellectual entertainment." But all kinds of confusion of style must be forgiven to the rhapsodies of an enthusiastic gourmand.

"One of those elegant assemblies for which the Nahant House is famous occurred on Thursday evening. The occasion was of marked and refined enjoyment to all present. The families resident in the cottages on the peninsula generally participated in the choice pleasures imparted by the proceedings, which, in addition to mere sensuous joys, largely partook of the lustre of a high intellectual entertainment. We can not forbear referring to the unassuming manners of Lord Napier; the facile bruskness of Lord Ribblesdale, the queenly appearance of Mrs. Duncan, of New Orleans, and her namesake of Providence, with the Sigourneys of New York, who were the 'observed of all observers.'"

That is what may be called swallowing the toad whole. The island of Manhattan patiently waits its turn, and humbly hopes to enjoy the "facile bruskness of Lord Ribblesdale" in due time, although only at the second table. It has not altogether forgotten the facile bruskness of the Marquis of Waterford, who honored the knockers and lamps of the quiet citizens several years ago, and is anxious to compare the qualities. Such a charming introduction of the young nobleman will be of the highest service to him in his American career.

It will be of immense interest to the public mind at this moment to state that H. R. H. Prince Alfred has lately been in Ireland, and that upon a certain excursion "recrossing the lake to Dinis his Royal Highness hooked a fine salmon which, in his great anxiety to capture, we regret to say, he lost, although the royal angler evinced great judgment and dexterity in playing the noble fish." The proof of the royal dexterity apparently being, that the fish escaped.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

"Ravenscroft, Georgia, 1858.

"Dear Mr. Lounger,—I hope you will gratify a little feminine curiosity, and give me a hint in your corner of the Weekly as to the authorship of some little poetical gems that have made their appearance in your dear, delightful paper. I mean 'Night Thoughts,' 'Before the Betrothal,' and 'Anchored.'

"My little sister, Lily Raven, declares that 'Anchored' is as full of poetic imagery as some of Tennyson's graphic word-painting, and that 'Night Thoughts' and 'Before the Betrothal' are only comparable to that touching little 'Love Song' of George Darley's you gave us in a late number.

"There is quite a sensation at Ravenscroft every week upon the arrival of the Weekly, from the little wee Raven just beginning to chirp, who stretches her little hands for the pictures, to the Rev. Croak Raven himself, who unfolds it before he looks at his 'Religious Intelligencer' or 'Missionary Journal;' all enjoy its charming variety.

"Please gratify the Mother Eve's spirit of "Your respectful admirer and constant reader,
"Ruth Raven."

—How can the charming Miss Ruth force the Lounger into so ungracious a position? Has he not often said, what he must now repeat, that the names of authors of anonymous articles are peculiarly the property and the secret of the authors?

—A Washington City youngster, whose name is F. R * * * *, sends a solution of the puzzle of the Napoleon plant. Let him mind his grammar—not saying "I have drawed"—and write again.

THE LATE GENERAL QUITMAN.

MANY a reader will recognize the features of the brave old filibuster chief in the portrait which we give on this page. Few men in the country are better known or more esteemed than the gallant veteran who has just yielded his spirit to his Creator.

John A. Quitman was a New Yorker by birth, having first seen the light on 1st December, 1799, at Rhinebeck, Dutchess County, in this State. His father was one of those hard-working, painstaking, country-doing yeomen of whom the type is fatally growing rarer. He was the pastor of two churches, and the spiritual teacher of a population scattered over many a mile of sparsely-settled country. He intended his son for the Church, and educated him to take his place. But the young man's nature was better adapted for another sphere of usefulness; after completing his collegiate course, he resolved to study law, and, the requisite knowledge acquired, set off to seek his fortune in the West.

For a time he figured as law-student and lawyer at Chillicothe, Ohio.

—Miss Eliza Turner. This marriage domiciled him as a citizen of Mississippi.

Four years spent in the practice of his profession, and in the careful fulfillment of duties as a representative in the State Assembly, young Quitman, at the age of twenty-nine, was appointed by the governor Chancellor of the State. The selection was subsequently ratified by the verdict of the people; who, following the example of the Legislature, elected him to the same office when it was made elective. He was subsequently chosen to the Senate, and President of the Senate. During his tenure of this post the death of the governor imposed on him the gubernatorial function; he availed himself of it to embody, in his Message of 1836, the States Rights doctrines which have since become so popular at the South. Judge Quitman's Message is still quoted as high authority on the States Rights doctrine.

His reputation as a man of bravery and military aptitude had grown up together with his renown as a lawyer. Shortly after his settlement at Natchez, he found the administration of justice completely nullified by the riotous lawlessness of a body of ruffians who would suffer no writs to be served upon them, and no property of theirs to be seized by the officers of the law. The State authorities were too weak to cope with these lawless descendants of the Regulators. Young Quitman resolved to supply the deficiency. He organized a volunteer military company called the Natchez Fencibles, and gave battle to the rioters wherever they could be found. At first the latter made a show of resistance, but they soon repented their temerity, and after a few severe beatings, left the State. The corps was led by Mr. Quitman.

Public attention thus directed to him, when the Texan war broke out and the South was all ablaze with sympathy for General Houston, and his brave followers, Mr. Quitman was offered the command of the volunteer regiment which was raised at Natchez. His position as President of the Senate rendered it difficult for him to accept the call; but his military ardor overcame the obstacle, and he set out. As is known, the Mexicans were beaten before he joined General Houston, and, after a toilsome march of thirty days, he returned home.

For several years after this, Mr. Quitman's duties were civil and unobtrusive. He continued the practice of law at Natchez, and took an active part in the advancement of various plans of public improvement in his State. He went to England as agent of the Mississippi Railway. He rendered himself popular by becoming the champion of measures which, had they been adopted, would have rescued the State from the disgrace of repudiation. He was offered, but declined, the office of State Judge of the Court of Errors and Appeals. His practice was large and lucrative, and he had the sagacity to perceive that a public man, to be useful and independent, must possess a competency.

When the Mexican war broke out, Mr. Quitman was naturally the man of all others to whom the volunteers of Mississippi looked for leadership. He was one of the first prominent Southern men who tendered their services to the Government, and the President had the pleasure to select him for a Brigadier-Generalship. With surprising rapidity he set his brigade in motion, and, by forced marches, contrived to join General Taylor the day before the attack on Monterey was made. He was assigned a prominent command, and, as all who have read the history of that fearful exploit will remember, he disputed with the gallant Worth the palm of successful bravery in the assault on the place. He was, in fact, the first man within the city, and by the skilful handling of his men contributed almost as much as Worth to the triumph of General Taylor's army.

Some time he then spent in the tedious work of drilling his raw force; then, having succeeded to the sole command of the volunteers, he was drafted to the army of the South, which, under General Scott, was commencing its march against the city of Mexico. He took a prominent part in all the military operations of the advance from Vera Cruz, signalizing himself every where by bravery and military skill. Perhaps the most pleasing anecdote of this part of his career is his refusal at Puebla to exhibit the brevet of Major-General which he had just received, and which would have enabled him to take the command out of the hands of General Worth, who had borne the heat and burden of the attack. For just such an act of courtesy to the late General Havelock, General Outram enjoys the gratitude and respect of the civilized world.

As at Monterey, General Quitman was the first to enter the city of Mexico in the great night-assault on that place. Between one and two in the morning, he scaled the wall at the Gortia of Belen, and waved a handkerchief tied to a rifle to Worth's division, which was still some hundred yards distant. It is said that on this occasion an aide-de-camp of the General-in-Chief rode up to him and was met by the insolent inquiry:

"What orders from head-quarters?"

"The General will not embarrass you by any orders."

If the story be true, it reflects credit on both parties.

THE LATE GENERAL JOHN A. QUITMAN.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

Another anecdote which illustrates General Quitman's frankness from sectional feeling, and forms a bright contrast to too many incidents in the course of the war, is told by Lieutenant Levell. When the army marched into the Gran Plaza of Mexico, General Quitman directed him to have the colors placed on the flag-staff over the palace, and added, to the chagrin, perhaps, of some around him,

"Let it be our national colors, the stars and stripes—not the particular colors of any regiment."

After the capture of the city, General Quitman was appointed Military Governor. Great credit is allowed him by all writers for the judgment and vigor he displayed in this capacity.

Since his return home, General Quitman has figured prominently as a politician and member of Congress, and as a filibuster chief. In 1850 he was elected Governor of his State. In 1855, and again in 1857, he was elected to Congress without opposition. Speaker Banks appointed him chairman of the Military Committee of the House of Representatives—a post in which he was retained by Speaker Orr. His large experience probably fitted him better for the office than any other member of the body.

General Quitman's career as a filibuster may be very briefly described. When, some years ago, the insane tyranny of the Cuban authorities provoked resentment among the Creole population of the island, and the people of our Southern States were prepared to aid their efforts to conquer their independence, General Quitman was selected to take the supreme command of the filibusters. He accepted the trust, and freely gave counsels and money to the promoters of the scheme. Circumstances prevented the realization of the designs of the "Cuban junta;" and the only results of the conspiracy to General Quitman were a considerable waste of time and money and several vexatious arrests by United States officials.

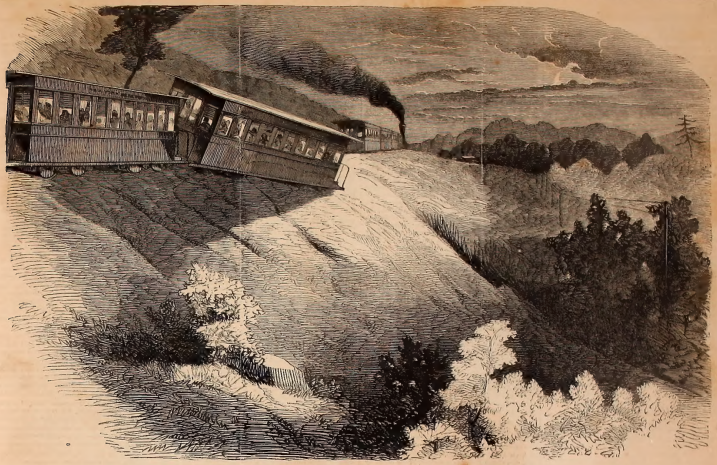
General Quitman died on 17th instant, at his residence near Natchez, Mississippi, of disease contracted at the National Hotel during the epidemic which prevailed there just before the last Presidential inauguration.

He was a man of tall stature and commanding presence. His temper was genial, his mind clear, and, though he was no orator, his speeches were always terse and effective. In politics he was a States Rights Democrat, and a firm believer in the institution of slavery; but no slave himself to party, and no friend to that Southern faction which seeks to maintain itself by the aid of an effete section of the Confederacy. Personally, he was universally esteemed as well as a good, honorable, and generous man.

It only remains that we should express our obligations to Mr. John S. Thrasher, who was an intimate friend of General Quitman, and who has kindly supplied a portion of the material for the above sketch.

THE ACCIDENT ON THE ERIE ROAD.

ON Thursday night, the 15th instant, occurred, near Shin Hollow, and 813 miles from New York, the most terrible disaster that has ever happened on the Erie Railroad. Our artist visited the scene of the calamity on the day following, and has furnished the sketches on the opposite page.



It appears that the Express train that, which left Jersey City at 5.30 P.M., having on board about one hundred and fifty persons, was going on a heavy down-grade at the rate of about thirty miles per hour, being, according to the conductor's statement, nine minutes behind time. From some cause—either weakness of the iron, or the thumping of the car-wheels—the outer rail was broken. The locomotive, baggage-car, and the first three passenger-cars were drawn over in safety. By this time, however, it is supposed, the broken end of the rail was pointing outward so far that, there being nothing on the other side to keep the tracks on the track (the flanges of the truck-wheels being inside), the last two cars slid off the rails, and were dragged a distance of fifty feet over the sleepers; when the connecting link between them and the forward cars was broken, and the two cars at once rolled down the embankment, which has in that place a perpendicular depth of twenty-five feet, the slope making the distance from toe to bottom about forty feet.

The investigation before the coroner's jury elicited these statements: That the track had been examined by the properly-appointed person since the passage of the previous train, which was a freight train; that the speed of the train was about thirty miles per hour, and not unusual for that part of the road; that the breaks in the rail—there were seven pieces—were fresh; and that the train was stopped as soon as possible after the first jerk gave notice of something wrong. On the other hand, it is stated that the portion of the road on which the accident occurred, being a down-grade with curves, requires more than usual care in running over it; that the repairing force on that part of the road has been lately reduced; that the quality of rail laid upon it, instead of being the best, was defective; and that the rate at which the train was going was remarked upon by the passengers as unusually great.

The verdict of the jury exculpates the Company and its employés from blame.

It appears that the first intimation of danger was a sudden jerk. Hereupon the brakes were whirled down. The three foremost cars were already past the broken rail. The last two slid off, and were dragged some fifty feet over the sleepers, when, with a second heavier jerk, the coupling broke, and they were both thrown on the embankment. The rear car and two or three times completely over, while the other made but one turn and a half, remaining bottom up. The last car was literally smashed, one of the heavy iron trucks passing through the bottom and rendering it a mere shapeless wreck. All the deaths occurred in this car, while in this, as well as the other, a large number were severely injured, chiefly about the head, face, and neck, and were pierced by splinters and fragments of the wreck. Six persons appear to have been killed, viz., three men, one woman (colored), and two children. Fifty-four persons were wounded, of whom fifteen sustained severe injuries, from which several have since died.

The removal of those in the wrecked cars were most singular. Mr. A. Hoguet found himself lying on his chest with arms stretched out as though swimming. His sensations were described as similar to those of a drowning person. A singular prank was played with his clothing. A hol-was torn in his linen duster a foot and a half across. This became smaller in an alpaca coat, a vest and a shirt, until in a thick flannel under-shirt it was not over an inch across, and the skin was only grazed. Had that blow reached an inch further it would have broken the spine. A young lady had the gaiter entirely stripped off one foot without being injured. Another lady felt the fall, but remembers nothing until all was over, when she found that all her under-clothing had been torn off, though her dress was left. She was severely bruised.

THE ERIE RAILROAD ACCIDENT—THE CARS GOING OFF THE TRACK.

A party of deaf mutes, under the care of Professor Peet, of the New York Asylum, furnished some interesting particulars. Professor Peet, who was in the hindmost car, says: "The first apprehension I had of danger was a sudden jump, as if we were going over a log; then the car seemed to take a diagonal course, and then we began rolling down precipitately. My only sensation was that of extreme peril. I felt that we were going to the most certain destruction, but I offered up a prayer that we might be saved, if possible. The next thing I knew I was seated on the top of the wreck at the bottom of the embankment. Looking up, I saw my wife [a deaf and dumb lady] seated some stops above me. She looked perfectly wild, distracted; she was not conscious of any thing. I went up to her, and after a little procured a recognition of consciousness from her. She had been asleep, and awoke only at the termination of the catastrophe."

THE SCENE AFTER THE ACCIDENT.

Mrs. Peet wrote: "I remember being conscious of a strange, harsh motion of the cars, but it seemed as though I must be dreaming, and so, instead of striving to arouse myself to consciousness, I merely put out my hand to feel that the child was quiet, when there came a crash, and I knew nothing more until I opened my eyes and found that I was on the ground, and that some one was supporting me. The first sight that I remember of being conscious of was the hands of some person saying in the mute language, 'The baby is safe—your husband is safe;' but even then I could not realize what had passed, and felt as though I were waking from some horrid nightmare, until, after being placed in the car, I looked through the window and saw strange forms gliding through the darkness, and the dead body of a man which was being borne past. Then I was impressed with the fearful reality, and again became unconscious, or nearly so, until we reached this place."

Miss Joanna Christy, daughter of the author of "Cotton is King," and also of Professor Peet's party, explained in most expressive sign language that every thing seemed to be a wheel, and she was its axis; every thing was revolving about her, and she was stationary. She sprang up as soon as the rest of the wheel was stationary, and saw Mrs. Peet; took hold of her and thought she was dead, as she made no motion at all. She had no thought of death or of consequences while she was the centre of this revolution.

Mrs. F. Leavens, who was much bruised, says: "I was dozing, and I was dreaming of being on the cars, and all at once I felt the jolt and jar, but was not alarmed, because I thought it was all a dream. And I thought to myself, I shall think it is a dream until I feel a crash. Next I felt the crash. Rolling over benumbed my senses. When the crash was over I found myself lying on one side, with my face and side buried in the dirt, and the top of the car over me, pressing on my head; persons walking over me would press it down on my head; and I told them to be careful, and then I heard a voice saying, 'Be patient, I will get you out soon.' Then I became insensible. The next I recollect I was out and sitting on the bank, and I told them to see to others that were more injured than I: I heard them groaning and crying around me."

LITERARY.

PROFESSOR AYTOUN is not in all respects an editor to our minds, especially as regards his appreciation of poetry; nevertheless he has done an excellent work in his BALLADS OF SCOTLAND, published in Edinburgh by Blackwood. In these volumes he has diligently collected a large number of ballads, of more or less merit and value, forming altogether a very unique and interesting museum of curiosities of ballad literature. The lover of Scotch song will not be the only one to prize the book. Many English favorites are here—traced, indeed, generally to Scotch origin. Many of our most familiar and best loved songs are here in their original dress. Such, for example, as

ANNIE LAURIE.

"Maxwelton banks are bonnie,
Where early fa's the dew,
Where me and Annie Laurie
Made up the promise true.
Made up the promise true,
And ne'er forget will I,
And for bonnie Annie Laurie
I'd lay down my head and die.

"She's backit like a peacock,
She's breastit like a swan,
She's jimp about the middle,
Her waist ye weel may span.
Her waist ye weel may span,
She has a rolling eye,
And for bonnie Annie Laurie
I'd lay down my head and die."

And here is a specimen of one of the most beautiful of ballads, "Helen of Kirkconnell," of whom the story is that she saved her lover's life at the sacrifice of her own:

"O Helen fair, beyond compare!
I'll weave a garland of thy hair,
Shall bind my heart for evermair
Until the day I dee!

* * * * *

"O Helen fair! O Helen chaste!
Were I with thee I would be blest,
Where thou lies low and takes thy rest
On fair Kirkconnell lee.

"I wish my grave were growing green,
A winding-sheet drawn o'er my een,
And I in Helen's arms lying
On fair Kirkconnell lee."

Routledge & Co. have published, in England, THE MODERN ART OF TAMING WILD HORSES, by J. S. Rarey. This is, we believe, a little book printed and published some time since in Ohio, of which Mr. Rarey's great success abroad has induced the republication. It is not his whole secret, but is doubtless the substance of it. In this book he lays down the rule that a horse must be treated kindly and intelligently; if afraid of an object, must be taught, gently, that it is harmless; must be handled quietly; and, in short, must be managed by the law of superior wisdom and kindness.

Here is a very sensible direction, to say the least of it, for saddling a colt:

"The first thing will be to tie each stirrup-strap into a loose knot to make them short, and prevent the stirrups from flying about and hitting him. Then double up the skirts, and take the saddle under your right arm, so as not to frighten him with it as you approach. When you get to him, rub him gently a few times with your hand, and then raise the saddle very slowly, until he can see it, and smell and feel it with his nose. Then let the skirt loose, and rub it very gently against his neck the way the hair lies, letting him hear the rattle of the skirts as he feels them against him; each time getting a little farther backward, and finally slip it over his shoulders on his back. Shake it a little with your hand, and in less than five minutes you can rattle it about over his back as much as you please, and pull it off and throw it on again, without his paying much attention to it. As soon as you have accustomed him to the saddle, fasten the girth. Be careful how you do this. It often frightens the colt when he feels the girth binding him, and making the saddle fit tight on his back. You should bring up the girth very gently, and not draw it too tight at first, just enough to hold the saddle on. Move him a little, and then girth him as tight as you choose, and he will not mind it. You should see that the pad of your saddle is all right before you put it on, and that there is nothing to make it hurt him, or feel unpleasant to his back. It should not have any loose straps on the back part of it, to flap about and scare him. After you have saddled him in this way, take a switch in your right hand to tap him up with, and walk about in the stable a few times with your right arm over your saddle, taking hold of the reins on each side of his neck with your right and left hands, thus marching him about in the stable until you teach him the use of the bridle, and can turn him about in any direction, and stop him by a gentle pull of the rein. Always caress him, and loose the reins a little every time you stop him. You should always be alone, and have your colt in some light stable or shed, the first time you ride him; the loft should be high, so that you can sit on his back without endangering your head. You can teach him more in two hours' time in a stable of this kind than you could in two weeks in the common way of breaking colts, out in an open place. If you follow my course of treatment you need not run any risk, nor have any trouble in riding the worst kind of horse. You take him a step at a time, until you get up a mutual confidence and trust between yourself and horse. First teach him to lead and stand hitched; next acquaint him with the saddle and the use of the bit; and then all that remains is to get on him without scaring him, and you can ride him as well as any horse."

By way of illustrating a remark that Bedouin Arabs have frequently a secret word or sign by which the owner extracts the utmost speed out of his mare, Mr. Rarey tells a good story of one Jabal, an Arab, whose mare, the swiftest on the desert, was stolen from his tent-door, in the night, by an enemy who mounted her, and shouted out his name as he rode away:

"Poor Jabal, when he heard the words, rushed out of the tent and gave the alarm; then mounting his brother's mare, accompanied by some of his tribe, he pursued the robber for four hours. The brother's mare was of the same stock as Jabal's, but was not equal to her; nevertheless he outstripped those of all the other pursuers, and was even on the point of overtaking the robber, when Jabal shouted to him, 'Pinch her right ear and give her a touch of the heel.' Gafar did so, and away went the mare like lightning, speedily rendering further pursuit hopeless. The pinch in the ear and the touch with the heel were the secret signs by which Jabal had been used to urge his mare to her utmost speed. Jabal's companions were amazed and indignant at his strange conduct. 'Oh thou father of a jackass!' they cried, 'thou has enabled the thief to rob thee of thy jewel!' But he silenced their upbraidings by saying, 'I would rather lose her than sully her reputation. Would you have me suffer it to be said among the tribes that another mare had proved fleeter than mine? I have at least this comfort left me, that I can say she never met with her match.'"

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

LATEST NEWS FROM UTAH.

DISPATCHES from Utah to the 25th of June, received at the War Department, state that orders have been issued that no one should leave the ranks of the army in passing through Salt Lake City, except from absolute necessity, and the greatest care was to be taken that the herds did not trespass upon the fields of the citizens.

Among the documents received is Governor Cumming's pardon and peace proclamation to the inhabitants of Utah.

An officer of the army, writing from Washington Territory relative to Colonel Steptoe's defeat, says the route eastward and northward of Colville is now virtually blockaded; that no one can cross Snake River, and that it will require a force ten times as large as is now there before peace can be restored.

THE APPROACHING ELECTION IN KANSAS.

The Kansas Herald says that General Calhoun has issued certificates of election to all those elected under the Lecompton Constitution. The Free State members from Leavenworth County receive certificates, which gives that party a majority in both branches of the Legislature. The returns for State officers will be made to the Legislature, in whose hands the whole subject rests. The Herald exhorts the people to vote for the ordinance, and settle the question without further strife and agitation.

POSSIBLE TROUBLE ON FRAZER'S RIVER.

The Washington correspondent of the Herald telegraphs: "Our Government begins to realize the importance of questions, heretofore thought but little of, relating to the rights and claims of the Hudson's Bay Company on the Pacific side of the continent. Unless a wise and liberal policy be pursued by the British with regard to miners in the Frazer River country, there may be collisions that would lead to international difficulties. The American miners will soon learn, if they have not already, that neither Governor Douglas nor the Hudson's Bay Company have any authority over mines on this continent. The colonial Governor of Vancouver's Island (Douglas) has no authority beyond what his commission confers. He has no right of jurisdiction, and has never claimed it before, over the main land or any other territory than Vancouver's Island, in the capacity of Governor, and except as chief factor of the Hudson's Bay Company. Neither the Company nor he, as its chief factor, have any right under their charter except the right or privilege of trading with the Indians. They have no possessory right over the mines, or approaches to mines, and therefore the imposition of taxes or license fees by either Governor Douglas or the Company is a usurpation of authority. All mines belong to the crown of England; but it has been decided by British authorities in Australia that 'placers' are not mines; in the meaning of the enactment ceding all mines to the crown, that gold-washing and working for gold on the surface is not mining."

RETALIATION IN TEXAS.

The Legislature of Texas, at its last session, passed the following Act:

"Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Texas, That the following sums be, and they are hereby appropriated for the use and support of the State Penitentiary for the years 1858 and 1859." After naming the various items, the law makes this further provision: "For purchasing and putting up additional machinery, $18,000—Provided, That no part of the same shall be expended in the State of Massachusetts, nor for machinery manufactured in said State."

MORE PHOTOGRAPHIC MARVELS.

Speaking of the photographic copy of the Declaration of Independence taken upon a surface no larger than a pin's head, which may now be seen in Salem, and can be read with a powerful microscope, the Salem Gazette says: "When such success in reducing the size of documents and likenesses has been attained by the photographic art, it is easy to imagine what might be accomplished in time of war by the use of the microscope. The most important official document could be contained in an ordinary vest button, and worn with impunity by a spy in an enemy's camp, or by a traitor eager to injure an active army of his own country."

HOW PERJURERS ARE TREATED IN NEW ORLEANS.

A New Orleans correspondent of the Mobile Mercury, alluding to the late trial of Harby for killing Stone, the seducer of his daughter, thus speaks of the witnesses who swore that she was of easy virtue: "Those unprincipled men who bore false witness against Miss Caroline Harby, are, by this time, able to appreciate the text to its fullest extent. Our merchants and business men have taken the punishment of their crime into their own hands. Simmons and Maurer were clerks at a cotton-press up town. Simmons was to have been given an interest, but several banks notified the proprietors of the press that if he was in any way interested in their business they would decline discounting any more of their paper. The commission merchants who had cotton pressed and stored by the concern, also sent them a notification that they would do no more business with them as long as Simmons and Maurer remained in their employ. Simmons has been unanimously expelled from his Lodge by the Odd Fellows, and both have been ignominiously turned out of houses where they formerly visited as favored guests. King is a married man, and his wife is one of the finest ladies of our city. Shortly after the trial, he signified his intention to her of going to Bladon Springs. She told him to go and never come back, as she never would live with him again. He is a cotton-weigher and sampler by profession, but henceforth will have to follow some other calling, as all his customers have notified him that they will not patronize him any more; and it is also hinted that he will be expelled from all connection with the Masons. Thus you see that, although these fellows could not be reached by the laws, they have been punished as severely as if they had been."

A RUNAWAY SHAKER COUPLE.

A Troy paper has the following: "On Tuesday night there arrived in town, from the Shaker settlement at Niskayuna, a young, pretty, and modest demoiselle, with blooming red cheeks and a monster straw bonnet, reminding one of the artistic magazine representation of Cupid with a night-cap, or Venus wearing spectacles. Her skirts were innocent of hoops, and her waist unspanned with corset bands. The 'improvements' of modern fashion had not reached her rural home, and she was as primitive and simple in her appearance as any consistent follower of Ann Lee should be. But her visits during the evening to various dry-goods stores, in quest of mysterious skeletons, charming taffetas, showy stellas, rich guipures, dainty lace, rustling silks, and soft velvets, induced a suspicion that there was 'a cat in the meal' somewhere, and, by a possibility, Ann the Prophetess was to lose a fair disciple. Yet the little Shakeress wisely kept her own counsel, and said not.

"Yesterday, however, a ruddy, fair-visaged young man, in home-spun blue, made his appearance in town, and forthwith instituted a vigorous siege upon sundry merchant tailor shops, hat stores, and the like—appearing, in course of time, a new man. We have no disposition to follow the matter further. The finale of a subject so mysterious in its inception was last evening intrusted to a popular clergyman, who soon finished it up in a manner quite prevalent in the outer world, but hardly recognized among the 'verity, verity' order of the faithful. We hope the two whose fates have thus been united may never have occasion to repent their abandonment of the 'peaceful community;' although the sudden transmogrification of a sombre, quiet Shaker miss into a full-hooped, fashionably-attired belle is a very dangerous experiment in this hot weather."

A QUEER WIDOW STORY.

The correspondent of an Albany paper says:

"Speaking of steamers reminds me of a little gossip that is in circulation 'in private circles.' It is said that one of our most noted steamship men is shortly to take a new partner. The gallant commodore is a widower—the lady is neither maiden, wife, nor widow—being just now in a chrysalis state. She waits only the dull, tedious process of the law to cast off the iron chain that binds her before she will put on the golden livery of a more congenial master.

"Rumor has it that the lady was on with a new love before she was off with the old, and that the new love has so arranged matters that the liege lord consents to part with his better-half—ostensibly because Sarah Jane can be more happy with another than she will be with him. As an earnest of his devotion, 'the another' has given to Sarah Jane the title-deeds to property in town worth $20,000, and also the fee-simple of a princely country seat in Westchester county, together with all and singular the hereditaments and things thereunto appertaining."

CURTAIN QUARRELS.

The Hartford Free Press gives the following synopsis of a case which occurred at Bristol Connecticut:

"A man—call him Smith—went to bed, and wanted his bedroom door left open. His wife thought the weather cool enough to shut it. She went to bed an hour after, but before the dispute was settled he pinched her. They both went to sleep, and the next day she went home to her father. She complained to the grand jury, and Smith was fined six dollars and costs. Smith appealed to the Superior Court. His defense was, that she threw her leg this way and hit a boil from which he was suffering, and that he merely struck out to save himself. Two lawyers on each side were engaged.

A MODEL LETTER.

A returned Californian recently told us an amusing story of letter-writing. He said many of the miners are very illiterate, and to write a letter is quite a formidable task. On one occasion a young man, in crossing a mountain, had become lost and perished in the snow. The cayota, an animal of that vicinity, attacked the body, and, when found, the head had entirely been eaten off. A friend of the young man, who knew his family, was told by the other miners that it was his duty to write to the father of the deceased an account of his death. After some objections for want of practice in such undertakings, he concluded to devote the next afternoon to it. At night he produced his letter, saying he had done the best he could, and thought it told the story. His letter was as follows:

"DEAR MAJOR,—The kiotas heve eat your son's head off. Yours, HENRY BOOCHER."

A PRESENTATION JOKE.

A popular actor of Philadelphia went to Cape May a few days since. He accidentally left his watch on the dressing-table. A friend going to the Cape took it down. In conjunction with a few others, he got up a complimentary presentation. A presentation speech was made, and the reply was gratefully eloquent. A feast followed, after which, on going to his room, he opened the case which inclosed the watch, and found it to be the one he left at home!

CLERGYMEN IN A BALL-ROOM.

A correspondent of the Chicago Press and Tribune, writing from Atlanta, Logan County, Illinois, thus describes the singular termination of the Fourth of July ball in that town: "It appears that the managers, several days since, sent special invitations to the ministers of the various churches in town to attend the dance, thinking to have a good laugh to themselves over it; but, to the surprise of those present, after the ball had got under full headway, four of the aforesaid ministers made their appearance in the hall, and soon were mingling with the by-standers. The 'set' being through, the announcement was made that the ministers having been solicited to attend, desired that a portion of the time should be set apart for them, which was acceded to. Then commenced the religious exercises of the ball! One preached, another prayed, and another struck up a good old hymn; when the dancers, seeing what turn matters were likely to take, ordered the musicians to proceed, and began the dance again, leaving the ministers to do their own singing, and make their exit the best way they could."

PERSONAL.

The Paris correspondent of the National Era, writing on the 24th of June, says: "Mr. Pickens, our new Minister to Russia, is still here, making purchases for his house at St. Petersburg, for which place he expects to leave in the course of six or eight days. General Dodge and family will soon be here, on their way home. Mrs. Dodge, who has greatly suffered from the effects of the bad climate of Spain, will spend a few weeks at some watering-place, to recruit her health before sailing for the United States. R. D. Owen is also expected here; his family proposes sailing direct from Naples.

The Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Press understands that Colonel Thomas L. Kane will, when the proper opportunity affords, state his case to the people, and show that he did not go to Utah without full authority, and also that the American army could never have entered Salt Lake City without his previous efforts in favor of peace.

It is also asserted here, in military circles, that General Johnston, Commander-in-Chief of the American force in Utah, is considerably under a cloud. What are the causes, I do not know. I think it will turn out that this officer is made, or will be made, the victim of certain desperate intriguers. They have nothing to do, I trust, with politics, inasmuch as the gallant gentleman is a Democrat of the first water.

A letter from Rome of 26th June, to the London Post, says: "Yesterday morning a secret consistory was held at the Vatican, in which his Holiness, after haranguing the assembled cardinals, announced an addition to their number in the person of Monsignor Rodrigues, patriarch of Lisbon. The Pope likewise created another cardinal, but reserved the name of the prelate in petto. Among the ecclesiastical promotions which followed was that of Dr. O'Regan, from the see of Chicago, in Illinois, to the bishopric of Dor or Dora, in partibus infidelium."

General Tottleben arrived on the 29th of June at Liege, from Brussels, accompanied by Baron de Velho, Russian chargé d'affaires at Brussels, and General de Lannoy, aid-de-camp of the King and Inspector-General of Fortifications. The party immediately proceeded to the royal cannon foundery, where they were received by Colonel Frederix, the director, and with whom they visited the establishment in all its details. On leaving the foundery, General Tottenben went to the establishment at Séraing, and returned to Liege in the evening.

A monument to the Hon. Preston S. Brooks has just been completed in Charleston, and is to be erected in Edgefield. It is an obelisk, fourteen feet high from the pediment, and five feet square at the base. Near the top or point of the obelisk is a neatly designed arabesque, and below, in the centre and front side of the monument, is the coat of arms of the State of South Carolina, elaborately worked and carved by an artist of great skill. Below this, and on the die of the obelisk, is an ivy wreath, in bold relief, encircling the inscription.

The Turkish Admiral left the United States disappointed in his calculations, as he himself stated to a member of the Cabinet. His Government had been induced to believe, by the representations of Mr. John P. Brown, American Dragoman at Constantinople, that the United States would contract for the building of a ship-of-war for the Turkish Navy. These representations, alone, brought him to our shores, and great was his disappointment when undeceived by Secretary Toucey. The Turks will hardly be able to understand how it is that an American official could be so ignorant of the policy and operations of his own Government.

Captain Seth M. Barton, of the United States Infantry, has been tried by a Court-martial at San Antonio, Texas, for ordering Joseph Heid, a citizen, not attached to the army, or subject to military duty, to be tied up and flogged with wagon whips, by the United States soldiers. It was alleged that the officer kept Heid tied up three hours, and also struck a private to compel him to flog Heid. The accused plead guilty to all the charges except the last. The Court-martial confirmed his plea of guilty, but "attached no criminality to the act." They also found him guilty of the last charge, and sentenced Captain Barton to be "suspended for three months from his command, and confined to the limits of his post for that period." The War Department very properly rebuked the Court-martial for such an outrageous finding.

The Cincinnati Times says: Major General Lytle, commander of the First Division of Ohio Militia, and late candidate for Lieutenant-Governor of Ohio, was arrested last night and placed in the Bremen Street lock-up, on the charge of disorderly conduct. The General's version is that he was mistaken for another general, and was grossly assaulted and abused, until he found it necessary to resist the insult. At a late hour in the night he was released, after depositing $20—the usual sum in such cases—as bail.

A correspondent in the Crescent City writes as follows: "Here is something I saw myself. A few days since a verdant youth with his blushing bride arrived at one of the principal hotels in this city. The head of the family immediately registered his name as S. B. Jones and lady, Alabama, on a bridle tower." Is not this a new way to inform the public you are in the hymeneal halter?"

The editor of the Peoria Transcript (Illinois) says: "We are assured by a gentleman who has recently returned from New York, where he saw Captain De Rivière, the impudent and indefatigable foreigner of large pretensions, who has lately distinguished himself by running away from Mobile with the wife and daughter of a wealthy lawyer, that he is the identical Señor Don Pedro P. L. De Moreto, who turned the heads of all the Chicago belles a year ago, bought a thousand-dollar horse with borrowed money, got up a magnificent excursion to Hyde Park, which was patronized by the wives of a distinguished Senator and a well-known Chicago lawyer, and finally becoming suspected, vamoosed for parts unknown, leaving behind a large number of anxious creditors, several broken-hearted young misses with mortified and disappointed mammas, an astonished city, half a dozen happy local newspaper reporters, and two trunks filled with dirty linen and cravats."

The Halifax Sun tells the following story: "Mrs. M'Aulay, a Philadelphia lady, and one of the passengers detained in this city by the mishap of the steamer City of Baltimore, paid a visit to her Majesty's steamer Styx, on Friday last, and demanded to see the commander of that now somewhat celebrated cruiser. The story goes that the lady was very politely received, and ushered into the presence of the officer in command, where a long interview took place, doubtless of high import to the interest of the two great nations represented on this occasion. We understand that the spirit of the lady's visit was of a decidedly national character, with the view of overhauling the gallant naval officer for numerous flagrant outrages committed on American bunting. The particular style in which our heroine conducted this retributive visit we are not positively prepared to describe—our reporter not having been present, unfortunately. It may have been that it were far better for the commander had he been exposed to a broadside from one of Brother Jonathan's steam-frigates; or it may have been that gentle woman's beseeching and persuasive eloquence elicited the promise that he would 'never do such naughty things again.' We incline, however, to the latter supposition; but, in either case, with such champions as the lady of our story, Jonathan will always be sure to vanquish Britain's naval heroes; he will gain more victories, we think, with the weaker vessels than with the stronger. Mrs. M'Aulay is the widow of the late United States Consul at Cairo, in Egypt, and is said to be well known in political circles in Washington."

Dr. Samuel F. Green returned in the steamer last week from India, after an absence of eleven years, during which time he has been connected with missions and engaged in the establishment of a school for the instruction of natives in medicine, and in the preparation of books in the same language, on medical subjects.

A full account of the burial of Mitchell on the summit of Mount Mitchell, in North Carolina (the highest point of land in the United States east of the Rock Mountains), is given in the Raleigh Register. Dr. Mitchell lost his life, it will be recollected, while engaged in measuring and surveying the mountain on which his remains now repose. The funeral was attended by the most distinguished men in the State, and the ceremonies were very impressive.

The Richmond (Virginia) Dispatch says of Mr. G. P. R. James, that he will soon leave for the Consul-Generalship at Odessa. This event causes sincere regret among the many warm friends and admirers of that gentleman in the city and State. The Dispatch says during his residence he has made himself more than acceptable to the people.

Madame Ida Pfeiffer, whose singular peregrinations in barbarous regions have long occupied the public, has just found a pillow in the hospital of Hamburg, where Dr. Tungel is treating her for chronic ague, caught at Madagascar.

M'Henry, who was lately tried on the supposition of being the notorious Townsend, is married to a farmer's daughter at Merrittsville, Canada. Strange to say, the fair one was a sweet-heart, once, of the veritable murderer Townsend.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT.

THE House of Commons has passed the Government of India Bill, Lord Palmerston being left in a minority of fifty. Lord Malmesbury announced in the House of Lords that the British cruisers would be immediately withdrawn from the Cuban waters, but that the blockade of the African coast would be continued. In the House of Lords the Jews' Bill has passed, an amendment having been agreed to, which prevents Jews from exercising ecclesiastical patronage, or advising her Majesty upon ecclesiastical appointments.

THE DISPUTE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. Butt moved a resolution declaring it expedient to discontinue the practice of authorizing men-of-war to visit and search vessels under foreign flags with the view of suppressing the slave-trade. He contended that England ought to abandon her futile efforts on the coast of Africa.

Mr. Milner Gibson seconded the motion.

Mr. Cardwell denied that England had been unsuccessful, and declared that an abandonment of her efforts to suppress the slave-trade would establish a universal system of piracy on the African coast. He then urged the continuance of the blockading squadron there.

Mr. Fitzgerald, on the part of the Government, agreed with the remarks of Mr. Cardwell, and said the Government had proposed to France the establishment of a commission on the spot to inquire into the free labor system lately established. With regard to America, he had the satisfaction of stating that the late difficulties had been swept away. Lord Napier had sent home a dispatch by the Europa to the effect that Mr. Cass had told him that the course taken by the British Ministry was worthy of a great country; and he (Cass) had assured Lord Napier that after the satisfactory declarations of the British Government, the American Government would at once give the most earnest consideration to any proposals that might be suggested to them for the verification of the nationality of vessels, and their right to bear the flag they assumed.

FAILURE OF THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.—RETURN OF THE NIAGARA.

The Niagara and Gorgon, attached to the squadron for the laying of the Transatlantic cable, arrived at Queenstown, Ireland, on 5th July. The Agamemnon and her tender the Valorous, and the Niagara and her tender the Gorgon, sailed from Plymouth on the 10th of June, each of the great vessels carrying about 1500 miles of cable. After having been three days at sea the expedition was overtaken by a fearful gale, which continued without intermission for nine days. On the seventh day of this heavy weather the ships, which continued to keep together, had to part company, and the Agamemnon was obliged to scud before the wind for thirty-six hours; her coals got adrift, and a coil of the cable shifted, so that her captain for some time entertained serious apprehensions for her safety, and, from the immense strain, her water-ways were forced open, and one of her ports was broken. Two of her sailors were severely injured, and one of the marines lost his reason from fright. The Niagara rode out the storm gallantly, having only carried away her jib-boom and one wing of the figure-head, the great American eagle.

THE ATTEMPTS AND THE ACCIDENT.

All the vessels having at length arrived at their central point of junction, the first splice of the cable was made on the 26th. After having paid out two and a half miles each, owing to an accident on board the Niagara, the cable parted. The ships having again met, the splice was made good, and they commenced to give out the cable a second time: but after they had each paid out about forty miles it was reported that the current was broken, and no communication could be made between the ships. Unfortunately, in this instance, the breakage must have occurred at the bottom, as the electricians, from the fine calculations which their sensitive instruments allow them to make, were able to declare such to have been the fact, even before the vessels came together again. Having cast off this loss, they met for the third time, and recovered the connection of the cable on the 28th. They then started afresh, and the Niagara having paid out over one hundred and fifty miles of cable, all on board entertained the most sanguine anticipations of success, when the fatal announcement was made upon Tuesday, the 29th, at 9 P.M., that the electric current had ceased to flow. As soon as the necessity of abandoning the project for the present was now only too manifest, it was considered that the opportunity might as well be availed of to test the strength of the cable. Accordingly, this immense vessel, with all her stores, etc., was allowed to swing to the cable, and in addition, a strain of four tons was placed upon the breaks, yet, although it was blowing fresh at the time, the cable held her as fast as if she had been at anchor for over an hour, when a heavy pitch of the sea snapped the rope, and the Niagara bore away for Queenstown. Before starting, an arrangement was made that should any accident occur in giving out the cable before the ships should have gone one hundred miles, they should return to their starting place in mid ocean; but that in case that distance should have been exceeded before any casualty should happen, they should make for Queenstown. In accordance with this understanding, the Niagara having made one hundred and nine miles before the mishap, returned to Queenstown. She must have passed the Agamemnon, but owing to the heavy fogs which prevailed for the greater portion of that time she missed seeing or gaining any tidings of her.

RETURN OF THE "AGAMEMNON."

The Agamemnon and Valorous arrived at Queenstown on the 12th instant. The final break in the Atlantic telegraph cable was below the stern of the Agamemnon, after one hundred and forty-six miles had been paid out of that vessel. The Agamemnon then returned to the rendezvous in mid-ocean, and cruised there five days in anticipation of meeting the Niagara. On the Agamemnon arriving at Queenstown it was resolved to coal and start again for a final attempt to lay the cable, on Saturday, the 17th instant, there still being, on both ships, twenty-five hundred miles of the cable left.

THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT'S PLAN WITH REGARD TO FRAZER'S RIVER.

Sir E. Bulwer Lytton's dispatch to Governor Douglas of Vancouver's Island has been published. In it we find the following:

"Her Majesty's Government are anxious to impress on you, that while her Majesty's Government are determined on preserving the rights both of government and of commerce, which belong to this country, and while they have it in contemplation to furnish you with such a force as they may be able to dispatch for your assistance and support in the preservation of law and order, it is no part of their policy to exclude Americans and other foreigners from the gold-fields. On the contrary, you are distinctly instructed to oppose no obstacle whatever to their resort thither for the purpose of digging in those fields, so long as they submit themselves, in common with the subjects of her Majesty, to the recognition of her authority, and conform to such rules of police as you may have thought proper to establish. The national right to navigate Frazer's River is of course a separate question, and one which her Majesty's Government must reserve. Under the circumstances of so large an immigration of Americans into English territory, I need hardly impress upon you the importance of caution and delicacy in dealing with those manifold cases of international relationship and feeling which are certain to arise, and which, but for the exercise of temper and discretion, might easily lead to serious complications between two neighboring and powerful States."

THE BILL FOR THE ORGANIZATION OF NEW CALEDONIA.

Sir Bulwer Lytton's new bill for the organization of the Government of the Northwest Territories of British America under a Governor and Council has been published. The present designation of these territories—New Caledonia—is to be continued, and they are to embrace all the country bounded to the south by the frontier of the United States, to the east by the water-shed between the streams that flow into the Pacific ocean and those which flow into the Atlantic and icy oceans, to the north by the 55th parallel of latitude, and to the west by the Pacific, including Queen Charlotte's Island, and all adjacent islands, except Vancouver's. The last named island may be included at any future time, on an address being presented for the purpose by its local Legislature.

END OF THE ANGLO-AMERICAN DIFFICULTY.

At the 4th July dinner in London, Mr. Dallas made a speech in which he said: "They had recently had some little difficulties on the American coasts and in the West India seas, and one of the Militiamen of the United States diplomacy had recently been charged with the negotiation of those difficulties. That was a point essentially connected with the fundamental principle of the American Revolution—the maintenance by a great people of the independence of their flag. (Cheers.) He would not go into the arguments on the question, which had been argued and reargued, but he looked on the 4th of July as an appropriate day to announce to his countrymen that the claim of visit and search of vessels sailing under the American flag on the high seas in time of peace had been frankly and finally ended. (Loud cheers.) While he was able to announce that gratifying fact, he thought it might be accompanied by the assurance that the termination of this question, for which they had struggled for nearly half a century, had been brought about with a degree of honorable and fair feeling on the part of the English Government, and with a full acknowledgment of that feeling on the part of the Government of the United States."

RAREY'S SECRET OUT.

A London correspondent says: "Mr. Rarey's career has unexpectedly been stopped. He has cleared some £15,000 to £20,000 by his horse-taming secret, when suddenly a cheap publisher got hold of a pamphlet published by the horse-tamer in America, and printed it. It contains in a small compass all the art of horse-taming; and the subscribers, who had bound themselves not to divulge the secret under a penalty of £500, became furious, and Mr. Rarey had to release them from their pledge in a letter in to-day's Times. Of course his profits will be now reduced to a minimum, since every subscriber is henceforth at liberty to practice upon wild horses publicly, and to communicate his knowledge to whomsoever he pleases."

MR. MORPHY IN ENGLAND.

A statement is going the round of the newspapers, credited to the London Times, but for which that newspaper is not responsible, with reference to Mr. Paul Morphy, the American chess champion, who is now in England, in which that gentleman is represented as visiting the St. George's club in London, incog., and beating Staunton, the great English player, after the latter had cleared the board of the pieces, and was about retiring in disgust at meeting with so poor a player. It is evident to the merest tyro in chess that this story is made out of whole cloth, for, apart from the impossibility of any person visiting the St. George's club unintroduced, Mr. Staunton has played chess too much not to know when he was nearly checkmated. As yet but little authentic information has reached this side of the Atlantic with reference to the movements of Mr. Morphy. It is known that he was regularly introduced to the members of the St. George club, and had engaged in a contest with Mr. Barnes, a very fine player, and had beaten him handsomely. He has also promised to participate in the great Birmingham Chess Congress, which will be attended by the chief magnates of Europe. He will, no doubt, give a good account of himself.

A PLAIN-SPOKEN EPITAPH.

A remarkably out-spoken one, from a monument in Horsleydown Church, in Cumberland, runs as follows: "Here lie the bodies of Thomas Bond and Mary his wife. She was temperate, chaste, and charitable; but she was proud, peevish, and passionate. She was an affectionate wife and tender mother; but her husband and child, whom she loved, seldom saw her countenance without a disgusting frown, while she received visitors whom she despised with an endearing smile. Her behavior was discreet toward strangers, but imprudent in her family. Abroad her conduct was influenced by good breeding, but at home by ill temper." And so the epitaph runs on to considerable length, acknowledging the good qualities of the poor woman, but killing each by setting against it some peculiarly unamiable trait.

PRINCE ALFRED NEARLY DROWNED.

A short time since, as Prince Alfred, who possesses a small pleasure-boat, was out a little way off Alverbank, he fell overboard, and, not without much difficulty, made his way to the shore. The first exclamation uttered by his Royal Highness is said to have been, "Oh, my watch!" believing it lost. He, however, greatly to his satisfaction, discovered it in his pocket, and handed it to those who were foremost in coming to his aid. The watch is said to be a present from his royal mother, and hence the very natural anxiety which he evinced.

ROYALTY'S SHOES.

We read in an exchange: "Many of our fashionable ladies here dress as if they were never to go out except to tread on carpets of velvet. We can imagine with what a shrug of aristocratic disdain many of these must read the account of the bridal outfit of the Princess Royal. Among the items particularly striking take the following:

"'Twelve dozen pairs of boots, of useful and solid make; some of them, intended for rough walking, being provided with treble soles, and small but projecting nails.'

"Only think of some of our 'paper-soled,' delicate-footed damsels sporting, by way of novelty, hob-nailed, triple-soled shoes!"

DEATH FROM A BITE OF A RAT.

At a recent trial of dogs in a rattery, one of the rats escaped the farrier, and got below a chair upon which one of the fancy happened to be at the time sitting. The man, wishing to expose the rat to the dog, put down his hand; the animal, however, taking offense at the liberty used, bit his thumb. Thinking the matter slight, that the bite was a simple scratch, he allowed it to go on for a few days unnoticed, till dangerous symptoms appearing he became alarmed, and was obliged to go into the hospital, where, mortification having ensued, the man in a short time after died perfectly insane.

FRANCE.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S VISIT TO FRANCE.

The report that the Queen of England is coming to Cherbourg in August is confirmed in the following terms by the Journal du Havre: "The Emperor, it is said, has written from Plombières to Queen Victoria to invite her Majesty to attend the fêtes at Cherbourg; and it is affirmed that the Queen has replied by telegraph that her Majesty accepts the invitation, and will be at Cherbourg on the 7th August, accompanied by Prince Albert and the Earl of Malmesbury, Minister of Foreign Affairs. This news, of which we can guarantee the bona fide character, proves that the understanding between France and England, if it were ever shaken, is at present as intimate as ever." The news is now almost universally accepted as true.

STRANGERS IN PARIS.

The Herald correspondent says: "Paris was never so devoid of visitors at this period of the year as at present. English and Americans seem entirely to have bid it farewell. Furnished apartments may be had at very low prices; indeed, there is no demand whatever for them. The hotels look dreary and forsaken, and the Louvre has not one-third of its complement. The Emperor left St. Cloud yesterday morning for Plombières. Previous to his departure the Prince and Princess Youssonpoff had an audience to take leave. This is the Russian pair that was sent over from Russia to astonish the weak minds of Paris by an expenditure of almost fabulous character. Their success has been of the most complete description. The splendor and magnificence of the Russian prince and princess has been in every one's mouth throughout the whole of their sojourn in the Faubourg St. Honoré. Such liveries have scarcely been seen out of the palace of kings. Day after day, night after night, have the splendid salons of their magnificent hotel been adorned with all the rank, fashion, and wealth of all parties of the French. It was there alone that the stern legitimists could once more be seen disporting in the light; it was only there that they would consent to brush shoulders with the parvenus the last sixty years have thrown to the surface; and it was there only that a common tone of sympathy was found in the half-suppressed mutter of jealousy and hatred which all felt against la perfide Albion. The sentiment of good-will between France and Russia was never stronger than now. The visit of the Emperor and Empress to Cherbourg is to be celebrated with extraordinary magnificence. Every vessel of the squadron in the roadstead is each to fire three broadsides; and, in addition, all the forts which surround the entrance, to the number of as many as eighteen, are being armed with cannon, to fire three times also. The Emperor will be accompanied from Cherbourg to Brest by three ships of the line, which will return the salutes. Altogether the thunder from gunpowder bids fair to be truly formidable."

HOW THE EMPEROR SPENDS HIS TIME.

"The Emperor," says a letter from Plombières, "enjoys excellent health, and every morning and evening, whatever may be the state of the weather, takes a long walk. In the middle of the day his Majesty transacts business, and every afternoon receives dispatches and official documents from Paris. His Majesty is better lodged than last year, and the town altogether is improved. A good many French and foreign visitors have arrived."

LOVE AND LAW.

A curious trial is about to commence in the French courts, which will be of some interest to the English public. The collateral heirs of Prince Charles de Rohan are about to plead against his widow and the child with whom she was pregnant at the time of her husband's death. The plea set up by the family is the great age of the Prince at the time of the marriage, and the "undue captation" used by the family to insure his affections. The adverse plea maintains that the age of the Prince having been but sixty-seven, no undue "captation" was necessary, and that the marriage was fully justified by the great beauty and amiable character of the young lady—an English girl of the highest respectability and unimpeachable conduct, daughter of W. Thomson, Esq., formerly of Smyrna.

GERMANY.

DEATH OF A LADY FROM GLANDERS.

The awful death of Madame Palesikoff, one of the most charming among all that bevy of charming Russian ladies who sometimes gladden the winters of Paris, has created a terrible shock among the circles she so lately embellished by her presence. The unhappy lady left Paris but a short time ago on a summer tour to Germany. While stepping from the door of the Opera House, at Berlin, to gain her carriage, she let fall one of her bracelets close to the pavement. Stooping to pick it up, she noticed at the time, laughingly, that "one of the horses belonging to a carriage standing at hand had dropped his head so close to her face that he had touched her, and left a moist kiss upon her cheek." In a few days the unfortunate lady was taken ill with that most horrible disease, glanders, and in a few days more, breathed her last, in spite of the attendance of the first physicians of Berlin, and every resource to be obtained by wealth or by the ceaseless vigilance of friends.

A CURIOUS STIPULATION IN A MARRIAGE CONTRACT.

Mademoiselle Odette Lafitte, daughter of the wealthy banker, M. Charles Lafitte, is about to marry a no less wealthy banker of Frankfort, M. Erlanger. The fair Parisienne insisted that in the Corbeille should be placed a document, signed by her intended, according her a sojourn of three months of every year in Paris, with a sum sufficiently large to defray the expenses of such visits.

A NEW MODE OF DISINHERITING ONE'S SON.

A few days ago a Baron Silberstein died at Vienna, and after his death no money was found in the house, although he had always passed for a wealthy man. Inquiries were made by his heir, and, on its being discovered that a banker had paid into his hands the sum of 170,000 florins but a few days before his death, his valet was arrested by the police on suspicion of having made away with the money. As the man said that his master left his bed a couple of days before he died in order to burn some papers, the stove in the bedroom was searched. Nothing but the remains of documents were found, and the servant was kept in custody, until it occurred to some one that it might be as well to examine the other stoves. The examination was made, and the numerous remains of bank-notes of 1000 florins each proved the innocence of the valet and the destructiveness of his master. The Baron, who was divorced from his wife, often expressed doubts about the legitimacy of his only son; and, in order that he should profit as little as possible by his death, he burned bank-notes of the value of 162,000 florins ($81,000). When the door of the stove was open, the word "thousand" was distinctly visible on many of the consumed notes, which naturally fell to pieces when touched.

ITALY.

A DEAD CITY.

A recent American traveler, when in Venice, expressed a curiosity to know how the remarkable palaces of that city were built, and on what foundation they stood. When told that they stood on piles, he desired to see the pile-driver. "There is a model of it in the Doge's Palace somewhere," replied the guide, "but it has not been used, for we have had no house built in Venice for three hundred years!" Making due allowance for the guide's accuracy of computation, the anecdote will serve to show the stagnant, Dead-Sea aspect of many Eastern countries whose exploits history has emblazoned.

AFRICA.

DISCOVERY OF A RELIC OF MUNGO PARK.

A relic of Mungo Park's travels in Africa has been discovered by Lieutenant Glover, of Baikie's West Coast expedition. The incident is thus related by the Cape Literary Magazine:

"Lieutenant Glover, one of the officers under the command of Captain Baikie, has stumbled upon a valuable relic of Mungo Park, and has of course secured it. Passing through a native village near the scene of Park's melancholy death, an old man accosted the lieutenant, and showed him a book which had for years been in his possession. It was a volume of logarithms, with Mungo Park's name and autographic notes and memorandum. The possessor offered it to Mr. Glover for 200,000 cowries. Inestimable as the prize was, the price demanded was enormous, and it was impossible to pay it. After some consideration, the lieutenant took from his pocket a clasp knife, and asked the native what he thought of that. This was too tempting a bait to be refused, the native joyfully took the knife, and the lieutenant still more joyfully secured his valuable memento of the distinguished African traveler."

DR. LIVINGSTONE AT THE CAPE.

Dr. Livingstone has been entertained at a dinner at the Cape of Good Hope. In his speech on that occasion, he thus spoke of the labors he is about to undertake:

"The central part of the continent which we now stand upon was supposed for a long time to be a great sandy plain. Certain rivers were known to be flowing toward the centre, but they were not known further, and they were supposed in consequence to become lost. But, instead of that, the grand view burst gradually on my mind of a very fine well-watered country; and not only that, but of certain well-watered healthy localities on both sides of the country, which were suitable for a European residence. When I passed into that country, I had not the slightest idea that there was such a want of cotton as I found to be the case when I went home to England. But there I saw the cotton growing wild and almost every where, and that sugar was collected all over the country (although the people did not know that it could be produced from the sugar-cane), and I found, further, that this was a great market for labor. When I lived at Kolobeng, men left their tribe, and I found some of them within 200 miles of Cape Town, seeking to obtain work. Now here we have the produce and here we have the labor, and I hope we may secure a healthy standing point, from which Europeans may push their missionary enterprise to the unhealthy regions beyond. We proceed, first of all, up the River Zambesi, and have the full authority of the Portuguese for so doing. This river is very large; it is difficult to convey to the people of such a dry country as this an idea of its size, but the narrowest part that I saw seemed almost to be equal to the Thames at London Bridge. It was not known to be a large river, on account of its being separated into five or six branches at its mouth, before it reaches the sea. But, when we get inland, we have a noble stream, and we have at least 220 miles of the stream without a single obstruction. Then we come into a large coal-field, and this seems to contain the elements of future civilization. And what I hope to effect is this: I don't hope to send down cargoes of cotton and sugar—perhaps this result will not be in my lifetime. But I hope we shall make a beginning, and get in the thin end of the wedge, and that we shall open up a pathway into the interior of the country, and by getting right into the centre have a speedy passage by an open pathway, working from the centre out toward the sides.

ARABIA.

MASSACRE OF CHRISTIANS.

On the 15th of June the Mohammedans in Jeddah rose and massacred the Christians. Among the victims are the English and French Consuls; also the wife of the latter and over twenty others. The Consulates were plundered. The British steamer Cyclops had rescued twenty-six Christians, and taken them to Suez. No Christians remained in the place. Two boats from the Cyclops had to fire on the Mohammedans, who attempted to intercept the retreat of the Christians from the town.

INDIA.

NENA SAHIB AND HIS FAMILY.

We continue to give extracts from the letters of Mr. Russell to the London Times: "Nena Sahib, who is represented as being much embarrassed by the women of his Zenana, is said to have taken a good start for the Terai—one of his wives presented him with an infant at Shahjehanpore.

HOW BEARERS OF FALSE NEWS ARE PUNISHED.

"A man came in from Bareilly with news respecting the enemy. He was asked if there was any force at Fureedpore. 'There is not so much as a fly there,' quoth he. 'Are you sure?' 'Yes. If I tell a lie, and you find a man there, hang me.' Just at this moment in enters another spy from Fureedpore itself. He reports the presence of 1000 cavalry and four guns in the place. The spies were confronted. 'Oh,' said the first, 'I was not at Fureedpore. In coming from Bareilly I passed round it, but I heard from a man that I knew that there was not a soul in the place.' His punishment was gentle, but immediate. As his information had been given extra officially, he was merely taught a lesson not to give statements in future about things he did not know. He was seized at once, a barber was sent for, his mustaches and eyebrows were shaved off, and his head divested of every hair, even of the sacred lock which he wore as a high-caste Hindoo, after which he received a taste of bamboo on the back, and was sent ignominiously out of camp.

ONSLAUGHT OF MUSSULMAN FANATICS.

"And now occurred a most extraordinary scene. Among the matchlock-men, who to the number of 700 or 800 were lying behind the walls of the houses, was a body of Ghazees or Mussulman fanatics, who, like the Roman Decii, devote their lives with solemn oaths to their country or their faith. Uttering loud cries, 'Bismillah, Allah, deen deen!' 130 of these fanatics, sword in hand, with small circular bucklers on the left arm, and green cummerbungs, rushed out after the Sikhs, and dashed at the left of the right wing of the Highlanders. With bodies bent and heads low, waving their tulwars with a circular motion in the air, they came on with astonishing rapidity. At first they were mistaken for Sikhs, whose passage had already somewhat disordered our ranks. Fortunately, Sir Colin Campbell was close up with the 42d; his keen, quick eye detected the case at once. 'Steady, men, steady; close up the ranks. Bayonet them as they come on.' It was just in time, for these madmen, furious with bang, were already among us, and a body of them sweeping around the left of the right wing got into the rear of the regiment. The struggle was sanguinary but short. Three of them dashed so suddenly at Colonel Cameron that they pulled him off his horse ere he could defend himself. His sword fell out of its sheath, and he would have been hacked to pieces in another moment but for the gallant promptitude of Color-Sergeant Gardiner, who, stepping out of the ranks, drove his bayonet through two of them in the twinkling of an eye. The third was shot by one of the 42d. Brigadier Walpole had a similar escape; he was seized by two or three of the Ghazees, who sought to pull him off his horse, while others cut at him with their tulwars. He received two cuts on the hand, but he was delivered from the enemy by the quick bayonets of the 42d. In a few minutes the dead bodies of 133 of these Ghazees, and some eighteen or twenty wounded men of ours, were all the tokens left of the struggle.

SIR COLIN CAMPBELL DEFEATED AT LAST.

"We passed through the large village of Tilhur, and encamped in a large mango tope to the south of it, not without considerable opposition from some of the inhabitants, for it so happened that the first camp fire that was lighted disturbed a community of the most vindictive bees in a hollow of the tree above that I ever heard of; they at once descended to the assault, and in a few minutes most of their enemies were utterly routed. The Commander-in-Chief himself was attacked and driven right out of the field, or rather out of the tope, for the enemy did not desist until they had forced him to take refuge in the open plain. The Chief of the Staff too was attacked, and utterly defeated in a few seconds. Colonel Althorp, after a gallant stand, was obliged to fly with the loss of his spectacles. Mr. Mackinnon, using a large mango branch as a claymore, resisted his foes with great activity and courage for some time, but finally he was obliged to fly, wounded in several places, and to take refuge in a neighboring tank. The guard over the treasure was also obliged to abandon their post; the natives wrapped themselves up in their cotton robes, and lay flat on the ground, and in a short time the bees were completely victorious. During the struggle all the Head-quarters Staff armed themselves with green boughs, so that it looked as if they were rehearsing a second march to Dunsinane. As soon as the tents were pitched, we had shelter from our enemy."

THE MOON, AND HOW WE SEE IT.

THE picture which we engrave on these pages is probably the best and fullest view of the moon that has ever been laid before the public. Most of our readers are aware that the mountains and hollows of the moon have been accurately and thoroughly mapped by astronomers, and registered by appropriate names. For the benefit of meritorious students of astronomical geography, we subjoin the names of all those which have been christened. At the present season it will amply repay the possessor of a small telescope to identify the several localities with the aid of our map.

In olden time the moon was a goddess. Whatever the ignorant mind of the time was incapable of grasping was supernatural. Thus arose the pale, chaste Deity of the Night, robed in virgin white, roaming dreamily under the partial shade of trees, loving to see her fair image reflected in streams, and shedding a complacent light on tender meetings. A goddess indeed! What less could have smiled so benevolently on young lovers? Even scurvy Johnson was forced to confess that

> The Queen of Night
> Round as queen a lambent light;
> Light that seems but just to show
> Dreams that heat and hearts that glow.

We are not heathens—far from it: we all go to church, and pay for pews, and the like; but who among us has not at some time or other paid homage to the Queen of Night, and thanked her for the gentle light which has shown the way to sure home, or even, perhaps, a pair of red lips?

Ah! let us not hasten to deride the poor old heathens!

In this matter-of-fact age, when every thing is regulated by degrees and inches, when philosophers have stethoscopes to test the amount of excitement which was developed in Fanny's breast at the aspect of Arthur arm in arm with Louisa—we don't fancy the moon as a goddess. We say, in blunt scientific terms, that she—or it—is a satellite of the earth, suspended in her—or its—present position by the contrasted attraction of the sun and the earth. This is the unromantic version of the naked fact.

There was a time—oh! that we had lived to see it—when the earth was an uncomfortable semi-incandescent maze, in the act of cooling off for practical purposes. The atmosphere was tropical throughout the globe. All things were intensely impregnated—or, as the philosophers say, superaturated—with carbon. Between the dry land and the waters there was no division. There was no ocean, and consequently no continents. All was hot mud, with here and there a lake or a short river, and here and there a dry, parched, torrid eminence. In these days there were animals and plants, but no human beings. Both animals and plants were like the age in which they flourished—to our notions monstrous. Monsters were the rule, rank in the vegetable and the animated world. Creatures were born, and grew to sizes which dwarf the elephant. Plant thrust their heads above the mud, and, in that carbonic-arous atmosphere, attained heights which would have towered above the tallest trees of our forests. But in proportion to the rapidity of their growth was the brevity of their life; for these were the days of earthquakes and terrestrial convulsions. Probably no day elapsed without some earthquake or volcanic eruption.

The light of day was dull and obscured. Masses of opaque matter floated through the atmosphere as thickly as dust specks that through a ray of sunlight in a darkened room. The hot air, thick and dull, hung a listless mist over the face of the earth, which was even then almost without form and void. When the sun went down, dense darkness covered the earth. There was no lesser light to rule the night; dim twinklings in the far distance, hardly piercing the pall which wrapped our planet, were the only contrasts to the Egyptian blackness of the dark hours.

But the internal fires which sprung from the vitals of the earth almost supplied the want of a second luminary. It is probable that there were but few spots on the globe which were out of view of some flaming volcano. We count the active volcanoes by integers. When we have enumerated Etna, Vesuvius, Hecla, Jorulla, Colima, and one or two others, we have reached the end of our list. In the days of Homer the volcanoes were counted by scores; in the carboniferous age they may have, must have, flourished by hundreds and thousands. That vast incandescent mass, of which the crust only had cooled, kept boiling up every few hours, and furiously pouring out the vials of its wrath upon an earth inhabited by transitory creatures. Go where the traveler may, he will still find traces of this terrible age. That tell-tale rock—the "trap"—is peculiar to no meridian; and from the Hudson's Bay territories nearly to Cape Magellan, from Spitzbergen to Borneo, either this, or some nondescript range of volcanic origin, here with scorize disseminated through the more regular formations, there with copper or gold held in a native state in half-decayed quartz, tell a very legible story of the time when all the component parts of the earth were in a fluid state, and were thrown off by the boiling mass beneath as a kettle throws off froth and scum.

There came a day when the under crust could no longer bear the weight of the mass which, after being thrown off daily, returned, by the force of gravitation, to the surface of its parent. A time came when the incandescent and inchoate planet—if so daring a figure may be ventured—felt the necessity of unusually strenuous measures. It gathered all its fiery energies, and mustered all its fearful strength. The effect was universal, not local. With such bodies distances of 25,000 miles must be trifling, and the earth's meridian—a paltry 8000 miles—not worth mentioning. One can imagine the purposs and effort being common to the entire molten and raging mass.

It came at last. After threes of inconceivable agony, with a rear and a convulsion which must have destroyed every living thing then existent upon the face of the planet, in the midst of general chaos, confusion, and desolation, the earth relieved itself. It tore from its half-cooled surface immense masses, and projected them with enormous force into space; not on one side alone, but on all. Lumps of earth four and five miles in thickness, and thousands of miles long and wide, were in an instant forced upward with such force as to pass beyond the circle of the earth's attraction. These various masses, thus hunched into space, soon felt the attraction of each other, and assembled together. They and, agreeably to the sublime law of celestial bodies, remained suspended in space at the point where the attraction of the earth meets that of the sun. That other celestial law which forbids the torpidity of any atom of matter compelled the aggregated mass to revolve, and the revolution forced the mass into a spherical shape.

Thus the moon came into being. An offshoot from the earth, it pays homage to its parent by revolving round it, and reflecting back to it a part of the sun's light during the period when that luminary is obscured to us. Had the force with which its substance was expelled from the body of the earth been less, it would have returned to our surface, just as those fragments of matter called aerolites do at regular intervals; had that force been greater, it would have entered upon the vast area which is the domain of the sun, and would have been attracted to that great chemical body, and been fused by its intense heat. It was sent abroad with precisely the force necessary to sustain it in equilibro between the earth and the sun, and hence it is "the lesser light which rules the night."

This is not the only service which it renders us. By its creation it caused great hollows in the surface of the earth. Into these hollows the waters which lay on the face of the deep naturally gathered, and became oceans, lakes, seas, and rivers. The cavities drained the earth of the moisture which had rendered it unfit for the habitation of the higher order of vertebrated creatures. Thus by degrees were formed the great Atlantic and Pacific, the Northern and the Southern oceans, leaving here and there tracts of cool, dry land for man to inhabit at the word of his Creator. Nor did the office of the moon stop here. While it was upheld in space by the attraction of the earth, it returned the compliment by exercising a reciprocal attraction upon the waters for which it had created beds. With the beautiful regularity which is the characteristic of heavenly bodies, it affected them at uniform intervals, causing the tides to flow and to ebb, and to vibrate between the spring and the neap flow. Lastly, it relieved the earth of a vast quantity of superincumbent matter, equal, in fact, to over one-fiftieth of the whole bulk of the planet. One must imagine the earth in the condition of a gentleman who has dined copiously, and whose interior is troubled by an unusual burden: the convulsion which led to the creation of the moon is similar to the effect of the dose which the gentleman, if he be wise, will instantly take.

A POWERFUL TELESCOPE.

In departing from us, and setting up for herself, the moon forgot some articles of baggage which were essential to her future comfort and prosperity. Among these were air and water. How we came by them two useful commodities it were hard to say—about as hard as to account for the fact that you, my dear reader, have two eyes and a nose. It is enough for you and the earth to feel satisfied that you have what you need—that is to say, your two eyes and a nose; the earth, air and water. And we must, in the like stupid way, remain content with the naked assertion that the moon is devoid of what she sadly needs, air and water.

This is made quite certain by the discoveries of astronomers. Rains, dews, oceans, lakes, hail, snow, clouds, are all unknown to the moon. History records that the cruel Carthaginians used to cut off the eyelids of their prisoners and tie them on their backs, exposed to the burning sun of Africa. The moon is in the same unhappy condition. Nothing shields its surface from the burning rays of the sun. Wherever the light of that fierce luminary penetrates the moon's surface is incessantly hot.

Of volcanic origin, the moon is true to its descent. It is full of volcanoes, most of which, however, perhaps from a conviction of the uselessness of further action—there being nothing to destroy, and no one even to see their explosions—are now silent and torpid. But they wrought out their destiny so long and so faithfully, that the surface of the moon is frightfully disfigured and uneven. Switzerland is a prairie compared to the smoothest part of the moon's surface. It is nothing but incessant mountain and hollow. Lunar Alps and Rocky Mountains intersect every few miles of the surface. The Himalayas would be unnoticed among the gigantic ranges which ornament the lunar superficies. And the projections, mighty as they are, are but trifling in comparison with the hollows. It would seem as though the moon, with spish weakness, had tried to imitate the earth in throwing off space for rivers and oceans—forgetting that it contained no water to fill the cavities. Astronomers have made the most extraordinary discoveries in reference to these lunar hollows. Some of them appear to be about fifty miles deep, and a hundred miles or so wide, with precipitous sides. One great astronomer Mitchell has vividly described them terrible places. Those who have looked over a precipice a few hundred feet in depth may perhaps form some rude idea of what it must be to gaze down into a hole fifty miles deep—so deep that the bottom would almost escape the eye, were there an interesting atmosphere—a great, monstrous cave, with no vegetation either on the borders or on the top, or on the sides or on the bottom; no life of any kind, not even the least sound, to break the endless monotony of silence—every where dull, warm scoriæ, lava, and stones of volcanic origin. But even these are the smallest of the lunar cavities. Latterly, acute astronomers, with improved instruments, have gazed into holes in the moon's surface, and estimated them to be no less than two hundred and fifty and three hundred miles deep, with fissures in them through which the sunlight penetrated.

Fancy the scene! Well may it have been termed the abomination of desolation! Surely this fair earth, with all its gloomy places and all its dreary scenes, contains nothing so overwhelming in its terrible despair as the moon. And who, gazing at its mild white face as it emerges from the cover of a cloud, would deem it so sad and desolate a sphere?

There are no "men in the moon." There can not be, for they could not exist without air and water. Tis a pity; for the sight of this planet of ours, thirteen times the size which the moon appears to us, as fair, and bright, and shining as our nightly luminary, would be a sight worth seeing.

Science has made such progress, and common sense has so far hoped pace with it, that the old idea that this was the only inhabited sphere in the universe is now completely exploded. There is no reason to believe that our planet is the only one in our solar system which is devoted to a useful career; nor is there any ground for imagining that our sun is the only one, of the myriad of suns we see every night, which gives light, and heat, and happiness to human creatures. On the contrary, the supreme wisdom of the Deity affords a fair presumption that this little planet of ours is but as a grain of sand among the worlds which have been created for the glory of God, and that each planet after its kind is fitted for the habitation of creatures whose office and purpose it is to thank and bless Him for their existence. Moons may be an exception for a time.

Of all this we know but little, and can only conjecture vaguely. As science advances, we may have telescopic instruments so superior to those now in use that we shall be able to decipher the moon's surface as plainly as a distant shore on our own planet. But visits thither must ever remain as impossible as they are at present. The story of Hans Pfaal will remain a brilliant imagination to the end of time.

The following are the names which have been given to the mountains and valleys, or hollows, in the moon, and which are referred to in the accompanying picture:

MOUNTAINS.

1. The Apennines.
2. The Caucasus.
3. The Alps.
4. Taurus.
5. Hæmus.
6. The Altai Mountains.
7. The Cordilleras.
8. The Riphn Mountains.
9. The Carpathians.
10. The Hercynian Mountains.

HOLLOWS, OR VALLEYS.

A. The Crisian Sea.
B. The Sea of Fertility (!).
C. The Sea of Nectar.
D. The Tranquil Sea.
E. The Serene Sea.
F. The Sea of Dreams.
G. The Sea of Death.
H. The Dreamy Marsh.
I. The Cold Sea.
K. The Sea of Vapors.
L. The Middle Bay.
M. The Sea of Clouds.
N. The Sea of Mist.
O. The Bay of Epidemics.
P. The Stormy Ocean.
Q. The Showery Sea.
R. The Sea of Rainbows.
S. The Sea of Dews.
T. Humboldt's Sea.

As will be seen, astronomers have done what they could to relieve the dreariness of nature by a free indulgence in fanciful names.

NOTHING NEW.

"There is nothing new!" to me said one,
Gravely quoting threadbare Solomon—
"There is nothing new beneath the sun!"

"Ah! what foolish wisdom this!" I cried.
"Adages are pompous robes that hide
The nothingness of that which goes inside,

"Nothing is new?—No silver second falls
Trinking through creation's echoing halls,
But something blooms: some voice awakes and calls!

"Spring, when she floats across the hills and seas,
Hangs not her last year's garlands on the trees.
Last autumn's fruits were not the twins of these.

"Nothing is new? Ingenious sophist, go!
Lift up your cradle's coverlet of snow—
Is this the babe you lost so long ago?"

THE DELECTABLE FAIRY TALE OF MIEL BONBON.

"MIEL BONBON, you are killing me!"

"Oh! I hope not."

"Miel Bonbon, you are too beautiful for any thing!"

"Isn't it any thing to kill you?"

"Graceful, witty, accomplished, sympathizing, light-minded, pure, sincere, gentle, appreciating, full of tact, fascinating, utterly angelic!"

"Dear me! I do not get up and bow! Consider it a cure, and forget it, like a good child."

"In fine, Miel Bonbon, I love you to distraction!"

"So I do you."

Of a truth, Miel Bonbon was a very queer girl. When she said these last words she looked me right in the face with those great, true, brown eyes of hers, and spoke as if she were not a bit ashamed. At first, I confess, I was a little vexed at the way she chose coming to me so readily, like a tamed bird; but as I analyzed her ingenuous feelings, clear as dew, she turned toward me—I saw the soul standing within, and knew that because, like young Eve, it was spotless, it was also naked and not ashamed. So straightway I was vexed again—this time at myself—to think that I had wished Miel Bonbon to mar her truth, and taste expectation in the disguise of a No that meant Yes.

This was the whole of the courtship; that is to say, the formality so called. For I had courted her in tender word and action—as much as the whole world courts when it becomes a poet, once in its Editing, and falls in love; I had courted her with flowers, as Gil courts the sightingbe; I had courted her in music, as the low courts Hyacinthus; with eyes had I courted Miel Bonbon, like two stars out of heaven and the daisies. For three months our life had been as lovely as the young summer sun in the blossomy boughs under which we sat, and answered by the sighing clover of the fields all around. All such heavenly visits as these were so clever like that clover—were boughs like those bought!

Yes, you are right—Miel Bonbon is an odd name for a girl—for that matter, for any body—and it is not unnatural that you do ask, "What is she? Whom did she come from? What country woman was she? Where in the world did she get such a strange name?"

Now this is all I know of the matter, up to the very hour of our marriage. I had gone one morning, after six months' hard work in town, in a little bit of a hamlet-house that I had built among the green Rhodes traversed by the Erie Railroad, and frequented only by people, like me, who were fond of catching trout, shooting, and getting well tanned by dividuality by being out of a crowd. One day, when, with sketch-book in hand, I had gone down to the top of a big mossy rock, which I intended to use for my studio, I looked down, and, on the farther side, saw a young girl sitting on a somber ledge, sketching too. Before she heard me and I glanced over her shoulder, and let a little pebble which was taken down the very waterfall, under an arch-way of maples, which I had cut my heart, and not just gone to sit my pencil, as well as incomparably better than I could have done it, that, in disgust, I put my book in my pocket, and, in lonely recesses of my pocket, wondering whether it was always going to be impossible to get out of my railroad that I shouldn't find some one there to beat me at every thing I tried.

Not wishing to violate privacy, I coughed impressively. The young woman turned and looked up naively into my eyes. What a face! The braids of her rich, plaited, brown hair fell low on her neck, and were all studded with trailing grasses and wood violets. And what a beautiful day-light fell on part of her head, through breaks in the branches, and made a sun-golden mist in nature, where the flowers seemed to grow naturally. Her clear, low forehead, arched thoroughly in two soft curves, was the most lovely, pure, moonsing eyes of hand; the womanly nose just curved enough to show character, and not enough to run to speak wonders of tact, taste, and appreciation; the mouth winning as little child's, speaking even in silence, varying through a hundred expressions even in the short moment I stood, astonished, before expressing myself. There, out of the sculpture of the cheek and chin, told me that I saw the perfect maiden of dreams.

"Modest!—beginning my composure—"is gracious, and forgive a stranger, whose intrusion was unintentional."

"It was no intrusion, Sir," said the most melodious of natural voices. "You could not have known, by any possibility, that I was here."

Beyond guinsay, a truth! It was just on the verge of impossibility, now that I was here, for a creature in the woods, and an utter inability, from the fact of a philosophical education, to resort to the hypothesis of Dryads!

I took courage.

"Are you not afraid to be alone? I am told there are bears—"

"Did you ever see a bear? I should like to so much! I think they are dear—so honest, and in a great soft motf. I don't believe I should be a bit afraid."

Mr. Charles Lawrence—ridiculist myself—with a practical training, accepting his sensations as true, and with ideas, so far as embracing them, unperfected from an early perusal of Mrs. Trimmer's "Natural History," stood amazed, and looked at this young woman as at a portent.

Just as I was rallying myself, and trying to think of something she might be afraid of—at least, enough to let me stay by her and keep it off the rest of the afternoon—there came a sound.

A crashing of broken undergrowth—a stamp of impatient, clumsy feet—a heavy breathing, as of some animal thoroughly blown by exercise. I began to think the little dorgle to be the subject of Trimmer was about to be set right on that—to say nothing of my having my own orthodox opinions strengthened.

No, it was not a bear—but young Cottin Bayley, fresh from Bread Street, in the loudest plaid from head to feet, coming out to catch trout with a rod and sinker! That man always was my abomination—but just then he did seem, at least, a pleasant disappointment, as a substitute for the bear. I breathed freely.

Not so the girl. She clung to my arm with a sudden look of terror, just as a little daughter of five years might have done, and whispered, quickly—"Oh, what is that? Shall I scream for help? Please—"

Evidently I shall never know, to my dying day, whether Cottin Bayles was going to shake hands with me. I leave the impression to rest where it was—he didn't do so—he saw me. For, setting him dead, I gave my arm to the young girl, and left the bank. Then we hurried through the bushes, and never stopped until, somewhat oppressed for breath, we stood to rest in the open road, looking back on the old stone boarding-house where I stank.

I really felt as if I had been doing one of the strangest things in the world. I turned toward the little fairy-woman at my side, and said:

"What were you afraid of?"

"I seemed to see his soul—oh! so coarse—so gross—so low!"

I believe it was then I began to love Miel Bonbon. For she had my repulsion—repulsion from my affinities. After this I asked her, as unobtrusively as I could, where she lived.

In her spirit I saw her home. I am going to stay at the house where you are. Every thing under her roof was familiar to that, if you can understand what I mean, it seemed not to dispose me to questioning. I was perfectly satisfied with this new-ever from the moment I saw her, and could have awakened a thousand succeeding queries, silent or expressed, how, where from, and why she came here.

"I am going to stay at the house where you are," said she, and as I answered that I was occupied a little nest of a room close under the eaves on the second floor with a ship-sail, and that sometimes at night, when I lay awake with my view window thrown open, I could hear her singing over the river, she said that she thought she would like to be with me.

The people at the house called her "The Lady Tootsy," and worshiped her gaiter soles at the distance between common life and mountain-air. They sang Cottin Bayley's songs, stopped at our door, called her "Little Bad Manners," because she had run away on the same floor with Bayley, and, coming from six trout, taken at a canter, to one, at a very moderate pace, I became aware that he cherished the secret hope that Miel Bonbon would be bored her confidentially to the silent night as Dreaming Rose, whose name I had given her as "the stunning woman." But I only called her Miel Bonbon—probable because she was sweet as the flower of that name, and because I had no secrets between fairies and most women—and she took the name, answering to it always. Some one called her for our day-long strolls, and never saying that she had another already; nor, curious as to my mood, did I ever ask her what her name really did have. Miel Bonbon was enough for me. I did not care to know more about her from; she was here now, and that also was enough.

The conversation with which this account began was that of the day before our marriage in New York. After it, feeling universally good from the heart, and very well-lined home with the sun, I was leaning on my arm, under the maples now shining into their first autumn tinge.

Then was it my mood, I suppose, I've no idea how many miles of that old house. Our means of going consisted mostly of one old horse, Bill Bayley, which lay under the asparagus of the mantle looking-glass, and the natural play swelling into the summer mood from rocks and trees. Then the magistrate—the pass of the wild, grand forest that was wild and grand in its solitude, I left Miel Bonbon and I could not be married en rapt there.

Yet, remember, I am no majestic Old Testament souls, who settled ever; thing to simply by a stone, a memorial-stone, to bear witness of their everlasting love. Nothing of the kind. Had you been now it, we went out to the rock where I had first met Miel Bonbon, and knelt on it with joined hands. And the thoughts we thought were not from the real marriage, of which the ceremony done afterward was but a sign. We were, in heart, one made up, and clasped one another in that long embrace which says, "Naught but death shall part thee and me."

"What is this, love?" said Miel Bonbon, with a sudden look of fear, as we rose, and she threw both our arms from about one another; "just give me your hand a minute." I put it in hers, and she held it in the air midway between us. "What do you feel now?" said she.

Here struck me. I was very strange, but just at that midway place I felt, though I could not see any thing, a magnetic current that was passing in exact union. "I verily believe," exclaimed Miel Bonbon, "that they are ours, which became one when we joined hands, and were divided when we parted." It must have been so; for never, up to this hour, have I felt that unity so increased; and one of us can ever tell the approach of the other in the darkest night by feeling it stir in our nearest.

Early the next morning we left the woods together for New York. Our parting was painful. Lady threw an old shoe after us for luck as we left the door. It struck me on the head, which made Miel Bonbon laugh, for it was too old to hurt, and gave young Bayliss an opportunity to remark, from the view window in which he sat like a rock "Grandsman" in the National Academy, in a frame altogether too good for him, that he wished it were his head.

On reaching New York, we were married over again in the house of my father, and had the necessary fun of Heaven and society, was now my wife. And what a charming little one she made! She had all my tastes, and that naturally, too, without any pretense of an imbecile deference; she had read all my favorite books, and loved them as well; and often, as we were talking together through one of the long winter evenings which we ever tired of spending with each other, she would come out with some exquisite sentence upon the subject in hand, which I thoroughly expressed what I had thought an utterly irrepressible idea of mine, that I was quite startled at the delight.

One night, just after her winning little mouth had first blown out the lamp under the urn and then given me a farewell kiss, it struck me as not unpleasant to have it do a third good office, and I said, "Sing, Miel Bonbon—there's a dear little fairy!"

"Sing—sing—what shall I sing?"

"The first thing of all you love best. I should like, for curiosity, to hear what that is."

She sat on my knee for some time in thought —deep thought—and then, in a voice wondrous fresh and clear, broke forth into that glorious anthem of purity—the Ave Maria. "The angel Gabriel liveth!"

I started so violently that she fell to her feet.

"Child!" I cried, feeling the drops of awe bustling all my forehead, "how did you know that that was the first thing my soul loved to me?"

"What?" said Miel Bonbon, her color coming and going every second. "So it is to me! Why is it to you?"

"They sang it at my mother's funeral."

"I must have been there. I began to feel it pain me when you speak of it."

"You, Miel Bonbon! Impossible! I could name all who were present; and do you think I would not have remembered you?"

The only answer Miel Bonbon made was to bury her face in my bosom, and weep bitterly. To myself, I was overcome by the strangest mystery, every where converging me as a thick cloud.

At last—for it seemed as if she never would stop crying without help—I roused myself, and, trying in his sweet face, said, gently and coldly,

"Darling! my abruptness frightened you—I have made you ill. Don't cry, Miel Bonbon—for-give me, and I will."

She raised her head, and answered me, in a broken voice:

"No; not that—you have not hurt me; but—oh, there must be some strange, dreadful secret in my birth!"

"Secret! what secret, Miel Bonbon? You are not well you. Sit!" Really I began to be afraid for her reason. She seemed to suspect this fear; and, to dissipate it, with a great effort collected herself.

"My husband," said she, sitting up, and through her tears looking me full in the face, "nought ought we that sir, but I begin to sing it as if it came right out of here and here," putting her hand first on her heart, and her forehead, "I will sing it as I began I seemed to see a funeral—we were attending it with the other people in the left aisle of St. Thomas's Church."

"My God!" I said; "the very place out of which I followed my father!"

"It was a beautiful lady, in her very prime, with dark brown hair, and a face as rich, long and beside her exquisite marble face. There was a jasmine wreath—"

"Miel Bonbon! you will drive me mad. How could you know this? I was a child of eight years old then, and you were not born. Either you are an angel or a—"

Quick! water! God forgive me for the utter word, and be assured that I did not say it! My eyes—quite, quite away! I bore her to the sofa, and, in the calm till the servant answered my quick call. And then we sprinkled her face, threw up all the windows, used the vinaigrette, all in a hurry, and very desperation—thinking I had killed her—I clasped her tightly to my breast, as an only fresh rock of remembrance to her, strangely then, thank God! she opened her eyes.

"Are you angry with me, dear?" she whispered, faintly.

If I ever give you cause to think so again, let me be punished as I have been the last five minutes!"

Here we dropped the subject. I solved its whole mystery, for the sake of dismissing it, by supposing Miel Bonbon and I were in the same mesmeric rapport with one another—a case not unusual between men and women who are much together. Then I forced self-satisfaction from the shadow of a cloud which fails through the window, and I kissed away the tears and called them kindest that dark saying of Miel Bonbon's:

"There must be some strange, dreadful secret about my birth!"

The winter was over, and spring half-way on the road to summer. I remember the weeks were in full bloom on the back piazza, and the Stuyvesant pear-tree with his blossoming head seemed trying to make Old Petrus in powder —when I had to go to Chicago on business. No one was to be there after that—but called me was imminent—and I was to go by the lightning train. A prospect about as pleasant as a tour by constant—but I was to be absent only a week, and the latter, as sooner over with and no likelihood of absent little, it was to sleep sound, and, on every try to and not do it. I was to eat at counters down the river five minutes, and the dishes are bread wiped with a dirty towel, cold, clammy wiches, and the potables, water brought in a pail formerly used for the conveyance of lemons, called lemonade. If I ever reached there, I was to stay at Chicago only a day, and then return.

Accordingly, painful as I felt our first parting must be, I could not be so cruel as to take Miel Bonbon with me. She pleaded long and beseechingly, but my love made me decided, and I announced all was to stay with "Oh no, darling! no, my Miel Bonbon! You are too precious to me to be killed outright." And, with heroic repression of my marital weakness, I sternly packed one solitary carpet bag. Then came the inevitable, but indescribable, and for that reason, little weight as it has with most people, the by me undescribed tenderness of the first good-by.

A little handkerchief waving at the window. I kiss my hand a dozen times. Good-by for six whole days, Miel Bonbon!

The train had reached Bergen Cut, as in my handkerchief I sat reading the paper, upside down, I believe, though that don't matter, and I felt a heart beat close beside me, looked up, and saw—

"Why, Miel Bonbon! not a day gone—"

"It is an ugly dream, dear?"

What could a man say to this darling, wicked, faithful, sunny, pernicious, charming, suicidal little wife? Nothing but that she would kill herself, and he was in rapture to see her.

"But how did you get here? I had only just time enough, and you were not dressed when I left the house."

"I could not be away from you—I found myself here." What could I have said to that to believe literally true.

And as the little creature braved with me that whole miserable distance and fatigue—all day my comfort, all night my comforter; for she kept my warm warm, as she nestled on it under my great cloak. Really, we both of us came back less tired than I should have returned alone. Mrs.—, keeper of all hostesses who travel by land or sea, and whose wives want to go with them.

I gain sufficient attention to the present. I never make them. But I will own, mortifying as it is, that I never I came thoroughly awake to my previous fatigues—Western land. While I was at Chicago I had so little time that there was no temptation to catch an evil moment. But as I awoke next morning to my return, somebody induced me to join a Company of which young Bayley was the active president, and whose circular contained the signatures of Crowdenia, Corlidge, and there's no saying what other eminent eminently respectable.

This Company had meetings almost every night. Meetings for Organization. Meetings for steps. Meetings to take them back. Meetings for consideration. Meetings utterly without consideration. Meetings for conversation, and, for business, for nothing at all. And I was whirled into the vortex, gradually and somewhat from spiral to spiral, until at last there was never a meeting but I was present, and my whole life-interest became a refrain of two words, which converted to land, land converted to cash.

Stop! Mr. Charles Lawrence—there, Sir! right where you are.

Ho, there, without! Who dares call stop?

I felt I was going mad. Fever. I will say possible Death, glaring over his shoulder. For Miel Bonbon was stricken down. Yes, in all the exquisite beauty of her young, peach-blossom womanhood; in all the ripening sweets of wifely tenderness; in all the golden foreshadowing of the blissful mysteries of maternity; stricken down—down. In the unspeakable loss of her own dear love, day by day, she had been growing paler, whiter, more weirdly spiritual, from the very hour that I started on my unnatural chase. It was through me how lonely the house must have been to her while I was at the meeting—how it must have been from old times must have seemed. True woman! Like the dairy, she dried the dew on her cheek when her husband returned, and wept in the dark out.

As I stood by that bedside, where she whom I loved lay unconscious, I cursed myself, for my folly, through teeth shut in wrath and anguish.

"Ah! doctor, do I curse it too late?"

"Painful as the extreme case is at it, Sir, I can give you no hope."

Oh! you liar doctor says that, how the last prop suddenly gives way between man and the literal! I paid the doctor his fees, bowed—although he could not see out, and knelt over all alone with Miel Bonbon and the overshadowing angel. In the manner of my life I could have prayed—I did and had an evil eye, how the lands of the Land Company would have turned into sand-heaps, and their company to Dead Sea fruit. I prayed! But hold. The doctor was but a prop; he knocked away. I did—where? Upon the All-Great, the All-Good. I would pray.

For an hour I knelt, breathing no articulate language, but with my heart out, and lonely all alone.

I was attracted by the sound of the old mid-way hour—the first of May. I had been there a year. It came delirious. In an ecstasy I sprang to my feet and cried, "She lives—she lives!"

Oh, no! not by the doctor, but she is only talking wanderingly in her fever. Still that is a shocking sight to see delirium in the eyes that love you. I put my ear to her mouth, and, clasping her hand, listen to catch what she says.

Thus in love. "There was a young man once —he loved every thing good and true and beautiful—he used to love Miel Bonbon—he used to love in his soul—all the time. Slowly—little by little —these images began to form themselves into one —one of a woman—a beautiful woman—and beautiful. In the night—he sometimes saw her—in his soul—and—she was—my wife shall be such a woman. By-and-by she grew so strong—so living—that she did not—could not—stay an image—she became—she became—how can he came a real—live woman—and sat down on a rock —he was by a river—and—she was by his side."

"Oh, Heaven! the secret of Miel Bonbon!"

"Yes—that was the name—the strange, sweet name—that nobody—she did not know—she had always been his—he wondered at her. But he loved her—and oh!—how she loved him—and she —became his wife. By day and night—Miel Bonbon must—be near him—she was where his—thought was—his thought kept—her alive. By-and-by—"

Here her voice grew fainter. In the fascination of an almost despair I threw myself down by her side, and put my heart upon hers. The old remedy revived her once more. Still, tricksely, she went on.

"By-and-by—he began to love money—oh—it frightens me—so much—so—very much—for the truth—and beautiful things. He was trying to be like the—best—no—not the best—the best is soft and good—like young Cottin Bayles. He would have been in—a very—short time. As his heart—and his thought inside—began to rust—and grow dim—his thought and heart—outside—his Mist Bonton—began to sicken—and to die—that's she would never live again—if—if—"

Voice failing once more. Quick! quick! with desperation. Heart kept quiet, and voice will run thus before! Once more, thank God, she revives!

"If what, dearest? If what, my soul, Maid Bonton?"

"If—he does not—look steadily at her face —with his face—when—he turns—and think the old thoughts again."

Hope! hope! Glory in the highest! Hope!

Still pressing my heart close to Miel Bonton's as the Prophet of old upon the Shunamite's son. I looked my very deepest thought into hers—the like lids of my love; yes, and I thought the old thoughts after. For—with God as my witness—I swore my solemn oath that the dross-heap of this world should no more forever rise between me and the old thoughts of my soul. Why, I could have turned breath'd drew back the pure, beautiful former life —with every second on! I breathed that life anew into the fainting Miel Bonton.

For an hour I lay thus—every thought an acre, every act a mighty prayer! Lay with my heart—for at the end of that time—slowly, as one comes out of a trance—the dear old Miel Bonton awoke, and knew she what she had been saying. Then quick-ar and quicker returned bloom, roundness, strength. And she arose more mirrored than ever.

As she fell upon my neck weeping, yet living, loving and lovely as in the days of old, I said again, "My only beloved—my husband!" do you think that I sorrowed for that past lesson of misguide? No; for it taught me to love you, Miel Bonton, and now that I know it, I say to her,

"Yet the world, nay, not death even, shall part me and thee!"

A CROWN OF SORROW.

A Sorrow, wet with early tears
Yet bitter, had been long with me;
I wearied of the weight of years,
And would be free.

I tore my Sorrow from my heart,
I cast it far away in scorn;
Right joyful that we two could part,
Yet most forlorn.

I sought (to take my Sorrow's place)
Over the world for flower or gem;
But she had had an ancient grace
Unknown to them!

I took once more with strange delight
My ancient Sorrow. Proudly now
I wear it, set with stars of light,
Upon my brow!

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER X.

"Great are the uses of adversity,
Which, like the toad, ugly and venomous,
Wears yet a precious jewel in its head."

